CLEMENT, klem'ent (Kλέμεντς, Klémenes, "mind"): A fellow-worker with Paul at Philippi, mentioned with special commendation in Phil 4:3. The name being common, no inference can be drawn from this statement as to any identity with the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians published under this name, who was also the third Bishop of Rome. The truth of this supposition ("it cannot be called a tradition," Donaldson, The Apostolical Fathers, 120), although found in Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius and Jerome, can neither be proved nor disproved. Even Roman Catholic authorities dispute it (art. "Clement," E.Caller, Catholic Encyc., IV, 13). The resemblance between the two in time and place is against it; "a wholly uncritical view" (Curttwell, Literary History of Early Christianity, 31). H. E. Jacobs

CLEOPAS, klo-pàs (Kλεόπας, Kloiápas, "reunited father"): One of the two disciples whom Jesus met on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24:18). The name is a contraction of Cleopatros, not identical with Cleopas of Jn 19:25. See also ALPHEUS; CLOPAS.

CLEOPATRA, klo-pá-trà (Kλεόπατρα, Klio-pat'ra, "from a famous father"): A daughter of Ptolemy VI (Philometor) and of Queen Cleopatra, who was married first to Alexander Balas 150 BC (1 Mac 10:58; Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 1) and was afterward taken from him by her father and given to Demetrius Nicator on the invasion of Syria by the latter (1 Mac 11:12; Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 7). Alexander was killed in battle against the joint forces of Ptolemy and Demetrius while Demetrius was in captivity in Parthia. Cleopatra married his brother Antiochus VII (Sidetes), who in the absence of Demetrius had gained possession of the Syrian throne (137 BC). She was probably privy (Appian, Syr., 68) to the murder of Demetrius on his return to Syria 125 BC, but Josephus (Ant, XIII, ix, 3) gives a different account of his death. She afterward murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Nicator, who on his father's death had taken possession of the government without her consent. She attempted unsuccessfully to poison her second son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII (Grypus), for whom she had secured the succession, because he was unwilling to concede to her what she considered her due share of power. She was herself poisoned (120 BC) by the draught which she had prepared for their son (Justin 39). She had also a son by Antiochus VII (Sidetes Antiochus Cyzicenus), who took his name from the province of Cyzicus: he was probably privy (Appian, Syr., 68) to the murder of Demetrius on his return to Syria 125 BC, but Josephus (Ant, XIII, ix, 3) gives a different account of his death. She afterward murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Nicator, who on his father's death had taken possession of the government without her consent. She attempted unsuccessfully to poison her second son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII (Grypus), for whom she had secured the succession, because he was unwilling to concede to her what she considered her due share of power. She was herself poisoned (120 BC) by the draught which she had prepared for their son (Justin 39).

CLOAK, klok, CLOKE (κλοκα, m'dl, κλοκή, simlith, etc; ιμάτων, himatión, στόλή, stolé, etc): "Cloak" is retained in ERV, as in AV, instead of mod. "coak" (ARV). In the OT, m'dl (of NT himation) uniformly stands for the ordinary upper garment worn over the coat (k'thômen). In Mt 5:40 both "cloak" and "coat" are mentioned together; cf Lk 6:29. In size and material the "cloak" differed according to age and sex, class and locality. CLOPAS, IV. 15; 39. The word "cloak" is a vague word (of Lk 12:24, AV "storehouse"); it was probably originally the name of the tent specially set apart for the bride, and later (Joel 2:16) used for the bride's chamber. The word is used originally (of Lk 12:24, AV "storehouse"); but since for safety it was the inner rooms of the Heb house which were used for storage purposes, the word came to mean inner CLOTHED, klōthd, UPON (ἱγνασσε, epanēthai, “to put on over” another garment): Used only in 2 Cor 5:2. In 4:13, in contrast with unclothed, of 1 Cor 15:53 f., in which the idea of putting on, as a garment, is expressed of incorruption and immortality. The meaning here is very subtle and difficult of interpretation. In all probability Paul thinks of a certain enswathement of his physical mortal body even in this life (in this we groan, i.e. in this present body), hence the force of the pre-fixed preposition. The body itself was regarded by the philosophers of his day as a covering of the soul, and hence it was to be clothed upon and at the same time transformed by the superimposed heavenly body. Epanēthai, an outer garment, is used several times in LXX for μολυθρία, an upper garment or robe (cf. Jn 21:7).

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

CLOTHES, klōthz, RENDING OF (ἱγνασσε, κρίθαν βυθαδίμων): This term is used to describe an ordinary or fine garment made in a garment. Samuel’s skirt was rent when Saul laid hold upon it (1 S 15:27). Jesus spoke about a rent being made in a garment (Mt 9:16). The term is also used to describe a Heb custom which indicated deep sorrow. Upon the death of a relative or important personage, or when there was a great calamity, it was customary for the Hebrews to tear their garments. Reuben rent his clothes when he found that Joseph had been taken from the pit (Gen 37:29). The sons of Jacob rent their clothes when the calf was found in Benjamin’s sack (Gen 44:13). A messenger came to Eli with his clothes rent to tell of the taking of the ark of God and of the death of his two sons (1 S 4:12). David rent his garments when he heard that Absalom had slain his brothers (2 S 13:31). See also 2 S 15:22; 2 K 18:37; Isa 36:22; Jer 41:5. Rending of clothes was also an expression of indignation. The high priest rent his garment when Jesus spoke what he thought was blasphemy (Mt 27:3). See also Mourning.

CLOUD, klōd (ἵδη, ἀνά, 27, ἄβ, νεφόθ, νεφέω, νέφος, néphos): I. Clouds in Palestine.—In the Bible few references are found of particular clouds or of clouds in connection with the phenomena of the weather conditions. The weather in Pal is more even and has less variety than that in other lands. It is a long, narrow country with sea on the W. and desert on the E. The wind coming from the W. is always moist and brings clouds with it. If the temperature over the land is low enough the clouds will be condensed and rain will fall, but if the temperature is high, as in the five months of summer, there can be no rain even though clouds are seen. As a whole the winter is cloudy and the summer clear.

In the autumn rain storms often arise suddenly from the sea, and what seems to be a mere haze, “as small as a man’s hand,” such as the Sea, Gehazi saw (1 K 18:44) over the sea, may become the black stormy cloud pouring down torrents of rain (1 K 18:45). Fog is almost unknown and there is very seldom an overcast, gloomy day. The west and southwest winds bring rain (Lk 12:2).

In the months of April, May and September a hot east wind sometimes rises from the desert and brings with it a cloud of dust which fills the air and penetrates everything. In the summer after-noon, esp. in the month of August, on the seacoast there is apt to blow up from the S. a considerable number of low cirro-stratus clouds which seem to fill the air with dampness, making more oppressive the dead heat of summer. These are doubtless the detected “clouds without water” mentioned in Jude ver 12, and “heat by the shade of a cloud” (Isa 25:5).

II. Figurative Uses.—The metaphorical and symbolic uses of clouds are many and furnish some of the most powerful figures of Scripture. In the OT, Jeh’s presence is made manifest and His glory shown forth in a cloud. The cloud is usually Presence and Glory spoken of as bright and shining, and it could not be fathomed by man:

Jeh Himself was present in the cloud (Ex 19:9; 24:16; 34:5) and His glory filled the places where the cloud was (Ex 16:10; 40:38; Nu 10:34); “The cloud filled the house of Jeh” (1 K 8:10). In the NT we often have “the Son of man coming” or “with great clouds” (Mt 24:30; 26:64; Lk 17:21, 22) and received up by clouds (Acts 1:9).

The pillar of cloud was a symbol of God’s guidance and presence to the children of Israel in their journeys to the promised land. The Lord appeared in a pillar of cloud and forsook them not (Neh 9:19). They followed the guidance of this cloud (Ex 40:36; Ps 78:14).

The clouds are spoken of in the OT as the symbol of God’s presence and care over His people; and so the “bow in the cloud” (Gen 9:13) is a sign of God’s protection.

As the black cloud covers the sky and blots out the sun from sight, so Jehovah promises “to blot out the sins” of Israel (Isa 44:22); Egypt also shall be conquered, “As for her, a Blot Out shall cloud cover her” (Ezk 30:18; cf. Lam 2:1).

There is usually a wide difference in temperature between day and night in Pal. The days are warm and clouds coming from the sea are often completely dissolved in the warm atmosphere over the land. As the temperature falls, the moisture again condenses into dew and mist over the hills and valleys. As the sun rises the “morning cloud” (Hos 6:4) is quickly dispelled and disappears entirely. Job compares the passing of his prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 13:18).

God “bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds” (Job 26:8) and the “clouds are the dust of his feet” (Nah 1:3). Jehovah “commands the clouds to rain no rain” (Isa 5:6), but as for man, “who can number the clouds?” (Job 38:37); “Can any understand the spreadings of the clouds?” (Job 38:40)

6. God’s Omnipotence and Man’s Ignorance (Job 36:29); “Dost thou know the balancing of the clouds, the wondrous works of his hands is perfect?” (Job 37:16). See BALANCINGS. “He that regardeth the clouds shall not reap” (Eccl 11:4), for it is God who controls the clouds and man cannot fathom His wisdom. “Thick clouds are a covering to him” (Job 32:14).
Clouds are the central figure in many visions. Ezekiel beheld "a stormy wind . . . out of the north, a great cloud" (Ezk 1 4), and 7. Visions John saw "a white cloud; and on the cloud one sitting" (Rev 14 14). See also Dnl 7 13; Jer 44 4; Lam 4. The cloud is also the symbol of the terrible and of destruction. The day of Je'h's reckoning is called the "day of clouds" (Ezk 8 7; 13 4) and a day of "clouds and thick darkness" (Lev 1 15). The invader and Unpleasant is expected to "come up as clouds" (Jer 4 13). Joel (2 2) foretells the coming of locusts as "a day of clouds and thick darkness" which is both literal and figurative. Misfortunes and old age are compared to "the cloudy and dark day" (Ezk 34 12) and "the clouds returning after rain" (Ecc 12 2).

Clouds are used in connection with various other figures. Rapidity of motion, "these that fly as a cloud" (Isa 60 8). As swaddling clothes of the newborn earth (Job 33 Other 9); indicating great height (Job 20 6)

F igures and fig. in Isa 14 14, "I will ascend above the heights of the clouds," portraying the self-esteem of Babylon. "A morning without clouds but an evil day" (Ezk 3 32), comparing God's justice with the day (2 S 23 4); partial knowledge and hidden glory (Lev 16 2; Acts 1 9; Rev 17 1).

CLOUD, PILLAR OF. See Cloud, II, 2; PILLAR OF Coud.

CLOUT, klout: As subst. (παραστήσις, ha-φαδαθόν) a patch or piece of cloth, leather, or the like, a rag, a shred, or fragment. Old "cast cloths and old rotten rags" (Jer 39 11.12 AV). As vb. (κλυτόν, "to clout") "to bmpam, or rub with a clot.

Old shoes and clouted [AV "patched"] upon their feet" (Josh 9 5; cf Shakespeare, Cym., IV, 2: "I thought he slept, And put my clouted brogues from off my feet"; Milton, Comus: "And the dull swain treads on it daily with his clouted shoon.

CLOVEN, klö'v'n: In the OT, represented by a participle from בָּף, shā, "to split," and applied to beasts that divide the hoof (Lev 11 3; Dt 14 7). The beasts with hoofs completely divided into two parts, which were also ruminant, were allowed the Israelites as food; see CUD; Hoof. In the NT, for διωρισμένοι, diormizomenai, in Acts 2 3 AV, RV "tongues parted asunder," i.e. "bifurcated tongues." Another explanation found in Rb is "to divide the words, not to tongues, but to the multitude, "parting among them," or "distributing themselves among them," settling upon the head of each disciple.

CLUB, klub. See Armor, III, 1; SHEPHERD; STAFF.

CLUSTER, klus'ter: (1) יִם, 'akahlāt, of proper name VALE OF ESHCOL, (q.v.), from root meaning "to bind together." A cluster or bunch of grapes (Gen 40 10; Nu 13 23; Isa 66 8; Cant 7 8; Mic 7 1, etc); a cluster of henna flowers (Cant 1 14); a cluster of dates (Cant 7 7). "Their grapes are of gall, their clusters are bitter" (Dt 32 32).

(2) βότρυς, bōtrus, "gather the clusters of the vine of the earth" (Rev 14 18).

"cluster of raisins" (םִמְּרָיוֹת) of 1 S 25 18; 30 12, should rather be "raisin cakes" or "dried raisins." E. W. G. MASTERMAN

CHIDUS, nî'dus, knî'dus (Kripûs, Knîdês, "age"): A city of Caria in the Rom province of Asia, past which, according to Acts 27 7, Paul sailed. At the S.W. corner of Asia Minor there projects for 90 miles into the sea a long, narrow peninsula, practically dividing the Aegean from the Mediterranean. It now bears the name of Cape Creo. Ships sailing south from the interior of Asia Minor here turn northward as they round the point. Upon the very end of the peninsula, and also upon a small island off its point was the city of Cnidus. The island which in ancient times was connected with the mainland by a causeway is now joined to it by a sandy bar. Thus were formed two harbors, one of which could be closed by a chain. Though Cnidus was in Caria, it held the rank of a free city. There were Jews here as early as the 2d cent. BC.

The ruins of Cnidus are the only objects of interest on the long peninsula, and as they may be reached by land only with great difficulty, few travelers have visited them; they may, however, be reached more easily by boat. The nearest modern village is Yazi Keui, 6 miles away. The ruins of Cnidus are unusually interesting, for the entire plan of the city may easily be traced. The sea-walls and piers remain. The acropolis was upon the hill in the western portion of the town; upon the terraces below the ancient palace and temple, among which were two theaters and the odeum still well preserved. The city was esp. noted for its shrine of Venus and for the statue of that goddess by Praxiteles. Here in 1873-78 Sir C. Newton discovered the statue of Demeter, now preserved in the British Museum. See also the Aphrodite of Cnidus in the South Kensington Museum, one of the loveliest statues in the world. From here also came the huge Cnidian lion. The vast necropolis W. of the ruins contains tombs of every size and shape, and from various ages.

COAL, kol (קָוֶל, poham, "charcoal"); cf Aram, fa'am, "charcoal"; 7733, gaheleth, "burning coal" or "hot ember"; cf Aram, fa'am, "to kindle"; בַּכֶּר, sb'hôr, "a black coal" [Lam 4 8]; of Aram, shakbûr, "scot" or "dark-colored sandstone"; תַּבֵּק, roqeph [1 K 19 6], and ריקָפָה = Rikpah [Isa 6 6], m "a hot stone"; of בַּכֶּר, resheph, "a flame" [Cant 8 6; Hab 3 5]; עם, amâth, "a live coal" [Rom 12 20] (= gaheleth in Prov 25 22); וּמָקִיד, amakidîh, "a live coal" [Jer 18 18; 21 8]: There is no reference to mineral coal in the Bible. Coal, or more properly anthracite, of high quality, is found in thin beds (not exceeding 3 ft.) in the sandstone formation (see GEOLOGY, Nubian Sandstone), but there is no evidence of its use in ancient times. Charcoal is manufactured in a primitive fashion which does not permit the conservation of any by-products. A flat, circular place (Arab. beidar, same name as for a threshing-floor) 10 or 15 ft. in diameter is prepared in or conveniently near to the forest. On this mound, to be converted into charcoal, is carefully stacked in a dome-shaped structure, leaving an open space in the middle for fine kindlings. All except the center is first covered with leaves, and then with earth. The kindlings in the center are then fired and afterward covered in the same manner as the rest. While it is burning or smoldering it is carefully watched, and earth is immediately placed upon any holes that may be formed in the covering by the burning of the wood below. For several days, more or less, according to the species of trees, the wood is converted into charcoal and the heap is opened. The charcoal floor is also called in Arab. mashsharâh, from šhâhîr, "soot"; cf Heb sb'hôr. The characteristic odor of the mashsharâh clings for months to the spot.
In Ps 120 4, there is mention of "coals of juniper," RV "broom," rôdeh. This is doubtless the Arab. rebem, Retama roetam, Forsk., a kind of broom which is abundant in Judea and Moab. Charcoal from oak wood was used for Quercus centra, L. Arab. sindîyân, is much preferred to other kinds, and fetched a higher price.

In most of the passages where Eng. VSS have "coal," the reference is not necessarily to charcoal, but may be to coals of burning wood. Pêhem in Prov 25 21, however, seems to stand for charcoal:

"As coals are to hot embers, and wood to fire, so is a contentious man to inflame strife."

The same may be true of pêhem in Isa 44 12 and 54 16; also of akhîhîr in Lam 4 8.

COAST, köst (גוֹּת, gôth), etc., "boundary"; cf גֻּדָה, gôdâh, "mountain," and Arab. jetâb, "mountain"; גַּהֲל, gehâl, lit. "a rope"; cf Arab. hâbîl (Josh 19 29 AV; Zeph 2 5 6 7; מַגָּל, mîgal, "that which is wasted"; cf Arab. hâgîd) (Josh 9 1 AV; Eek 25 2 2); גַּהֲלון, gehâlôn, lit. "by the sea" (Lk 17): "Coast." (fr Lat costa, "rib" or "side") in the sense of "sea-coast," occurs but a few times in the Bible. In nearly all the passages where AV has "coast," RV correctly has "border," i.e. "boundary wood," etc. (Leg. 27 2 ARV, "coast" is the tr of πέρας, pérâs, lit. "place." That the seacoast is but seldom mentioned arises naturally from the fact that, while the promised land extended to the sea, the coast was never effectively occupied by the Israelites.

RVm in a number of places renders "island" (q.v.), by "coastland," E.g. Isa 11 11; 23 6; 24 15; 59 18; Jer 25 22; Eek 39 6; Dnl 11 18; Zeph 2 11. In Isa 20 6, AV has "isle." RVm "country." See ISLE.

COAT, köt. See CLOAK; DRESS, etc.

COAT OF MAIL, mál. See ARMOR, ARMS, BRIGANDINE.

COCK, kok (ןָכָה, nakâh; Lat gallus): There is no reference in the OT to cock as poultry, which was probably first introduced into Judea after the Roman conquest. See CHICKEN. The cock is several times mentioned in the NT and always with reference to its habit of crowing in eastern countries with such regularity as to be almost clocklike. The first full salute comes almost at the minute at half-past eleven, the second at half-past one, and the third at dawn. So uniformly do the cocks keep time and proclaim these three periods of night that we find cock-crowing mentioned as a regular division of time: "Watch therefore: for ye know not when the lord of the house cometh, whether at even, or at midnight, or at cock crowing, or in the morning" (Mt 24 44; Mk 13 35). Jesus had these same periods of night in mind when he warned Peter that he would betray Him. Mt 26 34; Mk 14 34; Lk 22 34; Jn 13 38, give almost identical wording of the warning. But in all his writing Mark was more explicit, more given to exact detail. Remembering the divisions of night as the cocks kept them, his record reads: "And Jesus saith unto him, Verily I say unto thee, that thou today, even this night, before the cock crow twice, shalt deny me thrice!" (Mk 14 30). See CHICKEN. It is hardly necessary to say that the cocks crow at irregular intervals as well as at the times indicated, according to the time of the year and the phase of the moon (being more liable to crow during the night if the moon is at the full), or if a storm threatens, or there is any disturbance in their neighborhood.

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

COCKATRICE, kok'a-tris, kok'a-tris (קָכָתִרִיס, qâkâtâris; פָּרֶדֶלָה, parâdelâh; LXX, βασιλικός, basilikós, "basilisk"; q.v.), etc., "asp," "asp" (see ADDER; ASP; SERPENT): A fabulous, deadly, monster. The name "cockatrice" appears to be a corruption of Lat calcatrix, from calcare, "to tread," calcatrix being in turn a tr of G δεμεω, ἱθνεμένον, ἱθνεμένη, from ἱσσος, ἱσνα, "track" or "footstep." Herpetes ichneuomon, the ichneumon, Pharaoh's rat, or mongoose, a weasel-like animal, is a native of northern Africa and southern Spain. There are also other species, including the Indian mongoose. It preys on rats and snakes, and does not despise poultry and eggs.

Pliny (see Oxford Dictionary, s.v. "Cockatrice") relates that the ichneumon darts down the open mouth of the crocodile and destroys it by gaving through its belly. In the course of time, as the story underwent changes, the animal was metamorphosed into a water snake, and was confused with the crocodile itself; and also with the basilisk. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th ed., the cockatrice was believed as late as the 17th century to be produced from a cock's egg and hatched by a serpent, and "to possess the most deadly powers, plants withering at its touch, and animals being assailed by its look. It stood in awe however of the cock, and the sound of cock-crowing turned it to stone. It was seldom alone among animals was unaffected by the glance of its evil eye, and attacked it at all times successfully; for when wounded by the monster's teeth it found a ready remedy in rue, the only plant which the cockatrice could not wound." The real ichneumon does kill the most deadly snakes, and has been supposed to resort to a vegetable antidote when bitten. It actually does however when bitten by a deadly snake, and does not possess a knowledge of herbs, but its extraordinary agility enables it ordinarily to escape injury. It is interesting to see how the changing tale of this creature with its marvelous powers has been a hodge-podge of ichneumon, weasel, crocodile, and serpent.

The Bib. references (AV Isa 11 8; 59 5; Jer 8 17) are doubtless to a serpent, the word "cockatrice," with its mediaeval implications, having been introduced by the translators of AV. See SERPENT.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COCK-CROWING, kok'kro-ing (αλεκτροφωνία, aletterophonia): An indefinite hour of the night between midnight and morning (Mk 13 35), referred to by all the evangelists in their account of Peter's denial (Mt 26 72; Lk 22 56; Jn 18 27); (Mk 13 38). It is derived from the habit of the cock to crow esp. toward morning. See COCK.

COCKER, kok'ér (רַכֹּר, râkôr; tilbêrân, "to turn, "coddle," "pamper"): Occurs only in Ezek 30 9 with the meaning "to pamper." "Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid"; so Shakespeare, "a cockered silken wanton," now seldom used; Jean Ingelow, "Poor folks cannot afford to cocker themselves."

COCKLE, kok'le (AVm "stinking weeds," RVm "noisome weeds"); נָבָשׁ, nôbâsh, from Heb root וָנָשׁ, wânas, "to stink;" βάτος, bâtos, "Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley" (Job 31 40). On account of the meaning of the Heb root we should expect that the reference was rather to repulsive, offensive weeds than to the pretty corn cockle. It is very possible that no particular plant is here intended, though the common Mediterranean "stinking" arums have been suggested by Hooker.

CODE OF HAMMURABI. See HAMMURABI, Code of.

COELE-SYRIA, sê-lê-sir'îa (AV Celosyria; Koîlη Συρία, Koîlî Ṣūrīa, "hollow Syria"): So the Greeks after the time of Alexander the Great named the valley lying between the two mountain ranges, Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is referred to in the OT as Bīḏraṯ ha-ʾLĪḇāḥānōn, "the valley of Lebanon" (Josh 11:17), a name the echo of which is still heard in el-Bukhāl, the designation applied today to the southern part of the valley. This hollow, which extends about 300 miles in length, is the continuation northward of the Jordan valley. The main physical features are described under Lebanon (q.v.). The name, however, did not always indicate the same tract of territory. In Strabo (xvi,2) and Ptolemy (v,15), it covers the fertile land between the river, which later was to be presided over by Damascus, and the Anti-Lebanon. In 1 Esd 2:17; 2 Macc 3:8, etc., it indicates the country S. and E. of Mt. Lebanon, and along with Phoenicia it contributed the whole of the Seleucid dominions which lay S. of the river Eleutherus. Jos includes in Coele-Syria the country E. of the Jordan, along with Scythopolis (Beisan) which lay on the W., separated by the river from the other members of the Decapolis (Ant, XIII, xii, 2, etc.). In XIV, iv, 6, he says, "Pompey annexed Coele-Syria as a part of the river Euphrates and Egypt to Scæurus." The term is therefore one of some elasticity.

W. EWING

COFFER, kōf'ér (Γόμ, "argôs"). A small box such as in which the Philis placed their golden mite and other offerings in returning the Ark (1 S 6:11.15).

COFFIN, kōf'ın. See CHEST; BURIAL.

COGITATION, koj-i-tā'shən, ἀγωγή, "the act of thinking or reflecting," as in Dn 7:28, "my cogitations much troubled me" (RV "my thoughts").

COHORT, ko'hört. In RV of Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Jn 18:13;2; Acts 10:1; 21:31; 27:1, the tr of σκόπεω (AV and RV, "band"); the tenth part of a legion; ordinarily about 600 men. In Jn 18 the word seems to be used loosely of a smaller body of soldiers, a detachment, detail. See ARMY; BAND.

COINS, kōnːz. There were no coins in use in Pal until after the Captivity. It is not quite certain whether and when, or at what time divided into pieces of a certain weight for use as money or not, but there can be no question of coinage proper until the Pers period. Darius I is credited with introducing a coinage system into his empire, and his were the first coins that entered into use among the Jews, though it seems probable that coins were struck in Lydia in the time of Croesus, the contemporary of Cyrus the Great, and these coins were doubtless the model upon which Darius based his system, and they may have circulated to some extent in Babylonia before the return of the Jews. The only coins mentioned in the OT are the Darics (see DARI), and these only in the RV, the word "dram" being used in AV (Bar 2:69; 8:27; Neh 7:67-72). The Jews had no native coins until the time of the Maccabees, who struck coins after gaining their independence about 143-141 BC. These kings struck silver and copper, or the latter, at least (see MONEY), in denominations of shekels and fractions of the shekel, until the Maccabees were overthrown by the Romans. Other coins were certainly in circulation during the same period, esp. those of Alexander and his successors, the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucids of Syria, both of whom bore sway over Pal before the rise of the Maccabees. Besides these coins there were the issues of some of the Phoen townships, which were allowed to strike coins by the Persians and the Seleucids. The coins of Tyre and Sidon, both silver and copper, must have circulated largely in Pal on account of the constant transactions between the Jews and Phoenicians (for examples, see under MONEY). After the advent of the Romans the local coinage was restricted chiefly to the series of copper coins, such as the mites mentioned in the NT, which slowly demised but was struck mostly at Rome, but circulating wherever the Romans went. The coins of the Herods and the Procurators are abundant, but all of copper, since the Romans did not allow the Jewish rulers to strike either silver or gold coins. At the time of the first revolt (66-70 AD) the Jewish leader, Simon, struck shekels again, as, some numismatists think, he was the first to do so. But this series was a brief one, lasting between 3 and 4 years only, as Jesus was taken by Titus in 70 AD, and this put an end to the existence of the Jewish state. There was another short period of Jewish coinage during the second revolt, in the reign of Hadrian, when Simon Barcochba struck coins with Heb legends which indicate his independence of the Romans. They were of silver, circulated as before, and constitute the last series of strictly Jewish coins (see MONEY). After this the coins struck in Judea were Rom, as Jesus was made a Rom colony.

COLA, kō'la. See CHOLA.

COLD, kōld (κόλδ, ἀγρός, ψυχρός [adj.], ψυχρός, ψυχής [nouns]): Pal is essentially a land of sunshine and warmth. The atmospheric cold of northern latitudes is unknown. January is the coldest month; but the degree of cold in a particular place depends largely on the altitude above the sea. On the coast and in the snow never falls; and the temperature reaches freezing-point, perhaps once in thirty years. In Jerus at 2,500 ft. above the sea the mean temperature in January is about 45°F., but the minimum may be as low as 25°. Snow occasionally falls, but lasts only a short time. On Mt. Hermon and on the Lebanons snow may be found the whole year, and the cold is most intense, even in the summer. In Jericho and around the Dead Sea, 1,292 ft. below sea-level, it is correspondingly hotter, and cold is not known.

Cold is of such short duration that no adequate provision is made by the people to protect themselves against the cold. The sun is always bright and warm, and nearly always shines for part of the day, even in winter. After sunset the people wrap themselves up and go to sleep. They prefer to wrap up their heads rather than their feet in order to keep warm. The only means of heating the houses is the charcoal brazier and the common fireplace from which as many as possible gather for a little warmth. It is merely a bed of coals in an iron vessel. Peter was glad to avail himself of the little heat of the coals as late as the beginning of April, when the nights are often chilly in Jerus: "Having made a fire of coals; for it was cold: ... and Peter also was with them, standing and warming himself" (Jn 18:18). There is no attempt made to heat the whole house. In the cold winter months the people of the mountains almost hibernate. They wrap up their heads in shawls and coverings and only the most energetic venture out: "The sluggish will not plow by reason of the winter" (Prov 20:4, AV "cold"). The peasants and more primitive people of the desert often make their homes in the open, and sometimes in Melita where Paul was cast ashore after shipwreck: "The barbarians ... kindled a fire ... because of the cold" (Acts 28:2).

Color, Colors

The cold is greatly dreaded because it causes so much actual suffering: “Who can stand before his cold?” (Ps 147 17). The last degree of degradation is to have “no covering in the cold” (Job 24 7).

3. Dread of Cold
In the heat of the long summer, the shadow of a rock or the cool of evening is most grateful, and the appreciation of a cup of cool water can easily be understood by anyone who has experienced the burning heat of the sun: “As cold water is to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country” (Prov 25 25); “cold of snow in the time of harvest” (Prov 25 13), probably with reference to the use of snow (shaved ice) in the East to cool a beverage.

Figurative uses: “The love of the many shall wax cold” (Mt 24 12); “I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot” (Rev 3 15).

COL-HOZEH, kol-hôze (kol-hôzê, kol-hôzech, “all seeing”); LXX omits: A man whose son Shallum rebuilt the fountain gate of Jerus in the days of Nehemiah (Neh 3 15). The C. of Neh 11:5 is probably another man.

COLIUS, kol-lîus (Kâlios, Kolios, 1 Esd 9 23). See Calitas.

COLLAR, kol-âr, kol-âr:
(2) (קְלַר, peh, lit. “mouth”). In Job 30 18 the word is used to indicate the collar band, or hole of a robe, through which the head was inserted. Job, in describing his suffering and writhing, mentions the disfiguring of his garment, and suggests that the whole thing feels as narrow or close-fitting as the neckband, or perhaps that in his fever and pains he feels as if the neckband itself is choking him.
(3) (קְלַר, גְּלַר, Jer 29 26, “stocks”; RV “shackles,” which see; ARV “collar”). An instrument of torture or punishment.

COLLECTION, kol-kehr-shun:
(1) In the OT (קְלַר, קְלַר, מַקְלִית, “something taken up”), used in 2 Ch 24 6.9 AV with reference to the tax prescribed in Ex 30 12.16; RV “tax.”
(2) In the NT “collection” is the gr given to λογια, λογια, found only twice (classical, συλλογη, συλλογη). It is used with reference to the collection which Paul took up in the gentile churches for the poor Christians in Jerus, as, for some reason, perhaps more severe persecutions, that church was esp., newly (1 Cor 16 1.2; ver 2 AV “gifts”). Other words, such as bounty, contribution, blessing, alms, ministration, are used to indicate this same ministry. Paul seems to have ascribed to it great importance. Therefore, he planned it carefully long in advance, and prepared, wisely securing for it; he delegated carefully chosen to take it to Jerus; and, in spite of dangers, determined himself to accompany them. Evidently he thought it the crowning act of his work in the provinces of Galatia, Asia, Macedonia and Achia, for as soon as it was finished he purposed to go to Rome and the West (Acts 24 17; Rom 15 25.28; 2 Cor 8,9). See also COMMUNION.

G. H. TREVES

COLLEGE, kol-ej: This is the rendering of AV for Heb Mishneh (מִשְׁנֶה, mishneh, 2 K 22 14 = 2 Ch 34 22; cf Zeph 1 10). It is found in the Tg of Jonathan on 2 K 22 14 and rests on a faulty combination with Mish, the well-known code of laws of the 2d cent. AD. RV renders “second quarter” (of the city); 2 Ch 34 22 AVm “the school.”

COLLOP, kol’up (קְלָפ, pînâh): A slice of meat or “fat.” AV in Job 15 57, “maketh collops of fat [thick folds of flesh] on his flanks,” said of the “wicked man.” ARV reads “has gathered fat upon his loins.”

COLONY, kol’o-ni (kolonia, kolônia, Gr transliteration of Lat colonia, from γολονια, “cultivato”): The word occurs but once (Acts 16 12) in reference to Philippi in Macedonia. Rom colonies were of three kinds and of three periods: (1) Those of the early republic in which they were established in conquered towns to serve the state as guardians of the frontier, were exempt from ordinary military service. They were distinguished as (a) a ciuitem Romanorum, wherein the colonists retained Rom citizenship, unus, received Rom citizenship only when elected to magistracies. (2) The colonies of the Graccan period, established in pursuance of the scheme of agrarian reforms, to provide land for the poorer citizens. (3) After the time of Sulla colonies were founded in Italy by the Republic as a device for granting lands to retiring veterans, who of course retained citizenship. This privilege was appropriated by Caesar and the emperors, who employed it to establish military colonies, chiefly to garrison the provinces, with various rights and internal organizations. To this class belonged Philippi. Partly organized after the great battle of 42 BC, fought in the neighboring plain by Brutus and Cassius, the colony was established as a colony by Octavian (afterward styled Augustus) after the battle of Actium (31 BC), under the name Colonia Augusti. Jul. Philippus or Philip, emperor. It received the same colonia, whereby provincial cities acquired the same status as Italian cities, which possessed municipal self-government and exemption from poll and land taxes. See Citizenship; Philippi; Roman.

COLOR, kul’er, COLORS, kul’er: The word trd “color” in AV is ὄψις, which lit. means “eyes” or “appearance,” and has been so trd in RV. In the NT the Gr χρώμα, χρώμα, has the meaning of predece or show (Acts 27 30; cf Rev 17 4 AV). The references to Joseph’s coat of many colors (Gen 37 3.33.32) and “garments of divers colors” (2 13 18.19) probably do not mean the color of the garment at all, but the form, as suggested in AVm, “a long garment with sleeves.” In Jgs 5 30 the word for “dip” or “dye” in Gr cannot be original and has been so trd in ARV (see Dye). In 1 Ch 29 2 (יוּרר), ῥυτίμα, meaning “variegated,” hence “varicolored,” is found. In Isa 54 11, πῦθθ is used. This name was applied to the sulphide of antimony (Arab. koîb) used for painting the eyes. Hence the ARVM rendering “antimony” instead of “fair colors” (see PAINT). In Ezek 16 9 (יוֹרָר), פַּלְטָּן, is found, meaning “covered with pieces” or “spotted,” hence by implication “divers colors.”

Although the ancient Hebrews had no specific words for “color,” “paint” or “painter,” still, as we know, they commonly met with displays of the art of coloring among the Babylonians (Ezk 23 14) and Egyptians and the inhabitants of Pal. Potter.
glazed bricks, glassware, tomb walls, sarcophagi, wood and fabrics were submitted to the skill of the colorist. This skill probably consisted in bringing out the colors by the use of a few primary colors, rather than in any attempt at the blending of shades which characterizes modern coloring. That the gaudy show of their heathen neighbors attracted the children of Israel is shown by such passages as Jgs 8:27; Ezk 23:12-16.

Two reasons may be given for the indefiniteness of many of the Bib. references to color. (1) The origin of the Heb people: They had been wandering tribes or slaves with no occasion to develop a color language. (2) Their religious laws: These forbade expression in color or form (Ex 20:4). Yielding to the attractions of gorgeous display was discouraged by such prophets as Ezekiel, who had sickened of the abominations of the Chaldeans. (Ezk 23:14-15.16); “And I said unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes” (Ezk 20:7).

Indefiniteness of color language is common to oriental literature, ancient and modern. This does not indicate a want of appreciation of color but a failure to apply and define color effects. The inhabitants of Syria and Pal today delight in brilliant colors. Bright yellow, crimson, magenta and green are used for adornment with no evident sense of fitness, according to the foreigners’ eyes, other than a correspondence with the glazing brightness of the eastern skies. A soapmaker once told the writer that in order to make his wares attractive to the Arabs he colored them a brilliant crimson or yellow. A peasant chooses without hesitation a flaring magenta or yellow or green sunflower (gulfike), rather than one of somber hues. The oriental student in the chemical or physical laboratory often finds his inability to distinguish or classify color a real obstacle. His closest definition of a color is usually “lightish” or “darkerish.” This is not due to color blindness but to a lack of education, and extends to lines other than color distinctions. The colloquial language of Pal today is poor in words denoting color, and an attempt to secure from a native a satisfactory description of some simple color is usually disappointing.

The harmonious color effects which have come to us from the Orient have been, in the past, more the result of accident (see Dye) than of deliberate purpose, as witness the clashing of colors where such artists have been in contact.

This inability of the peoples of Bible lands to define colors is an inheritance from past ages, a consideration which helps us to appreciate the vagueness of many of the Bib. references.

The following color words occur in the AV or RV: (1) bay, (2) black, (3) blue, (4) brown, (5) crimson, (6) green, (7) grey, (8) hoar, (9) purple, (10) red, (11) scarlet, (12) surrel, (13) vermilion, (14) white, (15) yellow. In addition there are indefinite words indicating mixtures of light and dark: (a) grialed (griazled), (b) ringstraked (ringstraked), (c) speckled, (d) spotted.

(1) Bay or red is more properly tr1 “strong” in the RV. (2) Black (blackish): Eight different words have been tr “black.” They indicate various meanings such as “dusky like the early dawn,” “ashen,” “swarth,” “moved with passion.” Black is applied to hair (Lev 16:31; Cant 5:11; Mt 6:36); to marble or pavement (Est 1:6); to mourning (Job 30:30); to passion (Jer 22:11 AV; Lam 5:10); to horses (Zec 6:2; Rev 6:5); to the heavens (1K 18:45; Job 3:5; Prov 7:9 AV; Jer 4:28; Mic 3:6); to the sun (Rev 6:12); to the skin (racial) (Cant 1:56); to flocks (Gen 30:32:33:35:40); to brooks because of ice (Job 5:16).

(3) Blue (פרת, tikkéleth, a color from the cereum musel): This word was applied only to fabrics dyed with a special blue dye obtained from a shellfish. See Dye. בּ, shesh, in one passage of the AV is tr1 “blue” (Est 1:6). It is properly tr2 in RV “royal blue cloth.” “Blissness of a wound” (Prov 20:30) is correctly rendered in RV “stripes that wound.” Blue is applied to the fringes, veils, vestments, embroideries, etc., in the description of the ark and tabernacle (Ex 25:5 ff; Nu 4:6 ff; 16:38); to workers in blue (2Ch 2:14; 3:14); to palace adornments (Est 1:6); to royal apparel (Est 8:15; Jer 10:9; Ezk 23:6; 27:24).

(4) Brown: The Heb word meaning “sunburnt” or “swarth” is tr1 “black” in RV (Gen 30:32 ff).

(5) Crimson (כרמל, karml): This word is probably of Pers origin and applies to the brilliant dye obtained from a bug. A second word פרת, tóla’ath, is also found. Its meaning is the same. See Dye. Crimson is applied to raiment (2Ch 2:7:14; 3:14; Jer 4:30 AV); to sins (Isa 1:18).

(6) Green (greenish): This word in the tr refers almost without exception to vegetation. The Heb פֶּנֶק, “gârâb, lit. “pâl,” is considered one of the three definite colors thus used in the AV. The Gr equivalent is chlôros; cf. Eng. “chlorine.” This word occurs in the following vs: Gen 1:30; 9:3; Ex 10:15; Lev 2:14 (AV); 23:14 (AV); 2K 19:20; Ps 37:6; Isa 15:6; 27:27; Job 39:8; chlôros, Mt 5:22; Rev 8:7; 9:4. פרת, “holánd, closely allied in meaning to gârâb, is used to describe trees in the following passages: Dl 12:2; 1K 14:23; 2K 16:14; 17:19; 19:26; 2Ch 28:4; Job 15:32; Ps 37:37; 52:8; Cant 1:16; Isa 57:5; Jer 2:20; 3:6; 11:16; 17:2:8; Ezk 6:13; Hos 12:8. In the remaining vs the Heb equivalents do not denote color, but the condition of being full of sap, fresh or unripe (of similar uses in Eng.) (Gen 30:37 [AV]; Jgs 16:7; Ps 23:2; Cant 2:13; Job 8:16; Ezk 17:24; 20:47; Lk 23:31). In Est 1:6 the Heb word refers to a fiber, probably cotton, as is indicated by ARVm. Greenish is used to describe leprosy spots in Lev 13:49; 14:37. The same word is tr1 “yellow” in Ps 68:13.

(7) Grey: The Heb זֶהוּד, stókhád, means old age, hence refers also to the color of the hair in old age (Gen 42:38; 43:29; 44:21; Da 2:29; Ps 71:18; Hos 7:9). See Hoar, next paragraph.

(8) Hoar (hoary): The same word which in other vs is tr1 “gray” is rendered “hoar” or “hoary,” applying to the hair in 1K 2:9:6; Isa 46:4; Lev 19:22; Job 41:22; Prov 16:15. Another Heb word is tr1 “hoary” or “hoary,” describing “frost” in Est 16:14; Job 38:29; Ps 147:16.

(9) Purple: The Heb equivalent is לשון, "argâmân, Gr ρυγίφα, porphira. The latter word refers to the source of the dye, namely, a shellfish found on the shores of the Mediterranean. See Dye. This color, which varied widely according to the kind of shellfish used and the method of dying, was utilized in connection with the adornment of the tabernacle (Ex 25:26, 27, 35, 36, 39; Nu 4:14). There were workers in purple called to assist in beautifying the temple (2Ch 2:7:14; 3:14). Purple was much used for royal raiment and furnishings (Jgs 8:26; Est 1:6; 8:15; Cant 3:10; Mk 1: 19, 19:1:2). Purple was typical of gorgeous ornament (Prov 22:14; 27:7; 56; Ezk 27:7:16; Lk 16:19; Acts 16:14; Rev 17:5; 18:12:16).

(10) Red: The Heb דיים, "d'hôm, is from ל, "dám, “blood,” hence, “blood-like.” This is one of the three distinctive color words mentioned in the OT (see Green; White), and is found in most of the references to red. Four other words are used: (a) χρωμάτως, kakihóri, probably “darkened” or “clouded”; (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); (b) ἄμμαρ, to ferment; (Ps 75 8m; Isa 27 2 AV); (c) σκόρφος, bōhot, probably “to gisten” (Est 1 6); (d) πυρρός, purroús, “firelike” (Mt 16 2 3; Rev 6 4; 12 3). Red is applied to dyed skins (Ex 25 26 14; 35 7 23; 36 19; 39 34); to the color of animals (Nu 19 2; Zec 1 8; 6 2; 14 6; 12 8); to the human skin (Gen 25 25; ruddy, 1 S 16 12; 17 42; Cant 5 10; Lam 4 7); to the eyes (Gen 49 12; Prov 23 29); to sors (Lev 13); to wine (Ps 75 8m; Prov 23 31; Isa 27 2 AV); to the water (2 K 3 22); to the sea (Gen 50 20); to pottage (Gen 36 30); to apparel (Isa 63 2); to the sky (Mt 16 2 3); to sins (Isa 1 18); to a shield (Nah 2 3).

(11) Scarlet: Scarlet and crimson colors were probably from the same source (see Crimson; Dyes). ἀκροαί, tóla'ath, or derivatives have been trd by both “scarlet” and “crimson” (Gr κόκκινος). A Chald word for purple has thre been trd “scarlet” in AV (Dn 5 7 16 29). Scarlet is applied to fabrics or yarn used (a) in the equipment of the tabernacle (Ex 25 25ff; Nu 4 8); (b) in rites in cleansing lepers (Lev 14); in ceremonies of Passover purification (Nu 9 6 8 12); in the marriage ceremony (Nah 2 3); in the ceremony of ordination (Ps 8 3 24; Prov 31 21; Lam 4 5; Dn 5 7 16 29, “purple”; Nah 2 3; Mt 27 28; Rev 17 4 18 12 16); to marking thread (Gen 38 28 30; Josh 2 18 21); to lips (Cant 4 5); to sins (Isa 1 18); to beasts (Rev 17 3); to wool (He 9 19).

(12) Sorrel: This word occurs once in the RV (Zec 1 8).

(13) Vermilion: This word, ἀριβόν, šhishar, occurs in two passages (Jer 22 14; Ezek 23 14). Vermilion of modern art is a sulphide of mercury. It is not at all improbable that the paint referred to was an oxide of iron. This oxide is still taken from the ground in Syria and Pal and used for decorative outlining.

(14) White: The principal word for denoting whiteness in the Heb was יֶשֶׂף, lābbān, a distinctive color word. Some of the objects to which it was applied show that it was used as we use the word “white” (Gen 49 12). Mt. Lebanon was probably named because of its snow-tipped peaks (Jer 18 14). White is applied to goads (Gen 30 35); to rods (Gen 30 37); to teeth (Gen 49 12); to leprous hairs and spots (Lev 13; Nu 12 10); to garments (Eccel 9 8; Dn 7 9); as symbol of purity (Dn 11 35; 12 10; Is 1 15); to horses (Zec 1 8; 6 8 3); to tree branches (Ez 17 7); to corderoller seed (Ez 16 31). The corresponding Gr word, λευκός, leukós, is used in NT. It is applied to hair (Mt 5 36; Rev 1 14); to raiment (Mt 17 2; 28 3; Mk 9 3; 16 5; Lk 9 29; Jn 20 12; Acts 1 10; Rev 3 4 5 18; 6 11; 7 9 13 14; 19 14); to horses (Rev 6 2; 19 11 14); to a throne (Rev 20 11); to stone (Rev 2 17); to a cloud (Rev 14 14). Besides lābbān, four other Heb words have trd “white”: (a) מַגָּדַר, hōr, or מַגָּדַר, hār, meaning “bleached,” applied to bread (Gen 40 16); to linen (Est 1 6; 8 15); (b) צַע, ḣāb, or מַצַּע, ḥābor, lit. “dazzling,” is applied to appearance (Gen 5 10); to human appearance (Cant 5 10); to wool (Ezk 27 18); (c) יְדָו, yād, probably mother of pearl or alabaster (Est 1 6); (d) מַגָּי, ṣār, lit. “sails,” and, from resemblance, “white of egg” (Job 6 6).

(15) Yellow: This word occurs in Est 1 6 to describe pavilion; in Lev 15 to describe leprous hair; in Mt 13 23 to describe gold. Mixtures of colors: (a) grizzled (grized), lit. “spotted with hair,” applied to goats (Gen 31 10 12); to horses (Zec 6 3 6); (b) ringstreaked (ringstreaked), lit. “striped with bands,” applied to animals (Gen 30 35 5; 51 8 7); (c) speckled, lit. “dotted or spotted,” applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32 32; 31 8 7); to a bird (Jer 12 9); to horses (Zec 1 8 4); (d) spotted, lit. “covered with patches,” applied to cattle and goats (Gen 30 32 32). In Jule’s ver 32 “spotted” means “defiled.”

COLOSSAE, kō-lōs’sē (Kolossai, Kolossos, “punishment!” AV Colossos): A city of Phrygia on the Lycus River, one of the branches of the Maeander, and 3 miles from Mt. Cedrums, 8013 ft. high. It stood at the head of a gorge where the two streams unite, and on the great highway traversing the country from Ephesus to the Euphrates valley, 13 miles from Hierapolis and 10 from Laodicea. Its history is chiefly associated with that of these two cities. Early, according to both Herodotus and Xenophon, it was a place of great importance. There Xerxes stopped 481 BC (Herod. vii.30) and Cyrus the Younger marched 401 BC (Xen. Anat. 1.20). From Col 2 it is not likely that Paul visited the city; and its Christianization was due to the efforts of Epaphras and Timothy (Col 1 1 7), and it was the home of Philemon and Epaphras. That a church was established there early is evident from Col 4 12 13; Acts 19 1 11 24. As the nearest city to Hierapolois and Laodicea, increased in importance, Colossae declined. There were many Jews living there, and a chief article of commerce, for which the place was renowned, was the colossina, a peculiar wood, probably of a purple color. In religion the people were specially lax, worshipping angels. Of them, Michael was the chief, and the protecting saint of the city. It is said that once he appeared to the people, saving the city in time of a flood. It was this being in angels which called forth Paul’s epistle (Col 2 18). During the 7th and 8th cents. the place was overrun by the Saracens; in the 12th cent. the church was destroyed by the Turks and the city disappeared. Its site was explored by Mr. Hamilton. The ruins of the church, the stone foundation of a large theater, and a necropolis with stones of a peculiar shape are still to be seen. During the Middle Ages the place bore the name of Chonae; it is now called Chonas. E. J. BANKS

COLOSSIANS, kō-lōsh’ans, kō-lō-sh’ans, EPISCOPE TO THE: This is one of the group of St. Paul’s epistles known as the Captivity Epistles (see Philonem, Episcope to, for a discussion of these as a group).

J. AUTHENTICITY.—The external evidence for the Epistle to the Colossians, prior to the middle of the 2d cent., is rather indeterminate. In the 1. External Ignatius and in Polycarp we have here evidence and there phrases and terminology that suggest an acquaintance with Col but not much more (Ignat. Ephes., x, 3, and Polyc. x, i; cf Col 1 23). The phrase in Ep Barnabas, xii, “in him are all things and unto him are all things,” may be due to Col 1, but it is quite as possibly a liturgical formula. The references in Justin Martyr’s Dialogue to Christ as the firstborn (πρῶτος) are very probably suggested by Col 1 15, “the firstborn of all creation” (Dial., 84, 85, 138). The first definite witness is Tertullian, who included this epistle in papyrus, written by St. Paul (Tert., Adv. Marc., v.19). A little later the Muratorian Fragment mentions Col among the Epistles of St. Paul (106, 1. 21, Colossians). Irenaeus quotes it frequently and by name (Adv. haer., iii.14, 1). It is familiar to the writers. of the following cents. (e.g. Tert., De praescr., 7; Clem. Alex., Strom., I, 1; Orig., Contra Celsum, v.8).

The authenticity was not questioned until the second quarter of the 19th cent. when Mayerhoff claimed the epistle, viz.

2. Internal Evidence—The Tübinger school claimed, on the basis of a supposed Gnosticism, that the epistle was the work of the 2d cent. and so not Pauline. This position has been thoroughly answered by showing that the teaching is essentially different from the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., esp. in the conception of Christ as prior to and greater than all things created (see V below). The attack in later years has been chiefly on the ground of vocabulary and style, the doctrinal position, esp. the Christology and the teaching about angels, and the relation to the Ephesian epistle. The objection on the ground of vocabulary and style is based, as is so often the case, on the assumption that a man, no matter what he writes about, must use the same words and style. There are thirty-four words in Col which are not in any other NT book. When one removes those that are due to the difference in subject-matter, the total is reduced to twenty-five. The omission of familiar Pauline particles, the use of genitives, of “all” (paš), and of synonyms, find parallels in other epistles, or are due to a difference of subject, or perhaps to the influence of the language of his life in Rome (von Soden). The doctrinal position is not at heart contradictory to St. Paul’s earlier teaching (cf. Götter, Intro NT; St. Paul’s Epistles, 440 f). The Christology is in entire harmony with Phil. (as generally admitted as Pauline), and is only a development of the teaching in 1 Cor (8 6; 15 24-28), esp. in respect of the emphasis laid on “the cosmic activity of the preincarnate Christ.” Finally, the form in which St. Paul puts the Christology is that best calculated to meet the false teaching of the Colossian heretics (v. Bellow).

In recent years H. Holtzmann has advocated that this epistle is an interpolated form of an original Pauline epistle to the Colossians, and the work of the author of the Epistle to the Ephesians (q.v.). A modification of this theory of interpolation has recently been suggested by J. Weiss (TLZ, September 29, 1900). Both these theories are too complicated to stand, and even von Soden, who at first followed Holtzmann’s method (von Soden, Eval., 12), while Sanday (DBS) has shown how utterly untenable it is. Sober criticism today has come to realize that it is impossible to deny the Pauline authorship of this epistle. This position is strengthened by the close relationship between Col and Philem, of which Renan says: “Paul alone, so it would seem, could have written this little masterpiece” (Abbott, JCC, ivii). If Philem (q.v.) stands as Pauline, as it must, then the authenticity of Col is established beyond controversy.

II. Place and Date.—The Pauline authorship being established, it becomes evident at once that the apostle wrote Col along with the other Captivity Epistles, and that it is best dated from Rome (see Philem, Epistle to), and during the first captivity. This would be about 58 or, if the later chronology is preferred, 63 or 64.

III. Destination.—The epistle was written, on the face of it, to the church at Colossae (q.v.), a town in the Lycus valley where the gospel had been preached by Mark (Col 1:5), and where St. Paul was, himself, unknown personally (1 4.8-9; 2 15). From the epistle it is evident that the Colossian Christians were Gentiles (1 27) for whom, as such, the apostle feels a responsibility (2 1 ff). He sends to them Tychicus (4 7), who is accompanied by Onesimus, one of their own community (4 9), and urges them to be sure to read another letter which will reach them from Laodicea (4 16).

IV. Relation of Col to Other NT Writings.—Beyond the connection with Eph (q.v.) we need notice only the relation between Col and Rev. In the letter to Laodicea (Rev 3 14–21) we have two expressions: “the beginning of the creation of God,” and “I will give to him to sit down with me in my throne,” in which we have an echo of Col which “suggests an acquaintance with and recognition of the earlier apostle’s teaching on the part of St. John” (Lightfoot, Col, 42, n. 5).

V. The Purpose.—The occasion of the epistle was, we may be sure, the information brought by Epaphras that the church in Colossae was subject to the assault of a body of Judaistic Christians who were seeking to overthrow the faith of the Colossians and weaken their regard for St. Paul (Zahn). This “heresy,” as it is commonly called, has had many explanations. The Tübinger school taught that it was gnostic, and sought to find in the terms the apostle used evidence for the 2d cent. composition of the epistle. Phrōma and gnōsis (“wisdom” and “knowledge”) are terms with a gnostic interpretation, but will not admit it. The very heart of Gnosticism, i.e. the theory of emanation and the dualistic conception which regards matter as evil, finds no place in Col. The use of phrōma in this and in other epistles shows it is a gnostic view, whether held by the apostle or by the readers of the letters. The significance in Col of this and the other words adopted by Gnosticism in later years is quite distinct from that later meaning.

The teaching of the Colossians is thus a gnostic, but not gnostic in the way in which the apostle uses the words in his epistles. The Christ of the Colossians is not the angel Christ of Gnosticism. In Esseniism, on the other hand, Lightfoot and certain Germans seek the origin of this heresy. Esseniism has certain affinities with Gnosticism on the one side and Judaism on the other. Two objections are raised against this explanation of the origin of the Colossian heresy. In the first place Esseniism, as we know it, is found in the neighborhood of the Dead Sea, and there is no evidence for its establishment in the Lycus valley. In the second place, no references are found in Col to certain distinct Essene teachings, e.g. those about marriage, washings, communism, Sabbath rules, etc.

The Colossian heresy is due to Judaistic influences on the one hand, and to the growth of apocalyptic and gnostic views on the other. The Judaistic elements in this teaching are patent, circumcision (2 11), the law (2 14.15), and special seasons (2 16). But there is more than Judaism in this false teaching. Its teachers look to intermediary spirits, angels whom they worship; and insist on a very strict asceticism. To seek the origin of angel worship in Judaism, as is commonly done, is, as A. L. Williams has shown, to miss the real significance of the attitude of the Jews to angels and to magnify the bitter jeers of Celsus. Apart from phrases used in exorcism and magic he shows us that there is no evidence that the Jews ever worshipped angels (JTS, X, 413 f). This element in the Colossian heresy was local, finding its antecedent in the worship of the river spirits, and in later years the same tendency gave the impulse to the worship of St. Michael as the patron saint of Colossae (so too Ramsay, HDB, s.v. “Colossae”). The danger and the falsehood in this teaching were twofold.

In the first place (Col 2 8-17; 2 13, 14) there was the wearing of the bands of the Law once more, not now with the formality of the Galatian opponents, but none the less surely. But as the apostle’s readers are Gentiles (2 27) St. Paul is not interested in showing the preparatory aspect of the Law. He simply insists to them that they are quite free from all obligations of the Law because Christ, in whom they have been baptized (3 12), has blotted out all the Law (2 14). The second danger is that their belief in and worship of the Christ, as they were taught about Christ and the material world, would develop even further than it had. They, because of their union with Him, need not fear no angelic being. Christ has triumphed over them all, leading them as it were captives in His train (2 15), as He conquered on the cross. The spiritual powers cease to have any authority over the Christians. It is to set Christ forward, in this way, as Head over all creation as very God, and out of His relation to the church and to the universe to develop the Christian life, that the apostle writes.

VI. Argument.—The argument of the Epistle is as follows:

1. 1-2: Salutation.

2. 3-8: Thanksgiving for their faith in Christ, their love for the saints, their hope laid up in heaven, which they had in and through the gospel and of which he had heard from Epaphras.

3. 9-15: Prayer that they might be filled with the full knowledge of God's will so as to walk worthy of the Lord and to be fruitful in good works, thankful for their inheritance of the kingdom of His Son.

4. 16-23: Statement of the Son's position, from whom we have redemption. He is the very image of God, Coexistent, the Head of the church, preëminent over all, in whom all the fullness (pleroma) dwells, the Reconciler of all things, as also of the Colossians, through His death, proved very faithful to the hope of the gospel.

5. 24-2: 5: By his suffering he is filling up the sufferings of Christ, of whom he is a minister, even to reveal the great mystery of the ages, that Christ is in them, the Gentiles, the hope of glory, the object of the apostle's preaching everywhere. This explains Paul's interest in them, and his care for them, that their hearts may be strengthened in the love and knowledge of Christ.

6. 6-3: 4: He then passes to exhortation against those who are leading them astray, these false teachers of a vain, deceiving philosophy based on worldly wisdom, who ignore the truth of Christ's position, as One in whom all the Divine pleroma dwells, and their relation to Him, united by baptism, raised through the faith; quickened and forgiven; wherefore they in imitation of the observance of various legal practices, strict asceticism and angel worship. This exhortation is closed with the appeal that as Christ's they will not submit to these regulations of men which are useless, esp. in comparison with Christ's power through the Resurrection.

7. 5-17: Practical exhortations follow to real mortification of the flesh with its characteristics, and the substitution of a new life of fellowship, love and peace.

8. 18-4: 1: Exhortation to fulfill social obligations, as wives, husbands, children, parents, slaves and masters.

4. 2-6: Exhortation to devout and watchful prayer.

8. 7-18: Salutations and greeting.

COLT, költ (FOAL) (γόλτ, 'ayir, γόλτ, 'ait, 'ait, pólitos, idós, hólos, with some word such as ἑσπερία, ἥπερομεία, understood; hólos alone = 'son'); the Eng. words "colt" and "foal" are used in the Bible of the ass everywhere except in Gen 32 15, where the word "colt" is used of the camel in the list of animals destined by Jacob as presents for Esau. In most cases 'ayir (cf Arab. 'fir, "fess") means "ass", "colt"; but it may be used with the word, "son", as in Zec 9 9, where we have: 'al-lámi ur-ur-ayir ben-'âdônîth, lit. "on an ass, and on an ass's colt, the son of the she-asses"; cf Mt 21 5: ἐπὶ δόμον καὶ ἐπὶ πόλιον ἱππομει-ασφε-ρια, epi ónon kai epi pólion hiodón hupougen-ten, "upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass." In Jn 12 15 we have ἐπὶ δόμον πόλιον, epi pólion ónon, and in the previous ver the diminutive, ὅπαρον, ὅπαριον. The commonest NT word for "colt" is póllo, akin to which is Ger. Pohle and Eng. "foal" and "filly." The Lat. pullus signifies either "foal" or "chicken," and in the latter sense gives rise to Fr. poulet and Eng. "pullet."

In view of the fact that horses are but little mentioned in the Bible, and that only in connection with royal equipages and armies, it is not surprising that "colt" does not occur in its ordinary Eng. sense.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COME, kum: The tr of many Heb and Gr words. In the phrase "The Spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him" (Jgs 14 6.19; 15 14; 1 S 10 10; 11 6; 16 13), the word is Kat'óh; Jgs 14 6; 15 14 "came mightily," which is the uniform tr of RV (cf 13 25 "to move"); i.e. to disturb or stir up. "Come" in 1 Ch 12 18; 2 Ch 24 20, it is lâbâkh, "to clothe"; RVm "The Spirit . . . clothed itself with Gideon" and . . . "with Zechariah," "The Spirit clothed Amasai."

Among its many changes, RV has "come forth" for "come" (Mt 2 6); "gone up" for "come" (14 32, a different text); "come all the way" for "come" (Jn 4 15); "got out upon the" for "come to" (21 9); "draw near" for "come" (He 4 16); "in" for "come" in Acts 27 16; "attain unto" for "come in" (Eph 4 13); and "I come" for "I come again" (Jn 4 28).

COMELINESS, kum'li-nes, COMELY, kum'li: Cognate with "becoming," viz. what is suitable, graceful, handsome. The Servant of Jehovah in Isa. 52 3 is without "comeliness" (hâdâkh, "honor"); i.e., there is in him no appearance of "comgrading," while he is bowed beneath man's sin. "Praise comely" (nâwâth, f. of nâwâth); Ps 33 1; 147 1), i.e. suitable or befitting "for the righteous," and, therefore, an honor and glory; "uncomely parts" (aschelômen 1 Cor 6 18 25; viz. less honorable). See also 1 S 16 18, "a comely person"; Cant 6 4, "comely as Jesus," etc.

COMFORT, kum'fâr (Kê-fâr, nânâm, pârakalêo, parakalêo): The NT word is variously tr as "comfort," "exhorted," "beseech," the exact tr to be determined by the context. Etymologically, it is "to call alongside of," i.e. to summon for assistance. To comfort is to cheer and encourage. It has a positive force, implying in its synonym "console," as it indicates the dispelling of grief by the impartation of strength. RV has correctly changed the tr of paramumelômenai from AV "comfort," to "consolation." So in the OT, "Comfort ye my people" (Isa 40 1) is much stronger than "consoled," which has only the power of calm endurance of affliction, while the brightest hopes of the future and the highest incentives to present activity are the gifts of the Divine grace that is here bestowed.

COMFORTABLY, kum'fâr-ta-bli (Kê-fê-tê-bêlîh, "of lâbâkh," "to the heart"): "To speak to the heart," i.e. to speak kindly, to console, to comfort, is the ordinary Heb expression for woeing: e.g. Boaz spake "to the heart" of Ruth (Ruth 2:13a; AV "friendly,"); RV "kindly"). The beauty of the Heb term is illustrated in Gen 50:21 where Joseph "spoke kindly unto his brethren, and comforted them in their grief and sorrow." Rendered "comfortably" in five passages: thrice of human speaking, and twice of the tenderness of God's address to His people. David was urged to win back the hearts of the people by kind words, "speak comfortably" (2 Sam 19:7). Hosea in like manner comforted the Levites (2 Chron 32:20) and encouraged his captains (2 Chron 32:6). The term has exceptional wealth of meaning in connection with God's message of grace and forgiveness to His redeemed people. The compassionate love that has atoned for their sins is known as the "comforter" (Rom 3:24). He is called by the title, "the Comforter" (John 14:16), thenceforth to remain with His people. Thereafter Paul designates the Holy Spirit as the "Comforter". "comforter" in the singular (Col 2:2). This word is used in the English Bible in the singular collectively (Ex 34:12; Ps 119:96; 1 Cor 13:11). See Ten Commandments, The. H. E. Jacobs

COMMISSION, THE NEW, nū (ἐνθολή, entōlē kainē): The word "commission" is used in the Eng. VSS of the OT to translate several Heb words, more esp. those meaning "word" (dīr, "proclamation") as "the words of God" or "God's command" (Ex 20:1-17). "command" (Gen 1:1-28; Gen 13:10; 15:10); or, many times throughout the OT, in the singular collectively (Ex 34:12; Ps 119:96; 1 Cor 13:12). See Ten Commandments, The. H. E. Jacobs

COMING OF CHRIST. See Advent; Parousia.

COMING, SECOND. See Parousia.
When the law realizes itself as love for God and man in men's hearts, it ceases to bear the aspect of a command. The force of authority or the threat of punishment is lost. The fear of consequences or the desire to avoid displeasing God becomes a principle, a motive, a joyous harmony of man's will with the will of God; and in becoming internal, it becomes universal and transcends all distinctions of race or class. Even this was not an altogether new idea (cf Jer 31:31-34; Ps 51); nor did Christ's contemporaries and disciples think it was. The revolutionary factor was the death of Christ and the resurrection of a new Man, whom he exemplified and made manifest as the basis and principle of all spiritual life in the Church standing in antithesis to the grace and love which are through Jesus Christ (Rom 5-7). Believers in Christ felt their experiences and inward life to be so changed and new, that it needed a new term (agapē = "love") to express their ideal of conduct (see Charity). Another change that grew upon the Christian consciousness, following from the resurrection and ascension of Christ, was the idea that He was the permanent source of the principle of life. "Jesus is Lord" (1 Cor 12:3). Hence in the Johannine writings the principle described by the new term agapē is associated with Christ's lordship and solemnly described as His "new commandment." A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another" (Jn 13:34). To the Christians of the end of the 1st cent. it was already an old commandment which they had from the beginning of the Christian teaching (1 Jn 2:7; 2 Jn 5); but it was also a new commandment which ever came with new force to men who were passing from the darkness of hatred to the light of love (1 Jn 2:8-11) (cf Tim. 1:18).

The New Testament in the Gospel we may owe to the evangelist, but it brings into relief an element in the consciousness of Jesus which the author of the Fourth Gospel had appreciated more fully than the Synoptists. Jesus was aware that He was the bearer of a special message from the Father (Jn 12:49; Mt 11:27), that He fulfilled His mission in His death of love and self-sacrifice (Jn 10:18), and that the mission fulfilled gave Him authority over the lives of men, "even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." The full meaning of Christ's teaching was only realized when men had experienced and recognized the significance of His death as the cause and principle of right conduct. The Synoptists saw Christ's teaching as the development of the prophetic teaching of the OT. Paul and John felt that the love of God in Christ was a new thing: (a) new as a revelation of God in Christ, (b) new as a principle of life in the Church, (c) new as a command of God for a new relationship of believers with Christ. While it is love, it is also a commandment of Christ, calling forth the joyful obedience of believers. See also Brotherly Love.

COMMANDMENTS, THE TEN. See Commandment; Ten Commandments.

COMMAND, ka-mend': (1) For ἐκατοντάρχης, paratithēmi (Lk 23:46), translating the Heb pābād (Ps 31:5), in the dying wish of Jesus: 'Lo! the Lord hath remembered my spirit.' AV in Ps has the more general word "commit." The use of the Gr word in the sense of "deposit what belongs to one into the hands of another" is not uncommon in the classics. So also the derivatives parathēkē (2 Tim 1:12) and parakatathēkē (1 Tim 6:20; 2 Tim 1:14). See Deposit. This sense of the Gr, which is slightly archaic, corresponds to the first mention of the Lat, whence it comes, "to commit for preservation," esp. of the dying; to commend children, parents, etc., to the care of others (for examples, see Harper's Latin Dictionary).

(2) For εὐρέβω, "to stand together," and then, by standing together, to establish, prove, exhibit, as "righteousness" and "love of God" (Rom 3:5; 5:8), and thus to attest (2 Cor 3:1; 4:2), and, finally, to certify or to recommend a stranger (Rom 16:1; 2 Cor 10:8). The use of paratithēmi in 1 Cor 8:8 is equivalent.

(3) "To praise," ταυτότητα, epinō (Lk 16:8), and sumnētēmi in 2 Cor 10:12,18; for the OT, Heb ἄνθιστην, in Gen 12:15 AV; Prov 12:8. H. E. Jacobs

LITERATURE

I. The Word—General Scope.—Etymologically, a commentary (from Lat commentarii) denotes jottings, annotations, memoranda, on a given subject, or perhaps on a series of events; hence its use in the NT as a designation for a narrative or history, as the Commentaries of Caesar. In its application to Scripture, the word designates a work devoted to the explanation, elucidation, illustration, sometimes the homiletic expansion and edifying utilization, of the text of some book or portion of Scripture. The primary function of a good commentary is to furnish an exact interpretation of the meaning of the passage under consideration; it belongs to it also to show the connection of ideas, the steps of argument, the scope and design of the whole, in the writing in question. This can only be successfully accomplished by the help of a knowledge of the original language of the writing, and of the historical setting of the particular passage; by careful study of the context, and of the author's general usages of thought and speech; and by comparison of parallel or related texts. Aid may also be obtained from external sources, as a knowledge of the history, archaeology, topography, chronology, manners and customs of the peoples and time referred to; or, as in commentator's recent discoveries, from the light thrown on peculiarities of language by papyri or other ancient remains (see his Light from the Ancient East).
II. Differences in Character.—It is obvious that commentaries will vary greatly in character and value according as they are more scholarly, technical, and critical, entering, e.g., into philological discussions, and translating and remarking upon the various views held as to the text and meaning of the NT, more popular, aiming only at bringing out the general sense, and conveying it to the mind of the reader in an attractive and edifying form. When the practical motive predominates, and the treatment is greatly improved by illustration, application, and the enforcement of lessons, the work loses the character of commentary proper, and partakes more of the character of homily or discourse.

III. Range of Commentaries.—No book in the world has been the subject of so much commenting and exposition as the Bible. Theological libraries are full of commentaries of all descriptions and all grades of worth. Some are commentaries on the original Heb or Gr texts; some on the Eng. or other VSS. Modern commentaries are usually accompanied with some measure of introduction to the books commented upon; the more learned works have commonly also some indication of the data for the determination of the textual readings (see Cusack). The equal task of commenting with profit on the Bible as a whole, and, with the growth of knowledge, this task is now seldom attempted. Frequently, however, one writer contributes many valuable works, and sometimes, many cooperation of like-minded scholars, commentaries on the whole Bible are produced. It is manifestly a very slight survey that can be taken in a brief art. of the work of commenting, and of the literature to which it has given rise; the attempt can only be made to follow the lines most helpful to those seeking aid from this class of books. On the use and abuse of commentaries by the preacher, C. H. Spurgeon's racy remarks in his Commenting and Commentaries may be consulted.

Rabbinical interpretations and paraphrases of the OT may here be left out of account (see next art.; also Targums; Talmud; F. W. Farrar's History of Interpretation, 1). Let the NT, we are inclined to say in this company of like-minded scholars, commentaries on the whole Bible are produced. It is manifestly a very slight survey that can be taken in a brief art. of the work of commenting, and of the literature to which it has given rise; the attempt can only be made to follow the lines most helpful to those seeking aid from this class of books. On the use and abuse of commentaries by the preacher, C. H. Spurgeon's racy remarks in his Commenting and Commentaries may be consulted.

1. Early Commentaries.—Farrar's History of Interpretation, 1, shows that the OT books could not begin till the NT books themselves were written, and had acquired some degree of authority as sacred writings (see Bible). The earliest commentaries we hear of are from the circles of the Gnostic T. T. J. Heracleon, a Valentinian (cir 175 AD), wrote a commentary on the Gospel of John (fragments in Origen), and on parts at least of the Gospel of Luke. Tatian, a disciple of Justin Martyr, about the same time, compiled his Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Four Gospels, on which, at a later time, commentaries were written. Ephraim Syrus (4th cent.) wrote such a commentary, of which an Armenian tr has now been recovered. The Church Father Hippolytus (Beginning of 3d cent.) wrote several commentaries on the OT (Ex, Ps, Prov, Ecc, Dn, Zec, etc.), and on Mt, Lk and Rev.

(1) Origen, etc.—The strongest impulse, however, to the work of commenting and exposition of Holy Scripture undoubtedly proceeded from the school of Alexandria—esp. from Origen (283–54 AD). Clement, Origen's predecessor, had written a treatise called Hypotupōses, or "Outlines," a survey of the contents of Holy Scripture. Origen himself wrote commentaries on all the books of the OT, Ruth, Est, and Eccel alone excepted, and on most of the books of the NT (Mk, 1 and 2 Cor, 1 and 2 Pet, 1, 2, and 3 Jn, Jas, Jude, Rev excepted). He furnished besides, scholēs, or notes on difficult passages, and delivered Homilies, or discourses, the records of which fill three folio volumes. "By his Tetrapla and Hexapla," says Farrar, "he became the founder of all textual criticism; by his Homilies he fixed the type of a popular exposition; his scholia were the earliest speciments of marginal explanations; his commentaries furnished the church with her first continuous exegesis, most of which, fortunately the Alexandrian school adopted a principle of allegorical interpretation which led it frequently into the most extravagant fancies. Assuming a threefold sense in Scripture—a literal, a moral, and spiritual—it gave rise to caprice in foisting imaginary meanings into scriptural and historical statements (Farrar, op. cit., 189 ff.). Some of Origen's commentaries, however, are much freer from allegory than others, and all possess high value (cf. Lightfoot, Galatians, 217). The later teachers of the Alexandrian school continued the exegetical works of Origen. Pamphilus of Caesarea, the friend of Eusebius, is said to have written OT commentaries.

(2) Chrysostom, etc.—At the opposite pole from the allegorizing Alexandrian school of interpretation was the Antiochian, marked by a sober, literal and grammatical style of exegesis. Its reputed founder was Lucian (martyred 311 AD); but its real heads were Diodore of Tarsus (cir 370 AD) and Diodore of Mopaeutis (393–428 AD); and its most distinguished representative was John Chrysostom (347–407 AD). Chrysostom wrote continuous commentaries on Isa (only 1–8 10 remaining) and on Gal; but his chief contributions were his Homilies, covering almost the whole of the OT and NT. Of these over 600 remain, chiefly on the NT. They are unequal in character, those on Acts being reputed the feeblest; others, as those on Mt, Rom and Gal, are splendid examples of expository teaching. Schaff speaks of Chrysostom as "the prince of commentators among the Fathers" (Hist., Ante Nicene Per., 816). Thomas Aquinas is reported to have said that he would rather possess Chrysostom's homilies on Mt than the written works of all Prophets. In the West, Ambrose of Milan (340–97 AD) wrote expositions of OT histories and of Lk (allegorical and typical), and Jerome (346–420 AD) wrote numerous commentaries on OT and NT books, largely, however, compilations from others.

The medieaval and scholastic period offers little for our purpose. There was diligence in copying MSS, and producing catenae of the Old and New Testaments. Nicolaus de Lyra.—The 14th cent., however, produced one commentator of real eminence—Nicolaus de Lyra (1270–1340). Nicolaus was a Franciscan monk, well versed in Heb and rabbinical learning. While recognizing the usual distinctions of the various senses of Scripture, he practically builds on the literal, and exhibits great sobriety and skill in his interpretations. His work, which bears the name Posticum Perpetuae in Unisono Bible, was much esteemed by Luther, who acknowledged his indebtedness to it. Hence the jest of his opponents, Si Lyra non iussaret, Lutherus non salasset (a notice of Lyra may be seen in Farrar, op. cit., 274–75)

The Reformation brought men's minds back to the Scriptures and opened a new era in Bib. exposition and commentary. It became the custom to expound the Scriptures from exegesis and from the pulpit of the Protestant churches. "Luther's custom was to expound the Old and New Testaments" (Kostelin). The Reformation began at Zürich with a series of discourses by Zwingli on the Gospel of Mt. The same was true of Calvin, Beza, Knox and all associated with them. The production of commentaries or expository homilies was the necessary result.

6. Luther and Calvin.—As outstanding examples may be mentioned Luther's Commentary on Gal, and the noble commentaries of Calvin. Not all by any means, but very many of the commentaries of Calvin were the fruit of pulpit prelections (e.g. the expositions of Job, the Minor Prophets, Jer, Dan). Others, as the commentaries on Rom and the Psalms (reputed his best), were prepared with great care. Calvin's supreme excellence as a commentator is disputed by no one. From every school and shade of opinion in Christendom could be produced a chorus of testimony to the remarkable gifts of mind and heart displayed in his expositions of Scripture—to his breadth, moderation, fairness and modernness of spirit, in exhibiting the sense of inward genius of Holy Writ. The testimony of Arminians is as striking as any: "I exhort my pupils to peruse Calvin's commentaries . . . for I affirm that he excels beyond comparison in the interpretation of Scripture, and that his commentaries ought to be more highly valued than all that he handed down to us by the library of the Fathers."

(2) Beza, Grotius, etc.—Lutheranism had its distinguished exegetes (Benz, d. 1572), who wrote able commentaries on the OT, and in both the Catholic and the Reformed church the production of commentaries held a chief place. Beza, Calvin's successor, is acknowledged to have possessed many of the best exegetical qualities which characterized his master. Grotius, in Holland (d. 1645), occupies the foremost place among the expositors in this cent. on the Arminian side. His exegetical works, if not marked by much spirituality, show sagacity and learning, and are enriched by parallels from classical literature. The school of Cocceius (d. 1689) developed the doctrine of the covenants, and revelled in typology. Cocceius wrote commentaries on nearly all the books of Scripture. His pupil Vitringa (d. 1716) gained renown by his expositions of Isa and the Apocalypse.

(60) Durham (d. 1658) on Isa 63 consists of 72 sermons; Venema (Holland, d. 1787) on Jer fills 2 quarto, and on the Psalms no less than 6 quarto. These are only samples of a large class. H. Hammond's A Paraphrase and Annotations on the OT, from an Arminian Standpoint belong to this period (1675). Another work which long took high rank is M. Poole's elaborate Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum (5 vols, folio, 1609-76)—a summary of the opinions of 150 Bib. critics; with which must be taken Expositor's Bible, completed up to Isa 68 at the time of his death (1679). The work was continued by his friends.

(1) Calvin, M. Henry, etc.—The 18th ct. is marked by greater sobriety in exegesis. It is prolific in commentaries, but only a few attain to high distinction. Calmet (d. 1757), a learned Benedictine, on the Roman Catholic side, produced his Commentaire littéral sur tous les livres de l'Ancien et du Nouveau Testament, in 23 quarto vols

4. 18th Century—a work of immense erudition, though now necessarily superseded in its fields. On the Protestant side, Matthew Henry's celebrated Exposition of the Old and New Testaments (1708-10) easily holds the first place among devotional commentaries for its blending of good sense, quaintness, original and felicitous remark, and genuine insight into the meaning of the sacred writers. It is, of course, not a critical work in the modern acceptation, and often is unduly diffuse. M. Henry's work extends only to the end of Acts; the remaining books were done by various writers after his death (1714). Le Clerc (d. 1736) may be named as precursor of the critical views now obtaining on the composition and authorship of the Pent. His commentaries began with Gen in 1693 and were not completed till 1731. Other commentators of note are: Ewald (d. 1778), who published a new edition of the OT, and Breyfogle (d. 1797), who produced a complete Critical Commentary on the OT and NT, among the most learned and critical。(A. E.)

(2) Patrick, Louth, Scott.—In the Anglican church the names of chief distinction in this ct. are Bishop Patrick, Bishop Louth, and later, Patrick and Adam Clarke. They are generally classed with the Cambridge Platonists (d. 1707), who contributed paraphrases and commentaries on the OT from Gen to Cant, while Bishop Lowth (d. 1787) acquired lasting fame by his Prelections on Heb Poetry, and A New Translation, with Notes on Isaiah. He was among the first to treat the poetical and prophetic writings really as literature. The commentaries of Patrick and Louth were subsequently combined with those of Whiby and other divines (Arnold, etc.) to form a complete Critical Commentary (1809), which went through many editions. The well-known commentary of Thomas Scott (1747-1821), representing a moderate Calvinism, is a solid and judicious piece of work, inspired by an earnest, rigidly believing spirit. The habit of basing commentary on pulpit exposition, the tendency early set in to undue prolixity in the unfolding of the meaning of Scripture. "In the Lutheran church," says Van Oosterzee, "they began to treat the books of Scripture, sometimes in a very prolix manner, as, e.g. in the case of the 220 sermons by one Striegitz, a preacher at Meisen, on the history of Jonah, of which four are devoted to the consideration of the words 'Unto Jonah.'" (Practical Theol., 120). The habit spread.

The commentaries of Peter Martyr (Swiss Reformer, d. 1562) on Jgs and Rom occupy a folio each; N. Byfield (Puritan, d. 1622) on Col fills a folio; Caryl (Independent, d. 1673) on Rom extends to 2 folios; Godfrey (d. 1679) on Psalms consists of 72 sermons; Venema (Holland, d. 1787) on Jer fills 2 quarto, and on the Psalms no less than 6 quarto. These are only samples of a large class. H. Hammond's Paraphrase and Annotations on the OT, from an Arminian Standpoint belong to this period (1675). Another work which long took high rank is M. (A. E.) of the higher criticism had begun in the OT; in Germany, the spirit of humanism, inherited from Lessing, Herder and Goethe, had found its way into literature; knowledge of the sciences, of oriental civilizations, of other peoples and religions, was constantly on the increase; scholarship was more precise and thorough; a higher ideal of what commentary meant had taken possession of the mind. Learning, too, had enlarged its borders, and books on all subjects poured from the press in such numbers that it was difficult to keep up with them. This applies to commentaries as to other departments of theological study. Commentaries in the 19th cent., and in our own, are legion. Only the most prominent landmarks can be noted.

(1) Germany (a) The liberal school.—In Germany, as was to be anticipated, the rise of the critical spirit and the profound influence exercised by it are reflected in most of the commentaries produced in the first half of the cent. On the liberal side, the rationalists, the development of whose views, was shown in the rejection of miracle, the denial of prediction in prophecy, and the lowering of the idea of inspiration generally. The scholarship, however, is frequently of a very high order. This temper is seen in De Wette (d. 1822), who in his commentaries, written when his views had become more positive, show grace and feeling; in Gesenius (d. 1842), who produced an epoch-making commentary on Isa; in Knobel (d. 1863), pronouncedly rationalistic, but with keen critical sense, as evinced in his commentaries on the Pent and Joel, Eel, and Isa; in Hupfeld (d. 1886) in his Commentary on the Pss (4 vols); in Hitzig (d. 1875), acute but arbitrary, who wrote on the Pss and most of the Prophets; above all, in Ewald (d. 1875), a master in the interpretation of the poetical and prophetical books, but who commented also on the first three Gospels, on the writings of John, and on Paul's epistles. Ewald's influence is felt in the History of the Jewish Church by Dean Stanley, in England. The Exegetical Handbook (Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch) embraced copious annotations by Knobel, Hitzig, Bertheau (school of Ewald), etc, but also Ochsenaus (d. 1839) wrote likewise on the NT), on all the books of the OT;

(b) Believing tendency.—On the believing side, from a variety of standpoints, evangelical, critical, mediating, confessional, a multitude of commentaries on the OT and NT were produced. The extremely conservative, the apologetic, the offensive by Hengstenberg (d. 1869); on Pss, Eccl, Ezk, Jn, Rev); by Keil (d. 1888) in the well-known Keil and Delitzsch series (Gen to Est, Jer, Ezk, Dn, Minor Prophets; also NT commentaries), and by Havernick (d. 1845; Dn, Ezk). Delitzsch (d. 1890) wrote valuable commentaries on Gen, Job, Pss, Prov, Cant, Eccel, Isa; also on He. After the rise of the Wellhausen school, he considerably modified his views in the newer critical direction. His New Comment on Gen (1897) shows this change, but, with his other works, is still written in a strongly believing spirit. On the other hand, the critical position (older, not newer) is frankly represented by A. Dillmann (d. 1894) in his commentaries on the books of the Pent and Josh (ET of Genesis, 1897; many also of the above works are tr). The mediating school, largely penetrated by the influence of Schleiermacher, had many distinguished representatives. Among the most conspicuous may be named Lücke (d. 1855), who wrote on John; Bleek, the OT and NT critical scholar (d. 1873) who had a work on the first three Gospels, and lectures on Eph, Col, Philem, He and Rev (his Comment on He is the best known), and Tholuck (d. 1877), whose expositions and commentaries on Pss, Jas, Rom and He with his Comment on the Sermon on the Mount, are fine pieces of exegetical work. A special place must be given to two names of high distinction in the present connection. One is J. F. Lange (d. 1884), the projector and editor of the great Biblical and theological and systematic works in 12 vols, to which he himself contributed the commentaries on Gen to Nu, Hag, Zec, Mal, Mt, Mk, Jn, Rom, Rev, with introductions and homiletic hints. The other is H. A. W. Meyer (d. 1873), whose Critical and Exegetical Commentary on NT (2 vols, with many helping books being done by other scholars, Lückenma, Hutter, etc) is an essential part of every NT scholar's equipment.

With the more positive and confessional theologians may be ranked E. R. Steier (d. 1862), whose Words of the Lord Jesus (ET in 8 vols; Bib, mystical, tendency to prolixity), with commentaries on 70 selected Pss, Prov, 2d Isa, Eph, He, Jas and Jude, found much acceptance. A. von Harless (d. 1879) wrote a Commentary on Eph, praised by Tholuck. Ewald's disciple, the opening of the critical comments on the Reformed side, has an esteemed Commentary on He. An eminent continental theologian who cannot be overlooked is the Swiss F. L. Godet (d. 1900), whose admirable Commentary on St John's Gospel, and commentaries on Rom and Cor are highly appreciated.

(2) Britain and America.—Meanwhile the English-speaking countries were pursuing their own paths in the production of commentaries, either in continuing their old traditions, or in striking out on new lines, under the foreign influences which, from the beginning of the cent., had begun to play upon them. In England Bishop Bloomfield (d. 1857) published Lectures on Jn and Acts. In the United States there appeared from the pen of Dr. J. A. Alexander, of Princeton (d. 1860), a noteworthy Commentary on Isa, fully abreast of the modern learning, but staunchly conservative; also a Commentary on Pss. From the same seminary proceeded the massive Commentaries of Dr. Chauncey Hodger (Calvinistic). On Gal and Cor. Adapted for popular use and greatly in demand for Sunday-school purposes were the Notes, Critical, Explanatory and Practical of Albert Barnes (d. 1871; New School Presbyterian). These Notes, the fruit of a man who was of indefatigable industry, covered the whole of the NT, with several books of the OT (Job, Pss, Isa, Dn). Sensible and informative, rather than original or profound, they proved helpful to many. Over 1,000,000 copies are stated to have been sold. Of similar aim, though less widely known, were the Notes of Professor M. W. Jacobus (d. 1876; on the NT, Gen and Es).

A new era was opened in critical commentary in England by the publication of the OT Testament (1839-61) of Dean Alford (d. 1871), followed by his NT for Eng. Readers (1868). Here was presented a thoroughly critical treatment of the texts, with a full display of the critical apparatus, and notes philological and exegetical, accompanied by learned and lucid introductions, on all the books of the NT. About the same time appeared the solid, if more theological and homiletical, commentaries of the Scottish scholar, J. Eadie (d. 1876), on Gal, Eph, Phil, 1 and 2 Thes. Anglican scholarship produced its results in the Critical and Grammatical Commentaries of Bishop Elliott (d. 1905) on Gal, Eph, Phil, Col, Philem, Thess, Pastoral Epistles, and the yet more remarkable series of commentaries of Bishop J. B. Lightfoot (d. 1886), massive in learning, and wider in outlook than the English and Old Testament, the large part of the value of Lightfoot’s works consists in the special essays or dissertations on important subjects embodied in them (e.g. “St. Paul and the Three”, “The Christian Ministry”, “The Colossian Heresy”, etc.). With these names should be associated that of Bishop Westcott, Dr. Lightfoot’s successor in the see of Durham (d. 1901), whose commentaries on the Gospel and Epistles of St. John, and on the He, take a place among the foremost. Bishop Perowne, in turn (d. 1889), has also written commentaries, simpler in character, on Rom, Eph, Phil, and Col, in the Cambridge Bible Series, and on Rom in the Expositor’s Bible. In OT exposition mention should be made of Bishop Perowne’s valuable work on the Book of Psalms (2d ed, revised, 1870), with his contributions to the Cambridge Bible (see below).

The critical and theological liberalism of Germany has made its influence felt in England in the rise of a Broad Church party, the best products of which in commentaries were Dean Stanley’s (d. 1881) graphic and interesting Comm. on 1 and 2 Cor (1855) and Dr. B. Jowett’s Epistles of St. Paul to the Thess., Gal., and Rom., with Critical Notes and Dissertations (1858), has been mentioned in the appearance of the famous Essays and Reviews (1860), and in the works of Bishop Colenso on the Pent and Josh (1862-79). Bishop Colenso had already published a tr of Rom, with commentary (1861).

Before works by individual editors were appeared during this period several general commentaries, to the production of which many writers contributed. The following may be mentioned. The Speaker’s Comm. (10 vols, 1871-83), under the general editorship of Canon F. C. Cook (d. 1889), was called forth by the agitation over Bishop Colenso. Dr. Cook himself wrote introductions to Ex, Ps, and Acts, and contributed the entire commentaries on Job, Hab, Mk, Luke, 1 Pet, with parts of commentaries on Ex, Ps, and Mt. The work is of unequal value. A serviceable series is the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges (1877 ff), edited by Bishop Perowne, with Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools, and Cambridge Gr Text. for Colleges (1877), and the Gr Bible, (still in process). Dr. Perowne (d. 1904) himself contributed to the first-named the commentaries on Ob, Jon, Hag, Zac, Mal and Gal. Many valuable contributions appear in this series, e.g. A. F. Kirkpatrick on 1 and 2 S and Ps, T. M. Davison on Job and Ezk, Dr. Dods on Dn, G. G. Findlay on Thess, etc. Next, under the editorship of Bishop Elliptic, were produced (1877-84) A NT Comm. for Eng. Readers (3 vols), and An OT Comm. for Eng. Readers (5 vols), which contained some valuable work (Gen by R. Payne Smith, Ex by Canon G. Rawlinson, etc.). Akin to this in character was the Popular Comm. on the NT (4 vols, 1879-83), edited by Dr. W. Schaff. This embraced, with other excellent matter, commentaries on Thess by Dr. Marcus Dods, and on 1 and 2 Pet by Dr. S. D. F. Salmond. The Pulpit Comm. (49 vols, 1880 ff), edited by J. S. Exell and Canon H. D. M. Spence, has expositions by good scholars, and an abundance of homiletical material by a great variety of authors. The series of Handbooks for Bible Classes (T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh) has a number of valuable commentaries, e.g. that of Dr. A. B. Davidson on He.

6. Recent Period

In the most recent period the commentaries in series or by individual writers embodying the results of an advanced OT criticism—in less degree of a radical NT criticism.

(1) Germany.—In Germany, in addition to the Kursgefaesset exegetisches Handbuch, other standing (see above) handbooks, contributed, may be mentioned Marti’s Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum AT (1897 ff) and Nowack’s Handkommentar zum AT; also Strack and Zöckler’s Kursgefaesset Kommentar (OT and NT; critical, but moderate). Marti contributes to his Hand-Commentar the vol. on Isa, Dnl and the Minor Prophets; Nowack contributes to his Handkommentar the vols on Jgs and Ruth, 1 and 2 S and the Minor Prophets (of special importance in Nowack’s series are the vols on Gen and Amos and Josh by C. Steuer-nagel); Strack writes in his own work the vols on Gen to Nu (Oetzli contributes Dt, Josh and Jgs). Much more conservative in spirit are the commentaries of H. C. von Oberli (Basel) on Isa, Jer, Ezk and the Minor Prophets. In the NT, Meyer’s Commentaries has been “revised” by later writers, many of them (J. Weiss, W. Boussset, etc.) of much more advanced tendency than the original author.

(2) Britain and America.—In Britain and America, like currents are observable. Professor T. Cheyne, who wrote a helpful commentary on the Prophecies of Isa (1880-81), and subsequently commentaries on Mic and Hos (Cambridge Bible), Jer (Pulpit Comm.), and on The Book of Psalms (1884) is a significant contributor. Besides the above there have already been noted. It need not be said that the commentaries in this series are always scholarly and able; those on the OT are, however, all built on the Wellhausen foundations (see Criticism of the Bible. III). Dr. Driver contributed himself writings on Dt, Job, Ps, Sam, G. F. Moore, on Jgs; Dr. H. P. Smith, on 1 and 2 S; Dr. Briggs, on Ps; Dr. Toy, on Prov; Dr. W. R. Harper (d. 1900), on Am and Hos; while Mt in the NT is covered by W. C. Allen, Jk by Dr. Plummer, Rom by Drs. Sanday and Headlam, etc. A similar series is the Westminster Commercially, recently commenced, to which Dr. Driver contributes the vol on Gen (1904; 7th ed, 1909). Yet another recent popular series is The Century Bible, Professor J. A. Hole’s Jps, C. H. West’s Revised, and N. T. Driver’s in the last of the Minor Prophets, a well-planned one vol. Comm. on the Holy Bible, by various writers, has recently been edited by J. R. Dummelow (Cambridge). It is prefaced by a general Introduction, with a large number of arts, on the principal subjects with which a reader of the Bible will desire to be acquainted.

It need only be added that very many of the foreign works mentioned above (not simply those specially noted) are now accessible in Eng. tr.

LITERATURE.—Works and arts, specially devoted to commentaries are not numerous. S. S. Davidson has an art. “Commentary” in Ritto’s Bib. Enc. Vol I. See also F. W. Farrar’s Hid of Interpretation (Bampton Lects for 1885); C. H. Spurgeon’s popular talks on Commenting and Commentaries are accompanied by extensive lists of commentaries. A comprehensive view of his (severely exclusive of works deemed dangerous), lists of commentaries on the Bible as a whole, on the OT and NT separately, and on the several books, may be seen in most good works on Introduction, or in polemogena to commentaries. On the different books, a general Introduction prefixed to Lange’s Comm. on Genesis; also a lengthy section on the OT and NT, by Protestant and Catholic commentators, and again in the Index of the More Important Expository Works on the Bks of the OT.” The book’s Introduction contains a great deal of information given up to the author’s date. Full bibliography of modern books, including commentaries on the OT, are furnished in Dr. Driver’s Introduction. Similar lists are given in other works regarding the NT.
For the writers of the commentaries on the special books in the above-noted German and Eng. series, lists may generally be seen attached to each vol. of the series.

LITERATURE

The following outline alludes to the leading Jewish commentators and their works in chronological order. However, without the principles which guided the various Jewish schools of exegesis, or the individual commentators, differ from those of the modern school, the latter will find a certain suggestiveness in the former's interpretation which will merits attention.

Josephus cannot be called a Bible commentator in the proper sense of the term. See Josephus.

Targum (pl. Targumin): The Aram. tr. of the OT. Lit. the word designates a tr in general; its use, however, often extends to a commentary.

Targum includes all the books of the OT excepting Daf and Ezra-Nehe, which are written in part in Aram. This inclusion does have the time of the Second Temple, and it is considered a first approach to a commentary. In the case of the Tg, the word is not a mere tr, but rather a combination of a tr with a commentary, resulting in a paraphrase, or an interpretative tr — having its origin in exegesis. The language of this paraphrase is the vernacular tongue of Syria, which began to assume itself throughout Pal as the language of common intercourse and trade, as soon as a familiar knowledge of the Hebrew tongue came to be lost. The Targumin are: TO THE PENTATEUCH
(1) Targum Onkelos or Polyglot Tg (the accepted and official);
(2) Targum yonahmi of Babylonian Tg ("Pseudo-Jonathan"); has been restricted to the Aram. version of the OT, as contrasted with the Heb. original.

Targum of the Prophets
(1) Targum Jonathan ben Uziel (being the official tr of the Targumists of the 1st cent., and was then adapted to the vernacular of Babylonia);

A Palestinian Targum, called Targum yonahmi ("Pseudo-Jonathan"); has been restricted to the Aram. version of the OT, as contrasted with the Heb. original.

Or Targumin (not officially recognized): (1) To the Psalms and Job; (2) to Proverbs; (3) to the Five Rolls; (4) to Chronicles—all Palestinian. See Targum.

Midrash: Apparently the practice of commenting upon and explaining the meaning of the Scriptures arose among the Rabbis. It is the first time of Ezra), from the necessity of an exposition of the Law to a congregation many of whom did not or might not understand the language in which it was read. Such commentaries, however, were oral and extemporaneous, until much later crystallized into a definite form. When they assumed a definite and, still later, written shape, the name Midrash (meaning "investigation," "interpretation," from darrash, "to investigate" a scriptural passage) was given. The word occurs in 2 Ch 13 18, which refers to a "different" or "another" interpretation among the various exegetical Midrashim, both on account of its age and importance. Next comes the one on Lam. (Zunz pointed out that the Midrash Rabba consists of ten entirely different Midrashim.) On the same ten books there is a similar collection, called ha-Midrash ha-gaddal (the "Great Midrash"), being a collection of quotations from a good many works including the Midrash Rabba.

Midrashim are: The Midrash Tanhumad' on the Pentateuch; the Midrash ha-Mukhr (has been [Leipsig, 1909] tr into German by Winter and Wuenische; the latter also published, under the main title Bibliotheca Rabbinica, a collection of the old Midrashim in a German tr with introductions and notes). A. Simon, Sepher ha-Midrash, is a similar work. The Yale Midrash is a work similar in contents to the Yalkut Shimoni, ed. Greenup. See Commentaries; Midrash.

Talmud (Talmud): This term is used here to designate the entire body of literature exclusive of the Midrash. Ample exegetical material abounds in the Talmud as it does in the Midrashim.

4. Talmud: The critical notes on the Bible by some Talmudists are very characteristic of their intellectual and philosophical habits. Some of them are extremely radical, and expressed freely their opinions on important problems of Bible criticism, such as on the originality of the text, or the doubtful authenticity of the books of the OT. The Talmud is a collection of the 3d cent. AD held the opinion that the story of the creation of man was purely fictitious, and as to its fate. The Talmudists also generalized, and set up critical canons. The "Baraita," of the Thirty-Two Kinds, is the oldest of the Midrashim, abounds with categ ories (Philo's hermeneutical rules being rather fantastic), and contains exegetical notices valid to this day. Hermeneutics, of course, is not exegesis proper, but the theory of exegesis; one results from the other, however. This Baraita calls attention, for instance, to the fact that words occur in the OT in an abbreviated form—a thing now generally accepted. See Talmud.

Karaite: "Followers of the Bible." They are sometimes referred to as the "Protestants of the Jews," professing to follow the OT as the only rule of life and doctrine.

5. Karaites: The inclusion of the rabbinical tradition. The founder of this Jewish sect was a Bab Jew in the 8th cent., Anan ben David, by name; hence they were first called Ananites. The principal Karaites commentators of the 9th, 10th, and 11th cents. are: Benjamin Al-Nahwendi the elder (the first to use the term "Karaite", "Ba'ale Middat"), Solomon ben Jeroham, Sahil ibn Mazliah, Yusuf al-Basir, Yafith ibn Ali (considered the greatest of this period), and Abu al-Faraj Harum. Of a later date we will mention Aaron ben Joseph Abu Daghla and Aaron ben Eliezer. The struggle between the Rabbinites and the Karaites undoubtedly gave the impetus to the great exegetical activity among the Jews in Arab-speaking countries during the 10th and 11th cents. The extant fragments of Saadia’s commentary on the Pent. (p. 924) less than his polemical writings proper are full of polemics against the Karaites’ interpretation. And the same circumstance aroused Karaites to like efforts.

Middle Ages: In the old Midrashim as well as elsewhere the consciousness of a simple meaning of the Bible text was never entirely lost. The principal tendencies in exegesis were four; these were afterward designated by the acrostatic “ParDeS”: i.e. Parashah (for the simple philological explanation of words); Remez (or the allegorical): Draah (or the ethical-homiletical); and Sodh (or the mystical). Naturally enough this division could never be strictly carried out; hence variations and combinations are to be found.

Saadia ben Joseph (892-942), the severest antagonist of the Karaites, the OT into Arab. with notes. The parts published are: Pent, Isa, Prov and Job.

Moses ha-Darshan (the Preacher) of Narbonne, France, and Tobiah ben Eliezer in Castoria, Bulgaria (11th cent.), are the most prominent representatives of midrashic-symbolic Bible exegesis. The former’s work is known only by quotations, and his Christian exegetes of the Middle Ages as well as of modern times made use of his Bible commentary. Nicolas de Lyra (see Commentaries) followed Rashi closely; and it is a known fact that Luther’s tr. of the Bible is dependent upon Nicolas de Lyra. Rashi’s commentary has called forth numerous supercommentaries.

An independent and important exegete was Joseph Karo (about 1100). He edited and partly completed Rashi’s commentary, particularly the part on the Pent.

Abraham ibn Ezra’s (1092-1168) commentary on the Pent, like Rashi’s commentaries, has produced many supercommentaries. His is very scholarly. He was the first to maintain that Isa contains the work of two authors; and his doubts respecting the authenticity of the Pent were noticed by Spinoza.

The grammarians and the lexicographers were not merely exegetical expounders of words, but many of them were likewise authors of actual commentaries. Such were the Kimḥi, Joseph (father), Moses and David (his sons); esp. the latter. The Kimḥi’s were the most brilliant contributors to Bible exegesis and Heb philology (like Ibn Ezra) in mediaeval times.

Maimonides (1135-1204): Philo employed his allegorical method for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation of Plato with the OT. Maimonides had something similar in view. To him Aristotle was the representative of natural knowledge and the Bible of supernatural—and he sought for a reconciliation between the two in his religious philosophy. Exegesis proper was the one field, however, to which this great genius made no contribution of first-class importance.

The Maimonides’ views as to those exegesis of a philosophical turn, are: Joseph ibn Akin, Samuel ibn Tibbon, his son Moses, and his son-in-law, Jacob ben Abba Mari Anathol, whose Maimdah ha-Talmidim is the most important work of philosophical exegesis of the period.

Joseph ibn Kaspi, chiefly known as a philosopher of the Maimonidean type, deserves attention. Ibn Kaspi is an exegete of the first quality. His exposition of Isa 63 might be the work of the most modern scholar. He refers the prophecy to Israel, not to an individual, and in this his theory is far superior to that of some other Jewish expositors who interpret the chapter as referring to Hezekiah.

Through the philosophical holism, which began to be used after the death of Maimonides, Aristotle was popular in the pulpit. The pulpit changed to a chair of philosophy. Aristotle’s concepts—as Matter and Form, the Four Causes, Possibility and Reality—were then something ordinary in the sermon, and were very popular.

The principal commentators with a Kabbalistic tendency are: Nahmanides (1194-1270?), whose great work is his commentary on the Pentateuch; Immanuel of Rome (1270-1350?) who does, however, not disregard the lit. meaning of the Scriptures; Hisdai ben Abraham (d. 1340) who formulated the four methods of exegesis of “ParDeS” referred to above; he took Nahmanides as his model; many super-commentaries were written on his commentary on the Pent.; Gersonides, whose interpretation of Nahmanides, who sees symbols in many Biblical passages; on account of some of his heretical ideas expressed in his philosophy, some rabbis forbade the study of his commentaries.

We must not fail to mention the Zohar (the “Bible of the Kabbalists”), the book of all others in the Middle Ages that dominated the thinking and feeling of the Jews for almost 500 years, and which was in favor with many Christian scholars. This work is pseudographic, written partly in Aram., and partly in Heb. It first appeared in Spain in the 13th cent., and was made known through Moses de Leon, to whom many historians attribute it.

Mention must also be made of Isaac Arama (1430-94), whose Ḥokmah, his commentary on the Pent (homiletical in style), was the standard book for the Jewish pulpit for cents., much esteemed by the Christian world, and is still much read by the Jews, enjou in Russia and Poland.

Modern Times: Isaac Abravanel (or Abrabanel; 1437-1508): A statesman and scholar who came nearest to the modern idea of a Bible commentator by considering not only the literal elements of the Bible but political and social life of the people as well. He wrote a general introduction to each book of the Bible, setting forth its character; and he was the first to make use of Christian commentaries which he quotes without the least prejudice. Moses Alsheich (second half of 16th cent.) wrote commentaries, all of which are of a homiletical character. In the main the Jewish exegesis of the 16th and 17th cents. branched out into homiletics.

We will pass over the critical annotations connected with the various editions of the Heb Bible, based upon the comparison of MSS, on grammatical and Massoretic studies, etc., such as those of Elijah Levita, Jacob ben Hayyim of Tunis (afterward a convert to Christianity), etc.

The “Bu’irists” (“Commentators”): A school of exegetes which had its origin with Mendelssohn’s (1720-96) Lit. geram of the Bible, at a time when Christian Bib. studies of a modern nature had made some progress, and under whose influence the Bu’irists wrote. They are: Dubno, Wessely, Jaroslav, H. Homberg, J. Euchel, etc. They laid a foundation for a critico-historical study of the Bible among modern Jews. It bore its fruit in the 19th cent. in the writings of Philippson, Munk, Fuerst, etc. The same cent. produced Zunz's (1794–1886) Gottschehischen Vortrage der Juden, the book of c. 1878. It also presented three Jewish exegetes, Luzzatto in Italy, Malbim in Russia (the latter since 1878 residing in New York); he published, in Heb, a commentary on the OT, entitled Miqra' ki-Peshat (Berlin, 1899–1901, 3 vols), and, in German, Randglossen zu heb. Bibel, two scholarly works written from the conservative standpoint (Leipzig, 1908–). Malbim was highly esteemed by the Christian commentators Franz Delitzsch and Muehler, who studied under him. Others are Joseph Halèvy, a French Jew, a most original Bible investigator, and D. Hoffman (the last two named are adversaries of "higher criticism") and D. H. Mueller. M. Heilprin wrote a collection of Biblikritische Notizen (Baltimore, 1893), containing comparisons of various passages of the Bible, and The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews, written in classic Heb, and with accurate scholarship and in which full account is taken of the work of new Hebrews. A commentary on the whole of the OT has been since 1908 in progress under the editorship of A. Kahanah. This is the first attempt since Mendelssohn's Bü'ur to approach the Bible from the Jewish side with the latest philological and historical evidence. Among the authors are Kahanah on Genesis and Jonah, Krauss on Isaiah, Chajes on Psalms and Amos, Wynkoop on Hosea and Joel, and Lambert on Daniel. This attempt well deserves attention and commendation.

There is still to be mentioned the work of M. M. Kalisch (1828–95), whose special object was to write a full and critical comm. on the OT. Of his Historical and Critical Comm. on the OT, with a New Tr, only the following parts were published: Exodus, 1855; Genesis, 1858; Leviticus (pts 1–2), 1867–72. They contain a résumé of all that Jewish and Christian learning had accumulated on the subject up to the dates of their publication. In his Lew he anticipated Wellhausen to a large extent.

We conclude with some names of the liberals: Geiger (whose Uberschrift is extremely radical), Graetz, the great Jewish historian, and Kohler (president of the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati) who wrote The Song of Solomon. Many Jewish scholars are among the earliest essays of "higher criticism" written by a Jew.

COMMENTARY, kom'ēn-tār' (Ἀντιγράφω, emporta): I. OT Times.—There were forces in early Heb life not favorable to the development of commerce. Intercourse with foreigners was not encouraged by Israel's national and Overland routes customs. From the days of Commerce the appearance of the Hebrews in Canaan, however, some commercial contact with the peoples around was inevitable. There were ancient trade routes between the East and the West, as well as between Egypt and the Mesopotamian valley. Pal lay as a bridge between these objective points. There were doubless traveling merchants from very remote times, interchanging commodities of other lands for those of Pal. Some of the Heb words for "trading" and "merchant" indicate this (cf. נְמֶר, sīḥār, "to travel," נֶמֶר, rākhāl, "to go about"). In the nomad period, the people were necessarily dependent upon overland commerce for at least a part of their food supply, such as grain, and doubtless for articles of clothing, too. Frequent, local famines would stimulate such trade. Companies or caravans carrying on this overland commerce are seen in Gen 37:28–29, "Ishmaelites" and "Midianites, merchants," "for on their way to Egypt, with spices, salt and myrrh..." (2 Chron 1:14). The mention of certain products to Egypt as a present with money to Joseph in return for grain: balsam, spices, honey, myrrh, nuts, almonds (Gen 43:11f). The presence of a "Bab mantle" among the spoils of Ai (Josh 7:21) indicates commerce between Canaan and the East. While there are slight indications of a possible sea trade as early as the days of the Judges (Josh 5:17; cf. Gen 49:13), we must wait 2. Sea till the days of the monarchy of 3. Land the trade of ships. Land traffic was of course continued and expanded (1 K 10:15–28; 2 K 1:16). Sea trade at this time made large strides forward. The Phils were earlier in possession of the coast. Friendship with Hiram King of Tyre gave Solomon additional advantages seaward (1 K 5:9–26; 10:19–28; 2 K 8:17; 9:14), since the Phicians were preeminently the Mediterranean traders among all the people of Pal. Later, commerce declined, and the rulers attempted to revive it (1 K 22:48; 2 K 25:36), but without success. Tyre and Sidon as great commercial centers, however, long impressed the life of Israel (Isa 23; Ezek 26–27). Later, in the Macaebian period, Simon acquired Joppa as a Jewish port (1 Macc 14:5), and so extended Mediterranean commerce.

During the peaceful reign of Solomon, there came, with internal improvements and foreign friendships, a stimulus to traffic with the Far East over the ancient trade routes as well as with Phoenicia on the Time of the kings in the northwest. He greatly added to his wealth through tariffs levied upon merchants (1 K 10:15). Trade with Syria in the days of Omri and Ahab is indicated by the permission Benhadad gave to Israelites to open streets, or trading quarters, in Damascus, as Syrians had in Samaria (1 K 20:24). The prophets disallow repeatedly the results of foreign commerce upon the people in the days of Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, and of Jeroboam II, under whom great material prosperity was attained, followed by simple luxury (2 K 17:16; Hoz 12:1). The attempt of Jehoiachin to regain could not observe Sabbath and feast days (Am 8:5); cf Sabbath trading and its punishment in the days of the restoration (Neh 13:15–22). "Canaanite" became the nickname for traffickers (Ezek 12:21; cf. Isa 28:1).
II. NT Times.—After the conquests of Alexander 338 BC, trade between East and West was greatly stimulated. Colonies of Jews for trade purposes had been established in Egypt and elsewhere. The dispersion of the Jews throughout the Gr and Rom world added to their interest in commerce. The sea of Galilee, under Rom protection, became alive with commercial fleets. The Sea of Galilee with its enormous fish industry became the center of a large trading interest to all parts. The toll collected in Galilee must have been enormous. Matthew was called from his collectorship to discipleship (Mt 9:9); Zaccheus and other publicans became rich collecting taxes from large commercial interests like that of balsam. Jesus frequently used the commerce of the day as illustration (Mt 13:14-30). Along the Palestinian coast there were several ports where ships touched: Lydda, Joppa, Caesarea; and further north Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon and Antioch (port Seleucia).

The apostle Paul made use of ships touching at ports on his mission trips to Asia Minor, and the islands along the coast, and also coast trade with Greece, Italy and Spain, to carry on his missionary enterprises (Acts 13:4–13; 16:11; 18:18; 20:13–16; 21:1–5; 27:1–44; 28:1–10). The rapidity with which the gospel spread throughout the Rom world in the 1st cent. was due no little to the use of the great Rom highways, built partly as trade routes; as well as to the constant going to and fro of tradesmen of all sorts; some of whom like Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:2-26), Lydia, (16:14.40) and Paul himself (who was a traveling tent-maker) were active in disseminating the new faith among the Gentiles. In Jas 4:13 we have a good representation of the life of the large number of Jews who would "go forth such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain" (AV). See also Trade.

COMMIT, κομίζει, Used in two senses: (1) "To give in charge" or "entrust": σεμνων, "to put" (Job 5:8); γαλατ, "to roll" (Ps 37:5; Prov 16:3); παραχθε, "to give in charge" (Ps 31:5 A.V.; cf. Lk 23:46); τιθημα, "committed to us" (RV "entrusted to us the word") (2 Cor 1:19); γαλατ, "that which I have committed unto him" (2 Tim 1:12; RV "that which he hath committed unto me," Gr "my deposit"); "that which is committed unto thee" (1 Tim 6:20; Gr "that good thing," etc) (2 Tim 1:14; Gr "the good deposit"). (2) "To do or practise [evil]: πρασσει, "commit such things" (Rom 1:32; RV "practice"); cf. 2:2). In 1 Jn 3:48-8 "doeth sin (ποιετο, AV "commiteth sin") shows that it is not committing a single sin that is in view, but sinful practice.

COMMODOUS, κομδοισ- (κομδοi-stos, κομδo-θετος), "not well placed": The word occurs only in Acts 27:12. "As regards entering the place was certainly 'not commodious,' but as regards shelter from some winds (including N.W.), it was a good anchorage" (CH, XXIII, 639).

COMMON, κομον, κοινος, in the classics, and primarily in the NT, means what is public, general, universal, as contrasted with ιδιος, idios, that which is peculiar, individual, not shared with others. Thus, "common faith" (Tit 1:4), "common salvation" (Jude ver 3), refer to that in which the believers of all Christian units and is universal; "common," because there is but one faith and one salvation (Eph 4:4-6). From this comes the derived meaning of what is ordinary and, therefore, to be deistermed, as contrasted with what pertains to a class, and to be prized, because rare. This naturally coincides with OT exclusivism, particularity and separation. Its religion was that of a separated people, with a separated class as its ministers, and with minute directions as to distinctions of meat, drink, times, places, rites, vessels, etc. Whatever was "common" was thus kept out as "foreign." On the other hand, with its universalism of scope, and its spirituality of sphere, rose above all such externals. The salvation which it brought was directed to the redemption of Nature, as well as of man, sanctifying the creature, and pervading all of its being and all relations of life. The antithesis is forcibly illustrated in Acts 10:14 f., where Peter says: "I have never eaten anything that is c. and unclean," and the reply is: "What God hath cleansed, make not thou c." H. E. Jacobs

COMMONWEALTH, com' unve telwth (πολιτεία, politeia): Spoken of the theocracy (Eph 2:12). The same word is rendered "freedom," AV; "citizenship" RV. Also in the sense of commonwealth in the Apoc (2 Mac 4:11; 8:17; 13:14); in the sense of citizenship (3 Mac 3:21.23). See CITIZENSHIP.

COMMUNE, κομμ' en, COMMUNICATE, κομμ' i-kait, COMMUNICATION, ko'm'-ni-kk'shun: To commune is to converse confidentially and sympathetically. It is represented in both Heb and Gr by several words lit. signifying to speak (of Lk 6:11, διαλογε; also Lk 22:4; Acts 24:26, διαλογε, homile). To communicate is to impart something to another, so that it becomes common to giver and receiver. In 1 Tim 6:18, "willing to communicate" (RV 'sympathize'), represents a single word serve, koinoné, and refers to the habit of sharing with others either sympathy or property. RV gives "companionship" for homileti in 1 Cor 15:33 (AV "communications"). See also COMMUNION.

COMMUNION, κομ'm-yun (FELLOWSHIP): The terms "communion" and "fellowship" of the Eng. Bible are varying tr's of the words κοινωνία, koinonía, and κοινωνία, koinonía, or their cognates. They designate acts of fellowship observed among the early Christians. Communion and fellowship of which these acts were the outward expression. The several passages in which these terms are used fall into two groups: those in which they refer to acts of fellowship, and those in which they refer as mere fellowship, as such.

I. Acts of Fellowship.—The acts of fellowship mentioned in the NT are of four kinds. Our information concerning the nature of the fellowship involved in the observance of this sacrament is confined to the single notice.

1. The Lord's Supper. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? For we eat the fruit of the vine and the bread: do we not partake of his body and blood? (1 Cor 10:16-17)." The Lord's Supper is a communion of the body and blood of the Lord. The bread and wine are symbols of the body and blood of Christ. The act of partaking of the cup and the bread

the communions are linked together in unity: "We, who are many, are one bread, one body: for we all partake of the one bread." Thus the communion of the elements is a real communion of the worshippers one with another and with Christ. Unless the communion be understood in this spiritual sense Paul's illustration falls short of the mark. See Eucharist.

The term for fellowship as used in Acts 2 42 is by some interpreted in this sense: "They continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and in the communion of bread and the prayers." The fact that the four terms are used in pairs and that three of them refer to specific acts observed by the company of believers suggests that the term for fellowship also refers to some definite act similar to the others. It is very plausible to refer this to the community of goods described in the verses immediately following (see COMMUNITY OF GOOSES). The author might, however, with equal propriety have regarded the interchange of spiritual experience as Scripture in the class with "the breaking of bread and the prayers." Christian fellowship found a natural mode of expression in almsgiving. This is enjoined as a duty in Rom 12 13; 1 Tim 6 18; He 13 16.

3. Contributions. A small collection raised among the gentile converts for the poor saints of Jerusalem (Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:4; 9:13). To this collection St. Paul attached so much importance as a witness to the spiritual fellowship which the gospel inspires in all hearts alike, whether Jew or Gentile, that he desired even at the peril of his life to deliver it with his own hand. See Collection.

A form of fellowship closely related to almsgiving was that of formal aid or cooperation in Christian work, such as the aid given to St. Paul by the Philippians (Phil 1:5). A unique form of this cooperation is the personal endorsement by giving the right hand of fellowship as described in Gal 2:9.

II. Fellowship As Experienced.—From the very beginning the early Christians experienced a peculiar sense of unity. Christ is at once the center of this unity and the origin of every expression of fellowship. Sometimes fellowship is the result of unattractive experience and as such it is scarcely susceptible of definition. It may rather be regarded as a mystical union in Christ. In other instances the fellowship approaches or includes the idea of intercourse. In some passages it is a participation or partnership. The terms occur most frequently in the writings of Paul with whom the idea of Christian unity was a controlling principle.

In its various relations, fellowship is represented:

(1) As a communion between the Son and the Father. The gospel record represents Jesus as enjoying a unique sense of communion and intimacy with the Father. Among many such expressions those of Mt 11:25-27 (cf Lk 10:21,22) and Jn 14:16 are especially important. (2) As our communion with God, either with the Father or the Son or with the Father through the Son or the Holy Spirit. "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1:3; cf also Jn 14:23,26). (3) As our communion one with another. "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another" (1 Jn 1:7). Sometimes the idea of communion occurs in relation with abstract ideas or experiences: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph 5:11). "The fellowship of his sufferings" (Phil 3:10); "the fellowship of thy faith" (Philm ver 6). In three passages the relation of the fellowship is not entirely clear: the "fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil 2:1); "the communion of the Holy Spirit" (2 Cor 13:14); and "the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Cor 1:9). The fellowship is probably used as if prevailing among Christians by virtue of the grace of Christ and the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

It is not to be inferred that the idea of fellowship is limited to the passages in which the specific words for communion are used. Some of the clearest and richest expressions of unity and fellowship are found in the Gospels, though these words do not appear. The most familiar and forcible expressions of the idea are those in which they are represented symbolically, as in the parable of the Vine and the Branches (Jn 15:1ff) or in the figure of the Body and its Members (Mt 20:1ff; Rom 12:5; 1 Cor 12:12).

COMMUNION WITH DEMONS, δὲ μονή (DEVILS, dev'mon). I. Use of Term.—The actual expression "communion with demons" (κοινωνία τῶν βασανιστών, κοινω-

II. Teaching of Scripture.—To begin with, we may safely say, in general, that there is no ground for asserting that the Bible admits the possibility of conscious and voluntary communion with spirits. This is an essential element of popular demonology in all ages, but it is absent from Scripture. Even in the passages mentioned above which refer to necromancers and wizards, while, as we shall see, the words indicate that such practitioners professed to rely upon spirits in their divinations, the Scriptures carefully refrain from sanctioning these claims, and a number of features in the various passages serve to indicate that the true scriptural view is quite the opposite. As this is not a prevalent opinion, or even a generally recognized one, it should do well to examine the passages with some little care.

(1) We may first deal with the NT. In the Gospels the demoniacs are consistently looked upon and treated as unconscious and I. The New Testament MONOLOGY. The frequent use of this term "demonized" (daimonizomen) together with all that is told us of the methods of treating these cases adopted by Our Lord and His disciples (see EXORCISM) indicates the belief of the NT writers that the control of demons over men is obtained outside of or below the region of conscious volition and that the condition of the sufferers is pathological.

(2) The assertion must be said of the Lydian maiden whose cure by Paul is recorded in Acts 16:16. This is the one instance in the NT where divination is connected with spirits. The account emphasizes the excitable neurosis of the patient; and the belief on the part of the apostles and of the writer of Acts that the girl was not the conscious accomplice of her masters, but their unfortunate victim through her mysterious malady, is clear. She was treated, as the other cases recorded in the NT, not as a conscious wrongdoer, but as a sick person to be healed of his suffering" (Phil 3:10): "the fellowship of thy faith" (Philm ver 6).

(1) Turning now to the OT, the instance which requires the most careful treatment, because it holds the key to all the rest, is the narrative of Saul's visit to the Witch of Endor in 1 S 29 3-25. The Heb word 'obh which is usually tr'ed "one who has a familiar spirit" (see list of passages at 2. The Old Testament) beginning of art.) occurs in this narration four times (vs 3, 7, twice, 8).
According to the ordinary interpretation it is used of the power to evoke two or more spirits.
These three senses are (a) a person who controls a spirit, (b) the spirit controlled, (c) the power to control such a spirit. This meaning appears to be altogether too broad. Omitting to translate the word we have, (ver 2) it had put away 'obh\eh, and yidh\e'mim' (i.e. their) were wicked, a mistress of an 'obh\eh (ver 8) "Divine unto me . . .
by the 'obh\eh." It is extremely unlikely that the same word should be used in two senses so far apart as "person who has a spirit" and the "spirit itself" in the same context. In the last passage mentioned (ver 8) there is a double indication that the word 'obh cannot have either significance mentioned. Saul says: "Divine unto me by the 'obh and bring me up whomever I shall name unto thee." The expression "divine by" clearly points to some magical object used in divination. Control of a spirit through some magical object is familiar enough.
The rest of Saul's statement confirms this view.
The result of this divination is the calling up of a spirit. A spirit would hardly be called to call up another spirit. This conclusion is confirmed by the etymology. The word 'obh is supposed to mean "one who has a familiar spirit," from its root-significance of holding and its primary meaning of wineskin. According to this derivation the word is applied to a necromancer on the supposition that the spirit inhabits his body and speaks from within. The transference to spirit is extremely unlikely, and the explanation is not consistent with ancient ideas on spirit manifestation (see BDB, 288, end).
(2) We, therefore, hold with H. P. Smith (ICC, "Samuel in loc."), though partly on different grounds, that the word 'obh has the same meaning in all the passages where it occurs, and that it refers to a sacred object or fetish by which spiritistic divination was carried on.
The significance of this conclusion is that the meaning of "the necromancer's familiar spirit" disappears from the text, for Dr. Driver's interpretation of the companion word yidh\e'mim (see ICC, Comm. Dt in loc.) will scarcely be maintained in the face of this new meaning for 'obh. The prohibition contained in the Law (Deut 18 10) and the idea of using them, places them in the same catalogue of offence and futility with idol-worship in general.
(3) This opinion is confirmed by two separate items of evidence. (a) In the Witch of Endor story Samuel's appearance, according to the idea of the narrator, was due to a miracle, not to the magic power of the feeble and cheating old woman to whom Saul had resorted. God speaks through the apparition a stern message of doom. No one was more startled than the woman herself, who for once had a real vision (ver 12). She not only gave a loud cry of astonishment and alarm but she described the figure which she saw as "a god coming up out of the earth." The story is told with fidelity and clearly indicates the opinion that the actual appearance of a spirit is so violently exceptional as to indicate the immediate power and presence of God.
(b) In Isa 8 19 the 'obh\eh and yidh\e'mim are spoken of as those who "chirp and mutter." These terms refer to necromancers and mediums (LXX translates 'obh\eh by epy\e'na\a'mo\e'na\u, ventriloquistis, who practised ventriloquism in connection with their magical rites. In Isa 29 it is said "Thy voice shall be as an 'obh\eh, out of the ground." Here 'obh is usually interpreted as "ghost," but it is far more probable (see BDB sub loc.) that it refers as in 8 19 to the ventriloquistic tricks of those who utter their oracles in voices intended to represent the spirits which they have evoked. They are stumped in these passages, as in the Witch of Endor narrative, as deceivers practising a fraudulent art. By implication their practice with whom they were in familiar intercourse is denied.
This leaves the way clear for a brief consideration of the words of Paul in 1 Cor 10 20 in connection with cognate passages in the OT.
3. Meaning of the word is really demon-worship, the partaking of idol-
Worship with demons and a separation from Christ. It is usually taken for granted that this characterisation of heathen worship was simply a part of the Jewish-Christian polemic against idolatry. Our fuller knowledge of the spiritism which conditions the use of images enables us to recognize the fact that from the viewpoint of heathenism itself Paul's idea was strictly correct. The image is venerated because it is supposed to represent or contain an invisible being or spirit, not necessarily a deity in the absolute, but a superhuman living being capable of working good or ill to men.
(2) In the AV the term devils is used in four OT passages (Lev 17 7; Dt 32 17; 2 Ch 11 15; Ps 106 37). In RV "devils" has disappeared from the text—the word he-goats appears in Lev 17 7 and 2 Ch 11 15, but demons appears in Dt 32 17 and Ps 106 37. The tr of e\e'nhim as "he-goats" is literally correct, but conveys an erroneous conception of the meaning. The practice reprobarated is the worship of Satyrs (see SATYR) or wood-demons supposed to be like goats in appearance and to inhabit lonely places. The same word is used in Isa 13 21; 34 14. The word tr "demons" in RV is shk\ehim, a term used only twice and both times in connection with the rites and abominations of heathen worship. It is interesting to note that the word shk\ehu is applied to the beings represented by the bull-colossi of Assyria (Driver, Dt in loc.). BDB holds that the word shk\ehim is an Assyrian loan-word, while Briggs (ICC, Ps 106 37) holds that it is the old word for demon as used by Jews in their polemic against heathenism. In any case the word belongs to heathenism and is used in Scripture to describe heathen worship in its own terminology. The interpretation of these beings as evil is characteristic of Bib. demonism in general (see DEMON, worship of personal beings more than man and less than God, according to Jewish and Christian ideas (see Driver op. cit., 363). LXX translates both the above words by diamente. The term "communion with demons" does not imply any power on the part of men to enter into voluntary relationship with beings of another world, but that, by sinful compliance in wrongdoing, such as idol-worship of personal beings more than man and less than God, according to Jewish and Christian ideas (see Driver op. cit., 363). LXX translates both the above words by diamente.

COMMUNITY, kô-mü'ni-ti, OF GOODS ( skew-ta ko\u'veu tic, ko\u'veu koi\u'veu e\ wounds, lit. "They had all things in common"): In Acts 2 44, it is said that, in the infant church, "all that they possessed was sold, and they parted the things of which they were together, and had all things common," and (4 34) "as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them at the apostles' feet." The inference from this, that there was an absolute disposal of all the property of the church, that its proceeds were contributed to a common fund, has been disputed upon the ground that the example of Barnabas in selling "a field" for this purpose (Acts 4:37) would not have been mentioned, if this had been the universal rule. The thought conveyed is that all believers in that church held their property as a trust from the Lord, for the benefit of the entire brotherhood, and, as there was need, did as Barnabas did.

No commandment of which record has been preserved, preserved and such a one as Barnabas was from the spontaneous impulse of the sense of brotherhood in Christ, when the band of disciples was still small, making them in a sense one family, and under the external constraint of extreme want and persecution. So much there was, that they realized, under such conditions they had in common, that they were ready to extend this to all things. It was, in a sense, a continuance of the practice of a common purse in the band of immediate followers of Our Lord during his ministry. The prophecy included on Ananias and Sapphira was not for any failure to comply fully with this custom, but because this freedom which they possessed (Acts 5:4) falsely professed to have renounced, thus receiving in return the estimation of the breach of their word, which was not their due. This custom did not last long. It was possible only within a limited circle, and under very peculiar circumstances. The NT recognizes the right of individual property and makes no effort to remove the different that exist among believers themselves. The community of goods which it renders possible is spiritual (1 Cor 3:21 f.), and not one of visible and external things. With respect to the latter, it enjoins upon the Christian as a steward of God, the possession and administration of property for the progress of the kingdom of God, and the highest interests of men. The spirit of Acts 4:34 is always to pervade the association of believers as a true Christian community. Meyer, on the above passage, has suggested that it is not unlikely that the well-known poverty of the church at Jerusalem, and its long dependence upon the alms of other churches, may be connected with this early communistic practice, which was, however, justifiable and commendable at the time, bore its inevitable fruits in a subsequent season of great scarcity and lack of employment.

COMPACT, kom-pakt', COMPACTED, kom-pakt'ed ("kēł̂"), hōbbar, "to be joined"; āveniḇātēm, āveniḇīḇāḏāz, "to raise up together"; "Compact" appears as tr of hōbbar in Ps 132:3, "Jerus... a city that is compact together" (well built, its breaches restored, walls complete, and separate from all around); in Gen 4:17 ["compact") (numbīḇāḏāz) occurs in AV Eph 4:16, "fifty joined together and compacted," RV "fifty framed and knit together." In AV "compact" is also the tr of səwēdām, səwēḏāmēn, "to set together" (2 Pet 3:5), "an earth compacted out of water and amidst [in, through] the water," which suggests the idea of water as the primary material (cf Gen 1:2). COMPANY, kom-pa-ni: The fertility of the original language in synonyms and varied shades of meaning is seen by the fact that 20 Heb and 12 Gr words are represented by this single term. An analysis of these words shows that "company" is both an indefinite and limitless term, signifying few or many, and all kinds of assemblages of people, e.g.: (a) military (Isa 21:13 AV); (b) commercial (Gen 37:25 AV); Job 6:19, "The companies of Sheba waited [in vain] for them."
ancient and modern, whether professed by savages or prevalent among highly civilized communities, whether to be studied in sacred books or learnt orally from the people.

In this way we learn first of all that religion is a universal phenomenon—found among all nations in all conditions, though differing immensely in its teachings, ceremonies and effects in different places. It is perhaps the most powerful for good or evil of all the instincts (for it is an instinct) which influence mankind.

To account for the origin and growth of religion various theories have been propounded: (1) "Humanism," which is the revival of the "Self-says," of which there were two, one the "I-saying," which traces religion to early man's fancy that every object in Nature had a personality like his own; (2) the Astral Theory, which supposes that religion originated from worship of the heavenly bodies. It is clear that there are facts to support each of these hypotheses, yet no one of them satisfies all the facts. We have been told that it has been observed that most tribes from the earliest times clearly distinguished between those deities who had been men, and the gods proper, who had never been men and had never died. Regarding (2), it should be observed that it admits that man's consciousness of his own personality and his fancy that it exists in other creatures also does not account for his worshipping them, unless we grant the existence of the sensus numinis within him: if so, then this explains, justified, and necessitates religion. (3) The Astral Theory is in direct opposition to Euhemerism or Humanism. It ascribes personality to the heavenly bodies in man's early fancy; but it, too, has to presuppose the sensus numinis, without which religion would be impossible, as would be the science of optics if man had not the sense of sight. It is often held that religion is due to evolution. If so, then its evolution, resulting ex hypothesi in Christianity as its acme, must be the "Eternal Purpose" (prothesis tis asidend, Eph 3 11), just as has been the evolution of an amoeba into a man on the Evolutionary Theory. This would be an additional proof of the truth of Christianity. But, though doubtfully there has been a gradual progress under Divine guidance—in religion, the fact of Christ is sufficient to show that there is a Divine self-revelation too. Hence the claim of Christianity to be the absolute religion. The pre-Christian religions were the age-long prayer, the Incarnation was the answer (Illeworth). Christianity as revealed in Christ adds what none of the ethical faiths could prove their claim to—authority, holiness, revelation.

II. Relation of Christianity to Ethnic Faiths and Their Tenets.—It is very remarkable that Christianity—though clearly not a philosophy but a religion that has arisen under historical circumstances which preclude the possibility of supposing it the product of Eclecticism—yet sums up in itself all that is good in all religions and philosophies, without the bad, the fearful perversions and corruptions of the moral sense, too often found in them. The more the study of comparative religion is carried on the more plainly evident does this become. At one time (1) it has been thought the half-truths concealed rather than revealed in other systems, whether religious or philosophical. We subjoin a few instances of this.

Karma is strongly insisted on in Hindûism and Buddhism. These teach that every deed, good or bad, must have its result, that "its fruit must be eaten" here or hereafter. So does Christianity quite as forcibly (Gal 6 7-8). But neither

1. Karma

Indian faith explains how sin can be forgiven, evil be overruled for good, nor how, by building good found ed works, man may rise higher (Aug., Sermo iii, De Ascensione). They recognize, in some sense, the existence of evil, and illogically teach that rites and certain ascetic practices help to overcome it. They know of no Atonement, though modern Hindûism endeavors to propitiate the deities by sacrifices, as indeed was done in Vedic times. Conscience they cannot explain. Christianity, while showing the heinousness of sin as no other system does, and so supplementing the others, supplements them still further by the Atonement, showing that God is just, and teaching how His very righteousness can be brought to "justify" the sinner (Rom 3 26).

Mahâyâna Buddhism proclaims an immanent but not transcendent being (Dharma-kâya), who is the Ultimate Reality that underlies all. Religion e all particular phenomena" (Suzuki), who wills and reflects, though not fully personal. He is not the Creator of the world but a kind of Anima mundi, a "universal soul". To the Christian, sentient beings have no individual existence, no "ego-soul." The world of matter has no real existence but is his self-manifestation. Christianity supplants and corrects this by teaching the transcendence of God, and the immanence (Acts 17 28) of the Creator, who is at least personal, if not something higher, who is the Source of reality though not Himself the sole reality, and of our personality and life, and "who only hath immortality" (1 Tim 6 16).

Vedântism and Sûfism proclaim that ultimate absorption in the impersonal "It" is the summum bonum, and the Chânâdogyâ Upanishad says, "There is just one thing, without which there would be no bliss whatever. What is this thing? It is that one thing everything is, so to speak, a part: there being no ultimate difference between the human and the Divine. Thus sin is denied and unreality proclaimed (Mâyâ, illusion). The yearning for union with the Absolute is the aim of all, and this is satisfied in Christianity, which provides reconciliation with God and shows how by new spiritual birth men may become children of God (Jn 1 12-18) and 'partakers of the divine nature' (2 Pet 1 4), without being swallowed up therein like a raindrop in the ocean: the union being spiritual and not material.

Orthodox (Sunni) Muslim theology declares God to be separated from man by an impassable gulf and hence to be unknowable.

4. Self-Revelation of God

Philosophically this leads to Agnosticism, though opposed to Polytheism. Among the Jews the philosophy of Maimonides ends in the same failure to attain to a knowledge of the Divine or to describe the God except by negations (Sûpher Ha-naddâ'â, 11). The Bible, on the other hand, while speaking of Him as invisible, and unknowable through merely human effort (Job 11 7-8; Jn 1 18), yet reveals Him in Christ, who is God and man. Jewish mysticism endeavored to solve the problem of creation by the invention of the 'Akhârn kadhmûn (archetypal man), and earlier by Philo's Logos doctrine and the Memra of the Targums. But these abstractions have neither reality nor personality. The Christian Logos doctrine presents contents in a wondrous way the historical, eternal Christ (of Jn 1 1-3; Bahá’ísm their dogma of “manifestations” (mazhar) in human beings; the ‘Alláháris are so called because they regard ‘Alláh as God. Instead of these unworthy theories and delusions, Christianity supplies the holy, sinless, perfect Incarnation in Christ.

Hinduism offers mukti (moksha), “deliverance” from a miserable existence; Christianity in Christ offers pardon, deliverance from sin, and 6. Salvation reconciliation with God.

Krishnaism teaches unreasoning “devotion” (bhakti) of “mind, body, property” to certain supposed incarnations of Krishna (Vishnu), quite regardless of their immoral conduct;

7. Faith Christianity inculcates a manly, reasonable “faith” in Christ, but only after “proving all things.”

Pilgrimages in Islam and Hinduism indicate but do not satisfy a need for approach to God; Christianity teaches a growth in grace and in like-ness to Christ, and so a spiritual draw-to God ing near to God.

III. General Characteristics of Eth-nic Faiths.—The world's religions were, though in many various forms, certain common beliefs, such as:

1. Tenets power or powers, good or bad, superior Common to man and able to affect his present nature life; (2) That there is a difference between right and wrong, even though not clearly defined; (3) That there is an after-life of some sort, with happiness or misery often regarded as in some measure dependent upon conduct or upon the ob-servation of certain rites here. In the main the fact of the all but universal agreement of religions upon these points proves that they are true in substance. Even such an agnostic philosophy as original Buddhism has been deified, and Buddha himself has been deified by the Maháyána School. Yet no ethnic faith satisfies the “human soul naturally Christian” as Tertullian calls it (Liber Apotheoticus, cap. 17), for none of them reveals One God, personal, holy, loving, just, mer-ciful, omnipotent and omnipotent. Even Islam fails here. Ethnic religions are either (1) poly- theistic, worshipping many gods, imperfect and some evil, or (2) mystical, evaporating away, as it were, God’s Personality, thus rendering Him a mental abstraction, as in the Hindú philosophical systems and in Maháyána Buddhism. Christianity as revealed in Christ does just what all other faiths fail to do, reconciling these two tendencies and cor recting both.

As a general rule, the nearer to their source we can trace religions, the purer we find them. In most cases a tendency to degradation and not to progressive improvement manifests itself as time goes on, and this is sometimes carried to such an extent that, as Lecretius found in Progress, in Rome and Greece, religion becomes an Ethnic curse and not a blessing. Thus, for example, regarding ancient Egypt, Professor Renouf says: “The sub-limer portions of the Egypt religion are not the com paratively late result of a process of development. The sub-limer portions are demonstrably ancient, and the last stage of the Egypt religion was by far the grossest and most corrupt” (Hibbert Lectures, 91).

Modern Hindúism, again, is incomparably lower in its religious conceptions than the religion of Vedas. The rule holds good, as is evident from the myths about Tangan. In Samoa he was said to be the son of two beings, the “Cloudless Heaven” and the “Outspread Heaven.” He originally existed in open space. He made the sky to dwell in. He then made the earth. Somewhat later he was supposed to be visible in the moon! But a lower depth was reached. In Hawaii, Tangaroa has sunk to an evil being, the leader of a rebellion against another god, Tane, and it is now conceived to abide in the lowest depths of darkness and be the god of death. In South Africa, Australia and elsewhere, traditions still linger of a Creator of all things, but his worship has been entirely laid aside in favor of lower and more evil deities.

Almost everywhere mythology has arisen and perverted religion into something very different from what it once was. The same tendency has more than once mani fested itself in the Christian church, thus rendering a return to Christ’s teachings necessary. As an instance, compare the modern popular religion of Italy with that of the NT. It is remarkable that no religion but the Christian, however, has shown its capability of reform.

For the most part, in ethnic religions, there is no recognized connection between religion and moral ity. The wide extension of phallic worship and the existence of hierodoulai and hierodouloi shows that religion has often consecrated gross immorality. Mythology aids in this degradation. Hence Seneca, after mentioning many evil myths related of Jupiter, etc., says: “By which nothing evil is effected but the removal from men of their shame at sinning, if they deemed such beings gods” (L. A. Seneca, De beata vita cap. 26). With the possible doubtful exception of the religion of certain savage tribes, in no religion is the holiness of God taught except in Christianity and its initial stage, Judaism. Ethnic deities are mostly born of heaven and earth, if not identified with them in part, and are rarely regarded as creating heaven; it was otherwise, however, with Ahura Mazda, in Zoroastrianism, and with certain Semitic deities, and there are other exceptions, too. The “religions of Nature” have generally produced gross immorality, encouraging and even becoming a part of their ritual; cf. Mylitta-worship in Babylon and that of the “Mater deäm,” Venus, Anâhita, etc.

IV. Supposed Resemblances to Revealed Re-ligion.—Much attention has been called to real or supposed community of rites and dogmas among the Stoics, and in the Eddas of Scandi navia and the Purânas of India.

1. Rites “mimic” esp. what is found in the other faith is compared with Christianity. Sacrifice, for instance, is an essential part of every religion. In Christianity none are now offered, except the “living sacrifices” of the believer, though that of Christ offered once for all is held to be the subsance foreshadowed by Jewish sacrifices. Purificatory bathtings are found almost everywhere, and that very naturally, because of the universality of conscience and of some sense of sin.

Belief in the fiery end of the world existed among the Stoics, and is found in the Eddas of Scandi navia and the Purânas of India.

2. Dogmas Traditions of an age before sin and death came upon mankind occur in many different lands. Many of these traditions may easily be accounted for. But in some cases the supposed resemblance to revealed religion does not exist, or is vastly exaggerated. The Ygã philosophy in India is popularly supposed to aim at union with God, as does Christianity; but (so understood) the Ygã system, as has already been said, implies loss of personality and absorption into the impersonal, unconscious “It” (Tat). The doctrine of a Trinity is nowhere found, only Triads of separate deities. Belief in a resurrection is found in only very late parts of the Pers (Zoroastrian) scriptures, composed after cents. of communication with Jews and Christians. In the earlier Avesta only a "restoration" of the world is mentioned (cf Acts 3:21). Original (H razón Buddhist teaches "immortality" (omata), but by this is meant Nir-

A Has been said to teach the "resurrection of the body," but, according to Eubulus and Porphyry, it taught rather the transmigration of the soul.

The assertion is made that many of the leading gospel incidents in the life of Our Lord are paralleled in other religions. It is

3. Asserted, said for instance, that the resurrection-Parallels to theon of Adonis, Osiris and Mithra Gospel was believed in by their followers. It

History is true that, in some places, Adonis was said to have come to life the day after he had met his death by the tusk of a boar (the cold of winter); but everywhere it was recognized that the way to a man who had been killed but the representative of the produce of the soil, slain or dying down in the cold weather and growing again in spring. As to Osiris, his tomb was shown in more than one place in Egypt, and his body was never supposed to have come to life again, though his spirit was alive and was ruler of the underworld. Mithra was admitted to be the genius of the sun. He was said to have sprung from a rock (in old Pers and Sanskrit the same word means "sky," "cloud" or "rock"), but to have been incarcerated, nor to have died, much less to have risen from the dead. The modern erroneous fancy that Mithraists believed in his resurrection rests solely on one or at most two passages in Christian writers, which are only referable to the control of Osiris and the removal of his body from the tomb by his hostile brother Typhon (Set). The high morality attributed to Mithraism and even to the worship of Isā rests on no better foundation than the wrong rendering of a few passages and the deliberate ignoring of many which contradict the theory.

Virgin birth, we have been told, is a doctrine of many religions. As a matter of fact, it is found in hardly one ethnic faith. Nothing of the kind was ever regarded regarding Osiris, Adonis, Horus, Mithra, Krishna, Zoroaster. Of Buddha it is denied altogether in the books of the Southern Canon (Pali), and is found expressed only vaguely in one or two technical works of the Northern (Sanskrit) School. It was doubtless borrowed from Christianity. Supernatural birth of quite a different and (very repulsive) kind is found in many mythologies, but that is quite another thing.

Heathenism contains some vague aspirations and unconscious prophecies, the best example of which is to be found in Vergil's Fourth Eclogue, if that be not rather due to Jewish influence. Any such foreloges of the coming light as are real and not merely imaginary, such, for instance, as the Indian doctrine of the avatāras or "descent" of Viṣṇu, are to be accounted for as part of the Divine education of the human race. The 'false dawn,' so well known in the East, is not a proof that the sun is not about to exist its existence justify anyone in shutting his eyes to and rejecting the day-light when it comes. It is but a harbinger of the real dawn.

nics faiths no less than their aspirations show how great is man's need of Christ, and how utterly unable is imagination has ever proved itself to be even to conceive of such an ideal character as He revealed to us in the full light of history and in the wonder-working effects of His character upon the lives and hearts of those who then and in ages since have in Him received life and light.

COMPARE, kom-pa-r, COMPASS, kom-pa-s, re: "the", dámāh, ṭāb, māsh, ṭāb, ṭarak; parəbdālə, parəbdāli, əvənə, sugkr̡nə: "Compare" is the trp of ṭāb, dámāh, "to be like" (Cant 1:9); of ṭāb, māsh, "to liken," "compare" (Isa 46:5); of ṭāb, ṭarak, "to set in array," "compare" (Ps 89:6; Isa 40:18); of ṭāb, ṭāshak, "to be equal" (Prov 3:15; 8:11).

In the NT sugkr̡nə, "to judge" or "sift together," is trp "comparing," comparing spiritual things with spiritual (1 Cor 12:3; ARV "combining"); adapting the discours of the subject. Thus: RVm "interpreting spiritual things to spiritual men." W. L. WALKER

COMPASS, kom'pas, COMPASSES, kom'pəs': "Compare," noun is the trp of ṭāb, ṭāb, "circle," "vault" or "arch" ("when he set a compass upon the face of the depth" Prov 21:27 AV, RV "circle of" Job 26:10; and see Circle; VaulT OF Earth"; of ẓāb, karkōb, "a margin," "border" (Ex 27:5, "the compass of the altar," RV "the least round," so 38:16), to fetch a compass is the trp of ẓāb, sōbhāb, "to turn about," "go round about" (Nu 34:5; Josh 15:3, RV "turn about" 2 S 5:23; 2 K 3:9, RV "make a circuit"; of pertérchomai, "to go about" (Acts 28:13, RV "made a circuit"; in "some ancient authorities read cast loose": see Circuits). "Compasses" is RV for "compass," ṭāb, māshāh, an instrument for describing a circle: "He marketh it out with the compasses" (Isa 44:13) making an idol.

The vb. "to compass" occurs frequently in the sense of "to surround" and "to go round about," e.g. Gen 2:11, "which compasseth the whole land of Havilah," Dt 2:1, "We compassed [went around] mount Seir many days"; in Jer 31:22 we have "a new thing on the earth: a woman shall compass a man," RV "will turn about" (children of the old pharisees) but more probably as a protector. In those happy days, the protection of women (under God, ver 28) will be sufficient, while the men are at their work; to encompass" (the cords of death compassed me," Ps 18:4; "the waves of death," 2 S 25:5). "To gird" (Isa 60:11 RV); "to lie around," "to be laid around" (He 5:2, "compassed with infirmity" [clothed with it]; 12:1, "compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses").
COMPASSION, kom-pash'un: Compassion is the tr of ἀματία, ráhám, "to love," "pitv," "be merciful" (Dt 13 17; 30 3); of ἁμάμα, "mercies" (1 K 8 50); of ἱματία, "to pity," "spare" (Ex 2 6; 12 19; 34 22); ráhám (Ps 43 24; 11 4; 112 4; 145 8), is rendered by ARV "merciful.

We have σπαλγνίζομαι, splagnizomai, "to have the bowels yearning," in Mt 9 36; 14 14, etc.; sumpathéō (He 10 34), "to suffer with [another];" sumpathēia (1 Pet 3 8, RV "compassionate," in Gr "sympathetic"); metripathéō (He 6 2, RV "who can bear gently with"); eleóo, "to show mildness," "kindness" (Mt 18 33; Mk 5 19; Jude ver 22, RV "mercy"); orkielóo, "to have pity" or "mercy" (Rom 9 15 bis).

Both ráhám and splagnizomai are examples of the physical origin of spiritual terms, the bowels being regarded as the seat of the warm, tender emotions or feelings. But, while ráhám applied to the lower viscera as well as the higher, splagnizomai denoted chiefly the higher viscera, the heart, lungs, liver.

RV gives "compassion" for "mercy" (Isa 9 17; 14 1; 27 11; 49 13; Jer 13 14; 30 18; Dn 1 9 AV "tender love with"); for "bowels of compassion." (1 Jn 3 17); for "mercy" (He 10 28); "full of compassion" or "mercy" (ARV "merciful" in cases) (Ex 34 6; Neh 9 17; Ps 103 8; Joel 2 13; Jon 4 2); "compassions" for "mercies" (Isa 63 15; Phil 2 1), for "repentings" (Hos 11 8).

Compasion, lit. a feeling with and for others, is a fundamental and distinctive quality of the Bib. conception of God, and to its prominence the world owes more than words can express. (1) It lay at the foundation of Israel's faith in Jcb. For it was out of His compassion that He, by a marvelous act of power, delivered them from Egypt bondage and called them to be His own people. Nothing, therefore, is more prominent in the OT than the ascription of compassion, pity, mercy, etc., to God; the people may be said to have gloried in it. It is summed up in such sayings as that of this great declaration (Ps 103 8). (2) Jehovah is the God full of compassion [ARV merciful] and gracious" (of Ps 78 38; 86 15; 111 4; 112 4; 145 8; Lam 3 22, "His compassions fail not"). And, because this was the character of their God, the prophets declared that compassion was an essential requirement on the part of members of the community (Hos 6 6; Mic 6 8; of Prov 19 17). (2) In Jesus Christ, in whom God was "manifest in the flesh," compassion was an outstanding feature (Mt 9 30; 14 14, etc) and He taught that it ought to be extended, not to friends and neighbors only, but to all without exception, even to enemies (Mt 5 43 48; Lk 10 30 37).

The God of the NT, the Father of men, is most clearly revealed as "a God full of compassion." It extends to all the human race, for which He effected not merely a temporal, but a spiritual and eternal, deliverance, giving up His own Son to the death of the cross in order to save us from the worst bondage of sin, with its consequences; seeking thereby to "draw near" to all, give Himself still more devoted, more filled with and expressive of His own Spirit. Therefore all who know the God and Father of Christ, and who call themselves His children, must necessarily cultivate compassion and show mercy, "even as He is merciful." Hence the many apostolic injunctions to that effect (Eph 4 32; Col 3 12; Jas 1 27; 1 Jn 3 17, etc).

In the NT two words are found: (1) ἀγαπάω, agapeó. The word is of Pers origin and means to employ a courier. The ἀγαρόι, in the NT were public couriers stationed by appointment of the kings of Persia, at fixed localities, with horses ready for use, to transmit speedily from one to another the royal messages. These couriers had authority to press into their service, in case of need, horses, vessels, and even men, they might meet (Jos, Ant XIII, ii, 3). "compel them to go a mile" (Mt 5 41 AV; RV "impress"); "compelled Simon to bear his cross" (Mt 27 32; Mk 15 21 AV; RV "impressed"). (2) ἀγαφάω, agaphao, "to constrain, whether by force, threats, entreaties, persuasion, etc.;" "compel them to come" (Lk 16 13 AV; RV "constrain"). This has been a favorite text of religious persecutors. As Robertson says in his history of Charles V, "As they could not persuade, they tried to compel men to believe." But it simply meant that utmost zeal and moral urgency should be used by Christians to induce sinners to enter the Kingdom of God. Cf Acts 26 11.

GEORGE HENRY TREVER

COMPLAINING, kom-plei'ing (προτιμάω, ἀναφόραω, ἐναφόραω, "cry," "outcry," ἄφορισμα, "meditation, complaint") ("complaint"); ἀναφόραω is the act of crying out, the calling for God's help, if the complaint is in the context of distress (2 Th 3 6; "outcry," "to make a complaint"); ἀναφόραω, "to make perfume," πρόκαταστάτω, "to make a perfumery"; πρόκαταστάτω, "to make perfume," ἀναφόρά, "of the sacred anointing oil (Ex 30 25 32 33) and of the holy anointing oil (Ex 30 25 32 33) and of the holy anointing oil (Ex 37 38), which were not to be used for any profane purpose.

COMPLETE, kom-plé't: In AV for πληρωμα, plerôma, the vb. ordinarily used for the coming to pass of what had been predicted. AV translates this "completing" in Col 2 10; 4 12 to express the final and entire attainment of what is treated, leaving nothing beyond to be desired or hoped for; otherwise rendered in RV ("made full"). In RV, e. appears once for Gr ἀριστος, from ἀριστος, "to join," in 2 Tim 3 17, in sense of "accurately fitted for," where AV has "perfect.

COMPOSITION, kom-pó-zish'un (περιπλωματικός, makhoneth, "measure"); COMPOUND, kom-pound (subst.) (πρόκαταστάτω, ἀφόραω, "to make perfume," πρόκαταστάτω, "perfume," πρόκαταστάτω, "of the sacred anointing oil (Ex 30 25 32 33) and of the holy anointing oil (Ex 37 38), which were not to be used for any profane purpose.

COMPREHEND, kom-pré'hend: Used in a twofold sense in both the OT and NT. This double meaning appears in two Heb and two Gr words which signify in turn (1) mental or spiritual perception, (2) capacity to hold or contain, as in a vessel, or (3) capacity to hold all-inclusive principle, e.g.:

(1) ἀφαίρεσις, ἀφαίρεσις, "to lay hold of," hence mentally to apprehend: used of the spiritual capacity of the Christian "to comprehend [RV ' apprehend']" with all saints" (Eph 3:18) the measureless love of God; and of the inability of the unregenerate heart to know or perceive the revelation of God made in Christ: "the darkness comprehended it not" (Jn 1:5 RV 'apprehended'; RvM 'overcame'; cf 12:35).

(2) םיה, קול, "to measure or contain," as grain in a bushel. So God's immeasurable greatness is seen in His being able to hold occasions in the hand (Ps 136:7) and "comprehend the dust of the earth in a measure" (Isa 40:12).

אָנַכַּלָּדָה, anakephalaios, "to sum up under one head," e.g. love includes every moral principle and process. The entire law on its own side, says Paul, "is comprehended [RV 'summed up'] in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." (Rom 13:9).

Dwight M. Pratt

CONANIAH, kon-o-ni'a (נהוּנֶה, konanah), "Jah has founded or sustained." AV Conaniah:

(1) A Levite, appointed with his brother Shimea by Hezekiah, the king, and Azariah, the ruler of the house of God, to be overseer of the oblations and tithes and the dedicated things (2Ch 31:12,13).

(2) One of the chiefs of the Levites mentioned in connection with the passover celebration in Josiah's reign (2Ch 35:9).

CONCEAL, kon-se'el (פָּרַסְקָלָתָה, paraskelathah): Found but once in the NT (Lk 9:45). The primary meaning is to cover by hanging something in front of the object hidden. The purpose of the one concealing is made prominent. There is, therefore, a reserve and studied progress in regard to the statement, that is not always the suppression of truth (Prov 12:16,23). God withholds more than He reveals (Prov 25:2; cf Ps 97:2; 1Tim 6:16).

CONCEIT, kon-se'it: An idiomatic rendering of a phrase, φρόνημα ἐν εὐγνώμον, φρόνησιν ἐν διευκρίνεσιν, in Rom 11:25; 12:16; meaning lit. "wise with one's self," i.e. "in one's own opinion," or, as in Π OT passages (Prov 38:5.12 RvM), "in his own eyes" (Heb 'egyn).

CONCEPTION, kon-sep'shon, CONCETE, kon-se've (πνεύμα, πνεῦμα, πνευματικόν in heautotó), in Rom 11:25; 12:16; meaning lit. "wise with one's self," i.e. "in one's own opinion," or, as in Π OT passages (Prov 38:5.12 RvM), "in his own eyes" (Heb 'egyn).

CONCEPTION, Immaculate. See Immaculate Conception.

CONCERNING, kon-sun'ing: Makes frequent changes, such as "for," "as for," "from," "about," for "concerning"; "concerning" instead of "for," "of," "over," "in," "against," etc. Some of the other changes are, "unto that which is good," "concerning" (Rom 16:19), "concerning" instead of "because of" (Jer 23:9), "for the miracle of" (Mk 5:52), for "with" (10:41), for "of the Lord" (Acts 18:25), "concerning Jesus" (different text), "by way of disparagement" (2Cor 11:21), instead of "concerning reproach"; "Why askst thou me concerning that which is good?" (Mt 19:17) instead of "Why callest thou me good?" (different text; RvM).

CONCLUSION, kon-klo'zhan (καταλήπτον, katatamo'n, "mutilation," "cutting"): A term by which St. Paul contemptuously designates the merely fleshly circumcision upon which the Judaismists insisted as being necessary for gentle converts (Phil 3:2), as distinguished from пертоам, the true circumcision (ver 3). Cf Gal 5:12 and Dtn 31:1, and see Circumcision.

CONCLUDE, kon-klo'd (καταλήμματος, sumpisōtōs): Used only in Acts 15:10, where AV has "assuredly gathering," i.e. "inferring." Where AV has "conclude," RV more accurately renders "reckon" (Rom 3:28); "giving judgment" (Acts 21:25); "shut up" (Rom 11:32; Gal 3:23).

CONCLUSION, kon-klo'zhun (קָהֲלָה, qalēh): In Eccl 12:13 AV, where RV has "the end," viz. a summary of the entire argument of the book.

CONCORDANCE, kon-kör'dans:

1. Nature of Work
2. Classes of Concordances
3. Their Indispensableness
4. Concordances to Latin Vulgate
5. Concordances to the Hebrew OT
6. Concordances to the LXX
7. Concordances to the Greek NT
8. Concordances to the English Bible

Literature

The object of a concordance of Scripture is to guide the reader to any passage he is in search of by means of an alphabetical arrangement of the words found in Scripture, of Work and the bringing together under each word of all the passages in which that word occurs. Thus, in the ver: "Cast thy burden upon Jehovah" (Ps 55:22), the reader will look in the concordance under the words "cast" or "burden," and there will find a reference to the text. The merit of a concordance is obviously exhaustiveness and completeness of arrangement. There are abridged concordances of the Bible which give only the most important words and passages. These are seldom satisfactory, and a fuller work has in the end frequently to be resorted to.

The ordinary reader is naturally most familiar with concordances of the Eng. Bible, but it will be seen that, for scholarly purposes, 2. Classes of concordances are just as necessary for the Scriptures in their original tongues, and for versions of the Scriptures other than Eng. There are required concordances of the OT in Heb, of the NT in Gr, of the LXX version (Gr) of the OT, of the Vulg version (Lat) of the NT, as well as of the τρός of the Scriptures into German, French and other living languages. There are now, further, required concordances of the RVV of the English OT and NT, as well as of the AV. There are needed, besides, good concordances to the Apoc, alike in its AV and RV forms. Textual criticism leads to modifications of the earlier concordances of the Heb and Gr texts. It is the concordances of the Eng. version to facilitate reference by giving not only single words, but also phrases under which several passages are grouped, and to make the work more useful by furnishing lists of Scripture proper names, with their meanings, and, in the larger works, references to the Heb or Gr words for which the Eng. words stand.

The indispensableness of a good concordance for the proper study of the Bible is so apparent that it is not surprising that, since the idea was first conceived, much labor has been expended on the preparation of such works. The wonder rather is that the idea did not occur earlier than it did. No single scholar could ever hope to produce a perfect work of the kind by his own efforts. Modern concordances are based upon the labors of previous generations.

The oldest concordances date from the 13th cent., and are based, as was then natural, upon the Latin Vulgate. A Concordantiae Mss. is attributed to Antony of Padua (d. 1231). The first concordance to Latin was that of Hugo of St. Caro, Dominican monk and cardinal (d. 1263). It was called Concordantiae S. Jacobi from the monastery in which it was composed and is said to have been engaged upon its preparation. Hugo's Concordance became the basis of others into which successive improvements were introduced. The words of passages, at first wanting, were inserted; indecipherable particles were added; alphabetic arrangement was employed. Verse divisions were unknown till the time of Robert Stephens (1555). See Bible.

The earliest Heb concordance seems to have been that of Rabbi Mordecai ben Nathan (1438-48). It went through several editions.

5. Concord- and was tr'd into Lat by Reuchlin ances to (the 1566). Both original and tr conc-Hebrew OT tained many errors. It was improved by Calasio, a Franciscan friar (1621), and more thoroughly by John Buxtorf, whose Concordance was published by his son (1632). This latter formed the basis of Dr. Julius Först's Liber Sacrorum Vet. Test. Concordantiae Hebraeae quae auctore Chaldæo: 1640 (Eng. tr. Hebrew and Chaldee Concord. A later Heb Concordance in Germany is that of Solomon Mandelkern (1896). In England, in 1754, appeared the valuable Heb Concordance, Adapted to the Eng. Bible, by Dr. Taylor, of Norwich. With this work is entitled A Complete Concordance to the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, etc; to which is added, a Concordance to the Books called Apocrypha. Mr. Spurgeon said regarding it, "Be sure you buy a genuine unabridged Cruden, and none of the modern ones, for, good as they may be at the price . . . You need only one; have none but the best." Many editions of this valuable book have been published. It no longer remains, however, the only authority, nor even the most complete and serviceable, though perhaps still the most convenient, for the purpose of the student. In 1873 was published the Analytical Concordance to the Bible by Robert Young, LL.D., to which an appendix has since been added. This bulky and somewhat awkward authorship, however, was a commercial failure. A more convenient arrangement of the Bible by James Strong, LL.D. This includes the new feature of a comparative concordance of the Authorized and Revised (English) VSS. It embraces also condensed Dictionaries of the Heb and Gr words, to which references are made from the Eng. words by figures. It thus differs in plan from Young's, which gives the Heb and Gr words in the body of the concordance at the head of the passages coming under them. Lastly must be noticed the very valuable work, published in the same year (1894) in America by J. B. R. Walker, Comprehensive Concordance, with an Introduction by Marshall Curtais Hazard. It is stated to give 50,000 more passages than Cruden.

CONCURSE, kon'kurs, hâmdâh, "to hum," "to make a noise;" σωρόφω, ευσωρόφος, "a turning" or "twisting together;" Hâmdâh, usually tr'd by some word signifying "sound" is rendered "concourse" in Prov 1:21 (perhaps from the noise made by people thronging and talking together; of 1 K 1 41, “uproar”), “She [wisdom] crieth in the chief place of concourse,” RV “Heb at the head of the noisy [streets];” svatrophē is tr. “con- course” (Acts 19 40), a riotous crowd. Cf Jth 10 18.

CONCUBINAGE, kon-kū-bin’āj. See Family.

CONCUPISCENCE, kon-kū-pis’ens (προθυμία, ἐπιθυμία): Not used in RV, but in AV, Rom 7 8; Col 3 5; 1 Thea 4 5. The Gr noun, like the vb, from which it comes, meaning “to yearn,” “to long,” “to have the heart set upon a thing,” is determined in its moral quality by the source whence it springs or the object toward which it is directed. Thus Our Lord uses it to express the intensest desire of His soul (Lk 22 15). As a rule, when the object is not expressed, it refers to longing for that which God has forbidden, viz. lust. It is not limited to sexual desire, but includes all gazing forth of heart and will toward what God would not have us to have or be, as its use in the LXX of the Ten Commandments clearly shows, for “Thou shalt not covet” (Ex 20 17).

1. The causative stem of ὅρκος, ἀρασθα, “to declare [or make] wrong.” “To condemn,” whether in civil, ethical or religious relations.

1. In the OT

- Taken in this sense the word needs no comment (Ex 22 9; Dt 25 1; Job 40 8); “Who then can condemn?” (Job 34 29, AV “make trouble”).

- ὅρκος, “to fine.” “Condemned the land” (2 Ch 36 3 AV; AVm “muled”; RV “amended”; ARV “fined”; “wine of the condemned” (Am 2 8; RV “fined” [unjustly]).

2. In the NT

- The active part of ὅρκος, ἀσθαθαβα, “to judge.” “From those that condemn his soul” (Ps 109 31 AV; RV “that judge his soul”).

The NT usage is much more complicated, both because of the greater number of Gr words rendered “condemn” and “condemnation,” and because AV tr. the word in several different ways, apparently with no rule whatever.

1. The most important word is κρίνω, κρίνα, “to judge.” From it are a number of derivative vb.s and nouns. RV has rigidly excluded the harsh words “damn” and “damnation,” substituting “judge,” “condemn,” “judgment,” “condemnation.” This is proper, since the word damn (Lat damnare, “to inflict loss” upon a person, “to condemn”), and its derivatives has, in process of time, suffered degradation, so that in modern Eng. it usually refers to eternal punishment. This special application of the word for some context. ran side by side with the original meaning, but even as late as Wycliffe’s version the word “damn” is usually employed in the sense of condemn, as in Job 9 20, “My mouth shall damn me.” It is even applied to the condemnation of Jesus by the chief priests andscribes (Mt 10 33). This degeneration of the word is perhaps due, as Bishop Sanderson says, “not so much to good acts as to bad manners.” Kritō is rendered uniformly “judge” by RV, even where the context compels the thought of condemnation (Jn 3 17 18; 12 47; Acts 7 7; “might be damned,” 2 Thes 2 12 AV; Rom 14 22; Jas 5 9).

2. The more specific sense of condemn, however, is found in κατάκρισις, κατάκρινα, “to judge one down” (Mt 14 44: “is damned if he eat” (Rom 14 23; 1 Cor 11 32 AV; RV “condemned”). See also Mk 16 16; 2 Pet 2 6.

3. For “condemnation” there is the noun κρίσις, κρίμα, or κρίμα, κρίμα (for accret see Thayer’s Lexicon), in a forensic sense, “the sentence of the judge” (Lk 23 40; Mt 23 14 omitted in RV; “condemnation of the devil” 1 Tim 3 6; 5 12; Jude ver 4).

4. Much stronger is κατάκρισις, κατάκρινα, “condemnation” (Rom 5 16 18; 8 1) with reference to the Divine judgment against sin.

5. κρίνα, κρίνα, “the process of judgment,” “tribunal” (Jn 3 19; 5 24), with reference to the “judgment brought by men upon themselves because of their rejection of Christ.”

6. A stronger word is the adj. αὐτοκάτακτος, autokatodinos, “self-condemned” (Tit 3 11; cf 1 Jn 3 20 21).

CONDESCENSION, kon-de-sen’shun, of CHRIST. See KENOSIS.

CONDUCT, kon’dikt. See ETHICS.

CONDUIT, kon’dit. See CESTERN.

CONEY, kōni (קָפר, shaphan [Lev 11 5; Dt 14 7; Ps 104 18; Prov 30 26]): The word “coney” (formerly pronounced cooney) means “rabbit” (from Lat cuniculus). Shaphan is rendered in all four passages in the LXX χωροφύλακας, ὀρενγράτιος, or “hedge-hog,” but is now universally considered to refer to the Syrian hyrax, Procavia (or Hyrax) Syriaca, which in southern Pal and Sinai is called in Arab. wabar, in northern Pal and Syria tibdish, and in southern Arabia shiffus, which is etymologically closely akin to shaphan. The word “hyrax” (σφαξ, ἱραξ) itself means “mouse” or “shrew-mouse” (cf Lat sorex), so that it seems to have been hard to find a name peculiar to this animal. In Lev 11 5 RVm, we find “rock badger,” which is a tr of klyp das, the rather inappropriate name given by the Boers to the Cape hyrax. The Syrian hyrax lives in Syria, Pal and Arabia. A number of other species, including several that are arboreal, live in Africa. They are not found in other parts of the world. In size, teeth and habits the Syrian hyrax somewhat resembles the rabbit, though it is different in color, being reddish brown, and lacks the long hind legs of the rabbit. The similarity in dentition is confined to the large size of the front teeth and the presence of a large space between them and the back teeth. But whereas hares have a pair of front teeth on each jaw, the hyrax has one pair above and two below. These teeth differ also in structure from those of the hare and rabbit, not having the persistent pulp which enables the rabbit’s front teeth to grow continually as they are worn away. They do not hide among herbages like hares, nor burrow like rabbits, but live in holes or dells of the rock, frequently in the faces of steep cliffs. Neither the hyrax nor the hare is a ruminant, as seems to be implied in Lev 11 5 and Dt 14 7, but their manner of chewing their food may readily have led them to be thought to chew the cud. The hyrax has four toes in front and three behind, (the latter pair in the tails and in some fossil members of the horse family), all furnished with nails that are almost like hoofs, except the inner hind toes, which have claws. The hyraxes constitute a family of ungulates and, in spite of their small size, have points of resemblance to elephants or rhinoceroses, but are not closely allied to these or to any other known animals.

The camel, the coney and the hare are in the list of unclean animals because they “chew the cud but divide not the hoof,” but all three of these are eaten by the Arabs.

The illustration is from a photograph of a group of conies in the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut. Prepared by Mrs. MacCarruthers, who collected these specimens in a cliff in the neighborhood of Tyre. Specimens from the Dead Sea are rarer than those from Syria.

(1) “Confection” is found in AV only, and but once (“a. after the art of the apothecary” (Ex 30 35; RV “perfume”)); but the RV renders 1 Ch 9 28 “the c. [AV ‘ointment’] of them in the spices.” It stands for something “made up,” a mixture of perfumes or medicines, but never sweetmeats, as c. means with us.
(2) Likewise a “confectionary” is a perfumer. The word, too, is found but once (1 S 8 13), “He will take your daughters to be perfumers [AV “confectionaries”], and to be cooks, and to be bakers.” See PERFUMES.

GEO. B. EAGER

CONFEDERATE, kon-fêd’r-ät, CONFEDERACY, kon-fêd-ar-sei: “Confederate” as an adj. in the sense of united or leagued is twice the tr of βασιλεία, βρύθ, “covenant,” in several instances τρία “league” (Gen 14 13, βασιλεία, “lord of master of man, who was prince with Abram”; cf Ps 88 5; once of Νῦν, νῦθ, “to rest,” “Syria is c. with Ephraim” (Isa 7 2, Βύρμ “resteth on Ephraim”; also 1 Mac 10 47).
As a noun “confederate” occurs in 1 Mac 10 16, συμμαχος, “confederates” (1 Mac 8 20:24:31; 14 40; 15 17).

Confederacy, as a “league,” occurs as the tr of βρύθ, “the men of thy c.” (Ob 7:7) as a conspiracy it occurs in Isa 12 12, as τρία κυρίων, “to bind” (“Say ye not, a; c.” Cl 2 S 15 2; 2 K 12 20, etc.

W. L. WALKER

CONFERENCE, kon-fûr, conference, confer: The equivalent of three Gr words of different shades of meaning. In Gal 1 16, προσάνατιγμα, προσανατιθέμεν, had been used in classical writers for resorting to oracles (Lightfoot on Gal 5 2; Elliott on Gal 1 16): hence, “to take counsel with,” “to consult.” In Acts 4 15, συνάδελφοι, συμβάλλω, “to compare views,” “discuss”; and in Acts 26 12, συνάδελφος, συνάδελφος, “to talk together.” Cf the single passage in the OT (1 K 17).

CONFESION, kon-fesh’un (ΠΩΣ), γάθαδα; ὁμολογία, homologé, and their derivatives): The radical meaning is “acknowledgment,” “avowal,” with the implication of a change of conviction of course of conduct on the part of the subject. In Eng. “profession” (AV 1 Tim 6 12; He 3 1; 4 14), besides absence of the thought just suggested, emphasizes the publicity of the act. C., like its Gr equivalent, connotes, as its etymology shows (Lat. confessio, Gr ὑμολογεῖν), that the act places one in harmony with others. It is the unifying in a statement that has previously been made by someone else. Of the two Gr words from the same root in the NT, the compound with the Gr preposition ἑκάστῳ, found, among other places, in Eph 4 27 (Acts 10 18; 1 Cor 4 12), means generally “to talk with” or “to confess.” Phil 2 11, implies that it has come from an inner impulse, i.e. it is the expression of a conviction of the heart. It is referred anthropologically to God in Job 40 14, where Jeh says to the patriarch sarcastically: “Then will I also confess of (unto) thee” and in Rev 3 5, where it means “to recognize” or “acknowledge.”

When man is said to confess or make confession, the contents of the confession are variously distinguished. All, however, may be grouped under two heads, confession of faith and confession of sins.

Confessions of faith are public acknowledgments of fidelity to God, and to the truth through which God is revealed, as 1 K 8 33. They are declarations of unqualified confidence in Christ, and of surrender to his purposes, as in Mt 10 10; “Every one therefore . . . who shall confess me before men.” In Phil 2 11, however, c. includes, alongside of willing, also unwilling, acknowledgment of the sovereignty of Jesus.

The word c. stands also for everything contained in the Christian religion—"the faith" used in the objective and widest sense, in He 3 1; 4 14. In both these passages, the allusion is to the NT. The “High Priest of our c.” (He 3 1) is the High Priest, of whom we learn and with whom we deal in that new revelation, which in that epistle is contrasted with the old.

Confessions of sins are also of various classes:
(1) To God alone. Wherever there is true repentance for sin, the penitent freely confesses his guilt to Him, against whom he has sinned. This is described in Ps 32 3-6; cf 1 Jn 1 9; Prov 28 13. Such c. may be made either silently, or, as in Dn 9 19, orally; it may be general, as in Ps 51, or particular, as when some special sin is recognized; it may extend to many sins, or, as Ps 32 3-4, have been discovered, but which is believed to exist because of recognized inner depravity (Ps 19 12), and thus include the state as well as the acts of sin (Rom 7 18). (2) To one’s neighbor, when he has been wronged (Lk 17 4): “If thy brother . . . which seven times in the day, and seven times seven turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.” It is to this form of c. that James refers (5 16): “Confess . . . your sins one to another”; cf Mt 5 23 f. (3) To a spiritual adviser or minister of the word, such as the c. of David to Nathan (2 S 12 13), of the multitudes to John in the wilderness (Mt 3 6), of the Ephesians to Paul (Acts 19 18). This c. is a general acknowledgment of sinfulness, and enters into an enumeration of details only when the conscience is particularly burdened. (4) To the entire church, where some crime has created public scandal. As secret sins are to be rebuked secretly, and public sins publicly, “in the apostolic age, where there was genuine penitence for a notorious offence, the acknowledgment was as public as the disgrace of it.” An illustration of this is found in the well-known case at Corinth (cf 1 Cor 5 3 f with 2 Cor 2 6 f).

For auricular c. in the sense of the mediaeval and Rom church, there is no authority in Holy Scripture. In practice, there were cases of investigating those who were about to make a public c. of some notorious offence, and of giving advice concerning how far the circumstances of the sin were to be announced; an expeditious that was found advisable, since as much injury could be wrought by injudicious publishing of details in the e., as by the sin itself. The practice once introduced for particular cases was in time extended to all cases; and the practice of sin was demanded by the church as a condition of the absolution, and made an element of penitence, which was analyzed into contrition, confession and satisfaction. See the Examen Concilii Tridentini (1st ed. 1566) of Dr. Martin Chemnitz, superintendent of Brunswick, for a thorough exegetical and historical discussion of this entire subject. On the historical side, see also Henry Charles Lea, History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1896).

CONFIDENCE, kon-fëns-dans (τελειωτής, báthoς, and forms, κατενθαλία; κατενθαλία; parrhesía, parrhésis, πεπόνθη, πεπόνθη, παράθυρον, παράθυρον, πεπόνθη, παράθυρον, ἄμμος, ἄμμος; ἄμμος; hupostasis); the chief Heb word tr τ roofs confidence (báthoς, and its forms, perhaps, radially, "to be open," showing thus what originated the idea of "confidence"; where there was nothing hidden a person felt; it was very frequently rendered "trust." In Ps 118:9 we have "It is better to take refuge in the Lord" in Heb, "in the confidence in its power," and in 65:5, "O God of our salvation, thou that art the confidence anb every end of the earth." "Mibháhā in tr "confidence" in Job 18:11; 34:21; Prov 21:22, etc.

Keseel ("firmness, "stoutness") is rendered "confidence" in Prov 3:26, and kisikāhā in Job 4:6; peithō ("persuade") is tr "confidence" in 2 Cor 2:3; Gal 5:10, etc; peptóthe, in 2 Cor 1:15; 8:22, etc; hupostasis ("what stands under"), in 2 Cor 11:17; Heb 4:14; 1 Cor 3:2; parabibáth, "confidence." 4" (batah, "old""); is invariably tr in RV "boldness" (Acts 28:31; He 3:6; 4:16; 10:35; 1 Jn 2:28; 3:21; 5:14); tharsó or thargáth ("to have good courage") is so tr in RV, "being therefore always of good courage" (2 Cor 5:6); "I am of good courage concerning you" (2 Cor 7:16), AV "confident" and "confidence.

RV has "confidence" for "hope" (Job 8:14); for "assurance" (Isa 32:17); for "trusting" (2 Cor 3:4); for "same confident boasting" (2 Cor 9:4); "is confidence" for "trusted" (Job 40:29); "to have confidence" for "thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust" (Phil 3:4); "confidently" for "constantly" (Acts 13:15); "confidently affirm" for "affirm" (1 Cor 1:2); "securely therein," for "with confidence" (Exk 28:26) "securely therein." The Bible teaches the value of confidence (Isa 30:15; He 10:35), but neither in "gold" (Job 31:24), nor in man, however great (Ps 118:8-9; Jer 17:5), nor in self (Prov 14:16; Phil 3:3), but in God (Ps 65:5; Prov 3:26; 14:26), as revealed in Christ (Eph 3:12; 1 Jn 5:13-14).

CONFIRM, kon-fërn, CONFIRMATION, kôn-fërn-mi'shən: In the OT represented by several Heb words, generally with reference to an increase of external strength, as e. the feeble knees" (Isa 35:3); e. the kingdom" (2 K 15:19); e. inheritance" (Ps 68:9). In the NT, this external, objective sense is expressed by βεβαιός, behaiois, as in Mk 16:20; Rom 15:8. The strengthening of mind, purpose, conviction, i.e. the inner or individual sense (Acts 14:22; 15:32:41) corresponds to εὐπαρθένιος, eutheíness, "faithful." Used also of ratifying or making a thing effective, (νωπόν, πνευμα, σοφία) a covenant (Gal 3:15). The noun is used in the second sense (He 6:6; Phil 1:7). Confirmation, the rite, in some denominations, of admission to the full communion of the church, which the Rom church has elevated to the place of a sacrament, has only ecclesiastical, but no Scriptural, authority. It is grounded, however, in the Scriptural precedent of the laying on of hands after baptism. See Hands, Imposition of.

CONFLICT, kon-flik't, "contact," "fight": In Phil 1:30, "having the same contending ye saw in me." "being a burden" (AV); "contention" (AV); "contention" (AV); "contention" (AV). See also Agony.

FORM, kon-förn, CONFORMABLE, kon-förm-a-bal, "conformable" (συμμορφώθω, summorphó), "to become or be like," "of the same form": Indicating an inner change of nature, working into the outward life (Rom 8:29; Phil 3:10:21); while ἐσχαματισμός, ἐσχαματίζω, "fashioned according to" (Rom 12:21 AV, "conformed"), refers to that which is external.

CONFOUND, kon-fǒnhd: The physical origin of spiritual terms is well illustrated by the principal Heb words for "conformed" (rendered also "ashamed," etc) bāth, bāth, is "to become pale" (2 K 19:26; Job 6:20; Ps 83:17; 129:5 AV; Isa 19:9, etc). ἐκθαμβίζω, ἐκθαμβίζω, "to become red" (Ps 35:4; Isa 1:29; 24:23); "the moon shall be confounded," Mic 3:7; ἐκαθαρίζω, ἐκαθαρίζω, "to be dried up," (Job 46:24 AV; 48:12 20 AV; 50:2 AV; Zec 10:5); ἀκόλουθος, to blush" (Ps 69:6 AV; Isa 41:11, etc). In Gen 11:7-9, of the confusion of tongues, the word is ἀκόλουθος, ἀκόλουθος, "to mix," "mingle." In Jer 1:17 AV it is ἀκόλουθος, ἀκόλουθος, "to bring or put down." In NT, katachánō, to put to shame" (1 Cor 1:27 AV; 1 Pet 2:6 AV); and συγκαθαρίζω, "to pour together," "bewilder" (Acts 2:6; 10:22). RV frequently gives "ashamed" and "put to shame" instead of "confounded." W. L. Walker CONFUSION, kon-fóz'shən, "shame, paleness," ἀκόλουθος, "blushing," "wastiness," ἐκθαμβίζω, "shame," "ignominy," ἐκτάσθαι, "to confound," "to be shamed") (Ps 109:29 AV) and ἐκκαθαρίζω (Ps 44:15; Isa 30:3) are the words most frequently tr "confusion"; ἐκθαμβίζω, "wastiness," "emptiness" is so tr (Isa 24:10; 34:11; 41:29), also καλύπτω, "lightness," "contempt" (Job 10:15 = ignominy, AV) and ἐκκαθαρίζω, "profanation" (Lev 18:23; 20:12); ῥασάθ, "shaking," rendered "confused" in Isa 9:5 AV; cf. RV. Gr ἄκτασθαι, "instability" is tr "confusion" (1 Cor 14:33; Jas 3:16); συγκαθαρίζω, "is pouring out together." (Acts 19:29). In Wied 14:26, "changing of kind" (AV) is rendered "confusion of sex." CONGREGATION, kon-grə-gā'shən, ἄκαθ, ἄκαθ, "eddhāh): These two words rendered by "congregation" or "assembly" are used 1. Terms apparently without any difference of Employed sense. They appear to include an assemblage of the whole people or an section that might be present on a given occasion. Indeed, sometimes the idea appears to correspond closely to that conveyed by "hordes," or even by "crowd." "Eddhāh is once used of bees (Jgs 14:8). It has been sought to distinguish the two words by means of Lev 4:13, "if the whole "eddhāh of Israel

I. SEQUENT CONSCIENCE

1. Judicial

This is (1) judicial. No sooner is a decision formed than there ensues a judgment favorable or adverse, a sentence of guilty or not guilty. Conscience has often been compared to a court of law, in which the culprit, judge, and jury are all in one. There are, however, different situations: in this case, but these are all in the subject's own breast, and are in fact himself.

It is (2) punitive. In the individual's own breast are not only the figures of justice already mentioned, but the executioner as well: for, on the back of a sentence of condemnation or acquittal, there immediately follows the pain of a wounded or the satisfaction of an approving conscience; and of all human miseries or blisses this is the most poignant.

Esp. has the remorse of an evil conscience impressed the human imagination, in such instances as Cain and Judas, Saul and Herod; and the poets, those knowers of human nature, have found their most moving themes in the delineation of this aspect of human experience. The ancient poets represented the terrors of conscience under the guise of the Eriynes or Furies, who, with swift, silent, unsavory footsteps, tracked the criminal and pulled him down, while the executioner, in such dramas as Machbeth and Richard the Third, has burned the same lessons into the imagination of all readers of his works. The satisfaction of a good conscience may stamp itself on the habitual serenity of one face, and the accusations of an evil conscience may imprint a hunted and sinister expression to another (cf. Wisd. 17 11).

It is (3) predictive. There is no instinct in the soul of man more august than the anticipation of something after death—that a tribunal at which the whole of life will be reviewed and retribution awarded with perfect justice according to the deeds done in the body. It is this which imparts to death its solemnity; we instinctively know that we are going to our account. And such great natural instincts cannot be false.

It is (4) social. Not only does a man's own conscience pass sentence on his conduct, but the conscience of others pass sentence on it too; and to this may be due a great intensification of the consequent sensations. Thus, a crime may lie hidden in the memory, and the pain of its guilt may be assuaged by the action of time, when suddenly and unexpectedly it is found out and exposed to the knowledge of all; and, only when the force of the public conscience breaks forth on the culprit, driving him from society, does he feel his guilt in all its magnitude. principle on a vast scale; for there the character and conduct of every one will be submitted to the conscience of all. On the other hand, a friend may be to a man a second conscience, by which his own conscience, or rather that of the friends of this aptly and almost from without may, in some cases, be, even more than the judgment within, an encouragement to everything that is good or a protection against temptation.

II. Antecedent Conscience.—From the Sequent it is distinguished the Antecedent Conscience, which designates a function of this faculty preceding moral decision or action. When the will stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly before it the right course and the wrong, conscience commands to strike into the one and forbids to choose the other. This is its imperative; and— to employ the language of Kant—it is a categorical imperative. What conscience commands may be apparently against our interests, and it may be completely contrary to our inclinations; it may be opposed to the advice of friends or to the solicitations of companions; it may contradict the decrees of principalities and powers or the voices of the multitude; yet, wherever it modifies its claim. We may fail to obey, giving way to passion or being overborne by the allurements of temptation; but we know that we ought to obey; it is our duty; and this is a sublime and sacrificial greatness. Great is the rise of our conscience issuing one command and self-interesse or passion or authority another, and the question has to be decided which of the two is to be obeyed. The interpreters of human life have known how to make use of such moments, and many of the most memorable scenes in literature are of this nature; but the actual history of mankind has also been dignified with numerous instances in which confessors and martyrs, standing on the same ground, have faced death rather than contravene the dictates of the authority within; and there never passes an hour in which the eye of the All-seeing does not behold someone on earth putting aside the bribes of self-interest or the menace of authority and paying tribute to conscience by doing the right and taking the consequences.

III. Intuitive and Associational Theories.—Up to this point there is little difficulty or difference of opinion. Let us now consider what results are very different views emerge. It was remarked above, that when anyone stands at the parting of the ways, seeing clearly the right course and the wrong, conscience imperatively commands him which to choose and which to avoid; but how does anyone know which of the two alternatives is the right and which the wrong? Does conscience still suffice here, or is he dependent on another faculty? Here the Intuitive and the Associational, or— speaking briefly— the Sequent, the Antecedent, the German and the French schools of ethics diverge, those on the one side holding that conscience has still essential guidance to give, while those on the other maintain that the guidance must now be undertaken by other faculties. The Sensational or Experimental school holds that we are dependent on the authority of society or on our own estimate of the consequences of actions, while the opposite school teaches that in the conscience there is a clear revelation of certain moral laws, approving certain principles of action and disapproving others. The strong point of the former view is the diversity which has existed among human beings in different ages and in different latitudes as to what is right and what is wrong. What was virtuous in Athens may be deplased as foolhardiness in Britain. To this it may be replied, first, that the diversity has been greatly exaggerated; the unanimity of the human conscience under all skies being greater than is allowed; by philosophers, this aptly and almost from without may, in some cases, be, even more than the judgment within, an encouragement to everything that is good or a protection against temptation.

to God, meaning lit. "knowledge along with another," the other being God. Though this derivation be uncertain, many think that it exactly expresses the truth. There are few people with an ethical experience of any depth who have not sometimes been overwhelmingly conscious of the approval or disapproval of an unseen Being; and if there be any trustworthy argument for the existence of a Deity, prior to supernatural revelation, this is where it is to be found.

V. History and Literature. — Only a few indications of history can be given here. The conscience, at least the conscience, was identified in the ancient world, and the rise of a doctrine on the subject belongs to the period when the human mind, being cut off from public activity through political changes, was thrown back upon itself and began to watch closely its own symptoms. The word has a specially prominent place in the philosophical writings of Cicero. Strange to say, it does not occur in the OT; but, though not the name, the thing appears frequently enough, even on the very first page of revelation, the voice of God is heard calling among the trees of the garden (Gen 3:8); and, in the very next incident, the blood of Abel cries out to heaven from the ground (Gen 4:10). In the NT the word appears in the Gospels, e.g. in the speeches (Acts 24:16, etc) and writings of St Paul (Rom 2:15; 9:1; 13:5; 1 Cor 6:7-12, etc), and this might have been expected to secure for it a prominent place in the doctrine of the church. But this did not immediately take effect, although Chrysostom already speaks of Conscience and Nature as two books in which the human mind can read of God, previous to supernatural revelation. In the Middle Ages the conscience received from two sources, the church stimulus to meditate on the confessor, that it scanned every thought and weighed every scruple, becoming adept at introspection and self-discipline. Thus it came to pass that ethics took the form of Cases of Conscience, the priest having to train the sinner to be trained himself to meet the confessor, the confessor to his own conscience, as the case may be, through books, to be able to answer every query submitted to him in the confessional. The ripest fruit of this method appears in the Summa of Aquinas, who discusses elaborately the doctrine of conscience, dividing it into two parts — synderesis (from synφρεσις, sunfrēsis) and conscientia — the one of which supplies the major premises and cannot err, while the other draws the inferences therefrom and is liable to make mistakes. The Mystics identified the soul as the point in the spirit of man at which it can be brought into contact and connection with the Spirit of God.

At the Reformation the conscience was much in the mouths of men, both because the terrors of conscience formed a preparation for discarding the old traditions in faith and because, in appearing before principalities and powers in vindication of their action, the Reformers took their stand on conscience, as Luther did habitually at the Diet of Worms; and the assertion of the rights of conscience has ever since been a conspicuous testimony of Protestantism; whereas Romanists, especially as represented by the Jesuits, have treated the conscience as a feeble and ignorant thing, requiring to be led by authority — that is, by themselves. The forms of mediaevalism long clung even to Protestant lit. on this subject. It may not be surprising to find a High Churchman like Jeremy Taylor, in his Doctor Dubitandum, discussing ethics as a system of cases of conscience, but it is curious to find a Puritan like Baxter (in his Christian Directory), and a Scottish Presbyterian like David Dickson (in his Therapeutica Sacra) doing the same. Deism in England and the Enlightenment in Germany magnified the conscience, which they described as a power of revealing God as made any further revelation unnecessary; but the practical effect was a secularization and vulgarization of the general mind; and it was against these rather than the system which had produced these that Butler in England and Kant in Germany had to raise the standard of a spiritual view of life. The former said of the conscience that, if it had power as it had rights, it would absolutely govern the world; and Kant's sublime saying is still known at the close of his great work on Ethics: "Two things fill the soul with ever new and growing wonder and reverence, the older and the longer reflection continues to wonder at, the starry heavens above and the moral law within." The rise of an Associational and Developmental Philosophy in England, represented by such powerful thinkers as the Mills, father and son, Professor Bain and Herbert Spencer, tended to lift the halo surrounding the conscience, by representing it as merely an emotional equivalent for the authority of law and the claims of custom, so stamped on the mind by the experience of generations that, its earthly source forgotten, it came to be attributed to supernatural powers. But this school was antagonized with success by such thinkers as Martineau and T. H. Green. R. Rothe regarded conscience as a term too popular and of too variable signification to be of much use in philosophical speculation; but most of the great succession of writers on Christian ethics who followed him have treated it seriously; Dorner esp. recognizing its importance, and Newman Smyth bestowing on it a thorough modern treatment,

CONSECRATE, kon'sə-krt. CONSECRATION, kon'sə-kra'shen: In the OT for several Heb words of different meanings:

1. In the service of Jeh (Mic 4:13). See Ban; OT. Cusan.

Cūn. (1) יַעֲנָץ, nāzār, יַעַר, nēzer (Nu 6:7, 9:12; RV "separate"). See NĀRÍTZE. (2) יָנָשׁ, kādāsh; "to be set apart," or "to be holy": of Aaron and his sons (Ex 28:3; 30:30; RV "sanctify"). The silver and gold and brass and iron of the banned city of Jericho are "consecrated" things (RV "holy") unto the Lord (Josh 6:19); of the priests (2 Ch 26:18); of sacrifices (2 Ch 29:33; 31:6; Est 3:5). See HOLINESS.

(4) τὸ ἄρτος, millē yadḥ, lit. "to fill the hand"; and subst. pl. τὸν ἄρτον, millē'tum, a peculiar idiom used frequently and generally for the installation of a priest into his office; and subst. for the installation offerings which were probably put into the priest's hands to symbolize his admission into office; hence the phrase, "and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons" (Ex 29:9; so 2 Ch 29:1, 29:33-35; 32:29; Lev 8:33; 16:32; 21:10; Nu 3:3; Jgs 17:5,12; 2 Ch 29:31); of Jeroboam's non-Levitical priesthood (1 K 13:33; 2 Ch 13:9); of the altar (Ezk 43:20) and of those who contributed to build the temple (1 Ch 29:5). Subst. of an act of installation (Lev 7:37; 8:33), and of installation offerings (Ex 29:22-26,27,31; Lev 8:22,28-29,31).

2. In the NT

In the NT ἄρτος, ἄρτοι, "to make perfect" (He 7:28; RV "perfected"); ἐκατοντάρσις, ἐκκατοντάρσιος, "to make new" (He 10:20; RV "dedicated").

T. REES

CONSENT, kon-sent's: The vb. implies compliance with the guidance and direction of another, and, therefore, a secondary and subordinate relation of approval, sympathy and confidence on the part of the one who consents. He does not take the initiative, but yields to what the principal proposes. The phrase ἐκ συγκοινωνίας, ἐκ συμφωνίας, "by consent," means "by mutual agreement" (1 Cor 7:5), both parties concerned being placed on an equality. "With one consent" (Zeph 3:9, Heb "with one shoulder"; Lk 14:18) suggests, although it does not necessarily imply, the result of deliberation and consultation; it may have no other force than that of unanimity.

H. E. Jacobs

CONSIDER, kon-sid'er: In the NT the force of the word is brought out most vividly in Mt 6:26 (καταμαθήσεσαι, katamathtēsē) where it means "examine closely," as though the observer had to bend down for this purpose, and in Lk 12:27; He 10:24 (καταμαθανόμενος, to observe well!), while in He 13:7 the anaθήσεσαι "look up towards" or "look again at" is consistent with the reverential regard commended in the context. Used in the OT for a variety of Heb terms, signifying inspecting (Prov 31:16), examining (Lev 13:13), giving serious thoughts to (Ps 77:7; 81:3), it often means little more than "see" or "behold" (Ps 8:3; 9:13).

CONSIST, kon-sist' (συνίστημι, sunismēn): To stand together, exist, subsist (Col 1:17, "in him all things consist," i.e. the continuance of the universe is dependent upon His support and administration). In Lk 12:15, it is the vb. εὐλ. εἰμι, "to be," to express the thought that wealth is only an accident, not an essential to the highest ideal of life.

CONSOULATION, kon-sō-lā'shun (παραδελεγθεί, paraklēšēa): "Consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25), refers to the fulfillment of the promises in Isa 40:1 ff. See CONVerSor. "Son of consolation" (Acts 4:36 AV and ARVms); see BARNABAS.

CONSORT, kon-sôrt' (προσκλητήρος, prosklētērōs, "to allot," Acts 17:4). The vb. may be either in the middle or passive voice. RV, AV, and Luther's German tr regard it as middle, and render it: "cast [their] lot with..."; "set their lot with..."; "cast their lots with...". In admirability of the passive, see Alford's Greek Testament, proposing: "were added," as if by lot, the allotment being determined by God who gave them the Holy Spirit directing their choice. The Eng. has the Lat for "lot" as its base.

CONSPIRACY, kon-spir'ā-si. See CONFEDERACY.

CONSTANT, kon'stānt, CONSTANTLY, kon'stānt-ly: In 1 Ch 28 (ḥāsāk) meaning "firm," "strong." In Prov 21:28 the advb. ("constantly") of AV is replaced in RV by "shall speak so as to endure" (Ezk 24:17). RV "constantly" for AV "constantly" in Acts 12:15; Tit 3:8.

CONRAIN, kon-strān': Generally in the sense of pressing urgently (2 K 4:8; Lk 24:29; Acts 16:15), to impel or carry away (2 Cor 5:14); sometimes to be compelled of necessity (Job 32:18; Acts 28:19; cf Gal 6:12). See COMPEL.

CONSULT, kon-sult' (ἐκοιμάστη, ekōimastē, ekōimā; ἐνομίζω, enomizō, ἐνομίζεσθαι, enomizēsthai): (1) "To ask," "inquire," "seek advice." Ezekiel speaks of the king of Bab consulting the teraphim (Ezk 21:21), and the Israelites were admonished to have nothing to do with "a consulter with a familiar spirit" (Dt 18:11). See ASTRONOMY; COMMUNICATION WITH DEMONS; DIVINATION.

(2) "To take counsel," "devise," "plan." The various officials of Babylon "consulted together to establish a royal statute" (Dnl 6:7; cf Mt 26:4).

(3) "To deliberate with one's self," "make up one's mind." Nehemiah consulted with himself as to what might be done for Jerus ( Neh 5:7). Jesus spoke of a king "consulting" (AV) whether he be able to wage a war (Lk 14:31, RV "take counsel").

A. W. Fortune

CONSUME, kon-sūm' (ἐξάρτις, ἐκάλλος, ἐκάλλη, ἑκάσταμ, ἑκάσταμα; ἁναιλίαςκο, ἁναίλιασκό): In OT "eat," "devour," "consume" occurs very frequently, and is tr" consumed" (Gen 31:40; Ex 15:7; Ps 78:63, etc); ἑκάλλη ("to finish") is also frequently tr" consume," "consumed" (Gen 41:30; Ex 33:10; Ps 69:13, etc); ἑκάσταμα, "to be perfect," "finished" (Nu 17:13, Dt 3:15; Ps 73:19, etc). There are many other words tr" consume" and "consumed." e.g. ἀπήλθα, "to end" (Jer 8:13; Dnl 3:30); ἀπίστασιν, "be old;" (Job 28:14; Ps 49:14); ἀφάνος, implying violence (Job 24:19); ἀμφάνη, "to end" (Gen 19:15,17; Isa 7:20, etc); ἅσθεῖα, "to be old" (Ps 6:7; 31:9,10 AV); μακάς, "to become complete" (Ezk 4:17, Zech 14:4); ἑκάλλη is rendered "utterly consume" (Neh 9:31); ἁναίλιασκό, "to use up," occurs in Lk 9:54; Gal 5:15; 2 Thess 3:6 (AV); ἀπανδά, "to spend," is tr" consume" in Jas 4:4 (RV "spend"); ἑκάσταμα, "to consume utterly," occurs only in He 12:29; "for our God is a consuming fire."

In RV "devour," "devoured" are several times substituted for "consume," "consumed," e.g. Job 20:26; Jer 49:27; Nu 16:55; "boil well" (Ezk 34:10); for "be consumed with dying" (Nu 13:15); "perish all of us;" "consume" thus substituted for "corrupt" in Mt 6:19; "my spirit is consumed," for "my breath is corrupt" (Job 17:1); instead of "the flame consume the chaff" (Isa 5:24) we have "as the dry grass sinketh down in the flame;" and for "when the Lord shall consume" (2 Thess 2:8), RV reads (after a different text) "whom the Lord Jesus shall slay," "consume" in ARVM.

CONSUMMATION, kon-sū-mā'shun (κατάληγον, er 772, kalā logged, tr tgg, kalā): The word, meaning destruction, completion, or failing (Isa 10:23; 38:22; Dn 9:27) is tr" interchangeably in the AV for another CONSUMPTION, kon-sump'shun (καταναίω, sha-hephet, "wasting away"): One of the punishments which was to follow neglect or breach of the law. It may mean pulmonary consumption, which occurs frequently in Pal; but from its association with fever in the texts, Lev 26:16; De 28:22, it is more likely to be the much more common condition of wasting and emaciation from prolonged or often recurring attacks of malarial fever.

CONTAIN, kon-tān'. See CONTINUITY.

CONTEND, kon-tend', CONTENTION, kon-tēn'shun: The meeting of effort by effort, striving against opposition. Some think it is basic for koinonia (Gr. koinōnía). "By pride cometh only contention" (Prov 13:10). The contentions at Corinth (1 Cor 1:11) called forth the rebukes of Paul. Where used in AV in a good sense (1 Thes 2:2) RV has "conflict." In Acts 16:39, the noun has a peculiar force, where RV translates it "contention" (Gr. exorizomai) by "sharp contention." The Gr word refers rather to the inner excitement and irritation than to its outward expression.

CONTENT, kon-tent', CONTENTMENT, kon-tent'ment (κατανάλω, ya'ai; ἀποκατάρρησις, arkēsō): To be free from care because of satisfaction with what is already one's own. The Heb means simply "to be pleased." The Gr brings out the full force of the word in 1 Tim 6:8; He 13:5. Contentment (1 Tim 6:6) is more inward than satisfaction; the former marks the calm of mind, the latter has to do with some particular occurrence or object.

CONTINUITY, kon-ti-nen-si (ὑπερακοσμοί, ekkratēsía, "to have self-control" or "continence") RV, "to contain" AV: Paul, although he would that all men were like himself unmarried, yet advices that they should marry if they cannot control their sexual passions, and hold them in complete subjection to Christian motives (1 Cor 7:9). The same Gr vb. is used in 1 Cor 9:25, and tv4 "is temperate" (AV and ERV) of the athlete who during the period of training abstains from all indulgence in food, drink, and sexual passion. For the general principle as expressed in subst. ekkrētēs (Acts 24:25; Gal 5:23; 2 Pet 1:6) and adj. ekkrētos (Tit 1:8) see TEMPERANCE, TEMPERATE.

CONTINUAL, kon-tin'ū-ləl, CONTINUALLY, kon-tin'o-ā-lə: Without cessation, although there may be intervals between its presence; that which regularly recurs throughout a period, as Lk 24:53: "[They] were continually in the temple"; "lest she by her continual coming" (Lk 18:5). In OT for Heb fādāhīr, "pursue," as one drop of rain follows another in swift succession, but more frequently by tāmāth for offerings repeated at intervals, as

Ex 29:42; occasionally the Heb has the phrase lit. meaning "all the day" (kōl ha-yom), as Gen 8:5. In the NT most frequently for diá pantós, "through all" ("always" Mt 18:10; He 13:15), "sometimes," adiakalipōs, "incessantly" (Rom 9:2 AV) and diēnēkēs, "continuously" (He 7:3).

CONTINUANCE, kon-tin'ān'se: Not in RV; in Ps 139:16 AV, as an interpretation of Heb yāimān, "days," treating of God's preservation, where RV has: "They were all written, even the days that were ordained for me," i.e. all my days were in view, before one of them actually existed. In Lk 1:15, τὸ δόμα, "of long time," RV; in Rom 2:7, for hupomōnē, "patience," RV, or still better, "steadfastness," RvM.

CONTRADICTION, kon-tra-dik'shun: AV for ἰδίωτος, antilōgo (He 7:7; 12:3). In the former passage, RV has "without any dispute," i.e. what has been said requires no argument; in the latter "gainsaying," which is scarcely an improvement, the reference being to oral attacks upon the words and character of Jesus.

CONTRARY, kon-tra-ri (παρά, kēri; ἀνατρικτικός, anantiktos): In the OT it has the sense of antagonistic, as one kind of animal opposed or contrasted with another, esp. in Lev 26:21,23,24,27,28,40,41, where Jeh declares His attitude toward the people in such phrases as: "If ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk c. unto me; then I will walk c. unto you in wrath." In the NT it has a more varied significance and is applied to both material and human relations as simply opposite, set over against an object or thing. Used of the wind as in Mt 14:24; Mk 6:48; Acts 27:4, where it is spoken of as a wind. Refers also to conflicting doctrines, customs or beliefs, as 1 Tim 1:10, "and if there be any other thing c. to the sound doctrine." Several other Gr words are tv4 with almost an identical meaning. Occasionally a prefix gives a slightly different shade of meaning.

CONTRIBUTION, kon-tri-bu'tshun (κοινονεῖν, koīnōnē, "communion" or "fellowship," Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 9:13): The meaning "contribution" is drawn from the context, rather than from the Gr word. The phrase in the passage cited, lit. rendered, would be "to exercise" or "put fellowship into activity." The koīnōnía subsisting among believers because of their inner communion with Christ placed them and their gifts and possessions at the service of one another (see COMMUNION). They are enjoined not to forget to communicate (He 13:16). To be "communicative" (koīnōnikos) is to be a habit of their lives, the Christian principle being that of the holding of all property as a trust, to be distributed as there is need (Acts 2:42; 2 Cor 8:14f). The first occasion for calling this fellowship into activity, by way of "contributions," was within the church at Jerusalem and for its needy members (see COMMUNITY or COGNOSE). The second occasion was repeatedly from the infant gentile churches for the poor within the same church (Acts 11:29; Rom 15:26; 2 Cor 8:1–4; 9:2); the fellowship thus widening from intra-congregational to general church benevolence. These contributions were gathered weekly (2 Cor 8:1, 4f), were proportioned to the means of the givers (Acts 11:29; 1 Cor 16:2), were not exacted or prescribed, in a legalistic manner, but were called forth as the free-will offerings of grateful hearts (2 Cor 8:7), spirit-moved, and for the living spirit, and were sent to their destination by accredited representatives of the congregations (1 Cor 16:3; Acts 11:30).

CONTRITE, kon'trít, CONTRITION, kon'trís'hún (N27), dá'kaká', "bruise": Only in OT (Ps 34 18; Ps 61 17; Isa 57 15; N27, nákkáh, "smitten" (Isa 66 2)). Contrite, "crushed," is only the superlative of "broken"; "a contrite heart" is "a heart broken to pieces." In Holy Scripture, the heart is the seat of all feeling, whether joy or sorrow. A contrite heart is one in which the natural pride and self-sufficiency have been completely humbled by the consciousness of guilt. The theological term "contrition" designates more than is found in these passages. It refers to the grief or sorrow as a consequence of the revelation of sin made by the preaching of the law (Jer 23 29). The Augsburg Confession (Art. XII) analyzes repentance into two parts: "Contrition and faith," the one the fruit of the preaching of the law, the other of the gospel. While c. has its degrees, and is not equal in all persons, the promise of forgiveness is not dependent upon the degree of contrition, but solely upon the merit of Christ. It is not simply a precondition of faith, but, as hatred of sin, combined with the purpose, by God's aid, to overcome it, grows with faith.

CONTRIVENCY, kon'trú-vér-si (Στράτης), rótō, "strife," "contention," ὕπολογονύς, homologómenōs, "confessingly," "without controversy": Used frequently of disputes among men (as Dt 17 5) and then transferred to the justice of God as directed against the sins of men. Thus we read of Jeh's controversy with the nations (Jed 26 31); with the inhabitants of the land (Hos 4 1); with His people (Mic 6 2). "Without controversy" (1 Tim 3 16), a positive rather than a negative expression, "by common consent," or better, "as unanimously confessed," introducing a quotation from a hymn or rhetorical confession of the early church.

CONVERSE, kon-vúrs; verb: In RV limited to tr of κοινός, κοινός, "suitable time," "season," and its compounds: "that which is seasonable" or "opportunity" (Mk 6 21; Acts 24 26). AV is replaced, in Prov 30 8 RV, by "needful" (Heb ḥōq), "feed me with the food that is needful for me": Jer 40 4, by "right:" Eph 5 4, by "besetting;" in Rom 1 28, by "fitting," and in 1 Cor 15 12, by "opportune.""

CONVENIENT, kon-vún'ent; Found in the AVm of Jer 40 19: "Who will come me in judgment?" and in Jer 50 44: "Who will come me to pleading?" The Hebr term which is rendered convert is yá’dath, and it means to summon to a court, to call on to plead. Convent is obsolete, but it was formerly used, and meant to summon, or to call before a judge. Shakespeare used it several times. In King Hénry Hif, Act V, he says: "The lords of the council hath commanded that the archbishop be convened to the council board."

CONVERSANT, kon-vúrs'ánt (ἀναστρέφω), anástrephó, ἀναστρέφες, ἀναστρέφων, homólitos: This word is another illustration of the changes which time makes in a living language. The modern sense of the term is mutual talk, colloquy, but in AV it never means that, but always behavior, conduct. This broader meaning, at a time not much later than the date of AV, began to yield to the special, limited one of today, perhaps as has been suggested, because speech forms so large a part of conduct. The NT words for "converse" in the modern sense are homólitos (Lk 24 14 15; Acts 20 11) and anastómolitos (Acts 10 27).

1. In the OT the word used to indicate conduct is yá’dath, derekh, d’vay, the course one travels (AV Ps 37 14; m 50 23). It is the common Heb idea of conduct, possibly due, as Hatch thinks, to the fact that in Syria intercourse between village and village was so much on foot, with difficulty on stony tracks over the hills, and this is reflected in the metaphor.

2. In the NT the idea of deportment is once rendered by trópos, "Let your c. be without covets-ness" (He 13 5 AV; RV "by ye free from the love of money"; RVm "let your turn of mind be free"). But the usual word is παράκτιος (Acts 15 3). Derived forms of the vb. "convert" are used in the RV in Jas 5 19, "convert," "converteth" (5 20), "converted" (Ps 51 13, m "return"), "converts" (Isa 1 27, m "they that return"). In the later instances, derived forms of the vb. "convert" the RV employs "turn again" (Isa 6 10; Lk 22 32; Acts 3 19), or "turn" (Isa 60 5; Mt 13 15; 18 13; Mk 4 12; Jn 12 40; Acts 28 27), or Ps 19 7 the reading of the AV. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; it has been changed by the revisers into "restoring the soul." The words commonly used in the Eng. Bible as equivalent with the Heb and Gr terms are "turn," "return," "turn back," "turn again" (cf Dt 4 30; Isa 55 7; Jer 3 12 12; Ezk 20; 33 11; Mal 3 7). Thus "convert" is synonymous with "turn," and "conversion" with "turning.

The principal Heb word is צוּב, shábôh; other words are רכֹב, pánâh, צוּב, yá’dath, "go," "走," "go on," "to walk"); This word is tr doublet. This word is an anastómolitos, homólitos: This word is another illustration of the changes which time makes in a living language. CONVERSION, kon-vúr'shún: I. The Words "Conversion," "Convert," in Bib- lical Usage.—The noun "conversion" (ταρασοφία, epistrophé, epistrophe) occurs in only one passage in the Bible, "They passed through both English Phoenixia and Samaria, declaring the Bible conversion of the Gentiles" (Acts 15 3). Derived forms of the vb. "convert" are used in the RV in Jas 5 19, "convert," "converteth" (5 20), "converted" (Ps 51 13, m "return"), "converts" (Isa 1 27, m "they that return"). In the later instances, derived forms of the vb. "convert" the RV employs "turn again" (Isa 6 10; Lk 22 32; Acts 3 19), or "turn" (Isa 60 5; Mt 13 15; 18 13; Mk 4 12; Jn 12 40; Acts 28 27), or Ps 19 7 the reading of the AV. "The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; it has been changed by the revisers into "restoring the soul." The words commonly used in the Eng. 39 times in the NT. It is used (1) in the lit. sense in Mt 9 22; 10 13; 24 18; Acts 9 40; 15 36, etc; (2) in the fig. sense, in transformative (Lk 1 16 f; Jas 5 19 f).
1. Thess 4 1 22.
3. In the NT.
In Acts 9 21 it does not turn to the right way to the wrong. The opposite meaning, to turn from the wrong way to the right, we find in Lk 22 32; Acts 9 35; 11 21; 14 15: 16 19: 26 18; 2 Cor
1 Thess 1 9: 1 Pet 2 25. In connection with metanoia, "repent," it is used in Acts 3 19: 26 20. The root word strephein is used in the
fig. sense in Mt 18 3; Jn 12 40. LXX and TR have epistrephein.
II. The Doctrine.—While the words "conversion" and "convert" do not occur frequently in our Eng.
Bible the teaching contained therein is fundamental in Christian doctrine. From the words themselves it is not possible to derive a clearly defined doctrine of conversion; the materials for the construction of doctrine must be gathered from the tenor of the Bible teaching.
There is a good deal of vagueness in the modern use of the term. By some writers it is used in "a very general way to stand for the whole sequence of movements of accomplished, accompanying, and immediately following the apparent sudden changes of character involved." (E. D. Starbuck, The Psychology of Religion, 21). "To be converted," 'to be regenerated,' 'to receive grace,'
'to experience religion,' 'to gain an assurance,'
are so many phrases which denote the process, gradual or sudden, by which a self, hitherto divided and consciously wrong, inferior and unhappy, becomes united and consciously right, superior and happy in consequence of its hold upon religious realities. This at least is what conversion signifies in general terms" (William James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, 189). In this general, vague way the term is used not only by psychologists, but also by theological writers and in common religious parlance. A converted man is a Christian, a believer, a man who has religion, who has experienced regeneration.
In its more restricted meaning the word denotes the action of man in the initial process of salvation as distinguished from the action of God. Justification and regeneration Meaning are purely Divine acts, repentance, conversion, and man, human acts although under the influence and by the power of the Divine agency. Thus conversion denotes the human volition and act by which man in obedience to the Divine summons determines to change the course of his life and turns to God. Arrested by God's call man stops to think, turns about and heeds the opposite way. This presupposes that the previous course was not directed toward God but away from Him. The instances of conversion related in the Bible show that the objective point toward which man's life was directed may be either the service of idols (1 Thess 1 9) or a life of religious indifference, a self-centered life where material things engross the attention and deaden the sense of things spiritual (rich young ruler, Lk 18 22), or a life of sensuality, of open sin and shame (prodiggal son, Lk 15 13) or even a mistaken way of serving God (Saul, Acts 26 9). Accordingly in conversion either the religious or the ethical element may predominate. The moral man who turns from self to God, or from sin, is an instance of unconscious conversion, concerning God's will to a clear conception of his relation to God is more conscious of the religious factor. Conversion brings him into vital, conscious foahship with God through Jesus Christ. The immoral man who is awakened to a realization of the holiness of God, of the demands of His law, and of his own sin and guilt is more conscious of the outward change in his manner of life. The ethical change is the more outstanding fact in his experience, although it is necessarily connected with the religious experience of the changed relation to God.
The mode of conversion varies greatly according to the former course of life. It may be a sudden crisis in the moral and intellectual life. This is very frequently the case in the experience of heathen who turn from the worship of idols to faith in Jesus Christ. A sudden crisis is frequently witnessed in the case of persons who, having lived a life of flagrant sin, renounce their former life. Conversion to them means a complete revolution in their thoughts, feelings and outward manner of life. In other instances conversion appears to be the climax of a prolonged conflict for supremacy of divergent motives; and, again, it may be the goal of a gradual conversion, the consummation of a process of discerning ever more clearly and yielding ever more definitely and thus experiencing ever more vitally things which have been implanted and nurtured by Christian training. This process results in the conversion of those who, with the aid of God's Saviour in the consecration of life to His service.
Thus conversion may be an instantaneous act, or a process which is more or less prolonged. The latter is more frequently seen in the case of children and young people who have grown up in Christian families and have received the benefit of Christian training. No conversions of this kind are recorded in the NT. This may be explained by the fact that most of our NT writings are addressed to the first generation of Christians, to men and women who were raised in Jewish legalism or heathen idiolatry, and who turned to Christ after they had passed the age of adolescence. The religious life of their children as distinguished in its mode and manifestations from that of the adults does not appear to have been a matter of discussion or a source of perplexity so as to call forth specific instruction.
Conversion comprises the characteristics both of repentance and of faith. Repentance is conversion viewed from the starting-point, the turning from the former life; faith indicates the objective point of conversion, the turning to God.
Of late the psychology of conversion has been carefully studied and elaborately treated by psychologists. Much has been gathered. It is shown that 4. Conversion and Psychology particularly susceptible to religious Influences (of G. Stanley Hall, Adolescence, II, ch xiv; E. D. Starbuck, Psychology of Religion, etc). Yet conversion cannot be explained as a natural process, conditioned by physiological changes in the adolescent, esp. by approaching puberty. The laws of psychology are certainly God's laws as much as all other laws of Nature.
His Spirit works in harmony with His own laws.
But in genuine conversion there is always at work in a direct and immediate manner the Spirit of God to which man, be he adolescent or adult, consciously responds. Any attempt to explain conversion by eliminating the direct working of the Divine Spirit falls short of the mark. See REGENERATION; Repentance.

LITERATURE.—See REGENERATION.

CONVICT, kon-vikt', CONVICTION, kon-vik'- shun (καταδίωκω, elígho, and compounds, "to prove guilty"): Usual tr of EV, where AV has "convince," as in Jn 8 46; Tit 1 9; Jas 3 9; once also replacing AV "prove" (Jn 16 8), while RV changes AV
"convince" into "prove" in 1 Cor 14 24. It always implies the presentation of evidence. It is a decision presumed to be based upon a careful and discriminating consideration of all the proofs offered, and has a legal character, the verdict being rendered either on God's judgment (Rom 4 17) or before men (Jn 8 46) by an appeal to their consciences in which God's law is written (Rom 2 15). Since such conviction is addressed to the heart of the guilty, as well as concerning him externally, the word "reprieve" is sometimes substituted. To "convict . . . in respect of righteousness, and of judgment" (Jn 16 8), refers to the conviction of the inadequacy and perversity of the ordinary, natural standards of righteousness and judgment, and the approval of those found in Christ, by the agency of the Holy Spirit, as the great interpreter and applier of the work of Christ. H. E. Jacobs

CONVIENCE, kon-vins' (δικαιοσύνη, εκδίκαιος): Another form etymologically of "convict," means to bring to a decision concerning the truth or the falsehood of a proposition (Job 32 12). As usually applied to what is of a more individual and private character, and having reference to what is either good or bad in itself without moral quality, it has given way in RV to either "convict," "reprieve," or "confute." See CONVICT.

CONVOCATION, kon-v6-ka'shun: A rendering for סַמְאָה, מֵאָה, chiefly in the frequent "Holy Convocation"; but the word is sometimes used alone, e.g. Nu 10 2; Isa 1 13; 4 5. On a holy convocation no work could be done. The phrase differs from "sobem assembly," which in the Pent is only applied to the concluding festivals at the end of Passover and Tabernacles, while "Holy Convocation" is used of the Sabbath and all the great holy days of the Mosaic legislation.

CONVULSING, kon-vul'ing (Mk 1 26 m [AV torn]). See Unclean Spirit.

COOKING, k6'k2ng. See Food.

COOL, kool (םֵא, מְאָה, "wind", כַּטַּפְּפְּף, כַּתַּפְּפָד, "to cool down"): "Cool of the day" (Gen 3 8, m "wind"), when the evening breeze has tempered the heat of the day, enabling Orientals to walk abroad. "Cool my tongue" (Lk 16 24), a phrase reflecting the Jewish notion that Abraham had power to rescue his descendants from the fires of Hades.

COOS, k6'os. See Cos.

COPING, k6'ping. See House.

COPPER, kop'er (כַּפַּר, מְחָסָל): The word is trl "copper" in only one passage (Ezr 8 27 AV). In the ARV of this passage "brass" has been substituted. Neither describes the actual alloy according to present definitions so well as the word "bronze." Copper was one of the earliest metals to be known and utilized in alloy, but copper, as a single metal, was probably little used. The remains of spear, balances, arms, vases, mirrors, statues, cooking utensils, implements of all kinds, etc, from Bible times are principally of an alloy of copper hardened with tin known today as bronze (see Brass). In such passages as Dt 8 9, where reference is made to the native metal or ores, "copper" should be substituted for "brass" as in the ARV (cf Job 40 18). This is true also of coins as χαλκός, chalkeôs, in Mt 10 9.

Our modern Eng. word "copper" is derived from an old name pertaining to the island of Cyprus. Copper was known to the ancients as Cyprian brass, probably because that island was one of the chief sources for this metal. The Sinai peninsula and the mountains of northern Syria also contributed to the ancient world's supply (see Am Tab.). No evidences of copper ores in any quantity are found in Pal proper. See Metal; Mine. James A. Patch

COPPERSMITH, kop'er-smith (χαλκοσίτης, chalke'sitis): The word is found in NT once only, in 2 Tim 4 14: "Alexander the coppermith did [in "showed"] me much evil." As the Bible word rendered "copper" (see Ezr 8 27 AV) is trl "brass" by RV, so the word here rendered "c." should be rendered "brazier," or "worker in brass." See Copper.

1. Language and Alphabet.—The Coptic alphabet consists of the Gr uncial letters, plus seven more, the last two of which are not used in the Gr. Various spellings of the latter two characters have been employed by Copts: (1) Buhairic, the dialect of Lower Egypt, often called Coptic par excellence, and also (wrongly) Memphitic. It is used as the ecclesiastical language in the services of the Coptic church. The other four dialects are somewhat more closely allied to one another than to Buhairic, which shows greater traces of Gr influence. These dialects are, (2) the Sahidic (Sahid, or dialect of upper Egypt), also called Thebais; (3) the Bashmiric—or rather Bashmic—or for which Fayyumic has been suggested; (4) the Middle Egyptian proper (known from MSS found in the monastery of Jeremias near the Theban Seperum), differing but little from (3); and (5) the Akhmimic (Ahkham—earliest of the ancient Coptic dialects) is more primitive and more closely related to ancient Egypt than any other. Only a few fragments in it (of Ex, Eccles, 2 Macc, the Minor Prophets, and Catholic cognate) have yet been found. The last three dialects are often classified together as "Middle Egyptian" and (4) is then called "Lower Sahidic.

II. Versions.—In all 5 dialects more or less complete versions of the Bible once existed. They were the earliest made after the early Syr. At latest they began in the 3rd point of view was (e.g. Hyvernat) say as early as the 2d. It is thought that the Sahidic version was the earliest, then the Middle Egyptian, and finally the Buhairic. The latter represents an early and comparatively pure Gr text, free from what are generally termed western additions, while the Sahidic, on the other hand, contains most of the peculiar western readings. It sometimes supports codex B, sometimes codex 2, sometimes both, but generally it closely agrees with Codex D, esp. in the Acts. A Coptic (Sahidic) MS, written in the latter half of the 350 AD, and published by the British Museum in April, 1912, contains D, Jon, and Acts, and is older than any other Bib. MS (except a few fragments) yet known to exist. It proves that this Sahidic version was made about 200 AD. It in general supports the "Western" text of cod Bezae (D).
Much of the NT esp. still exists in Sahidic, though not Rev. In Buhairic we have the Pent, Job, Pss, Prov, Isa, Ezek, Dan, the 12 Minor Prophets, and fragments of the historical books of the OT, besides the whole NT, though the Book of Rev is later than the rest. In the other dialects much less had been preserved, as far as is known. In Bhusphr, we have fragments of Isa, Lam, Ep. Jer, and a good many fragments of the NT. In more than one dialect we have apoc gospels (see Texts and Studies, IV, no. 2, 1896) and Gnostic papyri, etc. The OT was tr'd from the LXX. The Pss seem to have been tr'd

III. Chief Editions. — The Buhairic Pss were first published in 1859. Wilkins published the Buhairic NT at London in 1716, and the Pent in 1731; Schwartze the Gospels in 1846–47; de Lagarde the Acts and Eph. in 1852. He also edited the Pss (trans. and lit. in 1875, 151 in number, of which the last celebrates David’s victory over Goliath. He added fragments of the Sahidic Psalter and of the Buhairic Prov.
Tattam published the Minor Prophets in 1836 and the Major in 1832, an ed. of the Gospel in London in 1847, and of the rest of the NT in 1852 (SPCK), with a literal Arab. version. Horner’s ed. of the Buhairic NT (4 vols. 1898, etc., Clarendon Press) and of Sahidic Gospels (1910, 3 vols.) is the standard ed. Ford published part of the Sahidic NT in 1879. We have since appeared: e.g. Ciasca published fragments of the Sahidic OT (Sacrarium Bibliorum Fragmenta Coptico-Sahidico MuclJ Borgiansi) at Rome, 1855–59.

COR, kör (ג, kôr): A liquid and dry measure, same as the homer; of about 90 gals. capacity (Ezk 45:14). See Homer; Weights and Measures.

CORAL, kór'al (םיאם), rá'móth, (דדְּה, pr'nîm): The red coral or precious coral, Corallium rubrum, is confined to the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas. It is the calcareous axis of a branching colony of polyps. It does not form reefs, but occurs in small masses from 40 to 100 fathoms below the surface. It differs totally in structure from the white corals which form coral reefs, belonging to the order of Octocorallia or Eight-rayed Polypes, while the reef-building corals belong to the Hexactinaria or Six-rayed Polypes.

Rá'móth, apparently from r. rá'îm, “to be high” (cf râm, “to be high”), occurs in three passages. In Prov 24:7, EV have “too high”. Wisdom is too high for a fool.” In Job 28:12–19, where various precious things are compared with wisdom, EV has “coral” (AVn “Ramothe”). It is mentioned here along with 9â’shôr, “gold” (RVn “treasure”); kelem, “gold of Òphtar”; shâ’ân, “onyx” (RVn “bangle”), soppîr, “asperges”, sâhîl, “gold”, zâ’îbbîth, “crystal” (RV “glass”); pâz, “gold”, gâ’ithâs, “pearls” (RV “crystal”); pr'nîmîn, “rubies” (RV “red coral” or “pearls”); pîyûtâth, “topaz.”

While the real meaning of some of these terms is doubtful (see Shoolman, Precious), they all, including the coral, appear to be precious stones or metals. In Ezk 27:16, râ’móth occurs with nîpêkhâh, “emeralds” (RVn “carbuncles”); ārâ’dân, “purple”; rîkkâm, “broidered work”, bâ‘âc, “fine linen”; kâmâdhîk, “agate” (AVn “chrysoberyl”); Nn “pearls”. In the context does not require a precious stone or metal, and Vulg has sericum, i.e. “Chinese material” or “silk.” Notwithstanding, therefore, the traditional rendering, “coral,” the real meaning of râ’móth must be admitted to be doubtful.

Pr'nîmîn (from r. pînân, “to separate”); cf Arab. fânân, “a branch of a tree”) occurs in Job 28:18; Prov 3:15; 8:11; 20:15; 31:10; Lam 4:7. In all these passages EV has “rubies” (Job 28:18, RVn “red coral” or “pearls”); Lam 4:7, RVn “corals.” Everywhere where a precious substance is indicated, but nowhere does the context give any light as to the nature of the substance, except in Lam 4:7, where we have the statement that the nobles of Jerus “were more ruddy in color than coral” or “body” than coral. This and the fact that a branch is the occurrence of pr'nîmin and râ’móth together in Job 28:18 is, if we give the precedence to pr'nîmin, a further argument against râ’móth meaning “coral.”

COR-ASHAN, kôr-ash'ân, kôr-râ'ah-in, 1 S 30:30: The original reading was probably Bor-ashan, “well of Ashan.” See ASHAN.

CORBAN, kôr-bân (4 בָּנ, kobân; סְפ, dôron; trâ “a gift,” “a sacrificial offering.” It. “that which is brought near,” viz. to the altar: An expression frequently used in the original text of the OT; in the Eng. Bible it occurs in Mk 7:11; cf also Mt 15:5. It is the most general term for a sacrifice of any kind, and was the course of time it became associated with an objectionable practice. Anything dedicated to the temple by pronouncing the votive word “C.” forthwith belonged to the temple, but only ideally; actually it might remain in the possession of him who made the vow. It could be justified in not supporting his old parents simply because he designated his property as a part of it as a gift to the temple, that is, as “C.” There was no necessity of fulfilling his vow, yet he was actually prohibited from ever using his property for the support of his parents. This shows clearly why Christ singled out this queer regulation in order to demonstrate the sophistry of tradition and to bring out the fact of its possible and actual hostility to the Scripture and its spirit.

CORD, kôrd (כִּרְד, hebhel, רֵו, yether, רֶד, mîthâr, דָּדֶה; שֹׁנוֹש, shoôn’ah, shoôn’im):

(1) The Arab. kôbîl corresponds to the Heb hebhel and is the common name of rope or rope throughout the East. Such ropes or cords are made of goat’s or camel’s hair, first spun into threads and then twisted or plaited into the larger and stronger form. Hebhel is tr’r inconsistently in RV by “cord” (Job 2:15; Job 36:8, etc.); by “line” (2 S 8:2; Mic 2:5; Ps 16:6; 78:55; Am 7:17; Zec 2:1); by “ropes” (1 K 20:31), and by “tacklings” (Isa 33:23).

(2) Yether corresponds to the Arab. wa’târ, which means catch. With a kindred inconsistency it is tr’r by “wither’s” (Jgs 15:7 RVn “bowstring”); by “cord” (Job 30:11), where some think it may mean “bowstring,” or possibly “rein” of a horse, and “bowstring” (Ps 11:2), doubtless the true meaning.

(3) Mîthâr is considered the equivalent of Arab. ânîb, which means tent ropes, being constantly so used by the Bedouin. They make the thing so called of goat’s or camel’s hair. It is used of the “cords” of the tabernacle (Jer 10:20), of the “cords” of the “hangings” and “pillars” of the court of the tabernacle in Ezk and Nn, and of 5g, by Isa (64:12), “Lengthen thy cords,” etc.

(4) Shoôn’ah is thought to have its equivalent in the Arab. râbûtîs, which means a band, or fastening.

Cor, 1st Ep. to

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA 710

See BAND. It is tr. by "cords" in Ps 118 27; 129 12; by "bands" in Ezek 3 25; Job 39 10; Hos 11 4; by "ropes" in Jgs 15 13, 14; and by "cart rope" in Isa 5 18. See COR. See also Nu 15 38 and AMLET. It seems to have meant the meaning of something twisted or interlaced.

(5) In the NT "cord" is found in Jn 2 15, translating scholinion, but in Acts 27 32 the same Gr word is rendered "ropes".

Figurative: (1) of affliction (Job 36 8); (2) of God's laws (Ps 2 3); (3) of the artifices of the wicked (Ps 129 4; 140 5); (4) of truthful habits (Prov 5 22); (5) of true friendship or companionship (Ecc 12 6); (6) possibly of the spinal cord (Ecc 12 6); (7) of falsehood (Isa 5 18); (8) of the spirit of enterprise and devotion (Isa 54 2); (9) of God's gentleness.

CORDS, κόρδα, SMALL (ευκωνον, scholinion), the diminutive of scholion, a "rush," hence "a rope of rushes"); Tr. "small cords" (Jn 2 15 AV; RV "ropes"). The same word is tr. "ropes" in Acts 27 32. See also Job 41 2 m.

CORE, κορέ (Κόρη), In AV, Jude ver 11, used as a variant for Korah. See KORAH, 3.

CORIANDER, κοριαν-δέρ ("3, gadih; kóro, kóron): The fruit of the Coriandrum Sativum (N.O. Umbelliferae), a plant indigenous around the Mediterranean and extensively cultivated. The fruits are aromatic and stomatic-carminative. They are of a grayish-yellow color, ribbed, ovate-globular and in size about twice that of a hemp-seed. "The manna was like coriander seed" (Nu 11 7; see also Ex 16 31).

CORINTH, κορίνθη (Κόρινθος, Kórinthos, "ornament"): A celebrated city of the Peloponnesus, capital of Corinthia, which lay N. of Argolis, and with the isthmus joined the peninsula to the mainland. Corinth had three good harbors (Lechaeum, on the Corinthian, and Cenchreae and Schoenus on the Saronic Gulf), and thus commanded the traffic of both the eastern and the western seas. The larger ships could not be hauled across the isthmus (Acts 27 6, 37); smaller vessels were taken over by means of a ship tramway with wooden rollers. The Phociotans, who settled here very early, left many traces of their civilization in the industrial arts, such as dyeing and weaving, as well as in their religion and mythology. The Corinthian cult of Aphrodite, of Melanthis (Melkart) and of Asclepius of Phocea origin. Poseidon, too, and other sea deities were held in high esteem in the commercial city. Various arts were cultivated and the Corinthians, even in the earliest times, were famous for their cleverness, inventiveness, and artistic sense, and they prided themselves on surpassing the other Greeks in the embellishment of their city and in the adornment of their temples. There were many celebrated painters in Corinth, and the city became famous for the Corinthian order of architecture: an order, which, by the way, though held in high esteem by the Romans, was very little used by the Greeks themselves. It was here, too, that the dithyramb (hymn to Dionysus) was first arranged artistically to be sung by a chorus; and the Isthmian games, held every two years, were celebrated just outside the city on the isthmus near the Saronic Gulf. But the commercial and materialistic spirit prevailed later. Not a single Corinthian distinguished himself in lit. Statesman, however, there were in abundance: Penteander, Phidion, Timoleon.

Harbors are few on the Corinthian Gulf. Hence no other city could wrest the commerce of these waters from Corinth. According to Thucydides, the first ships of war were built here in 664 BC. In those early days Corinth held a leading position among the Gr cities; but in consequence of her great material prosperity she would not risk all as Athens did, and win eternal supremacy over men; she had too much to lose to jeopardize her material interests for principle, and she soon sank into the second class. But when Athens, Thebes, Sparta and Argos fell away, Corinth came to the front again as the wealthiest and most important city in Greece; and when it was destroyed by Mummius in 146 BC, the treasures of art carried to Rome were as great as those of Athens. Delos became the commercial center for a time; but when Julius Caesar restored Corinth a cent. later (46 BC), it grew so rapidly that the Rom colony soon became again one of the most prominent centers in Greece.

When Paul visited Corinth, he found it the metropolis of the Peloponnesus. Jews flocked to this center of trade (Acts 18 1-18; Rom 16 21 ff; 1 Cor 9 20), the natural site for a great mart, and flourishing under the lavish hand of the Caesars; and this is one reason why Paul remained there so long (Acts 18 11) instead of sojourning in the old seats of aristocracy, such as Argos, Sparta and Athens. He found a strong Jewish nucleus to begin with; and it was in direct communication with Ephesus. But earthquake, malaria, and the harsh Turkish rule finally swept everything away except seven columns of one old Doric temple, the only object above ground left today to mark the site of the ancient city of wealth and luxury and immortality — the city of vice par excellence in the Rom world. Near the temple have been excavated the ruins of the famous font of Peirene, so celebrated in Gr literature. Directly S. of the city is the high rock (over 1,800 ft.) Acrocorinthus, which formed an impregnable fortress. Traces of the old ship-canal across the isthmus (attempted by Nero in 66-67 AD) were to be seen before excavations were begun for the present canal. At this time the city was thoroughly...
Rom. Hence the many Lat names in the NT: Lucius, Tertius, Gaius, Erastus, Quartus (Rom 16 21-23), Crispus, Titus Justus (Acts 18 7.8), Fortunatus, Achales (1 Cor 16 17). According to the testimony of Dio Chrysostomus, Corinth had become in the 2d cent. of our era the richest city in Greece. Its monuments and public buildings and art treasures are described in detail by Pausanias.

The church in Corinth consisted principally of non-Jews (1 Cor 12 2). Paul had no intention at first of making the city a base of operations (Acts 18 1; 16 9.10); for he wished to return to Thessalonica (1 Thess 2 17.18). His plans were changed by a revelation (Acts 18 9.10). The Lord commanded him to speak boldly, and he did so, remaining in the city eighteen months. Finding strong opposition in the synagogue he left the Jews and went to the Gentiles (Acts 18 6). Nevertheless, Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue and his household were believers and baptisms were numerous (Acts 18 8); but no Corinthians were baptized by Paul himself except Crispus, Gaius and some of the household of Stephanas (1 Cor 1 14.16) ‘the firstfruits of Achaia’ (1 Cor 16 15). One of these, Gaius, was Paul’s host the next time he visited the city (Rom 16 23). Silas and Timothy, who had been left at Berea, came on to Corinth about 45 days after Paul’s arrival. It was at this time that Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Thessalonians (3 6). During Gallo’s administration the Jews accused Paul, but the proconsul refused to allow the case to be brought to trial. This decision must have been looked upon with favor by a large majority of the Corinthians, who had a great dislike for the Jews (Acts 18 17). Paul became acquainted also with Priscilla and Aquila (18 18.26; Rom 16 3; 2 Tim 4 19), and later they accompanied him to Ephesus. Within a few years after Paul’s first visit to Corinth the Christians had increased so rapidly that they made quite a large congregation, but it was composed mainly of the lower classes: they were neither ‘learned, influential, nor of noble birth’ (1 Cor 1 26).

Paul probably left Corinth to attend the celebration of the feast at Jerusalem (Acts 18 21). Little is known of the history of the church in Corinth after his departure. Apollos came from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation to the brethren in Achaia (Acts 18 27; 2 Cor 3 1); and he exercised a powerful influence (Acts 18 27.28; 1 Cor 1 12); and Paul came down later from Macedonia. His first letter to the Corinthians was written from Ephesus. Both Titus and Timothy were sent to Corinth from Ephesus (2 Cor 7 13; 1 Cor 4 17), and Timothy returned by land, meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor 1 1), who visited Greece again in 56-57 or 57-58.

LITERATURE

1. The Authenticity of the Two Epistles.—1 and 2 Cor, Gal and Rom, all belong to the period of Paul’s third missionary journey. They are the most remarkable of his writings, and are usually distinguished as the four great or principal epp.; a distinction which not only is a tribute to their high originality and intrinsic worth, but also indicates the extremely favorable opinion which critics of almost all schools have held regarding their authenticity. Throughout the cent. the tradition has remained practically unbroken, that they contain the very letters Paulinus, the mind and heart of the great apostle of the Gentiles, and preserve to the church an impregnable defence of historical Christianity. What has to be said of their genuineness applies almost equally to both.

The two epp. have a conspicuous place in the most ancient lists of Pauline writings. In the Muratorian Fragment (cir 170) they stand 1. External at the head of the nine epp. addressed to churches, and are declared to have been written to forbid heretical schism (primum omnium Corinthii schismas hærere interruptis); and in Marcion’s Apostolicon (cir 140) they stand second to Gal. They are also clearly attested in the most important writings of the sub-apostolic age, e.g. by Clement of Rome (cir 95), generally regarded as the friend of the apostle, mentioned in Phil 4 3; Ignatius (Ad Ephes., ch xviii, second decade of 2d cent.); Polycarp (ch xii, xi, xi, first half of 2d cent.), a disciple of John; and Justin Martyr (b. at close of 1st cent.; while the gnostic Ophites (2d cent.) were clearly familiar with both epp. (cf. Westcott, Canon, passim, and Index II; also Charteris, Canonicity, 222-24, where most of the original passages are brought together). The witness of Clement is of the highest importance. Ere the close of the 1st cent., he himself wrote a letter to the Corinthians, in which (ch xlvii, Lightfoot’s ed, 144) he made a direct appeal to the authority of 1 Cor: “Take up the letter of Paul the blessed apostle; what did he write to you first in the beginning of the gospel?”
Verily he gave you spiritual direction regarding himself, Cephas, and Apollos, for even then you were dividing yourselves into parties." It would be impossible to desire more explicit external testimony. Within themselves both epp. are replete with marks of genuineness. They are palpating human documents, with the feeling of reality. Evidence 2. Internal harmonize with the independent narrative of Acts; in the words of Schleiermacher (Eindyg., 148). "The whole fits together and completes itself perfectly, and yet each of the documents had its own origin, and it is a mystery how the whole is contained in the one cannot be borrowed from those of the other." Complex and difficult as the subjects and circumstances sometimes are, and varying as the moods of the writer are in dealing with them, there is nothing fanciful, no离职s assent to his good faith. The very difficulty created for a modern reader by the incomplete and allusive character of some of the references is itself a mark of genuineness rather than the opposite; just what would most likely be the case in a free and intimate correspondence between those who understood one another in the presence of immediate facts which needed no careful particularization; but what would almost as certainly have been avoided in a fictitious document which was written in a medium of literary sense sufficient to forbid classification among the pseudographia. To take but a few instances from many, it is impossible to read such passages as those conveying the remonstrance in 1 Cor 9, the alternation of anxiety and relief in connection with the meeting of Titus in 2 Cor 2 and 7, or the ever-memorable passage which begins at 11 24 of the same ep.: "Of the Jews five times I closed," etc., without the feeling that the hypothesis of fiction became an absurdity. No man ever wrote out of the heart if this writer did not. The truth is that the theory of pseudoynomy leaves far more difficulties behind it than it is supposed to solve. There is an unanswerable literary prodigy of the 2d cent., who in the most daring and artistic manner gloated in the fanciful creation of those minute and life-like details which have imprinted themselves indelibly on the memory and imagination of mankind who have been brought even to imitate the chimera. No one knows where or when he lived, or in what shape or form. But if the writings are the undoubted rescripts of fact, to whose life and personality they are indissolubly united, no other than that of the apostle which has been so much written about. No one other than he who can be a spiritual guide and inspiration to his followers, and whose compositions they claim to be? They suit beyond compare the apostle of the missionary journeys, the tender, eager, indomitable "prisoner of the Lord," and no other. No other than he that has been suggested is more than the mere shadow of a name, and no two writers have had such a yearningly accorded even as to the shadow. The pertinent series of questions with which Godet (Intro to Nt: Studies on the Epp., 305) concludes his remarks on the genuineness may well be restated: "Was the use of the apostle's name in 1 Cor. 10:12 necessary? (2) What was the meaning of the discussion at Ephesus? (3)Was the discipleship of the author of Colossians? What is the evidence for or against? These are the questions that have been raised by the Church and the Church must answer them. At this point, the apostle wrote: "We who are alive at this moment of the Parousia" at a time when every-} church would have received without opposition into its archives, as an ep. of the apostle, half a cent. after his death, a letter unknown till then, and filled with reproaches most severe and humiliating to it?"

One is not surprised, therefore, that even the radical criticism of the 19th cent. cordially accepted the Corinthian epp. as belonging to the first group. 3. Consent to 25 citations in the great group. The men of criticism who founded that criticism were under no conceivable constraint in such a conclusion, save the constraint of obvious and incontrovertible fact. The Tübingen school, with the undeniable authenticity of all the rest of the epp. frankly acknowledged the genuineness of these. This also became the general verdict of the "critical" school which followed that of Tübingen, and which, in many branches, has included the names of the leading German scholars to this day. F. C. Baur's language (Paul, I, 246) was: "There has never been the slightest suspicion of unauthenticity cast on these four epp., and they bear so incontestably the character of Pauline originality, that there is not a word of truth in the assertion of critical doubts in their case." Renan (St. Paul, Intro, V) was equally emphatic: "They are incontestable, and uncontested."

Reference, however, must be made to the ultra-radical attacks of the 19th cent. Indeed, the epp. were adhered to especially among Dutch scholars, during the last 25 years. As early as 1792 Evasion, a retired Eng. clergyman, rejected Rom on the ground that the epp. could not have been written in Rome in Paul's day. Bruno Bauer (1850–51–52) made a more sweeping attack, relegating the whole of the four principal epp. to the close of the 2d cent. His views received little attention, until they were taken up and extended by a series of writers in Holland, Pierson and Nabmer, and Loman, followed rapidly by Steck of Bern, Volter of Amsterdam, and above all by Van Marne of Leyden. According to these writers, with slight modifications of view among themselves, it is very doubtful if Paul or Christ ever really existed; if they did, legend has long since made itself master of their personalities, and in every case what borders on the supernatural is to be taken as the criterion of the epp. The epp. were written in the 1st quarter of the 2d cent., and as Paul, so far as he was known, was believed to be a reformer of anti-Judaeic sympathies, he was chosen as the patron of the movement, and the writings were afterwards published in his name. The great work of the whole series was to further the interests of a supposed circle of clever and elevated men, who, partly imbued with Hebraic ideals, and partly with the speculations of Gt and Alexandrian philosophy, desired the spread of a universalistic Christianity and true Gnosis. For this end they conceived it necessary that Jewish legalism should be neutralized, and that the narrow national element should be expelled from the Messianic idea. Hence the epp. The principles on which the main conceptions of the critics are based may be reduced to two: (1) that there are relations in the epp. so difficult to understand that, since we cannot properly understand them, the epp. are not trustworthy; and (2) that the religious and ecclesiastical development is so great that not merely 20 or 30 years, but 70 or 80 more, are required, if we are to be able rationally to conceive it: to accept the situation at an earlier date is simply to accept what cannot possibly have existed. It is manifest that on such principles it is possible to establish anything, and that any historical lit. might be proved untrustworthy, and reshaped according to the subjunctive ideographs of the critic. The under-ly ing theory of intellectual development is too rigid, and is quite oblivious of the shocks it receives from actual facts, by the advent in history from time to time of those compelling, indigenous, persua sive, who rather mould the age than are molded by it. None have poured greater ridicule on this "pseudo-Kritik" than the representatives of the advanced school in Germany whom it rather expected to carry with it, and against whom it com plains bitterly that they do not take it seriously. On the whole the vagaries of the Dutch school have rather confirmed than shaken belief in these epp.; and one may freely accept Ramsay's view (HDB, I, 484) as expressing the modern mind regarding them, namely, that they are "the unimpeached and unassailable nucleus of admitted Pauline writings."

In the west the original has been very well preserved, and no exegetical difficulties of high importance are presented. (Reference should be made to the Intro in Sanday and Headlam's Romans, ICC[1896], where §7 gives valuable information concerning the text, not only of Rom, but of the Pauline ep. generally; also to the recent ed (Oxford, 1910), NT Graece, by Souter, where the various readings of the text used in RV [1881] are conveniently exhibited.) On the whole the text of 1 Cor flows on consistently, and, 1st at times, in a clear, faultless fashion, with rare back upon itself, and few serious criticisms are made on its unity, although the case is different in this respect with its companion ep. Some writers, on insufficient grounds, believe that 1 Cor contains religious material in 2 Cor. (cf 9 9), e.g. in 7 17-24; 9 1—10 22; 15 1—55.

III. Paul's Previous Relations with Corinth.—When, in the course of his 2d missionary journey, Paul left Athens (Acts 18 11), he sailed

1. Corinth westward to Cenchreae, and entered in 55 AD Corinth "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling" (1 Cor 2 3).

He was doubtless alone, although Silas and Timothy afterward joined him (Acts 18 5; 2 Cor 1 19). The ancient city of Corinth had been utterly laid in ruins when Rome subjugated Greece in the middle of the 2d cent. BC. But in the year 46 BC Caesar had caused it to be rebuilt and colonized in the Roman manner, and during the cent. that had elapsed it had prospered and grown enormously. Its population at this time has been estimated at between 600,000 and 700,000, by far the larger portion of whom were slaves. Its magnificent harbors, Cenchreae and Lechaeum, opening to the commerce of the East and West, were crowded with ships, and its streets with travelers and merchants from almost every country under heaven. Even in that old pagan world the reputation of the city was bad; it has been compared (Baring-Gould, Study of St. Paul, 241) to an amalgam of New York, Chicago and Paris, and probably it contained the worst features of each. At night it was made hideous by the brawls and lewd songs of drunken revelry. In the daytime its markets and squares swarmed with Jewish peddlers, foreign traders, sailors, soldiers, athletes in training, boxers, wrestlers, charioteers, racing-men, betting-men, courtesans, slaves, idlers and parasites of every description. The corrupting worship of Aphrodite, with its hordes of hierodolaos, was dominant, and all over the Gr-Rom world, "to behave as a Corinthian" was a proverbial synonym for leading a low, shameless and immoral life. Very naturally such a polluted and idolatrous environment accounts for much that has to be recorded of the semi-pagan and imperfect life of many of the Corinthians.

Paul was himself the founder of the church in Corinth (1 Cor 3 6 10). Entering the city with anxiety, and yet with almost auda cious hopefulness, he determined to know nothing among its people save the Church Jesus Christ and Him crucified (2 2). Undoubtedly he was conscious that the mission of the Cross here approached its crisis. If it could abide here, it could abide anywhere. At first he addressed himself to the business of his trade, and cultivating the friendship of Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18 2 f); then he opened his campaign in the synagogue where he persuaded both Jews and Greeks, and ultimately, when oppo sition became too great, the Gr-caravanserai Titus Justus, a proselyte. He made deep impressions, and gradually gathered round him a number who were received into the faith (Acts 18 7 8; 1 Cor 1 14 16). The converts were drawn largely but not entirely from the synagogue, (1 26; 7 21); they included Crispus and Sosthenes, rulers of the synagogue, Gaius, and Stephanas with his household, "the firstfruits of Achaia" (16 15). He regarded himself joyfully as the father of this community (4 14 15), every member of which seemed to him like his own child.

IV. Date of the Epistle.—After a sojourn of eighteen months (Acts 18 11) in this fruitful field, Paul departed, most probably in the year 52 (cf Turner, art. "Chron. NT," HDB, I, 422 f), and, having visited his converts (2 Cor 1 1 f), and the Synagogue of Asia (third journey), established himself for a period of between two and three years (tretia, Acts 20 31) in Ephesus (Acts 18 18 onward). It was during his stay there that his ep. was written, though neither the lower portion of the ep. (1 23; Acts 18 21) to which he left, 55; or, if that does not give sufficient interval for a visit and a letter to Corinth, which there is considerable ground for believing intervened between 1 Cor and the departure from Ephesus, then in the spring of the preceding year, 54. This would give ample time for the conjectured events, and there is no insuperable reason against it. Pauline chronology is a subject by itself, but the suggested dates for the departure from Ephesus, and for the writing of 1 Cor, really fluctuate between the years 53 and 57. Harnack (Gesch. der altchrist. Litt., II; Die Chron., 1) and McGiffert (Apost Age) adopt the earlier date; Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 66; Lightfoot (Bib. Essays) and Zahn (Einl.,) 7; Turner (ib supra), 55. Many regard 57 as too late, but Robertson (HDB, I, 485 86) still adheres to it.

V. Occasion of the Epistle.—After Paul's departure from Corinth, events moved rapidly, and it was quite apparent to him that he was quite 1. A Pre-cognizant of them. The distance and it was not great—about eight, days' journey by sea—and in the distance coming and going between the cities news of what was transpiring there would certainly have come to his ears. Members of the household of Chloe are distinctly mentioned (1 11) as having brought tidings of the contents that prevailed, and there were no doubt other informants. Paul was so concerned by what he heard that he sent Timothy and his companion (Apol. 2 1) with his commendations (4 17; 16 10 f.), although the present ep. probably reached Corinth first. He had also felt impelled, in a letter (6 9) which is now lost, to send earnest warning against companying with the immoral. Moreover, after excellent work in Corinth, had come to Ephesus, and was received as a brother by the apostle (3 5.6; 16 12). Equally welcome was a deputation consisting of Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus (16 17), from whom the fullest information could be gained, and who were the probable bearers of a letter from the church of Corinth itself (7 1), appealing for advice and direction on a number of points. This letter has not been preserved, but it was evidently the immediate occasion of our ep., and its tenor is clearly indicated by the nature of the apostle's reply. (The letter, professing to be this letter to Paul, and its contents, having been lost, is now just referred to, which deal with gnostic heresies, and were for long accepted by the Syrian and Armenian churches, are manifestly apocryphal. (Cf. Stanley's Corinthians, Appendix; Harnack's Gesch. der altchrist. Literatur, 1904, p. 140; 298 f.; Zahn, Einl., I, 183-249; Sanday, EB, II, 906-7.) If there be any relic in existence of Paul's previous letter, it is probably to be found in the passage 2 Cor 6 14-7 1; at all events that passage may be regarded as reminiscence of its style and message.) So that 1 Cor. is no bow drawn at a venture. It treats of a fully understood, and, on the whole, of a most unhappy situation. The church had broken into factions, and was distracted by party cries. Some of its members were living open immorally, and discipline was practically in abeyance. Others had quarrels over which they dragged one another into the heathen courts. Great differences of opinion had also arisen with regard to marriage and the social relations generally; with regard to banquets and the eating of food offered to idols; with regard to the behavior of women in the assemblies, to the Lord's Supper and the love-feasts, to the use and value of spiritual gifts, and with regard to the hope of the resurrection of the body. The church was filled with grief and indignation, which the too complacent tone of the Corinthians only intensified. They discussed questions in a lofty, intellectual way, without seeming to perceive their real drift, or the life and spirit which lay imperiled at their heart. Resisting the impulse to visit them "with a rod" (4 21), the apostle wrote the present ep., and dispatched it, if not by the hands of Stephanas and his comrades, most probably by the hands of Titus.

VI. Conclusion. In its general character the ep. is a strenuous writing, masterly in its restraint in dealing with opposition, 1. General firm in its grasp of ethical and spiritual principles, and wise and faithful in application. It is calm, full of reasoning, clear and balanced in judgment; very varied in its lights and shadows, in its kindness, its gravity, its irony. It moves with firm tread among the commonest themes, but also rises easily into the loftiest spheres of thought and vision, breaking again and again into passages of glowing and rhythmical eloquence. It rebukes error, exposes and condemns sin, solves doubts, uphold and encourages faith, and all in a spirit of the utmost tenderness and love, full of grace and truth. It is broad in its outlook, yet penetrating in its insight, enduring in its interest and application.

It is also very orderly in its arrangement, so that it is not difficult to follow the writer as he advances from point to point. Weissäcker (Apos. Age, I, 324-25) suggestsly and diagnostically the matter into (1) subj. Division sects introduced by the letter from Corinth, and (2) those on which Paul had obtained information otherwise. He includes three main topics in the first class; marriage, meat offered to idols and spiritual gifts (there is a fourth—the logia or collection, 16 1); six in the second class: the factions, the case of incest, the lawsuits, the free customs of the women, the abuse connected with the Supper and the denial of the resurrection. It is useful, however, to adhere to the sequence of the ep. In broadly outlining the subject-matter we may make a threefold division: (1) chs 1-6; (2) chs 7-10; and (3) chs 11-end.

(1) Chs 1-6: After salutation, in which he associates Sotheanis with himself, and thanking for the grace given to the Corinthians.

3. Outline (1 1-9), Paul immediately begins (1 10-13) to refer to the internal divisions among them, and to the unworthy and unprofitable self-controlled gifts. The gifts have been formed to the exact significance of the so-called "Christus-party," a party whose danger becomes more obvious in 2 Cor. Cf. Meyer-Heinrici, Comm., 8th ed; Godet, Intro, 250 ff.; Stier, 1 Cor., i, 176-8; Zahn, Einl., II, 890-7. If there be any relic in existence of Paul's previous letter, it is probably to be found in the passage 2 Cor 6 14-7 1; at all events that passage may be regarded as reminiscence of its style and message.) So that 1 Cor. is no bow drawn at a venture. It treats of a fully understood, and, on the whole, of a most unhappy situation. The church had broken into factions, and was distracted by party cries. Some of its members were living open immorally, and discipline was practically in abeyance. Others had quarrels over which they dragged one another into the heathen courts. Great differences of opinion had also arisen with regard to marriage and the social relations generally; with regard to banquets and the eating of food offered to idols; with regard to the behavior of women in the assemblies, to the Lord's Supper and the love-feasts, to the use and value of spiritual gifts, and with regard to the hope of salvation. The church was filled with grief and indignation, which the too complacent tone of the Corinthians only intensified. They discussed questions in a lofty, intellectual way, without seeming to perceive their real drift, or the life and spirit which lay imperiled at their heart. Resisting the impulse to visit them "with a rod" (4 21), the apostle wrote the present ep., and dispatched it, if not by the hands of Stephanas and his comrades, most probably by the hands of Titus. Weissäcker holds that the name indicates exclusive relation to an authority, while Baur and Pfleiderer think that it was a party watch word [virtually Petrine] taken to bring out the apostolic inferiority of Paul. On the other hand a few scholars maintain that the name does not, strictly speaking, indicate a party at all but rather designates those who were disgusted at the display of all party spirit, and with whom Paul was in hearty sympathy. See McGiffert, Apos. Age, 295-97.) After denouncing this petty parochialism, Paul offers an elaborate defence of his own ministry, declaring the power and wisdom of God in the gospel of the Cross (1 14-2 16), returning in ch 3 to the spirit of faction, showing its absurdity and narrowness in face of the fullness of the Christian heritage in "all things" that belong to them as belonging to Christ; and in ch 4 making a touching appeal to his readers as his "beloved children," whom he had begotten through the gospel. In ch 5 he deals with the case of a notorious offender, guilty of incest, whom they unworthily harbor in their midst, and in the name of Christ demands that they should expel him from the church, pointing out at the same time that it is against the countenancing of immorality within the church membership that he specially warns, and had handled as a sect, and had".

In ch 6 deals with the shamefulness of Christian brethren halting another to the heathen courts, and not rather seeking the settlement of their differences within themselves, reverting once more in the closing vs to the subject of unchastity, which irrepressibly haunts him as by his thoughts of them.

(2) Chs 7-10: In ch 7 he begins to reply to two of the matters on which the church had expressly consulted him in his ep., and which are introduced by the phrase peri de, "now concerning." The first of these bears (ch 7) upon celibacy and marriage, including the case of "mixed" marriage. These questions he treats quite frankly, yet with delicacy and tact. It is an easy matter to distinguish between what he has received as the direct word of the Lord, and what he only delivers as his own opinion, the utterance of his own sanctified common-sense, yet to which the good spirit within him gives weight. The second matter on which advice was solicited, questions regarding eidoloth. The men referred to idols, he discusses in ch 8, recurring to it again in ch 10. The system and casuistry involved he handles with excellent wisdom, and lays down a rule for the Christian conscience of a far-reaching kind, happily expressed: "All things are lawful; but not all things are expedient. All things are lawful: but not all things edify. Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's good" (10 23). By lifting their differences into the purer atmosphere of love and duty, he causes them to dissolve away. Ch 9 contains another notable defence of his apostleship, in which he asserts the principle that the Christian ministry has a claim for its support on those to whom it ministers, although in his own case he deliberately waived his right, that no challenge on such a matter should be possible among them. The earlier portion of ch 10 contains a reference to Jewish idolatry and sacramental abuse, in order that the evils that resulted might point a moral, and act as a solemn warning to Christians in relation to their activities.

(3) Chs 11-16: The third section deals with certain errors and defects that had crept into the inner life and observances of the church, also with further matters on which the Corinthians sought guidance, namely, spiritual gifts and the collection for the saints. Ch 11 1-16 has regard to the department of women and their veiling in church, a matter which seems to have occasioned some difficulty, and which Paul deals with in a manner quite his own, prevailing there to treat of graver and more disorderly affairs, gross abuses in the form of gluttony and drunkenness at the Lord's Supper, which leads him, after severe censure, to make his classic reference to that sacred ordinance (vs 20 to end). Ch 12 sets forth the diversity, yet true unity, of spiritual gifts, and the confusion and jealousy to which a false conception of them inevitably leads, obscuring that "most excellent way," the love which transends them all, which never fails. Paul dedicates thereafter to treat of graver and more disorderly abuses, whose pernicious effects he declares in language of surpassing beauty (ch 13). He strives also, in the following chapter, to correct the disorder arising from the abuse of the gift of tongues, many desiring to speak at once, and thus only producing confusion, and which no one could understand, thinking themselves thereby highly gifted. It is not edifying: "I had rather," he declares, "speak five words with my understanding, that I might instruct others also, than ten thousand words in a tongue" (14 19). Thereafter he follows the immortal chapter on the resurrection, which he had learned that some denied (15 12). He anchors the faith to the resurrection of Christ as historic fact, abundantly attested (vs 3-8), shows how all essential to it is to the Christian hope (vs 13-19), and then proceeds by reasoning and analogy to brush aside certain naturalistic objections to the great doctrine, "then they that are Christ's, at his coming" (ver 23), when this mortal shall have put on immortality, and death be swallowed up in victory (ver 54). The closing chapter gives directions as to the collection for the saints in Jerusalem, on which his heart was deeply set, and in which he hoped the Corinthians would bear a worthy share. He promises to visit them, and even take the winter there; for this makes a series of tender personal references, and so brings the great ep. to a close.

VII. Distinguishing Features.—It will be seen that there are passages in the ep. of great doctrinal and historical importance, esp. with reference to the Person of Christ, the Holy Spirit, the Eucharist and the Resurrection; also many that illuminate the nature of the religious meetings and services of the early church (of particularly on these, Weissacker, Apostelalter, II, 246 f.). A lurid light is cast on many of the church's early methods and customs, still clinging to those who were just emerging from paganism, and much allowance has to be made for the Corinthian environment. The thoroughness with which the apostle pursues the difficulties raised into the church and the conclusions he draws therefrom, the scope of matters which he subjects to Christian scrutiny and criterion, are also significant. Manifestly he regarded the gospel as come to fill, not a part, but the whole, of life; to supply principles that follow the believers to their homes, to the most secluded sanctum there, out again to the world, to the market-place, the place of amusement, of temptation, of service, of trial, of worship and prayer; and all in harmony with knowing nothing "save Jesus Christ, and him crucified." For Paul regards that not as a restriction, but as a large and expansive principle. He sets the cross on an eminence so high that its shadow covers the whole activities of human life.

Three broad outstanding features of a practical kind may be recognized. The first is the earnest warning it conveys against a factious spirit as imminental to the Christian life.

1. The Party The Corinthians were imbued with a party spirit the party spirit of the democracy, and were infected also by the sporting spirit of the great games that entered so largely into their existence. They transferred these things to the church. They listened to their teachers with the eagerness of partisans, and even had some parties as partisans who sought occasion either to applaud or to condemn. Paul recognizes that, though they are not dividing on deep things of the faith, they are giving way to "schisms" of a pettier and perhaps even more pernicious kind, that appeal to the lowest elements in human nature, that cause scandal in the eyes of men and inflict grievous wounds on the Body of Christ. In combating this spirit he takes occasion to go below the surface, and to reveal the foundations of true Christian unity. That must simply be "in Christ." And this is true even if the divergence should be on higher and graver things. Any unity in such a case, still possible to cherish, must be a unity in Christ. No unity, otherwise, is worth the name. He who is of Christ is of Him; none severed from the true and catholic faith, who confess with their lips and testify with their lives that He is Lord.

The ep. also renders a high ethical service in the rules it lays down for the guidance of the Christian conscience. In matters where the

2. The Christian Conscience is clearly one of the great imperatives, the conflict need never be protracted. An earnest man will see his way. But beyond these, or not easily reduced to them, there may be issues that cause perplexity and doubt. Questions arise regarding things that do not seem to be wrong in themselves, yet whose abuse or the offence they give to others, may well cause debate. Meat offered to idols, and then brought to table, was a stumbling-block to many Corinthian Christians. They said: "If we eat, it is consenting to idolatry; we dare not partake." But there were some who rose to a higher level. They perceived that every flesh was made for nakedness, and if the body is all, and the meat is not affected by the superstition. Accordingly their higher and more rational view gave them liberty and left their conscience free. But was this really all that they had to consider? Some say: "Certainly!"; and Paul acknowledges that this is undoubtedly the law of individual freedom. But it is not the final answer. There has not entered into it a consideration of the mind of Christ. Christian liberty must be willing to subject itself to the law of love. Granted that a neighbor is often short-sighted and over-scrupulous, and that it would be good neither for him nor for others to suffer him to become a moral dictator; yet we are not quite relieved. The brother may be weak in the very claim of his weakness may be strong. We may not ride over his scruples roughshod. To do so would be to put ourselves wrong even more seriously. And if the matter is one that is manifestly fraught with peril to him, conscience may be roused to say, as the apostle says: “Wherefore, if most maketh my brethren to stumble, I will eat no flesh for evermore.”

A third notable feature of the ep. is its exaltation of the cross of Christ as the power and wisdom of God unto salvation. It was the force that began to move and unscate, to lift and change from its base, the life of that old heathen world. It was neither Paul, nor Apollos, nor Cephas who accomplished that colossal task, but the preaching of the cross of Christ. The preaching of the cross of Christ and of Europe began with the gospel of Calvary and the open tomb. It can never with impunity draw away from these central facts. The river broadens and deepens as it flows, but it is never possible for it to sever itself from the living fountain from which it springs.

LITERATURE

I. TEXT, AUTHENTICITY AND DATE.—Of what has already been said in the preceding art. In the two important 5th-cent. uncials, A (Alex.) 1. Internal and C (Ephraemi), portions of the Evidence text are lacking. As to the genuineness internal evidence very vividly attests it. The elements of Pauline theology and eschatology, expressed in familiar Pauline terms, are manifest throughout. Yet the ep. is not doctrinal or didactic, but an intensely personal document. Its absorbing interest is in events which were profoundly agitating Paul and the Corinthians at the time, straining their relations to the point of rupture, and demanding strong action on Paul’s part. Our imperfect knowledge of the circumstances necessarily hinders a complete comprehension, but the references to these events and to others in the personal history of the apostle are so natural and so manifest a proof of faith, that no doubt rises in the reader’s mind but that he is in the sphere of reality, and that the voice he hears is the voice of the man whose heart and nerves were being torn by the experiences through which he was passing. Scholarly critics may differ as to the continuity and integrity of the text, there is no serious divergence among them in the opinion that all parts of the ep. are genuine writings of the apostle.

External, the testimony of the sub-apocalyptic age, though not so frequent or precise as in the case of 1 Cor, is still sufficiently clear

2. External to establish the existence and use of Evidence the ep. in the 2d cent. Clement of Rome is silent when he might rather have been expected to use the ep. (cf Kennedy, Second and Third Cor, 142 ff.; but it is quoted by Polycarp (Ad Phil., ii.4 and vii.1), and in the Epistle to Diognetus 5 12, while it is amply attested to by other Christian apologists. Tertullian and Clement of Alexander. It was written from Macedonia (probably from Philippi) either in the autumn of the same year as that in which 1 Cor was written, or 54 or 55 A.D., or in the autumn of the succeeding year.

II. Résumé of Events.—Great difficulty exists as to the circumstances in which the ep. was written, and as to the whole situation between 1 and 2 Cor. In 1 Cor Paul had intimated his intention of visiting the Corinthians and wintering with them, coming to them through Macedonia (16 5-7; of also Acts 19 21). In 2 Cor 1 15.16 he refers to a somewhat different plan, Corinth—Macedonia—Corinth—Judaea, and describes this return from Macedonia to Corinth as a second or double visitation. But if this plan, on which he and his friends had counted, had not been entirely carried out, it had been for good reason (1 17), and not due to mere fickleness or light-heartedness; he would have been willing to suit his plan to their convenience. It was because he would “spare” them (1 23), and not come to them “again with sorrow” (2 1). That is, he had been with them, but there had been such a profound disturbance in their relations that he dared not risk another meeting meantime; instead, he had written a letter to probe and test them, “out of much affliction and anguish of heart . . . with many tears” (2 4). Thank God, this severe letter had accomplished its mission. It had produced sorrow among them (2 2; 7 8, 9), but it had brought their hearts back to him with the old allegiance, with great clearing of themselves, and fear and longing and zeal (7 11). There was a period, however, of waiting for knowledge of this issue, which was to him a period of intense anxiety; he had even nervously regretted that he had written as he did (7 5-8). Titus, who had gone as his representative to Corinth, was to return with a report of how this severe letter had been received, and when Titus failed to meet him at Troas (2 13), he had “no relief for his spirit,” but pushed on eagerly to Macedonia to encounter him the sooner. Then came the answer, and the lifting of the intolerable burden from his mind. He that comforteth the lowly, even God, comforteth him (7 6). The Corinthians had been sown by a godly sorrow and repentance (7 8), and the sky had cleared again with almost unhopèd-for brightness. One who had offended (2 5 and 13)—but whose offence is not distinctly specified—had been disciplined by the church; indeed, in the revision of testing against him, and in sympathy for the apostle, he had been punished so heavily that there was a danger of passing to an extreme, and plunging him into despair (2 7). Paul accordingly pleads for leniency and forgiveness, lest further resentment should lead only to a further and deeper wrong (2 6–15). But in situations like this there were others, probably following in his train, who had carried on a relentless attack against the apostle both in his person and in his doctrine. He earnestly defends himself against those contemptuous charges of fleshliness and cowardice (ch 10), and crafty vanity (12. 16, 17). Another Jesus is preached, a different spirit, a different gospel (11 4). They "commend themselves" (10 12), but are false apostles, deceitful workers, ministers of Satan, fashioning themselves into ministers of Christ (11 13, 14). Their attacks are vehemently repelled in an eloquent apologia (chs 11 and 12), and he declares that when he comes the third time they will not be spared (13 2). Titus, accompanied by other well-known brethren, is again to be the representative of the apostle (8 6, 17). At no great interval Paul himself followed, thus making his third visit (12 14; 13 1), and so far fulfilled his original purpose that he spent the winter peacefully in Corinth (cf Acts 20 2, 3; 27). I. III. III. The New Situation.—It is manifest that we are in the presence of a new and unexpected situation, whose development is not clearly defined, and concerning which we have elsewhere no source of information to elucidate. But chief points requiring attention are: (1) The references to the offender in chs 2 and 7, and to the false teachers, particularly in the later chapters of the ep; (2) the painful visit implicitly referred to in 2 1; and (3) the letter as described in written tears and for a time regretted (2 4; 7, 8).

The offender in 1 Cor 5 1–5 had been guilty of incest, and Paul was grieved that the church of Corinth did not regard with horror a crime which even the pagan world would not have tolerated. His judgment on the case was uncompromising and the severest possible—that, in solemn assembly, in the name and with the power of the Lord Jesus, the church should deliver to Satan for the destruction of the flesh. On the other hand, the offender in 2 Cor 2 5 ff is one who obviously has transgressed less heinously, and in a way more personal to the apostle. The church, moreover, is capricious in its action, they induce him to care for him and stood by him (2 9; 13 7), had, by a majority, brought censure to bear on this man, and Paul now urges that matters should go no further, lest an excess of discipline should really end in a triumph of Satan. It is not possible to regard such references as applying to the crime dealt with in 1 Cor. Purposely veiled as the statements are, it would yet appear that a personal attack had been made on the apostle; and the 'many' in Corinth (2 6), having at length pressed his cause, Paul then deals with the matter in the generous spirit he might have been expected to display. Even if the offender were the same person, which is most improbable, for he can scarcely have been retained in the membership, the language is not language that could have been applied to the earlier case. There has been a new offence in new circumstances. The apostle had been grievously wronged in the presence of the church, and the Corinthians had not spontaneously re- sented; the wound had been patented. This was the apostle most deeply, and it is to secure their change in this respect that is his gravest concern.

Esp. in the later chs of 2 Cor there are, as we have seen, descriptions of an opposition by false teachers that is far beyond anything met with in 1 Cor. There indeed we have a spirit of faction, associated with unworthy partiality toward individual preachers, but nothing to lead us to suspect the presence of deep and radical differences undermining the gospel. The general consensus of opinion is that this opposition was of a Judaizing type, organized and fostered by imparable-False Pauline emissaries from Pal, who now followed the track of the apostle in Galatia as they did in Galatia. As they arrogated to themselves a peculiar relation to Christ Himself ("Christ's men") and "ministers of Christ," 10 7; 11 13, it is possible that the Christus-party of 1 Cor (and possibly the Cephas-party) may have persisted and formed the nucleus round which their new-comers built up their formidable opposition. One man seems to have been conspicuous as their ring-leader (10 7.11), and to have made himself specially obnoxious to the apostle. In all probability we may take it that he was the object of Paul's appeal to the Galatians. Under his influence the opposition audaciously endeavored to destroy the gospel of grace by personal attacks upon its most distinguished exponent. Paul was denounced as an upstart and self-seeker, as the induct of apostolic authority. He was held up, for the contemptible appearance he made in person, in contrast with the swelling words and presumptuous claims of his ep. It is clear, therefore, that a profound religious crisis had arisen among the Corinthians, one that was of great and lasting importance. The apostle's mission was far more urgent than ever. He could not afford to delay, and so the second visit (12 14; 13 12) speak of a third visit in immediate prospect, and the latter passage also refers to a second visit that had been already accomplished; while 2 1 distinctly implies that no further visit would be a place of a character so painful that the apostle would never venture to endure a similar one. As this cannot possibly refer to the first visit when the church was founded, and cannot easily be regarded as indicating anything previous to 1 Cor which never alludes to such an experience, we must conclude that the reference points to the interval between 1 and 2 Cor. It was an interval of some months, to judge from the expression "with sorrow," which humbled him (12 21) and left such deep wounds, had actually taken place. "Any exegesis," says Weissheissler justly, "that would avoid the conclusion that Paul had already been twice in Corinth before 2 Cor. was unable to do so" (Apostel, 345). Sabatier (Apolo Paul, 172 n.) records his revised opinion: "The reference here (2 1) is to a second and quite recent visit, of which he retained a very sorrowful recollection, including it among the most bitter trials of his apostolic career."

Paul not only speaks of a visit which had ended grievously, but also of a letter which he had written to deal with the painful circumstances, and as a kind of ultimatum to bring the whole matter to an issue (2 4; 7 8). This letter was written because he could not trust himself meantime to another visit. He was so distressed and agitated that he wrote it "with many tears": after it was written he repented of it; and until he knew its effect he endured torture so keen that he hastened to Macedonia to meet his messenger, Titus, half-way. It is impossible by any stretch of interpretation to refer this language to 1 Cor, which on the whole is dominated by a spirit of didactic calm, and by a consideration of the gravity accorded it by its recipients. Even though there be in occasional indications of strong feeling, there is certainly nothing that we can conceive the apostle might have wished to recall. The alternative has generally been to regard this as another case of a lost ep. Just as the writer of Acts appears to have been willing that the deplorable visit itself should drop into oblivion, so doubtless neither Paul nor the Corinthians would be very anxious to preserve an ep. which contains the norms of such a visit. On the other hand a strong tendency has set in to regard this intermediate ep. as at least in part preserved in 2 Cor 10–13, whose tone, it is universally admitted, differs from that of the preceding chapters in a remarkable way, not easily accounted for. The majority of recent writers seem inclined to favor this view, which will naturally fall to be considered under the head of "Integrity."

IV. Historical Reconstruction.—In view of such an interpretation, we may with considerable probability trace the course of events between 1 and 2 Cor as follows: After the dispatch of 1 Cor, news reached the apostle of a disquieting character; probably both Titus and Timothy, on returning from Corinth, reported the growing discontent of the Judaizing party. Paul felt impelled to pay an immediate visit, and found only too sadly that matters had not been overstated. The opposition was strong and full of effrontery, and the whole trend of things was against him. In face of the congregation he was baffled and flouted. He returned to Ephesus, and poured out his indignation in a severe ep., which he sent on by the hands of Titus. Before Titus could return, events took a disastrous turn. Paul and Titus were forced to leave that city in peril of his life. He went to Troas, but, unable to wait patiently there for tidings of the issue in Corinth, he crossed to Macedonia, and made Titus post haste to him. In the meantime the report of his arrival was having a powerful effect; the majority of the congregation returned to their old attachment, and the heavy cloud of doubt and anxiety was dispelled from the apostle's mind. He then wrote—perhaps the second ep. as forwarded to the Corinthians by Titus and other brethren, he himself following a little later, and finally wintering in Corinth as he had originally planned. If it be felt that the interval between spring and autumn of the same year is too brief for the events which are here to be separated by a period of nearly 18 months, 1 Cor being referred to the spring of 54 or 55, and 2 Cor to the autumn of 55 or 56 AD. (Reference on the reconstruction should esp. be made to Weizsäcker's Apostolic Age, Eng. tr. 1; to Schmiedel, Note to the Eng. ed [1865] of Paul Apostle, and to Robertson's art. in HDB.

V. Integrity of the Epistle.—Although the genuineness of the various parts of the ep. is scarcely disputed, the homogeneity is much debated. Semler and some later writers, including Clemen (Einheitlichkeit), have thought that ch 9 should be eliminated as logically inconsistent with ch 8, and as evidently forming part of a letter to the converts of Asia. But the connection with ch 8 is too close to permit of severance, and the logical objection, founded on the phraseology of 9:1, is generally regarded as hypercritical. There are two sections, however, whose right to remain integral parts of 2 Cor has been more forcibly challenged.

The passage 6:14 to 7:1 deals with the inconsistency and peril of intimate relations with the heathen, and is felt to be incongruous with the context. No doubt some stress was laid on an unwillingness on the part of the Corinthians to show the apostle the same frankness and kindness that he is showing them; whereas 7:2 follows naturally and links itself closely to such an appeal. When we remember that the particular theme of the lost letter referred to in 1 Cor 5:9 was the relation of the converts to the immoral, it is by no means unlikely that we have here preserved a stray fragment of that ep.

It is universally acknowledged that there is a remarkable change in the tone of the section 10–13, and which immediately follows the

2. Ch 10: previous chs.

In the earlier chs there 1–11:10 is relief at the change which Titus has reported as having taken place in Corinth, and the spirit is one of gladness and content; but from ch 10 onward the hostile attitude of the apostle is unexpectedly represented as still raging, and as demanding the most strenuous treatment. The opening phrase, "Now I Paul" (10:1), is regarded as indicating a distinctive break from the previous section with which Timothy is associated (11:1), while the concluding vs. 13:11 to end, seem fittingly to close that section, but to be abruptly cut out of harmony with the polemic that ends at 13:10. Accordingly it is suggested that 13:11 should immediately follow 10:15 and that 10:1–13:10 be regarded as a lengthy insertion from some other ep. Those who, while acknowledging the change of tone, yet maintain the integrity of the ep., do so on the ground that the apostle was a man of many moods, and that it is possible for him to make unexpected and even violent transitions; that new reports of a merely scotched antagonism may come in to ruffle and disturb his comparative contentment; and that in any case he might well desire to admonish finally to deliver his whole soul on a matter over which he had brooded and suffered deeply, so that there might be none mistake about the ground being cleared when he arrived in person.

The question is still a subject of keen discussion, and is not one on which it is easy to pronounce dogmatically. On the whole, however, it must be acknowledged that the preponderance of recent opinion is in favor of the theory of interpolation. Hausrath (Der Vier-Capitel-Brief des Paulus an die Korinther, 1870) gave an immense impetus to the view that this later section really represents the painful letter referred to in chs 2 and 7. As that earlier letter, however, must have contained references to the personal offender, the present section, which gives all such references, can be regarded as at most only a part of it. This theory is ably and minutely expounded by Schmiedel (Hand-Kommentar); and Pfeiferer, Lipsius, Clemen, Krenkel, von Boden, McGiffert, Cone, Flummer, Kendall, Moulton, Aderet, Waardenburg, and others, are prominent among its adherents. J. H. Kennedy (Second and Third Cor) presents perhaps the ablest and fullest argument for it that has yet appeared in English. On the other hand Sondak (EB) declares against it, and Robinson (HDB) regards it as decidedly not proven; while critics of such weight as Holtzmann, Beyerbach, Klöpper, Weiszäcker, Sabatier, Godet, Bernard, Denney, Weiss, and Zahn are all to be reckoned as advocates of the integrity of the ep.

VI. Contents of the Epistle.—The order of matter in the ep. is quite clearly defined. There are three main divisions: (1) chs 1–7; (2) chs 8–9; and (3) chs 10–13.

The first seven chapters as a whole are taken up with a retrospect of the events that have recently transpired, joyful references to the

1. Chs 1–7 fact that the clouds of grief in connection with them have been dispelled, and that the apostolic ministry as a Divine trust and power is clearly manifested. Paul accordingly concludes with an address to the Corinthians, indicating in which Timothy is associated, Paul starts at once to express his profound gratitude to God for the great comfort that had come to him by the good news from Corinth, rejoicing in it as a spiritual enrichment that will make his ministry still more fruitful to the church (1 3–11). He professes his sincerity in all his relations with the Corinthians, and particularly vindicates it in connection with a change in the plan which had originally promised a return ("a second benefit") to Corinth; his sole reason for refraining, and for writing a plain letter instead, being his desire to spare them and to prove them (1 12; 2 4.9). Far from harboring any resentment against the man who had caused so much trouble, he sincerely pleads that his punishment by the majority should go further, but that for their sakes he would now resign, lest the Adversary should gain an advantage over them (2 5–11). It was indeed an agonizing experience until the moment he met Titus, but the relief was all the sweeter and more triumphant when God at length gave it, as he might have been sure he would give it to a faithful and soul-winning servant of Christ (2 12–17). He does not indeed wish to enter upon any further apologies or self-commendation. Some believe greatly in letters of commendation, but his living testimonial is in his converts. This he has, not of himself, but entirely through God, who alone has made him an efficient minister of the new and abiding covenant of the Spirit, whose glory naturally excels that of the flesh and duration which fades and cannot bring life. Regarding this glorious ministry he must be bold and frank. It needs no veil as if to conceal its evanescence. Christ presents it unveiled to all who turn to Him, and they themselves reflect His glory. God's grace, as ever, is formed (3 1–18). As for those who by God's mercy have received such a gospel ministry, it is impossible for them to be faint-hearted in its exercise, although the eyes of some may be blinded to it because the god of this world has blinded them (4 4). It is indeed a wonderful thing that ministers of this grace should be creatures so frail, so subject to pressure and affliction, but it is not inexplicable. So much the more obvious is it that all the power and glory of salvation are from God alone (4 7,15). Yes, even if one be called to die in this ministry, that is but another light and momentary affliction. It is but passing from a frail earthily tent to abide forever in a heavenly home (5 1). Who would not long for it, though it be in a vessel of humiliation? Courage, therefore, is ours to the end, for that end only means the cessation of our separation from Christ, whom it is a joy to serve absent or present. And present we shall all ultimately be before Him on the day of judgment (6). That truth unpersuadeably deepens the earnestness with which preachers of the gospel seek to persuade men. It is the love of Christ constraining them (6 14) in the ministry of reconciliation, that they should entreat men as ambassadors on Christ's behalf (6 20). So sacred and responsible a trust has subduced the apostle's own life, and is indeed the key to its manifold endurance, and to the earnestness with which he has striven to cultivate every grace, and to submit himself to every discipline (6 1–10). Would God the Corinthians might open their hearts to him as he does to them? (Let them have no fellowship with iniquity, but perfect holiness in the fear of God [6 14–7 1].) He has never wronged them; they are enshrined in his heart, living or dying; he glorifies in them, and is filled with comfort in all his affliction (6 11–13; 7 2–4). For what blessed comfort that was that Titus brought him in Macedonia to dispel his fears, and to show that the things he regretted and grieved were not all, but had rather wrougth in them the joyful change for which he longed! Now both they and he knew how dear he was to them. Titus, too, was overjoyed by the magnanimity of their reception of him. The apostle's cup is full, and "in everything he is of good courage concerning them" (7 16).

In the second section, chs 8–9, the apostle, now abundantly confident of their good-will, exords the Corinthians on the subject of the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem. He tells them of the extraordinary liberality of the Macedonian churches, and invites them to emulate it, and by the display of this additional grace to make full proof of their love (8 1–8). Nay, they have a higher incentive than the liberality of Macedonia, even the self-sacrifice of Christ Himself (8 9). Wherefore let them go on with the good work they were so ready to initiate a year ago, giving out of a willing mind, as God hath enabled them (8 10–15). Further to encourage them he sends on Titus and other well-known and accredited brethren, whose interest in them is as great as his own, and he is hopeful that by their aid the matter will be completed, and all will rejoice when he comes, bringing with him probably some of those of Macedonia, to whom he has already been boasting of their zeal (8 16–9 5). Above all, let them remember that important issues are bound up with this grace of Christian liberality. It is impossible to reap bountifully, if we sow sparingly. Grudging them these profits because it really is good, but God loveth and rewardeth a cheerful giver. This grace blesseth him that gives and him that takes. Many great ends are served by it. The wants of the needy are supplied, men's hearts are drawn after that which is good, and virtuous dispositions abound, and God himself is glorified (9 6–15).

The third section, chs 10–13, as has been pointed out, is a spirited and even passionate polemic, in the course of which the Judaizing party is denounced. It is divided into two parts:

3. Chs 10–12—paul lesions and concl. The enemies of the apostle have charged him with being very bold and courageous when he is absent, but humble enough when he is present. He hopes the Corinthians will not compel him to show his courage (10 2). It is true, being human, he walks in the flesh, but not in the selfish and cowardly way his opponents suggest. The weapons of his warfare are not carnal, yet are they mighty before God to cast down strongholds and to refute sophistry and ungodliness. Any boast of being "Christ's," but that is no monopoly; he also is Christ's. They think his letters are mere "sound and fury, signifying nothing," but by and by they will discover their mistake. If we have been justified through faith, as he is justified, for Christ was verily part of his God-appointed province, and he at least did not there enter on other men's labors. But it would be well if men who gloried confined themselves to glorying "in the Lord." For after all it is His commendation alone that is of any permanent value (10 3–18). Will the Corinthians bear with him in a little of this foolish boasting? Truly he ventures on it out of concern for them (11 2). And as they are manifestly too exacting, too quick to take offense, let patience toward those who have come with a different gospel, they may perhaps extend some of their indulgence to him, for though he cannot lay claim to a polished oratory comparable to that of these "super-eminent" apostles, yet at least he is not behind them in knowledge (11 4–6). Can it be that he really sinned in preaching the gospel to them without fee or reward? Was it a mark of finely spending when he resolved not to be burdened to them, while he accepted supplies from Macedonia? But it is not that he did not love them, but because he decided to give no occasion to those who were too ready to blame him—those false apostles, who, like Satan himself, masqueraded as angels of light and ministers of righteousness (11 7–15). Come, then, let him to this glorying, this poor folly, which they in their superlative wisdom bear with so gladly in the case of those insolent creatures who now bully and degrade them (11 16–21). Hebrews! Israelites! So is he that so justifies those of the world in labors, in perils, in persecutions; in burdens, anxieties, sympathies; in visions and revelations of the Lord; in infirmities and weaknesses that have made more manifest in him the strength of Christ (11 22–12 10). Certainly all this is folly, but they are most to blame for it who, through lack of loyalty, have forced him to it. Did he injure them by declining to be burdensome? Is it so sore a point? Let it be forgiven! Yet when he comes again he will take no other course (12 11–18). They must not imagine that in all this he is excusing himself to them. He is sincerely and affectionately concerning himself for their edifying. He trembles lest when they meet again they should be disappointed in each other; lest they should be found in unworthy strife and tumults, and lest he should be humbled of God before them, having cause to mourn over some who are hardened and impetuous in their sins (12 19–21). For they must meet again—he is coming for the third time—and this time he will not spare. Let them prove themselves whether they be in the faith; for surely they must know whether Christ be in them. He earnestly prays for their goodness and honor; not to the end that no display of his power may be called for, but simply that he will be glad to appear weak if they should appear strong. Could they but believe it, their perfecting is the aim of all his labors (13 1–10). And so, with words of grace and tenderness, exhorting them to unity and peace, and pronouncing over them the threefold benediction, he bids them farewell (13 11–14).

VII. Value of the Epistle.—The chief element of value in this ep. is the revelation it gives of the apostle himself. Through all its changing moods, Paul, in perfect abandon, shows us his very soul, suffering, rejoicing, enduring, overcoming. It has been truly said that "it enables us, as it were, to lay our hands upon his breast, and feel the very throbings of his heart." (1) In relation to his conversion he shows us how he was, how easy it was to touch him on the quick, and to wound his feelings. The apostle was very human, and nowhere are his kindred limitations more obvious than in these present incidents. He would probably not be the first to say that even with him the creed was greater than the life. In the hastily written and nervously repented passages of that severe ep.; in the restless wandering, like a perturbed spirit, from Troas to Macedonia, to meet the news and know the issue of his acts, we see a man most lovable indeed, most like ourselves when issues hang in the balance, but a man not already perfect, not yet risen to the measure of the stature of the Lord. Yet we see also the intensity with which Paul labored in his ministry—the tenacity with which he held to his mission, and the invincible courage with which he returned to the fight for his imperiled church. He loved those converts as only a great soul in Christ could love them. His keenest sorrow came in the disaster that threatened them, and he flew to their defence. He had not only won them for Christ, he was willing to die that he might keep them for Christ. (2) The ep. is charged with a magnificent consciousness on the apostle's part of his high calling in Christ Jesus. He has been called with a Divine calling to the most glorious work in which a man can engage, to be to this estranged earth an ambassador of heaven. Received as Divine, this vocation is accepted with supreme devotion. It has been a ministry of sorrow, of strain and suffering, of hair-breadth escapes with the bare life; with its horn in the flesh, its buffeting of Satan. Yet through it all there rings the note of abounding consolation in Christ Jesus, and never was the "power of Christ, resting on frail humanity, more signally manifested.

LITERATURE.—See the references to both epp. and to 2 Cor alone. Under this heading in the preceding art. To the last three given should be added Moffatt's Introduction to the Literature of the N.T., 1911; valuable for its critical presentation of recent views, and for its references to the literature.

R. DYEES SAW

CORMANTHUS, kōr'min-thus: Lat form for Gr Kormithos in the subscription to Rom (AV). See CORINTH.

CORMORANT, kōr'mō-rant (κορμοράντ, skālākh; καταρδκτης, katardkēs; Lat Corus marinus): A large sea-fowl belonging to the genus Phalacrocorax and well described by the Heb word used to designate it—which means a "plunging bird." The bird appears as large as a goose when in full feather, but plucked, the body is much smaller. The adult birds are glossy blue and bronze tinted, with white on the cheeks and sides as a festal dress at mating season, and adorned with filamentary feathers on the head, and bright yellow gape. These birds if taken young and carefully trained can be sent into boxes and bring to their masters large quantities of good-sized fish: commonly so used in China. The flesh is dark, tough and quite unfit to eat in the elders on account of their diet of fish. The nest is built mostly of seaweed. The eggs are small for the size of the birds, having a rough, thick, but rather soft shell of a bluish white which soon becomes soiled, as well as the nest and its immediate surroundings, from the habits of the birds. The young are leathery black, then gorged with soft down of brownish black above and white beneath and taking on the full black of the grown bird at about three years. If taken in the squab state the young are said to be delicious food, resembling baked hare in flavor. The old birds are mentioned among the abominations for food (Lev 11 13–19; Dt 14 12–18). GENE STRATTON-PORTER

CORN, kōrn (κόνις, dāgān; oríos, šūos): A word used for cereals generally (Gen 27 28.37, etc., AV) much as our Eng. word "corn." ARV almost invariably substitutes "grain" for "corn." The latter may be taken to include (1) barley, (2) wheat, (3) fitches (vetches), (4) lentils, (5) beans, (6) millet, (7) ry—-the wrong tr for vetches, (8) pulse—for all these see separate articles. Rye and oats are not cultivated in Pal. For many references to corn see AGRICULTURE; Food. "A corn [kēkōs, kókkos, RV 'grain'] of wheat" is mentioned (Jn 12 24).
CORNELIUS, kor-nê-lûs (Korêhlios, Korêlios, "of a horn"): The story of Cornelius is given in Acts 10:1-11:18. The name is
1. His Rom and belonged to distinguished Family and families in the imperial city, such as Station the Bene and Benjaminites. Thus he was probably an Italian of Rom blood.

Julian the Apostate reckons him as one of the few persons of distinction who became a Christian. He was evidently a man of importance in Caesarea and well known to the Jews (Acts 10:22). He was a centurion in the Italian cohort. To understand this we must note that the Rom army was divided into two broad divisions, the legions and the auxiliary forces. See Army, Roman.

Legions were never permanently quartered in Pal until the great war which ended in the destruction of Jeras, 70 AD. From the year 6 AD, when Pal was made into a province of the Roman empire, it was garrisoned by auxiliary troops recruited amongst the Samaritans and Syrian Greeks. The headquarters were naturally at Caesarea, the residence of the procurator. But it would not have been prudent for a garrison in Pal to be composed wholly of troops locally recruited. Therefore the Rom governors mingled with the garrison 600 soldiers, free Italian volunteers. With this cohort Cornelius was a centurion.

He is described as devout and God-fearing, i.e. at least, one of those men so numerous in that effete age of decadent heathenism who, discontented with polytheism, yearned for a better faith, embraced, therefore, the monotheism of the Jews, and read the Scriptures, and practised more or less of the Jewish rites. He was well reported of by the Jews, and his religion showed itself in prayer at the regular hours, and in aims to the people (of Israel). Even Jewish bigotry was not strong enough to prevent such a one from being a Christian. Moreover, he seems to have made his house a sort of church, for his kinsfolk and friends were in sympathy with him, and among the soldiers who closely attended him were some devout ones (Acts 10:27).

The story of his conversion and admission into the Christian church is told with some minuteness in Acts 10. Nothing further is known of Cornelius, though one tradition assigns him to the Christians of Caesarea, and that he became the bishop of Scythopolis.

The exact importance of the incident depends upon the position of Cornelius before it occurred. Certainly he was not a proselyte of the church, or a member of the Jewish communion. A proselyte is described in Acts 15:9, as a convert, a person who was brought into the Christian church by the agency of men who were converts of the church.

2. His Ad- of Cornelius, though one tradition Ad- mission into sertis that he founded the church in the Christian community, and that he became the bishop of Scythopolis.

The exact importance of the incident depends upon the position of Cornelius before it occurred. Certainly he was not a proselyte of the church, or a member of the Jewish communion. A proselyte is described in Acts 15:9, as a convert, a person who was brought into the Christian church by the agency of men who were converts of the church.

4. Signifi- Of the church. The significance of the incident consists in this, that, under Divine direction, the first Gentile, not at all belonging to the old theocracy, becomes a Spirit-filled Christian, entering through the front door of the Christian church without first going through the narrow gate of Judaism. The incident settled forever the great, fundamental question as to the relations of Jew and Gentile in the church. The difficulties in the way of the complete triumph of Peter’s view of the equality of Jews and Gentiles in the Kingdom of Christ were enormous. It would have been indeed little short of miraculous if the multitude of Christian Pharsees had not raised the question again and again. Did they not dog Paul’s steps after the Council? Certainly Ramsay is wrong in saying that the case of Cornelius was passed over or condoned as exceptional, for it was used as a precedent by both Peter and James (Acts 15:7-14).

As for Peter’s subsequent conduct at Antioch, no one who knows Peter need be surprised at it. The very accusation that Paul hurled at him was that for the moment he was carried into inconsistency with his principles (hupokeireis). Of course, this incident of Cornelius was only the first step in a long development; but the rest of that settled. The rest in due time and proper order was sure to follow. By this tremendous innovation it was settled that Christianity was to be freed from the swaddling bands of Judaism and that the Christian church was not to be an appendage to the synagogue. The noble character of Cornelius was just fitted to abate, as far as possible, the prejudices of the Jewish Christians against what must have seemed to them a dangerous, if not awful, innovation.

CORNER, kôr’ner (Gr. kôrner, miskê, maskê, μήκος, pê’dh, πεδίον, πηνάθι, ἄρχη, αρχ政务, γωνία, ἀκρωγονία, ἀκρωγονιόν): In Ex 26:24; Ezek 41:22; 46:21,22, miskê, "angle" is tr. "corner", pê’dh, "side," "quarter," and pînâth, "corner," "front," "chief," are more frequently so tr., e.g. Ex 26:26; Lev 19:9; Jer 9:26; 25:23; and Ex 27:2; 1 K 7:34; Ps 118:22; Isa 26:16 ("cornerstone"); Jer 61:26.

Other words are kôrph ("wing and head") (Isa 46:22; Ezek 7:2); kathêph ("shoulder") (2 K 11:11 AV bia); pa’a’am, "foot" (Ex 55:12 AV); zdô’yôth, "corner-stones" (Ps 144:12; Zec 9:15 [tr. "corners"]).

For "corner" RV has "side" (Ex 36:26), "corner-stone" (Zec 10:4), also for "stays" (Isa 19:13). Instead of "teacher removed into a corner" (Isa 30:20), "be hidden," "hide themselves"; for "corners" we have "feet" (Ex 26:12; 1 K 7:30); "rib" (Ex 30:4; 37:27); for "divide into corners" (Neh 9:25), "allot after their portions"; for "into corners" (Dt 32:26), "afar"; the words to Israel (Isa 41:9) "called thee from the chief men [אכ>[תים] thereof" are rendered by RV "called thee from the corners thereof" (of the earth).

In the NT we have gônâ ("angle," "corner"); in the corners of the streets (Mt 6:5), the head of the corner (21:42), the four corners of the earth (Rev 7:1; 20:8); archê ("a beginning") (Acts 10:11; 11:5); chief corner stone" (Eph 2:20; 1 Pet 2:6), is a tr. of ἀκρωγονία ("at the extreme angle").

CORNER GATE, kôr’ner gât. See Jerusalem.

CORNERS OF THE EARTH. See Earth, Corners of.

CORNER-STONE, kôr’ner stôn (γωνία, πηνάθι, γωνία, στάθη; ἀκρωγονία, ἀκρωγονία) Part of the public or imposing buildings to which importance has been attached in all ages and in many nations, both on account of its actual service and its figurative meaning. Ordinarily its use in the Bible is figurative, or symbolical. No doubt the original meaning has some importance, as is shown by the use of the stone, which was laid at the foundation of a building.

(1) With the Canaanites, who preceded Israel in the possession of Pal., corner-stone laying seems to have been a most sacred and impressive ceremonial. Under this important stone of temples, or other great structures, bodies of children or older persons would be laid, consecrating the building by such human sacrifice (see Fortification, II, 1). This was one of many hideous rites and practices which Israel was to extirpate. It may throw light on the curse pronounced upon the rebuilding of Jericho (Josh 6:26; see PeFS, January, 1904, July, 1908). See Canaan.

(2) OT references. — The Heb word pīmnāh, "corner," is found or implied in every occurrence of this idea. Derived from a root signifying "to turn," the word signifies "turning," and therefore "edge" or "corner." Ordinarily it is used with ḫēben, "stone" (Ps 118:22); or it may occur alone, having acquired for itself through frequent use the whole technical phraseology (see 10:4 AV). While all the structures indicate the stone, or cornerstone, there appear to be two conceptions: (a) the foundation-stone upon which the structure rested (Job 38:6; Isa 28:16; Jer 51:26); or (b) the topmost or chief stone, which linked the last two together (Ps 118:22; Zec 4:7); in both cases it is an important or key-stone, and figurative of the Messiah, who is "the First and the Last." In Job 38:6 it beautifully expresses in figures the stability of the earth, which Jehovah created. In Zec 10:4 the leader or ruler in the Messianic age is represented by the corner-stone. The ancient tradition of the one missing stone, when the temple was in building, is reflected in or has been suggested by Ps 118:22 (Midr quoted by Pusey under Zec 4:7).

It is probable that we should read in Ps 144:12 not "corner-stones," but "corner-pillars," or supports (cf Gr Caryatides) from a different Heb word, ṣabāḥ. See also House.

(3) NT passages. — Ps 118:22 is quoted and interpreted as fulfilled in Jesus Christ in a number of passages: Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17; Acts 4:11 and 1 Pet 2:7; it is also the evident base of the passages: Isa 28:16 and Amos 9:11, quoted twice in the NT; Rom 9:33, from LXX combined with the words of Isa 8:14, and in 1 Pet 2:6, which is quoted with some variation from LXX. The OT passages were understood by the rabbis to be Messianic, and were properly so applied by the NT writers. See also House.

CORNET, kör'net, kor'net. See Music.

CORNFLOOR, kör'flor (קְפֵר הָאָרֶן, gōren dagḏāhān): "Thou hast loved a reward upon every cornfloor" (Hos 2:14 AV, "chire upon every grainfloor"). Israel had deserted Jeh for supposed material benefits and regarded bounteous crops as the gift of the heathen gods which they worshipped. Jeh would therefore cause the corn (grain) and wine to fail (ver 2). See also Threshing-Floor.

CORONATION, kor-ō-nā'shən (προτοκλισία, protoklisia): Occurs in 2 Mac 4:21 (AV, RV "enthronement") where Apollonius was sent into Egypt for the coronation of Ptolemy Philometor as king. The Gr word protoklīsia occurs nowhere else, and its meaning is uncertain. The reading in Swete is protoklīsia, and this means "the first call.

CORPSE, körp's: This word in the AV is the tr of two Heb words, 'ṣāh, pegher, and הָרֶע, ṣā'āh, while הָרָע, nōketōth, and הָרָע, gāpēah, which mean the same, are tr "body," with which the Eng. word "corpse" (Lat corpus) was originally synonymous. Therefore we find the noun apparently unnecessary added to the adj., "dead" in 2 K 18:35 and Isa 26:19. The Gr equivalent is πτώμα, pōtoma, lit. "a fallen body," "a ruin" (from πιέσσω, πιέτω, "to fall"), in Mk 6:29; Rev 11:8.

Corpses were considered as unclean and defiling in the OT, so that priests were not to touch dead bodies except those of near kin, and in the Old Testament the high priest and a Nazirite not even such (Lev 21:11; Nu 6:6-8). Nu 19 presents us the ceremonial of purification from such defilement by the sprinkling with the ashes of a red heifer, cedar wood, hyssop and scarlet.

It was considered a great calamity and disgrace to have one's body left unburied, "a food unto all birds of the heavens, and unto the beasts of the earth" (Dt 28:26; 2 S 21:10; Ps 79:2; Isa 34:5; Jer 7:33). Herein hence is explained the burnt of Rizpah (2 S 21:10), and of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who protected or recovered and buried the mutilated bodies of Saul and his sons (1 S 31:11-13; 2 S 2:4-7; cf 1 Ch 10:11-12). See Burial.

Even the corpses of persons executed by hanging were not to remain on the tree "all night," "for he that is hanged is accursed of God; that thou defile not thy land which Jeh thy God giveth thee for an inheritance" (Dt 21:23). H. L. E. Loring

CORRECTION, ko-rek'šən (םיקסר, māqėr, usually rendered "instruction," is trd "correction" in several passages): The vb. from which the noun is derived signifies "to instruct" or "chastise." The idea of chastisement was very closely connected in the Heb mind with that of pedagogy. See Chastisement. RV and ARV have changed "correction" of AV to "instruction" in Jer 7:28, reversing the order in the margins. בּטֵש, sōbēthel, rendered "rod" in Job 21:9, is unnecessarily changed to "correction" in 27:13. In 2 Tim 3:16, ἐκκόπους, ἐπαναθήνεις, is trd "correction." The difference between correction, discipline and instruction was not clearly drawn in the Heb mind.

CORRUPTION, ko-ru̇p'shən: The Heb נטוע, mishbeth, נטוע, ṣhēbēth, נטוע, masbēth, and their Gr equivalents, θησπόσ, phthoros, and διασπόσ, diazphoros, with numerous derivatives and cognate vbs., imply primarily physical degeneration and decay (Job 17:14; Acts 2:27, etc.). The term נטוע, shābah, which AV translates with "corruption" in Job 2:6, ought to be rendered "pit," as in The 1909; 36 7 et passim, while shābah bêt in Isa 33:17 means the "pit of nothingness," i.e. of destruction.

Figurative: At an early time we find the above-mentioned words in a non-literal sense denoting moral depravity and corruption (Gen 6:11; Ex 32:7; Hos 9:9; Gal 6:8, etc.), which ends in utter moral ruin and hopelessness, the second death. The question has been raised whether the meaning of these words might be extended so as to include the idea of final destruction and annihilation of the spirit. Upon such a mental examination, however, this question must be denied both from the standpoint of the OT and of the NT. Apart from other considerations we see this from the metaphor used in the Scriptures to illustrate the condition of "corruption," such as the "unquenchable fire," the "worm" which "dieth not" (Mk 9:43-48; cf Isa 56 24), and “sleep” (Dnl 12 2), where a careful distinction is made between the blissful state after death of the righteous and the everlasting disgrace of the godless. The later Jewish theology is also fully agreed on this point. The meaning of the words cannot therefore extend beyond the idea of utter moral degradation and depoperty.

CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF (Κατά τον Χορὸν τοῦ Κατακόρου, har ha-mashḥāth; τό δρος τοῦ Μοσαδ, τό δρος τοῦ Μουαθ): The hill on the right hand of which Solomon built high places for Ashtoreth, Chemosh and Molech (2 K 23 13). The mountain referred to is no doubt the Mount of Olives. The high places would, therefore, be on the southern height called in later Christian writings the “Mount of Offence,” and now, by the Arabs, Bāṭen el-Hawā. Har ha-mashḥāth is probably only a perversion of har ha-mishḥāth, “Mount of Anointing,” a later name of the Mount of Olives.

COS, κός (Kos, Kös, “summit”): AV Coos: An island off the coast of Caria, Asia Minor, one of the Sporades, mountainous in the southern half, with ridges extending to a height of 2,500 ft.; identified with the modern Stanchio. It was famous in antiquity for excellent wine, amphorae, wheat, ointments, silk and other clothing (Coae vates). The capital was also called Kos, and possessed a famous hospital and medical school, and was the birthplace of Hippocrates (the father of medicine), of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and of the celebrated painter Apelles. The large plane tree in the center of the town (3,000 years old) is called “the tree of Hippocrates” to this day. The older capital, Astypalaea, was in the western part of the island, the later (since 366 BC) in the eastern part. From almost every point can be seen beautiful landscapes and picturesque views of sea and land and mountain.

Cos was one of the six Dorian colonies. It soon became a flourishing place of commerce and industry; later, like Corinth, it was one of the Jewish centers of the Aegean, as well as one of the financial centers of the commercial world in the eastern Mediterranean. Among the benefactors of the people of Cos was Herod the Great. It is mentioned in connection with Paul’s third missionary journey in Acts 21 1, and in its relations with the Jews in Mt 8 9; Acts 16 12; Ac 19; 18; 19; 21, 19. For other references, see Paton-Hicks, Inscriptions of Cos, ix.

COSAM, κόσαμ (Kosam, Kōsam): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke’s genealogy in the 5th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

COSMOGONY, κοσμογονία. See Anthropology; Creation; Earth; Evolution; World.

COSMOLOGY, κοσμολόγια. See World; Providence.

COSTLINESS, κοστήνος (κοστήνος, tōnēthē, “preciousness,” “an abundance of costly things”): Found only in Rev 18 19, “made rich by reason of her costliness.”

COTES, κότας. See Sheepfote.

COTTAGE, κοτάσι. See House.

COTTON, κοτίνος (COTTON, karpas, is the better tr., as in RVm, where AV and RV have “green” in Est 1 6): The Heb karpas is from the Pers kairīpa and the Sanskrit karpāsa, “the cotton plant.” The derived words originally meant “muslin” or “calico,” but in classical times the use of words allied to karpas—in Gr and Lat—was extended to include linen. The probability is in favor of “cotton” in Est 1 6. This is the product of Gossypium herbaceum, a plant originally from India but now cultivated in many other lands.

COUCH, kouch (subst.). See Bed.

Couch (vb.): ἐβαθμίζω, ἐβαθμίζεσθαι, “to crouch,” “to lurk,” as a beast in readiness to spring on its prey. “If thou dost not well, sin coucheth at the door” (Gen 4 7, AV “lieth”), waiting for it to open. Cain is warned to beware of the first temptations to evil, in his case esp. a sullen and jealous disposition (cf. Dante, Inferno, I, 30). See Abel; Cain. The tribe of Judah is compared for its bravery to a recumbent lion or lionness (Gen 49 9; cf. Nu 24 9 f); and Issachar to “a strong ass, couching down between the sheepfolds” (49 14, AV “between two burdens”); cf. Jgs 5 16. “The deep that coucheth beneath” (Dt 33 13), probably the springs of water, or possibly, as Driver suggests, “the subterranean deep, pictured as a gigantic monster.” See Antss. (Land, O. E. 119, 1).

COUCHING-PLACE, kouch’ing-places (κοθόν, morbeθ; once in EV [Ezk 25 5]): The same Heb word, however, which means simply “place of lying down” of animals in repose, is used also in Zeph 3 15 where the tr is “a place . . . to lie down in.” The figure, a case of emic to emic (see besides, Isa 17 2; 27 10), suggests desolation.

COULTER, kol’ter. See Plow.

COUNCIL, koun’sil, COUNCILLOR, koun’siler (συμβούλιον, sumbolion): An assembly of advisers (Acts 25 12); a body of those taking counsel (see Schürer’s Jewish People in the Time of Christ, I (1), 60). Distinguished from συμβούλιον, sundrion, the supreme court of the Jews, by being of a less formal character, i.e. less of an institution. For “council” in the latter sense, its most frequent use, see SANHEDRIN. A councillor (Gr bouleutēs) was a member of the Sanhedrin. Applied to Joseph of Arimathaea (Mt 27 57; Lk 23 50). In AV “counselor.”

COUNSEL, koun’sel, COUNSELLOR, koun’seller (συμβουλιον, sumbolion): Ordinarily found as the object of verbs signifying “to reckon” (see Scripture) beside the idea of a practical end to be reached, that of consultation and deliberation among those united in a common cause (Mt 12 14; Mk 3 6). A councillor (samboulos) is a confidential adviser (Rom 11 34); often in the OT (Isa 9 6; Prov 24 6, etc). Confounded in AV with “counselor” (see above), the latter being an official adviser, which the former does not necessarily mean.

COUNCIL, kount (Τέκος, τόπος, κόπω, μάνθα, μαθησι, psephhizo): Used of arithmetical computation “to number” (Ps 139 18; Nu 23 10); also for Κοθόν, kothanon, “to reckon,” to indicate classification among or identification with, “c. for a stranger” (Job 10 13); “c. for his enemy” (Job 33 10). In the NT the arithmetical computation is less prominent, except in the sense of “calculate,” psephhizo, sumpsamphhizo, “to reckon with pebbles,” each pebble representing a unit (Lk 14 28; Acts 19 19); of moral estimate, ἐκκαθαρία and λοιποναί (Phil 3 7 13). The noun, fr Heb kaphath, “is a count of” (Ex 12 4), viz. in the arithmetical sense.

COUNTEANCE, kounte’nan: (1) The noun (see also s.v. Face) is the tr of a variety of Heb and Gr expressions, ἐπιστήμων, πάνων; προσέπον, πρόσωπον, being the most frequent. Be sides there are found παραπόσσα, morch, “appearance,” “shape,” “comeliness,” “visage,” γένος, “the eye,” ἀντί, “opening,” “appearance,” “figure,” etc., and Aram. נמ, נויו. To the Oriental the countenance mirrors, even more than to us, the character and feelings of the heart. The countenance (morch) is frequently rendered elsewhere (Ps 13 17; Ps 13 24; Ps 14 15; in 2 S 16 12, lit. “fair of eyes”; “comely” (Cant 2 14); “beautiful” (I J 1 35 3); “cheerful” (Psa 15 3); “angry” (Prov 23 19); “fierce” (Dul 3 29); “troubled” (Ezk 27 33); “sad” (1 S 1 18; 2 S 3 3; Eccl 7 3). The countenance is “sharped, i.e. made keen (Prov 31 17); it “falls,” i.e. looks despondent, disappointed (Gen 4 56); is “cast down” (Job 29 24); “changed” (Job 14 29; cf “altered” into glory, Lk 9 29; Dnl 5 6.9.10; 7 28, Aram. יט). To set one’s countenance stedfastly upon a person (2 K 8 11) is synonymous with staring or gazing at a person. Not infrequently we find compound expressions such as “light of countenance,” i.e. favor (Job 29 24; Ps 4 4; 44 3; 89 15; 10 8); “health of countenance” (Ps 42 11; 43 5); “help of countenance” (Ps 42 5); “rebuke of countenance” (Ps 80 16); “pride of countenance” (Heb 2 5, lit. “haughty,” “lofty ness,” Ps 10 14). As vs. (Heb תַנ, תָּנ, “to countenance”) we find the word in AV of Ex 23 3, where the Revisers translate “Neither shalt thou favor [AV ‘countenance’] a poor man in his cause.” Here the meaning seems to be that no distinction of persons shall be made by the judge. See Lev 19 15, where, however, a different word is used. There is therefore no need of the emendation proposed by Knobel and accepted by Kautzsch, who would read תַנ, תָּנ, “great,” for תַנ, תָּנ, ובכ, “and the poor” of the text. The LXX has πε̂νης, πε̂νης, “poor.”

COUNTER-CHARM, koun’tér-charm. See AMULET; CHARM.

COUNTERFEIT, koun’tér-fit (قياس, kēbālōs, kēbāleōs, καταποίησις, ἀπατοῦσα, ἀπατών: homōtōs): “C. occurs as the tr of kēbāleōs, ‘mixed with dross,’ ‘not genuine’ (Wisd 15 9, “to make c. things,” RV ‘moulded counterfeits,’ spurious things, imitations,’ (see 1 Cor 11 28), etc.) of the LXX Lev 19 15; Dt 22 11, “mixed garment,” and 2 Cor 13 5.6, addikmēlos, ‘reprobate’ (see 1 Cor 11 28), “counterfeit” in the older sense of a representation occurs in Wisd 14 17 (anapotou, “to make a likeness”); “of his visage,” RV ‘imagining the likeness from afar, and Eccles 38 27 (κοινώθηκεν, “as one might like”), “of his imagery,” RV ‘to preserve likeness in his portraiture.’

COUNTERVAIL, koun’tér-vāl (κατακλήσις, κατακλήσις, “equalized”): To thwart or overcome by acting against with equal force; thus, “The enemy could not c. the king’s damage” or loss (Est 7 4 ARV reads “The adversary could not have compensated for the king’s damage”). “Nothing doth c. [RV ‘can be taken in exchange for’] a faithful friend” (Eccles 6 15).

COUNTRY, koun’tri (各方面, anege, “land,” γή, πατρίς, “field,” πατρίς, πατρίς, “native land,” (Lk 4 23; Jn 4 44; He 11 14); περιχώσας, περιχώσας, “country [AV ‘region’] round about” (Mt 14 35; Lk 3 4; 3 8; 8 37). In He 11 14 ff., “heaven” is referred to as a country. Egypt and Assyria were “far countries” (2 Sam 19 AV; Ecc 10 9). The hill country (of the numerous Gibeans [gibbāh, “a hill”]) was the mountainous region to the N. or to the S. of Jerusalem. The low country, skabhē (see SHEPHELAH), consisted of the foothills to the west of the hill country. The south country or of Lul (nahaph, q.v., was the dry, extreme southern part of Pal, approximately between Beersheba and Kadesh-barnea.

ALFRED ELY DAY

COUNTRYMAN, koun’tri-man (καταφύλακτος, καταφύλακτος): “Of the same tribe” (1 Thess 2 14); also in idiomatic rendering (γένος, γένος) for those of one’s own race or kin (2 Cor 11 26; Gal 1 14 AV, “one’s own nation”). Cf Mk 6 4; Rom 9 3; and see CUSON; KINSMAN, etc.

COUPLE, koup’l: (1) Used as a noun, indicates two objects of the same kind that are considered together. Thus we read of a couple of cakes (2 S 1 6, used loosely), and a couple of asses (2 S 16 1, Heb gemeth).

(2) Used as a vb., it means to join or fasten one thing to another. This term occurs most frequently in the description of the tabernacle (see Ex 26 6.9.11; 26 10.13.16). Couple is used in 1 Pet 3 2 to describe the joining of fear to chaste behavior (Heb ἀδήμαρπα).

COUPLING, koup’ling: Is the RV rendering of παράκλησις, mabherē. This Heb by Negan (anhaph) ing, or the place, where one thing is joined to another, as of the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex 26 4.5), and of the different parts of the ephod (Ex 28 27; 39 20).

It is also the RV rendering of Παρακλησία, mhabārēth, and this refers more to the thing that joins the two objects, as beams of wood (2 Ch 34 11), or hooks of iron (1 Ch 22 3).

COURAGE, kou’rāj: Heb הַסְתָּק, “to show one’s self strong” (Nu 13 20; 2 S 10 12; 1 Ch 19 13; 2 Ch 15 8; Exz 10 4; Ps 27 14; 31 24; Isa 41 6); רְכָּח, “spirit,” “animus” (Josh 2 11 AV); מָכָא, “to be alert” (physically and mentally), “to be agile,” “quick,” “energetic” (Dt 31 6.7.23; Josh 1 6 19.18; 10 25; Jos 2 9; Ch 26 5); מָכָא, “to heart,” and fig.: “person,” “spirit” (Dnl 11 25); גרthuros, “cheer” (Acts 28 15). A virtue highly esteemed among all nations, one of the four chief “natural” (cardinal) virtues (Wisd 8 7), while cowardice ranks as one of the mortal sins (Eccles 2 12.13; Rev 21 8).

COURSE, kōrs (from Lat curaus, “a running,” “race,” “voyage,” “way”): (1) περιχώσας, περιχώσας, “forward or onward movement,” as of a ship: “We made a straight c.” (Acts 16 11; of Acts 21 1); “We had finished our c.” (RV ‘voyage,’ Acts 21 7).

(2) A (prescribed or self-appointed) path, as of the sun: “Swift is the sun in his e.” (1 Est 4 34); of the stars: “The stars in their courses fought against Sisera” (Jgs 6 20 AV) (see ASTRONOMY; Astrology); of a river (or irrigating canal): “as willows by the watercourses” (Isa 44 4); of a race (περιχώσας, περιχώσας, “country,” “region,” “may have free c.” (RV “may run”) (2 Ths 3 1).

(3) A career in such a course (περιχώσας, περιχώσας): “I have finished my RV ‘the’ c.” (2 Tim 4 7); “as John fulfilled his RV ‘was fulfilling’” his c.” (Acts 10 73); “that I may finish RV ‘may accomplish’” my c.” (Acts 20 24).

(4) A way or manner, as of life: “Every one turned to his e." (Jer 8 6); "their e. is evil" (Jer 23 10); "walked according to the e. [šāḏōn, ṣāḏōn, RVm 'age'] of this world" (Eph 2 2).

(5) Orderly succession: "sang together by e." (ARV 'sang one to another') (Exr 3 11); "by e." (RV 'in turn') (1 Cor 14 27); the courses of the priests and Levites (1 Ch 23 1-15; 1 Ch 26 1; 2 Ch 5 11; Lk 1 58). See PRIESTS and LEVITES.

(6) A row or layer, as of masonry: "All the foundations of the earth are out of e." (RV 'are moved'; ARV 'are shaken') (Ps 82 5). The temple was described as a "circular nature" (Jas 3 6). The cycle of generation (tón trochoú tēs genéseōs) here means the physical world as constituted by the round of origin and decay, and typified by the Orphic (legendary) cycle of births and deaths through which the soul passes in metempsychosis. See also GAMES.

COURT, kōrt. See HOUSE.

COURT OF THE GENTILES. See TEMPLE (Herod's).

COURT OF THE SABBATH. See COVERED WAY.

COURT, kōrt, OF THE SANCTUARY, sānk'th-ā-ri (TABERNACLE, TEMPLE): By "court" (عش, ḫāter) is meant a clear space inclosed by curtains or walls, or surrounded by buildings. It was always an uncovered inclosure, but might have within its area one or more edifices.

The first occurrence of the word is in Ex 27 9, where it is commanded to "make the court of the tabernacle." The dimensions for this follow in the directions for the length Tabernacle of the linen curtains which were to inclose it. From these we learn that the perimeter of the court was 300 cubits, and that it consisted of two squares, each 75 ft., lying E. and W. of one another. In the westerly square stood the tabernacle, while in that to the E. was the altar of burnt offering. This was the worshipper's square, and every Heb who passed through the entrance gate had immediate access to the altar, (cf. W. Robertson Smith, note on Ex 20 26, OTJC, p. 435). The admission to this scene of the national solemnities was by the great east gate described in Ex 27 13-16 (see EAST GATE).

The fundamental conception out of which grew the resolve of building a temple for the worship of Jeh was that the new structure was to be an enlarged duplicate in stone of the Tabernacle. The Temple doubling in size of the holy chambers was accompanied by a doubling of the inclosed area upon which the holy house was to stand. Hitherto a rectangular oblong figure of 150 ft. in length and 75 ft. in breadth had sufficed for the needs of the people in their worship. Now an area of 300 ft. in length and 150 ft. in breadth was inclosed within heavy stone walls, making, as before, two squares, each of 150 ft. This was that "court of the priests" spoken of in 2 Ch 4 9, known to its builders as the "inner court" (1 K 6 36; cf. Jer 36 10). Its walls consisted of "three courses of hewn stone, and a course of cedar beams" (1 K 6 38); into which read the meaning of colonnades. Its two divisions may have been marked by some fence. The innermost division, accessible only to priests, was the site of the new temple. In the easterly division stood the altar of sacrifice; into this the Heb laity had access for worship at the altar. Later incidental allusions imply the existence of "chambers" in the court, and also the accessibility of the laity (cf Jer 35 4; 36 10; Ezk 8 16).

In distinction from this "inner" court a second or "outer" court was built by Solomon, spoken of by the Chronicler as "the great court" (2 Ch 3 15). It was inclosed with brass (bronze). Wide difference of opinion obtains as to the relation of this outer court to the inner court just described, and to the rest of the Solomonic buildings—particularly to the "great court" of "the house of the forest of Lebanon" of 1 K 7 9, 10. Some identify the two, others separate them. Did this court, with its brass-covered gates, extend still further to the E. than the temple "inner" court, with, however, the same breadth as the latter? Or was it, as Keil thinks, a much larger inclosure, surrounding the whole temple area, extending perhaps 150 cubits eastward in front of the priests' court (cf Keil, Bib. Archaeology, I, 171, ET)? Yet more radical is the view, adopted by many modern authorities, which regards "the great court" as a vast inclosure surrounding the temple and the whole complex of buildings described in 1 K 7 1-12 (see the plan, after Stade, in G. A. Smith's Jerusalem, I, 59). In the absence of conclusive data the question must be left undetermined.

In Ezekiel's plan of the temple yet to be built, the lines of the temple courts as he had known them in Jerusalem are followed. Two squares Temple for E. lie N. and S. of one another, and bear the distinctive names, "the inner court" and "the outer court" (Ezk 8 16; 10 5).

In the Herodian temple the old nomenclature gives place to a new set of terms. The inner inclosure known later as "the court of the Gentiles" does not appear under that name in the NT or in Jos. What we have in the tract Middoth of the Mishnah and in the various treatises on the temple, the "court of the priests" and the "court of Israel" (Middoth, ii.6; v.1; Jos, BJ, V, v, 6). The data in regard to both are difficult and conflicting. In Middoth they appear as long narrow strips of 11 cubits in breadth extending the length of the temple and the altar across the inclosure—the "court of Israel" being railed off from the "court of the priests" on the E.; the latter extending back- ward as far as the altar, which has a distinct measure. The design was the direct or near approach of the lay Israelite to the altar. Jos makes the 11 cubits of the "court of Israel" extend round the whole "court of the priests," inclusive of altar and temple (see TEMPLE; and cf. G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 506-9, with the reconstruction of Waterhouse in Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 111 ff). For the "women's court," see TREASURY.

Many expressions in the Ps show how great was the attachment of the devout-minded Heb in all ages to those courts of the Lord's house where he was accustomed to worship (e.g. Ps 65 4; 84 2; 92 13; 96 8; 100 4; 116 19). The courts were the scene of many historical events in the OT and NT, and of much of the earthly ministry of Jesus. There was enacted the scene described in the Parable of the Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18 10-14).

W. SHAW CALDECOTT

COURTS, JUDICIAL, joo-dish'al, jū-dish'al: At the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed judges (שפטים, shāphātīm, Ex 18). In Egypt and Alexander's time, he appears in the list of judges, judges, who, of course, was a source of many wrongs. Leaving Egypt, Moses took the judicial functions upon himself, but it was impossible that he should be equal to the task of administering justice to two and one-half million people; hence he proceeded to organize a system of jurisprudence. He proceeded to organize a system of jurisprudence. He was confronted with thousands—in all 78,600 judges. This system was adequate for the occasion, and these courts respectively corresponded practically to our Justices of the Peace, Mayor’s Court, District Court, Circuit Court. Finally, there was a Supreme Court under Moses and his successors. These courts, though graded, did not afford an opportunity of appeal. The lower courts turned their difficult cases over to the next higher. If the case was simple, the judge over the court that heard the case was too intricate for him, he would refer it to the next higher court, and so on until it finally reached Moses. There were certain kinds of questions which the tens, fifties, and hundreds would not take at all, and the people understood it and would bring them to the higher courts for original jurisdiction. When any court decided it, that was the end of that case, for it could not be appealed (Ex 18. 25-26). On taking possession in Canaan, the judges were to be appointed for every city and valley (De 19. 18), thus giving all Israel a speedy and cheap method of adjudication. Though not so prescribed by the constitution, the judges at length were generally chosen from among the Levites, as the Levites were the judges. The above states this plainly, and various passages of the Scriptures express it positively by inference (see Dt 1. 13). Jephthah’s election by vote of the people is clearly set forth (Jg 11. 6-11).

Among the Judges, their office was held very sacred; for God Himself had given it. Hence those who administered the law were God’s special representatives, and of the Judges their person was held correspondingly very sacred. These circumstances placed upon them the duty of administering justice without respect to persons (Dt 1. 17; 16. 18). They were to be guided by the inalienable rights granted to every citizen by the Hebrew constitution: (1) No man was to be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law (Nu 35. 9-34). (2) Two or three witnesses were required to convict anyone of crime (Dt 17. 6; 19. 2-13). (3) Punishment for crime was not to be administered unless it was clearly stated that the person in question was guilty (Dt 23. 10-11). (4) One held to bondage but having acquired liberty through his own effort should be protected (Dt 23. 15.16). (5) One’s homestead was inalienable (Lev 25. 23-26. 34). (7) The right to a trial without the person’s own consent (Ex 21. 2-6).

Gradually a legal profession developed among the Hebrews, the members of which were designated as “Lawyers” or “Scribes,” also known as “Doctors of the Law” (Lk 10. 41). Their business was threefold: (1) to study and interpret the law; (2) to instruct the Hebrew youth in the law; and (3) to decide questions of the law. The first two they did as scholars and teachers; the last either as judges or as advisers in some court, as, for instance, one of the Senate of Jerusalem or some inferior tribunal. No code can go into such details as to eliminate the necessity of subsequent legislation, and this usually, to a great extent, takes the form of judicial decisions founded upon the code, rather than of separate enactment; and so it was among the Hebrews. The provisions of their code were for the most part quite general, thus affording a large scope for casuistic interpretation. Regarding the points not explicitly covered by the code, a sentence must be found either in the form of established custom or in the form of an inference drawn from the statute. As a result of the industry with which this line of legal development was pursued during the centuries immediately preceding our era, Hebrew law became a master compendium of principles: the disputed points, the judgments of the individual lawyers could not be taken as the standard; hence the several disciples of the law must frequently meet for a discussion, and the opinion of the majority then prevailed. These were the meetings of the “Doctors.” Whenever a case arose concerning which there had been no clear legal decision, the question was referred to the nearest lawyer; by him, to the nearest company of lawyers, perhaps the Sanhedrin, whose resultant decision was henceforth authority.

Before the destruction of Jerusalem technical knowledge of the law was not a condition of eligibility to the office of judge. Anyone who could command the confidence of his fellow-citizens was elected, and many of the rural courts undoubtedly were conducted, as among us, by men of sterling quality, but limited knowledge. Such men would avail themselves of the legal advice of any “doctor” who might be within reach; and in the more dignified courts of a large municipality it was a standing custom to have a company of lawyers present to discuss and decide any new law points that might arise. Of course, frequently these men were themselves judges, and it is likely that practically the entire system of jurisprudence was in their hands. Though Judæa at this time was a subject commonwealth, yet the Sanhedrin, which was the body invested with the supreme legislative and judicial authority, exercised autonomous authority to such an extent that it not only administered civil cases in accordance with Jewish law—but for without intermixture with Roman law, such a right a Jewish court would be impossible—but it also took part to a great extent in the punishment of crime. It exercised an independent police power, hence could send out its own officers to make arrests (Mt 26. 47; Mk 14. 45; Acts 4. 3; 5. 17-18). In cases that did not involve capital punishment, its judgments were final and unamended (Acts 4. 2-23; 5. 21-40). Only in capital punishment cases must the consent of the procurator be secured, which is not only clearly stated as being necessary from the beginning of the whole course of Christ’s trial, as reported by the Synoptic Gospels. In granting or withholding his consent in such cases, the procurator could follow his pleasure absolutely, applying either the Jewish or Roman law, as his guide. In one case of the right to inflict capital punishment even on Roman citizens was granted the Sanhedrin, namely, when a non-Jewish person overstepped the bounds and entered the sacred holy place of the temple. Even in this case the consent of the procurator must be secured, but it appears that the Roman rulers were inclined to let the law take its course against such wanton outrage of the Jews’ feelings. Criminal cases not involving capital punishment need not be referred to the procurator.

The city in which the Sanhedrin met was Jerusalem. To determine the particular building, and the spot on which the building stood, is interesting to the archaeologist, not to the student of law. The local courts of sessions usually held their sessions during the second and fifth day (Monday and Thursday) of the week, but we do not know whether the same custom was observed by the Great Sanhedrin. On Sabbaths no court was held, much less on the Sabbath preceding the Passover. If not to be pronounced until the day after the trial, such cases were avoided also on the day preceding.
a Sabbath or other sacred day. The emphasis placed on this observance may be seen from the obligations issued by Augustus, absolving the Jews from the duty of attending court on the Sabbath. See Doctor; Lawyer; Sanhedrin; Scribe.

Cousin, kusˈnə (əˈnəpsid, anəˈpaozə); Only in Col 4 10, where Mark is said to be "cousin" (RV) to Barnabas, and not as in AV, "sister's son." The renderings "cousin" of AV for συγγενής, sug-gens, in Lk 1 36.58 were probably understood at the time of the tr, in the wider, and not in the more modern, sense of the term. This religiously most universally prevalent. In view of this the renderings "kinswoman," "kinsfolk" in RV are preferable. As a title of honor and dignity, it occurs in 1 Esd 42, etc. See Kinsman.

1. General Meaning.—The etymological force of the Heb b'rith is not entirely certain. It is probable that the word is the same as the Assyrian biritu, which has the common meaning " fetter," but also means "covenant." The significance of the root from which this Assyrian word is derived is uncertain. It is probable that it is "to bind," but that is not definitely established. The meaning of biritu as covenant seems to come directly from the root, rather than as a derived meaning from fetter. If this root idea is to bind, the covenant is that which binds together the parties. This, at any rate, is in harmony with the general meaning of the word.

In the OT the word has an ordinary use, when both parties are men, and a distinctly religious use, between God and men. There can be no doubt that the role of biritu come from the ordinary, in harmony with the general custom in such cases, and not the reverse. There are also two shades of meaning, somewhat distinct, of the Heb word: one in which it is properly derived, i.e. a solemn mutual agreement, the other in which it is more a command, i.e. instead of an obligation voluntarily assumed, it is an obligation imposed by a superior upon an inferior. This latter meaning, however, has clearly been derived from the former. It is easy to see that an agreement, including as the contracting parties those of unequal position, might readily include those agreements which tended to partake of the nature of a command; but the process could not readily be reversed.

II. Among Men.—We consider first a covenant in which both contracting parties are men. In essence a covenant is an agreement,

1. Early but an agreement of a solemn and binding force. The early Sem idea of a covenant was doubtless that which prevailed among the Arabs (see esp. W. Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, 2d ed., passim). This was primarily blood-brotherhood, in which two men became brothers by drinking each other's blood. This is an idea which is now continued into the clan of the other. Hence this act involved the clan of one of the contracting parties, and also brought the other party into relation with the god of this clan, by bringing him into the community life of the clan, which included its god. In this early period Hebrew, "covenant" is not a special engagement to this or that particular effect, but bond of troth and life-fellowship to all the effects for which kinsmen are permanently bound together" (W. Robertson Smith, op. cit., 315 f.). In this early ceremonial the religious idea was necessarily present, because the god was kindred to the clan; and the god had a special interest in the covenant, because he esp. protects the kindred blood, of which the stranger thus becomes a part. This religious predilection of the covenant, and its original idea was much modified. In later usage there were various substitutes for the drinking of each other's blood, viz. drinking together the sacrificial blood, sprinkling it upon the parties, eating together the sacrificial meal, etc.; but the same idea found expression in all, the community of life resulting from the covenant.

The covenant in the OT shows considerable modification from the early idea. Yet it will doubtless help in understanding the covenant to keep in mind the essential or central Elements and form. Combining statements made in different accounts, the following seem to be the principal elements in a covenant between men. Some of the details, it is to be noted, are not explicitly stated in any of these covenants, but may be inferred from those between God and men.

1. A statement of the terms agreed upon (Gen 26 29; 31 50.52). This was a modification of the earlier idea, which has been noted, in which a covenant was made between two equals.

2. An oath by each party to observe the terms, God being witness of the oath (Gen 26 31; 31 48–53). The oath was such a characteristic feature that sometimes the term "oath" is used as the equivalent of covenant (see Ex 17 13). (3) A curse invoked by each one upon himself in case of disregard of the agreement. In a sense this may be considered a part of the oath, adding emphasis to it. This curse is not explicitly stated in the case of human covenants, but may be inferred from the covenant with God (Dt 27 15–26). (4) The formal ratification of the covenant by some solemn external act. The different ceremonies for this purpose, such as these have already been mentioned, are to be regarded as the later equivalents of the early act of drinking each other's blood. In the OT accounts it is not certain that such formal act is expressly mentioned in relation to covenants between men. It seems probable that the sacrificial meal of Gen 31 54 included Laban, in which case it was a covenant sacrifice. In any case, both sacrificial meal and sprinkling of blood upon the two parties, the altar representing Jebr, are mentioned in Ex 24 4–8, with allusions elsewhere, in ratification of the covenant at Sinai between Jehovah and Israel. In the covenant of God with Abraham is another ceremony, quite certainly with the same purpose. This is a peculiar observance, viz. the cutting of animals into two parts and passing between the severed portions (Gen 15 9–18), a custom also referred to in Jer 34 18. Here it is to be noted that it is a smoking furnace and a flaming torch, representing God, not Abraham, which passed between the pieces. Such an act, it would seem, should be shared by both parties; but in this case it is doubtless to be explained by the fact that the covenant is principally a promise by Jeh. He is the one who binds Himself. Concerning the significance of this act there is difference of opinion. A common view is that it is a formal expression of the curse, impressing upon oneself the same, i.e. cutting in pieces, if one breaks the terms of the covenant. But, as W. R. Smith has pointed out (op. cit., 481), this does not explain the passing between the pieces, which is the characteristic feature of the ceremony. It seems rather to the two parties “were taken within the mystical life of the victim.” (Cf. the interpretation of He 9 15-17 in COVENANT IN THE NT.) It would then be an inheritance from the early times, in which the victim was regarded as kindred with the tribe, and hence also an equivalent of the drinking of each other’s blood.

Other features beyond those mentioned cannot be covenant specific and Ritual. This is the case with the setting up of a stone, or raising a heap of stones (Gen 31.45.46). This is doubtless simply an ancient custom, which has no direct connection with the covenant, but comes from the ancient Semitic peoples. The covenant is essentially that of a clan, or of a king. When the covenant is between tribes it is thus a treaty or alliance. The following passages have this use of covenant: Gen 14.13; 21.27.32; 26.23.25; 44.4; Ex 25.39; 34.12.15; Dt 7.13; Josh 9.7.6.7.15.15.19.21; 1 K 6.12; 15.19 § 2 Ch 16.3; 1 K 20.34; Ps 83.5; Isa 33.8; Ezk 16.16; 17.13-19; 30.5; Dn 11.22; Am 1.9. In other cases it is between a king and his subjects, when it is a mandate or ordinance, as 2 S 3.12.13.21; 8.3 § 1 Ch 14.9; Jer 34.8-18; Dn 9.27. In other cases it is between individuals, or between small groups, where it is an agreement or pledge (2 K 11.4 § 2 Ch 23.4; Job 31.31). Such a treaty between David and Jonathan it is more specifically an alliance of friendship (1 S 18.3; 20.8; 23.18), as also apparently in Ps 55.20. It means an alliance of marriage in Mal 2.14, but probably not in Prov 2.17, where it is better to understand the meaning as being “her covenant with God.”

In all cases of covenants between men, except Jer 34.10 and Dn 9.27, the technical phrase for making a covenant is kārub b’rith, “to make close covenant.” The phrase originally “be cut.” Everything indicates that this vb. is used with reference to the formal ceremony of ratification above mentioned, of cutting animals in pieces.

3. Between God and Men.—As already noted, the idea of covenants between God and men doubtless arose from the idea of covenants between men. Hence the general idea thought is similar. It cannot in this case be, as in the case of the covenant between contracting parties who stand on an equality, but God, the superior, always takes the initiative.

To some extent, however, varying in different cases, it is regarded as a mutual agreement; God with His commands makes certain promises, and men agree to keep the commands, or, at any rate, the promises are conditioned on human obedience. In general, the covenant of God with men is a Divine ordinance, with signs and pledges on God’s part, and with promises for human obedience and penalties for disobedience, which are not accepted by men. In one passage (Ps 25.14), it is used in a more general way of an alliance of friendship between God and man.

A covenant of this general kind is said in the OT to have been made by God with Noah (Gen 9.9-17 and elsewhere). In this the promise of God is to multiply the descendents of Abraham, to give them the land of Canaan, and to make them a blessing to the nations. This is narrated in Gen 15.18; 17.2-21, etc. A covenant is made with the nation Israel at Sinai (Horeb) (Ex 15.1; 20.3; 34.6.7), ratified by a forward reference to the covenant of Abraham, and lasting for the centuries. This constituted the nation the peculiar people of God, and was accompanied by promises for obedience and penalties for disobedience. This covenant was renewed on the plains of Moab (Dt 29.1).

A covenant with Phinehas (Nu 25.12.13) established an everlasting priesthood in his line. The covenant with Joshua and the people (Josh 24.22), and the covenant with Hosea and the people (Ex 2.25.19) was an agreement on their part to serve Jeh. The covenant with Jehoiada and the people (2 K 11.17 § 2 Ch 23.13) was an agreement on their part to obey the Book of the Law. The covenant with Ezra and the people (Ezr 10.1) was an agreement on their part to keep the Mosaic law, and to obey the law. The prophets also speak of a new covenant, most explicitly in Jer, but with references elsewhere, which is connected with the messianic hope in Hos 1.2; 2.22; 6.8; 66.9; 69.21; 61.8; Jer 31.31.33; 32.49; 50.5; Ezek 16.60.62; 20.37; 34.25; 37.26; Hos 5.18).

Various phrases are used of the making of a covenant between God and men. The vb. ordain (used of making covenants between men, kārub b’rith, is often used here) is followed by the phrase nāsā b’rith ’at pi, “to take up a covenant upon the mouth of someone.”

The history of the covenant idea in Israel, as between God and man, is not altogether easy to see to keep trace. This applies esp. to the great covenant between God and Israel, of Covenant, viz. the one with Abraham, and the idea of covenant in the OT. The earliest references to this relation of Israel to Jeh under the term which ordinary sense is accepted are: Jn 1.13, 2.25; 3.29. The interpretation of the former passage is doubtful in details, but the reference to such a covenant seems clear. The latter is considered by many a later addition, but largely because of this mention of the covenant. No other references to such a covenant are made in the prophets before Jeremiah. Jeremiah and Ezekiel speak of it, and it is implied in Second Isaiah. It is a curious fact, however, that most of the later prophets do not use the term, which suggests that the omission in the earlier prophets is not very significant concerning a knowledge of the idea in early times.

In this connection it should be noted that there is some variation among the Hexateuchal codes in their treatment of the covenants. Only one point, however, needs special mention. P gives no explicit account of the covenant at Sinai, and puts large emphasis upon the covenant with Abraham. There are, however, several allusions to the Sinaitic covenant (Lev 2 13; 24 8; 26 9.15.25.44.45). The facts indicate, therefore, principally a difference of emphasis.

The light of the facts already noted, however, it is held by many that the covenant idea between God and man is comparatively late. This view is that there were no covenants with Abraham and at Sinai, but that in Israel's early conceptions of the relation to Jeh He was their tribal God, bound by no special ethical covenant with the people. This is a larger question than at first appears. Really the whole problem of the relation of Israel to Jeh throughout OT history is involved, in particular the question at what time a comprehensive conception of the ethical character of God was developed. The subject will therefore naturally receive a fuller treatment in other articles. It is perhaps sufficient here to express the conviction that there was a very considerable conception of the ethical character of Jeh in the early history of Israel, and that consequently there is no sufficient reason for doubting the fact of the covenants with Abraham and at Sinai. The statement of W. Robertson Smith, approaches the matter (op. cit. 310): "That Jeh's relation is not natural but ethical is the doctrine of the prophets, and is emphasized, in dependence on their teaching, in the Book of Dt. But the passages cited show that the idea has its foundation in pre-prophetic times and is not made by the prophets, though they give it fresh and powerful application, plainly do not regard the conception as an innovation."

A little further consideration should be given to the new covenant of the prophets. The general teaching of the prophet is that the sins of the people which led to the exile. Hence during the exile the people had been cast off, the covenant was no longer in force. This is stated, using other terminology, in Hos 3 5; 1 9; 2 2. The prophets speak, however, in anticipation, of the making of a covenant again after the return from the exile. For the most part, in the passages already cited, this covenant is spoken of as if it were the old one renewed. Special emphasis is put, however, upon its being an everlasting covenant, as the old one did not prove to be, implying that it will not be broken as was that one. Jeremiah's teaching, however, has a little different emphasis. He speaks of the old covenant as passed away (31 32). Accordingly he speaks of a new covenant (31 31.33). This new covenant in its provisions, however, is much like the old. But there is a new emphasis upon individuality in approach to God. In the old covenant, as already noted, it was the nation as a whole that entered into the relation; here it is the individual, and the law is to be written upon the individual heart.

In the later usage the specific covenant idea is sometimes less prominent, so that the term is used practically of the religion as a whole; see Isa. 56 4; Ps 105 18.

COVENANT (IN THE NT): Ap&aelig;n, Diath&ek;e, was the word chosen by the LXX translators to render the Heb brith, and it appears thus nearly 300 times in the Gr OT in the sense of covenant, while sune&th;&ek;&th;e and en&th;&ek;&th;ai are each used once only. The choice of this word seems to have been occasioned by a recognition that the covenant which God makes with men is not fully mutual as would be implied in sune&th;&ek;&th;e, the Gr word commonly used for covenant (although not a NT word), while at the same time the rarity of words among the Jews made the common sense of diath&ek;e relatively unfamiliar. The Apocryphal writers also frequently use the word in the same sense and no other.

In the NT diath&ek;e is used some thirty times in a way which makes it plain that its NT use must be "covenant." In Gal 3 15 and He 9 15-17 it is held by many that the sense of covenant must be set aside in favor of will or testament. But in the former passage it can be taken in the sense of a disposition of estate or arrangement by God the Father, a conception in substantial harmony with its regular NT use and with the sense of brith. In the passage in He the interpretation is more difficult, but as it is acknowledged on all hands that the passage loses all argumentative force if the meaning of the NT covenant is accepted, it seems best to retain the meaning covenant if possible. To do this it is only necessary to hold that the death spoken of is the death of the animal sometimes, if not, indeed, commonly slain in connection with the making of a covenant, and that in the mind of the author this death symbolized the death of the contracting parties so far at least as to pledge them that thereafter in the matter involved they would no more change their minds than can the dead. If this view is taken, this passage falls in line with the otherwise invariable use of the word diath&ek;e by Jewish Hellenists. See Testament.

COVENANT, kuv&th;e-bant, kuv&th;e-ant, ARK OF THE. See Ark of the Covenant.

COVENANT OF SALT, salt (יִבְשָׂל, brith melah; אָסָה, hálash, classical Gr Ἀσά, hálás): As salt was regarded as a necessary ingredient of the daily food, and all the sacrificial offerings to Jeh (Lev 2 13), it became an easy step to the very close connection between salt and covenant-making. When men ate together they became friends. Cf. the Arab expression, "There is salt between us"; "He has eaten of my salt," which means partaking of hospitality which cemented friendship; of "eat the salt of the palace" (Est 4 14). Covenants were generally confirmed by sacrificial meals and salt was always present. Since, too, salt is a preservative, it would easily become symbolic of an everlasting covenant. So offerings to Jeh were to be by a statute for ever, "a covenant of salt for ever before Jeh" (Nu 18 19). David received his kingdom forever from Jeh by a "covenant of salt" (2 Ch 13 5). In the light of these conceptions the use of salt became the more significant: "Have salt in yourselves, and be at peace one with another" (Mk 9 50).

LITERATURE:
The name given in Ex 24 7 to a code or collection of laws found in the preceding chapters, 20-23, as the terms of the covenant made with Yah, and given for Israel's guidance until a more complete legislation could be provided. Two covenants were made between Yah and Israel; Moses served as mediator; animals were sacrificed, the blood thus shed being also called "the blood of the covenant" (dán há-briáh, Ex 24 8).

The book of laws occupies a fitting and clearly marked place in the Pentateuchal collection. Examination of the historical context shows that it is put where it belongs and belongs where it is put. A few months after the Exodus (Ex 19 1) Israel arrived at Sinai. Immediately at the command which Moses had received from Yah in the Mount, they prepared themselves by a ceremonial of sanctification for entrance into covenant relation with Yah. When the great day arrived for making this covenant, Moses in the midst of his personage ad had been accepted by them. The first part of these covenant-terms, viz. the Decalogue (Ex 20 2-17), was spoken by the Divine voice, or its declaration was accompanied by awe-inspiring natural convulsions (Ex 19 16). Before the picking of the terrified people Moses went up again into the mountain and received from Yah for them the rest of the "words" and "ordinances" (24 3); and these constitute the so-called Book of the Covenant (20 2-23). In this direct and unmediated manner the narrator connected the book with the nation's consecration at Sinai. The prophets regarded the making of the Sinaitic covenant as the marriage of Israel and Yah, and these laws were the terms mutually agreed upon in the marriage contract.

While it is not possible to arrange the materials of this document into hard-and-fast divisions, the following analysis may be suggestive

1. Historical Consecution

The critical analysis and dismemberment of the books of laws cannot be attempted. The following is a tabulation of the introduction to this body of laws untrue and impossible. The four chapters are assigned to J, the Decalogue to E, and the Book of the Covenant to or E, the repetition of the Decalogue in the 32-34 being J's account. Ordinarily the Book of the Covenant is to be earlier than the Decalogue, and is indeed the oldest body of Yah legislation. However, it could not have existed till one time, nor in the wilderness, since the laws are given for those in agricultural life, and seem to be those nouns made at various times and finally gathered together. Furthermore, this more primitive code either contradicts the later one, or it reveals an entirely different point of view. The chief contradictions or diversities are: nature and number in the days of a man, those of an official priestly class, and direct conception of the annual feasts as agricultural celebrations. JE carried into unity forms that were current, but this book of laws existed much earlier, embodying the earliest legal developments of Yah life in Canaan. It is suggested by some that it is Yah although he does not the analysis, that this code is itself a composite of various layers and ages. See Criticism (The Oldest Hypothesis).

But in favor of the simpler interpretation of these laws as the ethical obligations of the new bond between Yah and Israel some statements deserve to be made. If a solemn or Biblical Consecution Sinai—and to this all the history, all the prophets and the Psalms give testimony—there must have been some statement of the declaration to Israel and fundamental terms of the covenant relationship to Yah. Such statement need not be final nor exhaustive, but rather intended to instruct and guide until later and more detailed directions might be given. This is exactly the position of the laws of the passage (20 18). It is evident that this was the thought of the editor of the Pent and that this is the first and reasonable impression made by the unsuspecting and connected reading of the record, can hardly be questioned by candid minds. In answer to the criticism that there is no agricultural flavor of the laws presupposes settlement in Canaan—a criticism rather remarkable for its blind ignorance—it may be suggested: (1) Israel had occupied in Egypt an agricultural section, and must have been able to form or to receive a body of laws dealing with agricultural pursuits. (2) They were on the march toward a land in which they should have permanent settlement in agricultural; and, not the presence of allusions to such life, but rather their absence, should cause surprise. (3) However, references to settled farm life are not so obtrusively frequent as those seeking signs would have us think. References to the animal life of the flock and herd of a shepherd people, such as the sheaves, at such a time are not so frequent (21 28,33,35; 22 1,10; 23 4), etc. The laws are quite generic in form and conception, enforcing such duties as we would devolve upon both temporary nomad and prospective tillers of the soil. R. P. Taylor therefore (art. in one-vol HDB) accepts this code as originating in the desert wandering.

In answer to the view, best presented by Wellhausen in Proleg. and W. R. Smith in OTJC, that this code is in conflict with later legislation, it may be said that the Book of the Covenant, as an effort at reform, and civil and summary, is in its proper place in the narrative of the sojourn at Sinai, and does not exclude the expectancy of more elaborate organization of both ceremonial and civil order. But the whole question relates more properly to discussion of the later legislation or of the particular topics in dispute (e.g.) For a thorough treatment of them consult W. H. Green, Heb Feasts.

In the Book of the Covenant the moral elements strongly emphasized are legislation of Yah and spirituallity of worship; a high and equitable standard of right; highest concern of the Laws for the week and the poor; humane treatment of dumb animals; purity in the cookery of the house and of the broth; and the simple and joyful life. Without development in details came with later legislation.
Covenant, Bk of Covenant, New

The term “New” Covenant necessarily implies an “Old” Covenant, and we are reminded that God’s dealings with His people in the various dispensations of the world’s history have been in terms of covenant. The and “Old” Holy Scriptures by their most familiar —the Term title keep this thought before us, the “Covenant” OT and the NT or Covenant; the that terms within the realm of “church” being the writings or Scriptures of the Old Covenant, those within the Christian church, the Scriptures of the New Covenant. The alternative name “Testament”—adopted into our English description through the Lat., as the equivalent of the Heb brith, and the Gr diathēkē, which both mean a solemn disposition, compact or contract—suggests the disposition of property in a last will or testament, but although the word diathēkē may bear that meaning, the NT seems esp. governed by the OT usage and the thought moves in a similar plane, it is better to keep to the term “covenant.” The one passage which seems to favor the “testament” idea is Heb 9:16,17 (the Revisers who have changed the AV “testament” into “covenant” in every other place have left it in these two vs), but it is questionable whether even here the better rendering would not be “covenant” (see below). Certainly in the later OT, the terms “testament” and, more especially, “testament,” if allowed to stand, is an application by transition from the original thought of a solemn compact to the secondary one of testamentary disposition. The theological terms “Covenant of Works” and “Covenant of Grace” do not occur in Scripture, though the ideas covered by the terms, esp. the latter, may easily be found there. The “New Covenant” here spoken of is practically equivalent to the Covenant of Grace established between God and His redeemed people that again resting upon the eternal Covenant of Redemption made between the Father and the Son, which, though not so expressly designated, is not obscurely indicated by many passages of Scripture. Looking at the matter more particularly, we have to note the words of Christ at the institution of the Supper. In all three Synoptists,

2. Christ’s as also in Paul’s account (Mt 26:28; Use at Last Mk 14:24; Lk 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25) Supper “covenant” occurs. Mt and Mk, Lk and Paul, the “new covenant in my blood,” the Revisers following the critical text, have omitted “new” in Mt and Mk, but even if it does not belong to the original MS, it is implied, and there need be little doubt that Jesus used it. The old covenant was so well known to these Jewish disciples, that to speak of the covenant in this emphatic way, referring manifestly to something other than the old Mosaic covenant, was in effect to call it a “new” covenant. The expression, in any case, looks back to other Old and pointed out to Jews; but in the contrast there are points of resemblance. It is most significant that Christ here connects the “new” covenant with His “blood.” We at once think, as doubtless the disciples would have, that God’s offering of His blood is referred to. It is wonderful how the contrasted covenant and血 rites are so beautifully illustrated in the Last Supper. (See Supper.)

3. Relation of the transaction described in Ex 24 Ex 24:7, when Moses “took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people,” implies, though not expressed, the idea of ratification. The term “took the book” (the base of which had already been sprinkled on the altar), and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which Jehovah hath made with you concerning all these words” (ver 8). The blood was sacrificial blood, the blood of the animals sacrificed as burnt offerings and peace offerings (Ex 24:6). The old covenant, which was at the altar itself of the sacrifice offered to God, the other half sprinkled on the people, of the virtue of the same sacrifice applied to the people, and so the covenant relation is fully brought about. Christ, by sprinkling the blood of the new covenant, indicates that His death was a sacrifice, and that through that sacrifice His people would be brought into a new covenant relationship with God. His sacrifice is acceptable to God and the virtue of it is to be applied for all believers so all the blessings of the new covenant are secured to them; the blood “is poured out for you” (Lk 22:20). He specifically mentions one great blessing of the new covenant, the forgiveness of sins—which is poured out for many unto remission of sins (Mt 26:28).

This great thought is taken up in He and fully expounded. The writer draws out fully the contrast between the new covenant and the old by laying stress upon the perfection of Christ’s atonement in contrast to the material and typical sacrifices (He 9:11–23). He was “a high priest of the good things to come,” connected with “the greater and more perfect tabernacle.” He entered the holy place “not by his own blood, but by the blood of another, His own blood,” not of “goats and calves,” and by that perfect offering He has secured “eternal redemption” in contrast to the temporal deliverance of the old dispensation. The blood of those typical offerings procured ceremonial cleansing; much more, therefore, shall the blood of Christ avail to cleanse the conscience “from dead works to serve the living God”—that blood which is so superior in value to the blood of the temporal sacrifices, yet resembles it in being sacrifice blood. It is His “who, through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God.” It is the fashion in certain quarters nowadays to say that it is not the blood of Christ, but His spirit of self-sacrifice for others, that invests the cross with its saving power, and this verse is sometimes cited to show that the virtue lies in the surrender of the perfect will, the shedding of the blood being a mere accident. But this is not the view of the NT writers. The blood-shedding is to them a necessity. Of course, it is not the natural idea of blood corporate life nor the shedding it, that saves. The blood is the life. The blood is the symbol of life; the blood shed is the symbol of life outpoured—of the penalty borne; and while great emphasis must be laid, as in this verse it is laid, upon the saving sacrifice of the infinite will to God, yet the essence of the matter is found in the fact that He willingly endured the dread consequences of sin, and as a veritable expiatory sacrifice shed His precious blood for the remission of sins.

Of the shedding of that blood, as the writer goes on to assert, "he is the mediator of a new covenant, that a death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they that have been blotted out may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance" (ver 15). Thus Christ fulfils the type in a twofold way: He is the sacrifice upon which the covenant is based, whose blood ratifies, as He is also, like Moses, the Mediator of the covenant. The death of Christ not only secures the forgiveness of those who are brought under the new covenant, but it was also for the redemption of the transgressions under the first covenant, implying that all the sacrifices gained their value by being types of Christ, and the forgiveness enjoyed by the people of God in former days was bestowed in virtue of the great Sacrifice to be offered in the fulness of time.

Not only does the blessing of perfect forgiveness come through the new covenant, but also the promise of the "eternal inheritance" in contrast to the earthly inheritance which, under the old covenant, Israel enjoyed. The true "inheritance" is held to justify the taking of the word in the next verse as "testament," the writer passing to the thought of a testamentary disposition, which is only of force after the death of the testator. This obviously there is good ground for the analogy, and all the blessings of salvation which come to the believer may be considered as bequeathed by the Saviour in His death, and accruing to us because He has died. It has, in that sense, tacitly to be assumed that the testator lives again to be His own executor and to put us in possession of the blessings. Still, we think there is much to be said in favor of keeping to the sense of "covenant," even here, and taking the clause, which renders it as, "a covenant is of force [or firm] over the dead," as meaning that the covenant is established on the ground of sacrifice, that sacrifice representing the death of the maker of the covenant. The allusion may be further explained by a reference to Ezekiel 24:15-17, which has generally been considered as illustrating the ancient Sem method of making a covenant: the sacrificial animals being divided, and the parties passing between the pieces, implying that they desired death if they broke the engagement. The technical Heb phrase for making a covenant is "to cut a covenant."

There is an interesting passage in Herodotus iii.8, concerning an Arabian custom which seems akin to the old Heb practice. The Arabians observe pledges as religiously as any people; and they make them in the following manner: when any wish to pledge their faith, a third person standing between the two parties makes an incision with a sharp stone in the palm of the hand, nearest the longest fingers of both the contractors; then taking some of the blood from the garments of each, he smears seven stones placed between him and the blood; and as he does this he invokes Bacchus and Urania. When this ceremony is completed, the person who pledges his faith binds his friends as suitors to the stranger, and the citizen, if thought of, is made with a citizen, and the friends also hold themselves obliged to observe the engagement."

Covenant in NT.

This new covenant established by Christ was foretold by the prophet Jeremiah, who uses the very word "covenant" in describing it, and to Jer 31:1-34 His disciples to understand that the prophetic interpretation would in Him be realized. There is no doubt that the author of Hebrews had the passage in mind, for he has led up to the previous statement by definitely quoting the whole statement of Jer 31-34. He had in ch 7 spoken of the contrast between Christ's priesthood "after the order of Melchizedek" (ver 11) and the imperfect, Aaronic priesthood, and he decides that "the surety of a better covenant" (ver 22). Then in ch 8, emphasizing the thought of the superiority of Christ's heavenly high-priesthood, he declares that Christ is the "mediator of a better covenant, which hath been enacted upon better promises" (ver 6). The first covenant, he says, was not faultless, otherwise there would have been no need for a second; but the fault was not in the covenant but in the people who failed to keep it, though perhaps there is also the suggestion that the external imposition of laws was not sufficient to secure true obedience. "For finding fault with them he saith, Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah; (not the old covenant and at once to show its superiority and guarantee its permanence—there is this wonderful provision: "I will put my laws into their mind, and on their heart also will I write them: and I will be to them a mother, and they shall be to me a people." This at once shows the spirituality of the new covenant. Its requirements are not simply given in the form of external rules, but the living Spirit possesses the heart; the law becomes an internal dominating principle, and so true obedience is secured.

Ezekiel had spoken to the same effect, though the word "covenant" is not used in the passage, ch 36:27: "I will put my Spirit within you, and ye shall keep mine ordinances, and do them." In ch 37 Ezekiel again speaks of the great blessings to be enjoyed by the people of God, including cleansing, walking in God's statutes, recognition as God's people, etc, and he distinctly says of this era of blessing: "I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them" (ver 26). Other important foreshadowings of the new covenant are found in Is 24:10; 55:3; 59:21; 61:8; Hos 2:18-23; Mal 3:1-4. We may well marvel at the spiritual insight of these prophets, and it is impossible to attribute their forecasts to natural genius; they can only be accounted for by Divine inspiration.

The writer to the Hebrews recurs again and again to this theme of the "New Covenant"; in 10:16.17 he cites the words of Jeremiah already quoted about writing the law on their minds, and remembering their sins no more. In 12:24, he speaks of "Jesus the mediator of a new covenant," and "the blood of sprinkling," again connecting the "blood" with the "covenant," and finally, in 13:20, he prays for the perfection of the saints through the "blood of an eternal covenant.

In 2 Cor 3 Paul has an interesting and instructive contrast between the old covenant and the new. He begins it by saying that "our sufficiency is from God; who also made us sufficient as ministers of a new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life' (5:6). The New of Old and "letter" is the letter of the law, of the old covenant which could only bring condemnation, but the spirit which characterizes the new covenant gives life, writes the law upon the heart. He goes on to speak of the old as that "ministration of death" which nevertheless "came with glory" (ver 7), and he refers esp. to the law, but the new covenant is the "ministration of the spirit," the "ministration of righteousness" (vs 8,9), and has a far greater glory than the old. The message of this "new covenant" is "the gospel of Christ." The glory of the new covenant is focused in Christ; rays flow from Him. The glory of the old dispensation was reflected upon the face of Moses, but that glory was transitory and so was the physical manifestation (ver 13). The sight of the shining face of Moses awed the people of Israel and they revered him as a leader specially favored of God (vs 7-18). When he had delivered his message he veiled his face, and they could not see that it glow did not last; every time that he went into the Divine presence he took off the veil and as his face was lit up with the glory, and coming out with the traces of that glory lingering on his countenance he delivered his message to the people. He again veiled his face (cf Ex 34 29-33), and thus the transition and obscurity of the old dispensation were symbolized. In glorious contrast to that symbolical obscurity, the ministers of the gospel, of the new covenant, use great bawdry of speech. The veil is done away in Christ (vs 12 ff). The glory which comes through Him is perpetual, and fears no vanishing away.

COVER, kuv'ër, COVERING, kuv'ër-ing: The tr of several Heb words. The covering of the ark (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, mikkeh), Gen 8 13) was possibly the lid of a hatchway (cf Mitchell, World before Abraham, 213).

To the sons of Kohath was assigned the task of caring for the furniture of the Tabernacle whenever the camp was moved, a suitable covering (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, kāṣāh) of sealskin being designated for each of the specially sacred objects, the temple curtains also being so termed (Ex 26 11 12 ff).

Nu 15 15 (gâmād) may refer to anything used as a lid or covering; Job 24 7; 31 19 (kâʿāth) refer to clothing or bed-covering.

Figurative: "Abaddon hath no covering" (kâʿāth) from God (Job 26 6); "He will destroy ... the face of the covering [ha-lō] that covereth all peoples" (Isa 25 7). The removal of the veil, often worn as a token of mourning (cf 2 S 19 4), signified the destruction of worth. W. N. STERN

COVERED WAY, kuv'ër wā (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, mēḏāb), "a covered walk": Mentioned in 2 K 16 18 (AV "covert") as a gallery belonging to the temple, concerning the purpose of which opinions differ. Some consider it to have been the place where the king stood or sat during the Sabbath services; others, a public place for teaching; others, the way by which the priest entered the sanctuary on the Sabbath.

COVERING, kuv'ër-ing, FOR THE HEAD (צַנְפּזָלָאטי), "peribolation": Mentioned in the NT only in 1 Cor 11 15: "For her hair is given her for a covering,” lit. “something cast round,” probably equivalent to “veil” (q.v.), Read in the light of the context: Every woman praying or prophesying with her head unveiled dishonors her head” (ver 5). The meaning would seem to be that Nature it-

COVERT, kuv'ër-t: Now seldom used, except for game, and then generally spelt “cove” or “a covered way” (2 K 16 18 AV); also a shelter of any kind (Isa 4 6); a hiding place, “a lair,” a den” (Job 28 4); “a face of secrecy,” “a secret way” (1 S 25 26; Job 40 21; Ps 61 4; Isa 14 3; 32 2); “a den,” “a lair” (Jer 25 38).

COVET, kuv'ër-t (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, 'awzah; τάκευμα, zelō), “to desire earnestly;” “to set the heart and mind upon anything” Used: in two senses: good, simply to desire earnestly but legitimately, e.g. AV 1 Cor 12 31; 14 30; bad, to desire unlawfully, or to secure illegally (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, ἀράχησι); hence: “a lust” (Mt 5 28; 1 Cor 10 6), “concupiscence” (AV Rom 7 8; Col 3 5).

COVETOUSNESS, kuv'et-us-nes: Has a variety of shades of meaning determined largely by the nature of the particular word used, or the context, or both. Following are some instances of how to gain dishonestly (טֵוָֽשֶׁר, πράσον), e.g. AV Ex 18 21; Ezek 33 31. (2) The wish to have more than one possesses, inordinately, of course (πλεονεξία, πλεονεκρία), e.g. Lk 12 15; 1 Thess 2 5. (3) An inordinate love of money (παιδηραγος, παιδηραγία, AV Lk 16 14; 2 Tim 2 3; philarguría, Lk 16 50); negative in He 13 5 AV.

Covetousness is a very grave sin; indeed, so heinous is it that the Scriptures class it among the very gravest and grossest crimes (Eph 5 5). In Col 3 5 it is "covetousness," while in Col 3 10 it is set forth as excluding a man from heaven. Its heinousness, doubtless, is accounted for by its being in a very real sense the root of so many other forms of sin, e.g. departure from the faith (1 Tim 6 9.10); lying (2 K 22-25); theft (Josh 7 21); domestic trouble (Prov 16 27); murder (Ezk 22 12); indeed, it leads to "many foolish and hurtful lusts" (1 Tim 6 9). Covetousness has always been a very serious menace to mankind, whether in the OT or NT period. It was one of the sins that broke out after Israel had entered into the promised land (Achan, Josh 7); and also in the early Christian church immediately after its founding (Ananias and Sapphira, Acts 5); hence so many warnings against it. A careful reading of the OT will reveal the fact that a very great part of the Jewish law—such as its enactments and regulations regarding duties toward the poor, toward servants; concerning cleansing, usury, pledges, gold and silver taken during war—was introduced and intended to counteract the spirit of covetousness.

Eerdmans maintains (Expos, July, 1909) that the commandment, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house" (Ex 20 17), meant to the Israelite that he should not take anything of his neighbor's possessions that were removed or unprotected by their owner. Of Ex 34 23 ff. Thus, it refers to a category of acts that is not covered by the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." It is an oriental habit of mind from of old that when anyone sees abandoned goods which he thinks desirable, there is not the least objection to taking them, and Ex 20 17 would probably be an explanation of what is to be understood by "house" in ver 17a.

Examples of covetousness: Achan (Josh 7); Saul (1 S 16 9.19); Judas (Mt 26 14.15); Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5 1-11); Balaam (2 Pet 2 15 with Jude ver 11).

COW, Kou, KINE, Kin ( Heb. בָּקָר, בָּקָר), "cow"; בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, "shekhlath bəqər (Isa. 7:21)"; בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, "young of a sheep, goat, or cow"; בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, "milk kine, from בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, "to suckle"; בַּקָּר, בַּקָּר, 'eleph): In Am 4:1, the term, "kine of Bashan," is applied to the voluptuous women of Samaria. In Gen 41:36 is the narration of Pharaoh's dream of the seven fat and seven lean kine. In Isaiah's vision (Isa. 11:7) we have (And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together.) Cows do not seem to have been sacrificed. The sacrifice of the kine that brought the ark back from the Philis (1:8 14) was due to the exceptional circumstances. See ALFRED ELY DAY.

COZ, ko z (גּוֹז, กอย, "thorn"): A man of Judah (1 Ch 4:8). ARV has added the art., making the name Hakkor without sufficient reason. The name occurs with the art. (Ha-kôz) in Ezr 2:61; Neh 3:42; 7:63, and I Ch 24:10, but not with reference to the same person. Coz was of the tribe of Judah, while Hakkor belonged to the family of Aaron.

COZEBI, ko-zè'-bi (1 Ch 4:22). See ACHZIB.

CRACKNEL, krak'nel: Occurs in 1 K 14:3, where Jeroboam bids his wife go to Abijah to inquire concerning their son: "And take with thee ten loaves and cracknels" (AV "cakes," ERV "cracknels," ABV "cakes"). The Heb word is קְרָכֵל, k̄̄rakhōdām, from נָכַח, "to prick" or "mark"; most probably cakes with holes pricked in them like our biscuits.

CRAFT, kraft, CRAFTINESS, kra'ti-nes (πανοργία, πανοργία), CRAFTY, kra'fti (πανοργιός, πανοργεία): The original meaning is that of "ability to do anything," universally applied in a bad sense to unscrupulous wickedness, that stops short of no means to attain its purpose; then, in a modified form, to resourcefulness in wrong, cunning (Dnl 8:25; 2 Mac 12:24; RVm "jugglery"). In Lk 20:32, Jesus perceives "the craftiness" of His adversaries, i.e. the complicated network which they have laid to ensnare Him. The art with which a plot is concealed, and its direction to the ruin of others, are elements that enter into the meaning. Heinrich on 1 Cor 3:19 illustrates from Plato the distinction between craftiness and wisdom. There is a touch of humor in 2 Cor 12:16, when Paul speaks of his conduct toward the Corinthians as having been "crafty." H. E. JACOBS.

LITERATURE
1. SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE:--Our knowledge of the arts and crafts of Bible times has come to us through two principal ways. First, from Bib., Assy, Bab and Egypt written records. Of these the Egypt are the most illuminating. Second, from examples of ancient handicraft which have been buried and preserved through many centuries. and brought to light again by modern discoveries.

(1) Jewish craftsmanship:--The chief written documents from which we may learn about about of crafts are the Bible records. A study of what few references there are leads us to believe that before the Israelites came into contact with the people of Canaan and Phoenicia they had not developed any considerate as a technical skill (1 K 5:6; 1 Ch 14:1; 2 Ch 2:7.14; Ezr 3:7). Some of the simpler operations, such as the spinning and weaving of the common fabrics and the shaping of domestic utensils, were performed in the household (Ex 35:25.26) but the dyeing and finishing of fine fabrics, carving, inlaying, metal-working, etc., was the work of foreigners, or was learned by the Jews after the Exodus, from the dwellers in Pal.

The Jews, however, gradually developed skill in many of these crafts. It is believed that as early as Nehemiah's time, Jewish craftsmen had organized into guilds (Neh 3:8.31.32). In post-Bib. times the Jews obtained monopolies in some of the industries, as for example, glass-making and dyeing. These trades remained the secrets of certain families for generations. It is because of this secrecy and the mystery that surrounded these trades, and is still maintained in many places, that we know so little as to how they were conducted. Until recently the precious indigo dyers in Damascus were Jews, and the Jewish craftsmen with modern craftsman the right to make glass. In some of the Syrian cities Jewish craftsmen are now outnumbering other native workmen in certain trades.

Few examples of Heb craftsmanship have been discovered by the archaeologists which shed much light upon early Heb work. Aside from the pottery of the Israelitish period, and a few seals and coins, no traces of Heb workmanship remain. It is even doubtful how many of the above objects are really the work of this people.

(2) Canaanitish and Phoenician craftsmanship:--It is generally conceded that what technical skill the Hebrews acquired resulted from their contact with the Canaanites and Phoenicians. Frequent mention of the workmanship of these peoples is made in the Bible, but their own records are silent. Ezekiel's account of the glories of Tyre (Ezk 27) gives some idea of the reputation of that city for craftsmanship: "They builders have perfected thy beauty" (ver. 4); "Syria was thy merchant... Damascus was thy merchant for the multitude of thy handiworks" (ver. 16.18). Adad-nirari III (812-783 BC), the Assy king, enumerates the tribute which he exacted from the king of Damascus. "Variegated... linen, an ivory bed, a seat of inlaid ivory, a table" were among the captured articles. These were probably Phoen work.
Many examples of Phoenician craftsmanship have been discovered. These are characterized, from the standpoint of art, by a crudeness which distinguishes them from the more delicately and artfully wrought work of the Babylonians and Egyptians. The credit remains, however, to the Phoenicians of introducing skilled workmanship into Pal. The Phoenicians, too, furnished the means of intercourse between the Babylonians and Egyptians. From the very earliest times there was an interchange of commodities and ideas between the people of the Nile and those of the Tigris and Euphrates.

(3) Assyrian and Babylonian craftsmanship.—The Babylonians and Assyrians made few references to their own handicraft in their records; but the explorers of recent years have revealed many examples of the remarkable workmanship of the early inhabitants of Mesopotamia. In referring to a silver vase found in that country (Tellah), dating from the 4th millennium BC, Clay (see "Literature") says "the whole is exceedingly well rendered and indicates remarkable skill, which in no respect is less striking than that of Egypt contemporaries in this handicraft." Jewelry, weapons, votive images of various kinds, together with many kingly, statues in the hardest stones, delicately wrought, gems, dating from the times of Abraham and earlier, lead us to ask when these people acquired their skill.

(4) Egyptian craftsmanship. —The written records of Egypt are doubly important, not only inasmuch as these they not only refer to the various crafts, but also illustrate the processes by drawings which can leave no doubt as to how the workmen accomplished their ends. Therefore, the extensive explorations in Egypt of the last forty years have given to the world many priceless relics of craftsmanship, some of them dating from the very dawning of civilization. Among the ruins of early Syrian and Palestinian cities are found numerous objects witnessing to the skill of the Egyptians. These objects and the evidence of the influence of their work on the Phoenician arts show the part that the Egyptians played in moulding the ideas of the workmen who were chosen to build the temple at Jerus. In the following brief summary of the crafts mentioned in the Bible, it will be noticeable how well they may be illustrated by the monuments of the Nile country. To confirm the knowledge derived from the above sources, the data illustrating the present-day customs in Egyptian life are valuable. These will be mentioned in discussing the various crafts.

II. Crafts Directly or Indirectly Mentioned in the Bible. —(For a more detailed treatment of the crafts see under separate arts.) This industry probably originated in Babylonia, but the knowledge of the process was early carried to Egypt, where later the Hebrews, along with other captives, were driven to making the bricks of the Egyptians. The making of sun-dried bricks called for little skill, but the firing and glazing of bricks required trained workmen. See BRICK.

Wood was extensively used by ancient builders. With the exception of the Egypt antiquities, little remains but the records to indicate this fact. Numerous references are made to the carpenter in building the temple and subsequent repairs of this structure (1 K 6:5; 2 Ch 3; 2 K 22; 6; 22 Ch 32 11; 2 Ch 24 12; 2 K 22 6; Ezr 3 7; 4 1). David's house and that of Solomon and his favorite wife were made partly of wood. In the story of the building of the tabernacle, wood-working is mentioned (Ex 25). The people of Tyre built ships of cypress, with masts of cedar wood and oars of oak (Ex 27 5, 6). Idols were carved from wood (Dt 29 17; 2 K 19 18; Isa 37 19; 45 20). The Philis built a wooden cart to carry the ark (1 S 6 7). Threshing instruments and yokes were made of wood (2 S 24 22). Ezra read the law from a pulpit of wood (Neh 8 4). Solomon's chariots were made of wood (Cant 3 9). Inlaid work, still a favorite form of decoration in Syria, was used by the Phoenicians (Ex 27 5). How the ancient carpenters did their work can be assumed from the Egypt monuments. Some of the operations there pictured are still performed in the same way. See TOOLS; CARPENTER.

The terms "carving" and "engraving" are used interchangeably in translating OT passages. The first mention made of engraved objects is in:

3. Carving was the signet of Judah (Gen 38 18).

(Engraving) The art of engraving on various hard objects, such as clay, bone, ivory, metals and precious stones, probably came from Mesopotamia. The Hebrews learned engraving from the Canaanites. The nature of this engraving is shown by the Assyrian cylinders and Egyptian scarabs. It is doubtful how many of the signs found in Pale were used as bowls, as the engraved devices are mostly Phoenician symbols. In Egypt, however, it has been the custom in the Orient for men of affairs to carry constantly with them their signets. The seal was set in a ring, or, as was the case with Judah, and as the Arabs do today, it was set on a cord suspended around the neck. One of the first sights in a Syrian city street is the engraver of signets, seated at his low bench ready to cut on one of his blank seals the buyer's name or sign.

4. Ceramics and pottery. Carved pottery was often done on decorated surfaces. See CERAMICS.

Both the Egyptians and Babylonians were skilled in molding and baking objects of clay. The early Bab records consist of burnt clay tablets with scores of glazed bricks used as important decorative features. In Egypt, idols, scarabs and amulets were often made of fired clay, glazed or unglazed. By far the most important branch of ceramic art was the making of jars for holding water or other liquids. These jars have been used throughout the East from earliest times. The Jews learned what they knew about this art from the Phoenicians. See POTTERY.

Dyeing is one of the oldest of the crafts, The only reference to the act of dyeing in the Bible are (a) in connection with the dyed skins of animals (Ex 25 5; 26 14), and (b) Jgs and Cleanings— 5 30. That it was a highly developed trade is implied in the many other references to dyed stuffs both in the Bible and in profane lit. Cleansing was done by the fuller, who was probably a dyer also. See COLOR; Dye; Fuller.

Very little is known of the work of embroidery, further than that it was the working-in color thread (Ex 27 7). See EMBROIDERING.

6. Embroidering—learn that it was one of the exports of Egypt. See EMBROIDERING.
Hebrews being acquainted with glass-making, as its history extends back to very early times. The Egyptians and Phoenicians made bottles, glass beads, idols, etc. These objects are among the ones usually found in the tombs. Glass beads of very early manufacture were found in the mound at Gezer. Some of the pigments used for painting were made of powdered colored glass. In the NT we read of the "bead of glass like unto crystal" (Rev 4:6). See Glass.

Grinding was a domestic task and can hardly be classed as one of the crafts. When flour was needed, the housewife, or more likely the servants, ground the wheat or barley between two millstones (see Millstone) or, with a rounded river stone, crushed the wheat on a large flat stone. It is still a common custom in Syria and Pal for women to work together as indicated in Mt 24:41 and Lk 17:35. Grinding of meal was a menial task, considered the employment of a concubine; hence setting Samson to grinding at the mill was intended as a disgrace.

The rhythmic sound of the stone cutter at his work never ceased in the cities. It is probable that this was for sanitary reasons, for the city was built of stone. As such buildings were very common, and much attention was paid to every detail of their construction, there was developed an efficient corps of masons, especially in Egypt and Syria. When the Israelites abandoned their nomadic life, one of the first things that they planned were permanent places of worship. As these developed into structures more pretentious than mere piles of stones, the builders naturally resorted to the skill of the master builders of the country. A visitor to Jerus may still see the work of the ancient masons. The so-called Solomon's quarries under the city, the great drafted stones of the temple area, belong to an early date. The very shape of the masons' tools may be determined from the marks on the stones. See Mason.

Among the oldest objects that have been preserved are those of silver, gold and bronze. These are proof that the ancients understood the art of cutting, smelting, refining and working of metals.

Oil-Making

The oil referred to in the Bible is olive oil. Pliny mentions many other oils which were extracted in Egypt. The oils were usually extracted by first crushing the fruit and then pressing the crushed mass. At Gezer, Tell es Shab and other ancient ruins old oil presses have been discovered. See Oil.

One who has visited the tombs and temples of Egypt will never forget the urge which the ancient Egypt painters made of colors. The otherwise somber effect produced by expansile plain walls was overcome by sculpturing, either in relief or intaglio, on a coating of stucco, and then coloring these engravings in reds, yellows, greens and blues. Architectural details were also painted. The capitals of columns and the columns themselves received special attention from the painter. Colors were similarly used by the Greeks and Phoenicians.

In the Sidon tombs, at Palmyra and similar ruins, traces of painting are still evident. See Painting. The colors used in these temples and tombs in the OT (Isa 19:7 AV) and once in NT (2 Jn 20:12), in Isa 19:7 the RV renders "paper reeds," "meadows." Papyrus (q.v.) occurs in Isa 18:2 and RVm of Ex 2:3. The nearest approach to our paper which the ancients possessed was that made from a species of papyrus reed. The plant grows out, side by side, long strips of the inner lining of the papyrus reed, then over these other strips at right angles to the first, afterward soaking with some adhesive material and finally pressing and drying. Sheets made in this way were fastened together with glue into a long scroll. The Gr for papyrus plant is "biblos," from which the Eng word "Bible" is derived. Parchment, leather and leaves were also used as paper. The natives of Syria and Pal still call a sheet of paper a "leaf" (Arab. warqa).

The art of perfume-making dates back to the ancient Egyptians. In Ex 30:35 we have the first mention of scented anointing oils. The perfumers' (AV "confectioner" or "apothecary") products were used (a) for religious rites as offerings and to anoint the idols and (b) for personal use on the body or clothes. Some perfumes were of either scented oils or fats (ointments). See Perfume.

The trade of plastering dates back to the beginning of the history of building. There were two reasons for using plastering or stucco: (a) to render the building more resistant to the weather and (b) to make the surfaces more suitable for decoration by engraving or painting. See Plaster.

The arts of spinning and weaving were early practised in the household. See Spinning; Weaving.

Although it is known that tanning was practiced, the only reference to this trade mentioned in the Bible is to Simon the tanner (Acts 9:43; 10:62). Leather girdles are mentioned in 2 K 1:8; Mt 3:4. Relics taken from the tombs show that the ancients understood the various methods for preserving skins which are used in present-day practice. See Tanner.

We think of Paul as the tent-maker. The tents which he made however were probably not like those so frequently referred to in the OT. Tents in Paul's time were made from Cilician cloth. Paul's work was probably the sewing together of the proper lengths of cloth and the attaching of ropes and loops. In OT times the tents were made of strips of coarse goat's hair cloth or of the skins of animals. See Tent.

This art is being written within sound of festivities about the winepresses of Mt. Lebanon where men and women were gathered for the annual production of wine and molasses (Arab. dib). Their process is so like that of Bible times that one is transported in thought to similar festivities that must have taken place in the ancient Egypt. Kings that applied these workers understood the precautions necessary for procuring a desirable product is evidenced by early writings. The choice of proper soil for the vineyards, the adding of preservatives to keep the wine, boiling the juice to kill undesirable ferments, guarding against rats and other pests, are examples of their knowledge of wine-making. See Wine Press.

III. Craftsmen.—Craftsmen were early segregated into groups. A trade usually remained in a family. This is true to some extent in the East today. In such cities as Beirût, Damascus, or Aleppo the shops of the craftsmen of a given trade will be found grouped together. There is a silver and goldsmiths' market (Arab. skîk), an iron market, a dyeing quarter, etc. Jewish craftsmen in early times sat separately in the synagogues. Some crafts were looked upon with disfavor, esp. those which brought men in contact with women, as for example, the trade of goldsmith, carder, weaver, fuller or tanner. There was a fellow-feeling among craftsmen referred to by Isaiah (Isa. 41:6, 7). This same feeling is observed among Syrian workmen today. The Arab has many phrases of encouragement for a man at his work, such as, "Peace to your hands," "May God give you strength." A crowd of men pulling at a pulley rope, for example, shout or sing together as they pull.

CRAG, krag (תֶּבֵּל, shén [1 S 8 12; 14 4; Job 39 28 AV and ERV]): In a mountainous country composed of sedimentary rocks, like the cretaceous rocks of Pal, cliffs are formed on a slope where hard strata are underlaid by softer strata. The soft strata wear away more rapidly, undermining the hard strata above them, which for a time project, but finally break off by vertical joint planes, the fragments rolling down to form the talus slope at the foot of the cliff. As the breaking off of the undermined hard strata proceeds irregularly, there are left projecting crags, sometimes at the top of the cliff, and sometimes lower down. Two such crags (šên ha-qâlâ, "sharp rock," RV "rocky crag"), which were given particular names, Boez and Sench, marked the scene of the exploit of Jonathan described in 1 S 14. Conder failed to identify the crags, and it has been proposed to alter the text rather extensively to make it read: "wall of rock" instead of "crag" (EB s. v. "Michmash"). Such rocks form safe resting-places for birds of prey, as it is said of the eagle in Job 39 28 ERV:

"She dwellth on the rock and hath her lodging there.
Upon the crag of the rock, and the stronghold"

CRANE, krân (צָבָא, qâvâ; יֶבְנֵה, yâvānâ; Lat Grus cinerea): A bird of the family gruidae. The crane is mentioned twice in the Bible: once on account of its voice (Isa. 38 14: "Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter"); again because of the unforgettable picture these birds made in migration (Jer. 8 7): "Yea, the stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times; and the turtle-dove, and the swallow and the crane observe the time of their coming; but my people know not the law of the Lord.

The commentators have found reasons for dropping the crane from the ornithology of the Bible, but this never should be permitted. They were close relatives of stork, heron and ibis; almost as numerous as any of these, and residents of Pal, except in migration. The two quotations concerning them fit with their history, and point out the two features that made them as noticeable as any birds of Pal. Next to the ostrich and pelican they were the largest birds, having a wing sweep of 8 ft. from tip to tip and standing 4 ft. in height. In migration such immense flocks passed over Pal as to darken the sky, and when they crossed the Red Sea they appeared to sweep from shore to shore, and so became the most noticeable migratory bird, for which reason, no doubt, they were included in Isaiah's reference to spring migration with the beloved doves, used in sacrifice and for caged pets, and with the swallows that were held almost sacred because they homed in temples. Not so many of them settled in Pal as of the storks, but large flocks lived in the wilderness S. of Jerusalem, and a few pairs homed near water as far north as Merom. The grayish-brown cranes were the largest, and there were also a crested, and a white crane. They nested on the ground or in trees and laid two large eggs, differing with species. The eggs of the brown bird were a light gray with brown speckles, and those of the white, rough, pale-blue with brown splorches. They were not so affectionate in pairs or to their young as storks, but were average parents. It is altogether probable that they were the birds intended by Isaiah, because they best suited his purpose, the crane and the swallow being almost incessant talkers among birds. The word "chatter," used in the Bible, exactly suits the notes of a swallow, but is much too feeble to be used in describing the vocalizing of the crane. They migrated in large wedge-shaped companies and cried constantly on wing. They talked incessantly while at the business of living, and even during the watches of the night they scarcely ceased passing along word that all was well, or sending abroad danger signals. The Arabs called the cry of the cranes "bellowing." We usually express it by whooping or trumpeting. Any of these words is sufficiently expressive to denote an unusual voice, used in an unusual manner, so that it appealed to the prophet as suitable for use in a strong comparison.

CRASHING, krash'ing (כָּשֶׁב, shebher): This word, meaning "a breach," fig. "destruction," is גָּד (transliterated "crash") in Zeph. 1 10: "a great crashing from the hills," representing the doom to fall on evil-doers in Jerusalem, as the enemy advanced against the city from the north.

Menedius (2 Macc 4 29). As Cyprus was not at the time in the possession of Antiochus, the words have been generally taken to mean Krates "who had formerly been, or afterward was, governor of the Cyprians." The Vulg translates the Gr into "Sostratus autem praecunctat Cypris."

LITERATURE

Much negative ground has been cleared away for any modern discussion of the doctrine of creation. No idea of creation can now be taken as complete which does not include creation as Abiding besides the world as at first constituted, all that to this day is in and of creation. For God creates not that which can exist independently of Him, His preserving agency being inseparably connected with His creative power. We have long ceased to think of God's creation as a machine left, completely, made, to its own automatic working. With such a doctrine of creation, a theistic evolution would be quite incompatible.

Just as little do we think of God's creative agency, as merely that of a First Cause, linked to the universe from the outside by effects. Nature in her entirety is as truly His creation today as she ever was. The dynamic ubiquity of God, as efficient energy, is to be affirmed. God is still All and in All, but this in a way sharply distinguished from pantheistic views, whether of the universe as God, or of God as the universe. Of old He created such that so gnostic theories of natural and necessary emanation are left far behind. Not only have the "carpenter" and the "gardener" theories—within, of course, the architect or world-builder theory of Plato—been dismissed; not only has the conception of evolution been proved harmonious with creative end, plan, purpose, ordering, guidance; but evolutionary science may itself be said to have given the thought of theistic evolution its best base or ground. The thought现今 is, that the world—that all cosmic existences, substances, events—depend upon God. The doctrine of creation—of the origin and persistence, of all finite existences—as the work of God, God as the necessary postulate of the religio-consciousness. Such consciousness is marked by deeper insight than belongs to science. The underlying truth is the anti-patheistic one, that the energy and wisdom—by which that, which was not, become—were, in kind, other than its own. For science can but trace the continuity of sequences in all Nature, while in creation, in its primary sense, this law of continuity must be transcended, and the world vision produced which is immanent in its evolution. For God is the Absolute Reason, always immanent in the developing universe. Apart from the cosmogonic attempts at the beginning of Genesis, which are clearly religious and ethical in scope and character, the OT furnishes no theorectic account of the manner and order in which creation proceeded.

The early chs of Genesis were, of course, not given to reveal the truths of physical science, but they recognize creation as marked by order, continuity, law, plastic power of God. Besides completeness in different kingdoms, unity of the world and progressive advance. The Genesis cosmogony teaches a process of becoming, as well as a creation (see Evolution). That cosmogony has been recognized by Haeckel as meritoriously marked by the two great ideas of separation or differentiation, and of progressive development or perfecting of the originally simple matter. The OT presents the conception of time-worlds or successive ages, but its real emphasis is on the energy of the Divine Word, bringing into being things that did not exist.

The OT and the NT, in their doctrine of creation, recognize no eternal matter before creation. We cannot say that the origin of matter is excluded from the Genesis account of creation, and this quite apart from the use of bâr'dâ, as admitting of material and means in creation. But it seems unwise to build upon Genesis passages that afford no more than a basis and explanation of the NT. The NT seems to favor the derivation of matter from the non-existent—that is to say, the time-worlds were due to the efficient Divine Word or originate Will, rather than to being built out of God's own immanent essence. So the best exegesis interprets He 11 3.

In OT books, as the Ps, Prov, and Jer, the creation is expressly declared to be the work of Wisdom—a Wisdom not disjoined from God. "Wisdom" in Creation declare the glory of God, the world manifests or reveals Him to our experience, as taken up and interpreted by the religious consciousness. The primary fact of the beginning of the time-worlds—the basal fact that the worlds came into being by the Word of God—is something apprehensible only by the power of religious faith, as the only principle applicable to the case (He 11 3). Such in the mind of Him He created. The first principles in the highest—and a truly rational one (see Logos). In creation, God is but expressing or acting out the conscious Godhead that is in Him. In it the thought of His absolute Wisdom is realized by the action of His perfect Love. It is philosophically necessary to maintain that God, as the Absolute Being, must find the end of creation in Himself. If the end were external to, and independent of, Him, then would He be conditioned thereby.

What the Divine Being is concerned to maintain, is the absolute freedom of God in the production of the universe, and the fact that He is so much greater than the universe that existence has been by Him bestowed on all things that do exist. The Scriptures are, from first to last, shot through with this truth. Neither Kant nor Spencer, from data of self-consciousness or sense-perception, can rise to the conception of creation, for they both fail to reach the idea of Divine Personality. The inconceivability of creation has been pressed by Spencer, the idea of a self-existent Creator, through whose agency it has been made, being to him unthinkable. As if it were not a transparent fact of man's own scientific practice refuted, that a hypothesis may not have philosophical or scientific value, because it is... what we call unthinkable or inconceivable. As if a true and sufficient cause were not enough, or a Divine act of will were not a vera causa. Dependent existence inevitably leads thought to demand exception that God may have some place in time, since time cannot be posited prior to the existence of the world. The difficulties of the ordinary hypothesis of a creation in time can never be surmounted, so long as we continue to make eternity mean simply indefinitely prolonged time. Augustine was, no doubt, right when, from the human standpoint, he declared that the world was not made in time, but with time. Time is itself a creation simultaneous with, and conditioned by, world-creation and movement. To assert the ordinary fashion of thoughts, that God created in time, is apt to make time appear independent of God, or God dependent upon time. Yet the time-forms enter into all our psychological experience, and a concrete beginning is unthinkable to make the
The time-conditions can be transcended only by some deeper intuition than mere logical insight that can supply—by such intuitive endeavors, in fact, as is realized in the necesary-religion of the modern Christian God, if such an eternal Being acts or creates.
He may be said to act or create in eternity; and it is legitimate enough, in such wise, to speak of His creative act as eternal. This seems preferable to the position of Origen, who speculatively assumed an eternal or unbeginning activity for God as Creator, because the Divine Nature must be eternally self-determined to create in order to the manifestation of its perfections. Clearly did Aquinas perceive that we cannot affirm an eternal creation impossible, the creative act not falling within our categories of time and space. The question is purely one of God’s free volition, in which—and not in “nothing”—the Source of the world is found.
This brings us to notice the frequently pressed objection that creation cannot be the act of nothing, since out of nothing comes nothing.
10. Creation This would mean that matter is eter-“ex nihilo” nal. But the eternity of matter, as something other than God, means its independence of God, and its power to limit or condition Him. We have, of course, no direct knowledge of the origin of matter, and the conception of its necessary self-existence is fraught with hopeless difficulties and absurdities. The axiom, that out of nothing nothing comes, is not contradicted in the case of creation. The universe comes from God; it does not come from nothing. But the axiom does not really apply to the world’s creation, but only to the succession of its phenomena. Entity does not spring from non-entity. But there is an opposite and positive truth, that something presupsposes something, in this case rather some One—aliquis rather than aliquot.
It is enough to know that God has in Himself the powers adequate for creating, without being able to define the ways in which creation is effected by Him.
11. From God’s Will It is a sheer necessity of rational faith or spiritual reason that the something which conditions the world is neither an elemental matter, but personal and origi-native Will. We have no right to suppose the world made out of nothing, and then to identify, as Erigena did, this “nothing” with God’s own essence. What we have a right to maintain is, that what God creates for calls into his own being and leave the world; and so save His will alone, Ground of all actualities. Pre-existent Personality is the ground and the condition of the world’s beginning.
In this sense, its beginning may be said to be relative rather than absolute. God is always antecedent to the universe—its prius.
12. Error of Cause and Creator. It remains an Pantheistic effect, and sustains a relation of causal dependence upon Him. If we say, like Cousin, that things have taken place in time, we run risk of falling into Spinozistic pantheism, identifying God, in excluding from Him absolute freedom in creation, with the impersonal and unconscious substance of the universe. Or if, with Schelling, we posit in God something which is not God—a dark, irrational background, which original ground is also the ground of the Divine Existence —may we try to find a basis for the matter of the universe, but we are in danger of being merged—by our conceptions of God, in the idea of Pantheism, to which God is but the soul of the universe.
The universe, we feel sure, has been caused; its existence must have some ground; even if we held a philosophy as idealistic as the system of created things one grand illusion, an illusion so vast would still call for some explanatory Cause.
Even if we are not content with the conception of a First Cause, acting on the world from without and antecedently, we are not yet freed from the necessity of asserting a Cause. An underlying and determining Cause of the universe would still need to be postulated as its Ground.
Even a universe held to be eternal would need to be accounted for—we should still have to ask how such a universe came to be. Its endless movement must have direction and character imparted to it from some immanent ground or underlying cause. Such a self-existent and eternal World-Ground or First Cause is, by an inexorable law of thought, the necessary correlate of the finitude, or contingent character of the world. God and the world are to be taken simply as cause and effect, for modern metaphysical thought is not content with such a mere ens extra-mundanum for the Ground of every possible experience. God, self-existent Cause of the ever-present world and its phenomena, is the ultimate Ground of the possibility of all that is.
Such a Deity, as causa sui, creatively bringing forth the world out of His own potence, cannot be allowed to be an arbitrary resting-place, but a truly rational Ground, of End—the thought. Nor can His Creation be Divine allowed to be an aimless and me-genial universe: it is shot through with end or purpose that tends to reflect the glory of the eternal and personal God, who is its Creator in a full and real sense. But the Divine action is not dramatic: of His working we can truly say, with Isa 45 15, “Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself.” As creation becomes progressively disclosed to us, its glory, as revealing God, ought to excite within us an always deeper sense of the sentiment of Ps. 102 13, “O Jehovah of the Lord, how long is thy name in all the earth?” See also Anthro-poology; Earth; World.

CREATOR, krē′tər (κτίστης, kitesēs, 1 Pet 4:19): The distinctive characteristic of Deity, as the Creator, is that He is the Cause of Being, not merely of its evolution or present arrangements. The doctrine of His being the Creator implies, that is to say, that He is the real and the exclusive Agent in the production of the world. For, as Porter remarks, the thought of the Creator is the most fruitful of all our ideas. As Creator, He is the Unconditioned, and the All-conditioning, Being. The universe is thus dependent upon Him, as its causative antecedent. He cannot not be necessary to His own whole substance," into being, without any presupposed basis. His power, as Creator, is different in kind from finite power. But the creative process is not a case of sheer almightiness, creating something out of nothing, but an expression of God, as the Absolute Reason, under the forms of time and space, causality and finite personality. In all His work, as Creator, there is no inclement from without, but it rather remains an eternal activity of self-manifestation on the part of a God who is Love.

God's free creative action is destined to realize archetypal ends and ideals, which are peculiar to Himself. For thought cannot be content with the causal category under in Creation or Precedent. The He can call the thing into being, but must run on to the teleological category, wherein He is assumed to have created with a purpose, which His directive agency will see at last fulfilled. As Creator, He is distinct from the universe, which is the product of the free action of His will. This theistic postulation of His freedom, as Creator, rules out all theories of necessary emanation. His creative action was in no way necessarily necessary to His own blessedness or perfection, which must be held as already complete in Himself. To speak, as Professor James does, of "the stagnant felicity of the Absolute's own perfection" is to misconceive the infinite plenitude of His activity and to place Him in a position of abject and unworthy dependence upon an eternal activity of world-making.

God's action, as Creator, does not lower our conception of His changelessness, for it is a gratuitous manifestation of His will. The will to time accidental thing, or that He could not or will a change, without, in any proper sense, changing His will. Again, grave difficulties cluster around the conception of His creative thought or purpose as externalized in time, the chief source of the trouble being, as is often imperfectly realized, that, in attempting to view things as they were when time began, we are really trying to look out of, and beyond, experience, to the thinking of which time is an indispensable condition.

God's work as Creator must have taken place in time, since the world must be held as no necessary element in the Absolute Life.

The self-determined action of the Divine Will, then, is to be taken as the ultimate principle of the cosmos. Not to any causal or meta-

CREATURE, LIVING (τῶν, hýgēn; ἠγων; ζών): "Living creature" (hýgēn) is the designation of each of the composite figures in Ezekiel's visions (1:5.13.f; 3:13; 10.15.17.20) and, of the similar beings in the visions of the Apocalypse, instead of the considerably unfortunate "animal" in AV by "beast" (Rev 6:4 ff; 5:6 ff; 6:1 ff; 7:11; 14:3; 16:7; 19:4), which, however, went back to Wiclif, in whose time the word had not the low meaning which "beast," "beastly" have with us; hence he translates 1 Cor 15:44, "It is sown a beastly body," meaning simply animal (see Trench's Select Glossary); in Rev "the beasts of the earth," the "beasts" that came up, the notable "beast" that men worshipped, represent the Gr ἄριστον, "a wild beast."

The "living creatures" in Ezekiel's vision (1:5 ff) were four in number, "with the general appearance of a man, but each with four faces and four wings, and straight legs with the feet of an ox. Under their wings they spread with one arm and plant their feet, and join so to make that they never require to turn. The front face is that of a man; right and left of this are the faces of a lion and [of] an ox, and behind, that of an eagle. . . . out of the midst of them gleam fire, torches, lightning, and coals of fire. . . . there are four wheels that can turn in every direction, called whirling wheels (10.12.13). Like the creatures, these are alive, covered with eyes, the sign of intelligence; the spirit of the living creatures is in them. They are afterward discovered by the prophet to be cherubim" (Schultz, OT Theology, II, 233). See CHERUBIM. In Ezekiel's vision they seem to be the bearers of the throne and glory of God; the bearers of His presence and of His revelation (9:3; 10:3). They also sound forth His praise (3:12; 10:2). (See Schultz as above.)

The four living creatures in Rev (4:6) are not under the throne but "in the midst of the throne" (ARV "before"); see 7:17; cf 5:6) and "round about the throne." They are also cherubim, and seem to represent the four beings that stand at the head of the four divisions of the creation; among the untamed animals the lion; among cattle the calf or ox; among birds the eagle; among fish the sea. They give a perfect picture of true service, which should be as brave as the lion, patient as the ox, aspiring as the eagle, intelligent as man" (Milligan in loc.). They represent the powers of Nature—of the creation, “full of eyes” as denoting its permeation with the Divine Reason, the wings signifying its constant, ready service, and the unceasing praise the constant doing of God’s will. The imagery is founded on Ezekiel as that had been modified in apocalyptic writings and as it was exalted in the mind of the Seer of Patmos.

CREDIT, kred’it (προτεινω, pistolein; 1 Mac 10 46 AV, RV “gave no credence”; Wisd 18 6 AV, RV “trusted”; 1 Mac 30 30, AV “credence”): In the modern commercial sense the noun “credit” does not occur in the canonical Scriptures or in the Apoc.

It follows that the actual practice was not so considerate, and in consequence the creditor fell into bad repute. In Ps 109 11 he is the extortioner; in Prov 29 13 the oppressor is evidently the creditor, though a different word is used; cf also Prov 30 7. In Sir 29 28 the importance of the creditor is one of the hardships of the poor man of understanding. The actual practice of the Jews may be gathered from Neh 5 1 ff; Jer 34 8 ff; and Sir 29 1–11. LITERATURE

By “creed” we understand the systematic statement of religious faith; and by the creeds of the Christian church we mean the formal expression of the “faith which was delivered unto the saints.” The word is derived from the first word of the Latin VSS of the Apostles’ Creed, and the name is usually applied to those formulae known as the Apostles’, the Nicene and the Athanasian creeds.

In this art. we shall first indicate the Scriptural foundation and rudimentary Bib. statements upon which the distinctive dogmas of the church are based; and, secondly, briefly describe the origin and nature of the three most important symbols of belief which have dominated Christian theology.

1. Scriptural Basis.—There are three forms in which the religious instinct naturally expresses itself—in a ritual, a creed and a life. Men first seek to propitiate the Deity by some outward act and express their devotion in some external ceremony. Then they endeavor to explain their worship and to find a rationale of it in certain facts which they formulate into a confession; and lastly, not content with the outward act or the verbal interpretation of it, they attempt to express their religion in life.

Pagan religion first appears in the form of a rite. The worshipers was content with the proper performance of a ceremony and was not, in the earliest stage at least, concerned with an interpretation of his act. The myths, which to some extent were an attempt to rationalize ritual, may be regarded as the earliest approach to a formulated statement of belief. But inasmuch as the myths of early pagan religion are not obligatory upon the reason or the faith of the worshipper, they can scarcely be regarded as creeds. Pagan religion, strictly speaking, has no theology and having no real historical basis of facts does not possess the elements of a creed. In this respect it is distinguished from revealed religion. This latter rests upon facts, the meaning and interpretation of which are felt to be necessary to give to religion meaning and reality as an ideal.

Even in the OT there are not wanting the germs of a creed. In the Decalogue we have the beginnings of the formulation of belief, and in the proclamation, “Hear, O Israel: Jehovah is our God and there is no other” (Dt 6 4), we have what may be regarded as the symbol of the OT faith and the earliest attempt to enunciate a doctrine.

It is to the NT, however, we must turn to find the real incitements of such a statement of belief as may be designated a creed. We must remember that Christ lived and taught for a time before any attempt was made to portray His life or to record His sayings. The earliest writings are not the Gospels, but some of the Epistles, and it is to them we must look for any definite explanation of the facts which center in the appearance of Christ upon the earth. At the same time in the sequence of events the personality and teaching of Jesus come first, and in the relation to Him of His disciples and converts and in their personal confessions and utterances of faith we have the earliest suggestions of an expression of belief. The confession of Nathanael (Jn 1 49), “Rabbi, thou art the Son of God,” and still more the utterance of St. Peter (Mt 16 16), “Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God,” and the exclamation of Thomas (Jn 20 28), contain the germ of a creed. It is to be noted that all these expressions of belief have Christ as their object and give utterance with more or less explicitness to a conviction of His Divine nature and authority.

But while these sayings in the Gospels were no doubt taken up and incorporated in later interpretations, it is to the Epistles that we must first go, for an explanation of the Epistles the facts of Christ’s person and His relation to God and man. Paul’s Epistles are really the nature of a confession and manifesto of Christian belief. Communities of believers already existed when the apostle directed to them his earliest letters. In their oral addresses the apostles must have been accustomed not only to state facts which were familiar to them, but also to draw inferences from them as to the meaning of Christ and the great truths centering in His person—His incarnation, His death and resurrection (as we may see from the recorded sermons of Peter and John in Acts). It is in these facts that the Epistles appeal. It was at once natural and necessary that some expression of the faith once delivered to the saints should be formulated for a body whose members were pledged to each other and united in the bonds of union was the acknowledgment of "one Lord, one faith." Paul recognizes it as vital to the very spirit of religion that some definite profession of belief in Christ should be made: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom 10:9). These words would seem to imply that a confession of the Deity, the atoning death, and resurrection of Jesus was the earliest form of Christian creed.

Paul's reference to it does not prove it untrue. It only proves at most that it was not a part of the ground upon which the Christ was commended to the first acceptance of faith. But though no direct allusion to the virgin birth occurs in Paul's writings the truth which gives spiritual value to the fact of the virgin conception, viz., God's new creation of humanity in Christ, is a vital and fundamental element in the faith both of St. Paul and of the whole early church. The Christian life is essentially a new creation (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15; Rom 6:4) in Jesus Christ, the second Adam (Rom 5:12–21), who is from heaven (1 Cor 15:47). Into this spiritual context the facts recorded by Matthew and Luke introduce no alien or incompatible element (cf W. Richmond, The Provenance of the Gospels, 1930; Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ). And therefore the story of Christ's birth as we have it in the Synoptics finds a natural place in the creed of those who accept the Pauline idea of a new creation in Christ. See Virgin Birth.

It is beyond the scope of this art. to discuss the evidences of development in the main doctrines of the gospel, but however the later ages may have elaborated them, the leading tenets of the apostolic faith of the church—the doctrine of the Trinity; Our Lord's divinity and real humanity; His atoning death and resurrection; the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and of the catholicity and unity of the church—are clear and distinct in these earliest Scriptural sources.

II. Historical Forms.—Faith implies a creed as a confession and testimony. Such a confession and testimony answers to a natural impulse of the soul. Hence a profession of faith is at once a personal act of assurance and a social and religious document. Sometimes scholars have preferred to find traces in the later writings of the NT of a more definite summary of belief: as in the allusion to the form of sound words (2 Tim 1:13), the "deposit" or "good deposit" which is to be kept (1 Tim 6:20 RVM); or "in the faithful words" enumerated in these epistles (1 Tim 1:15; 3:1; 4:8; 2 Tim 2:11); and in the remarkable passage in the beginning of He 6 in which the elementary doctrines of the Christian religion are enumerated: first on the subjective side, repentance and faith, and then objectively, the resurrection and the judgment. There are also brief summaries in several of the Pauline Epistles of what the apostle must have considered to be essential tenets. Thus for example we have the death, burial and resurrection of Christ mentioned in 1 Cor 15:3f; Rom 1:3ff.

Such summaries or confessions of personal faith as in 2 Thess 2:13f are frequent in Paul's writings and may correspond to statements of truth which the apostle found serviceable for catechetical purposes as he moved from one Christian community to another. See Catechist.

It is not indeed till a much later age—the age of Irenaeus and Tertullian (135–200)—tha t we meet with any definitive summary of belief. But it cannot be doubted that these Scriptural passages to which we have referred not only served as the first forms of confession but also contributed the materials out of which the articles of the church's faith were formulated. As soon as Christian preaching and teaching were exercised there would be a felt need for explicit statement of the truths revealed in and through Jesus Christ. It may be said that all the main facts which were subsequently embodied in the creeds have their roots in the written and unwritten teaching of the Pauline Epistles. The only exception which might be made is in the case of the virgin birth. It does not lie within the scope of this art. to comment upon the silence of the epistles on this subject. This, however, we may say, that the omission of

1. The Apostles' Creed, previously called the Roman Creed, though popularly regarded as the earliest, was probably not the first in chronological order. Its origin and growth are involved in considerable obscurity (see separate art. APOSTLES' CREED; and of Harnack, Harmonia Symbolica). The Nicene Creed, called sometimes "the Creed of the 315" from the number of bishops reputed to have been present, was authorized at the Council of Nicea in 325 AD, and completed by the Council of Constantinople in 381, when the clauses which follow the mention of the Holy Ghost were added. The opinions of Arius at the beginning of the 4th cent. created the unrest as to call forth not only the adoration of bishops but also the intervention of the emperor Constantine, who, as a professed Christian, had become the patron of the church. The efforts of the emperor, however, had no effect in allaying the dissensions of the church at Alexandria, which, upon the banishment of Arius, spread throughout eastern Christendom. It was decided, therefore, to invoke a general council of bishops at Constantinople in 381. The Council of Constantinople II, as it was shortly afterwards called, met at Nicaea in 325 AD. There is no detailed record of the proceedings. "We do not know whether it lasted weeks or months (Saunders)." The Council of Carthage met about 314, being only a presbyteral council. After this the Arians were recognized at once and for all formally declared. This, the first oecumenical council, met at Nicaea in Bithynia in 325 AD. There is no detailed record of the proceedings. "We do not know whether it lasted weeks or months (Saunders)." The Council of Carthage met about 314, being only a presbyteral council. After this the Arians were recognized at once and for all formally declared. This, the first oecumenical council, met at Nicaea in Bithynia in 325 AD. There is no detailed record of the proceedings. "We do not know whether it lasted weeks or months (Saunders)."

The controversy turned upon the nature of the Son and His relation to the Father. The word homousios ("of one substance with"), used in the course of the argument with a view of controverting the extreme orthodox position, became the battleground between the parties. The Arians violently condemned. The Subelians or Semi-Arians endeavored to save their cause by evoking its full force contended for the term homoiotatios ("like substance"). But the majority finally adopted the former expression as the term best suited to discriminate their view of the relation of the Father and Son from the Arian view. The absence of the emperor was gained and the words "being of one substance with the Father" were incorporated into the creed. The clauses descriptive of the Holy Spirit were added or confirmed at a later council (381), and were designed to refute the Macedonian heresy which denied His equality with the Father and Son, and reduced the Holy Spirit to a level with the angels.

The phrase "proceedeth from the Father and the Son" is of historic importance. The last three words are a later addition to the creed by western churches, formally adopted by the Council of Toledo in 589. But when the matter was referred in the 9th cent. to Leo III he pronounced against them as unauthorized. This interpolation, known as the Filioque, marks the difference still between the Lat and Gr churches. From the 9th cent. no change has been made in the Nicene Creed. It has remained, without the Filioque clause, the central bulwark of the Orthodox Church; and with the addition of that word it has taken its place among the three great creeds of the Western Church.

The Athanasian Creed, or the Symbolum Quicunque, as it is called, from its opening words, differs entirely in style and history from those which we have just considered. It is not a gradual evolution of a creed like the Apostles' Creed, nor is it the outcome of synodal authority like the Nicene Creed. When the composition appears for the first time as a document of authority it is cited in its completeness and as the work of the Father whose name it has since, in the most part, borne, although it was not brought to light for many centuries after his death (Lumby, Hist of the Creeds). Without going into the full and intricate evidence which has been brought forward by scholars to prove that it is incorrectly attributed to Athanasius, it is sufficient to observe that both authorship and date are uncertain. Dr. Swasey proves in the most conclusive manner that the existence of this creed antedates the Church of Constantine and that its origin may probably be ascribed to the then existing demand for a more detailed exposition of the faith than that which is found in the Apostles' Creed. It is to be mentioned at synods before the end of the 8th cent., whose special business it was to discuss the allied matters which were afterward embodied within it in such detail.

"The notion of imputation has been raised with regard to this creed, and it has been maintained by some that it is literally a forgery of the same nature as the "false decretales" and the equally famous "Donation of Constantine" (Swasey). But it may be said that the word "crucified" (so strictly applied to a "natural and inevitable result of the working of the mind of the Westminster Formulary of beliefs) is a more clearly defined and detailed confession of its Trinitarian faith" (Tulloch, Enc Brit). The imposition, if there was any, consisted not in the origin of the matter in the sacred character of the act but in the connection of it to a name and a date with which it had no connection. This was done no doubt to secure for it credit and authority, and was supposed to be justified by its special doctrinal import.

This symbol, though too compendious and elaborate to serve the purpose of a creed, itself standing in need of exposition and explanation, has its value as representing a fusion of doctrine in the form of a creed. The Apostles' Creed determined the nature of God and the Nicene Creed the nature of the Son. The Athanasian Creed may be regarded as establishing the great doctrine of the Trinity. Its distinguishing features are its clear exposition of the relationship of the persons of the Trinity, its uncompromising declaration of the truth of Christian faith, and its expression of the danger of rejecting it. The others declare the faith; this insists also on its necessity. This, also, alone insists upon the necessity of the Filioque (Yonge, An Exposition of the Apostles' Creed). The closing warning is based on Christ's own words: "I give unto thee the key of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Mt 16:19). If this creed is solemn in its admonitions, we must remember that so also are the Gospels. On the whole it is a comprehensive summary of truth, laying down the rule of faith as a foundation, following out its issues of good or evil. True belief is closely connected with right action.

With the adoption of the "Athanasian" symbol, the creed-making of the early and mediæval church ceases. Of the three mentioned one only in the broadest sense, the Nicene, is Catholic. Neither is the Apostles' Creed nor the Athanasian Creed applied to the Gr or oriental church which remained faithful to the faith settled by the holy Fathers of Nicaea. The two others adopted by the West are really gradual growths or consequences from it, without any definite antecedent or sanction from the Catholic Church. The faith as defined at Nicaea and ratified by subsequent councils is the only true Catholic symbol of the universal church.

With the Reformation a new era of creed-formation began. It will not, however, be necessary to do more than mention some of the confessions of the Reformed churches which consist mainly of elaborations of the original creeds. The Reformed creeds in their main points are the old, and safeguard the distinctive doctrines and ecclesiastical positions of particular branches of the church. Of this nature are the Confessions of the Lutheran church—the Augsburg Confession of 1530; the Genevan, or Calvinistic of 1549 consisting of 26 arts, defining particularly the nature of the Sacraments; confessions of the Dutch church confirmed at the Synod of Dort in 1619 and known as the "Decrees of Dort"; and the famous Heidelberg Catechism. To this series the Protestant church has added the 39 Articles of the Church of England and the Westminster Confession of Faith, which is the doctrinal standard not only of the churches of Scotland, but of the principal Presbyterian churches of Britain and America.

20, while shārāq is rather "to swarm." But in at least one passage (Lev 11:44), we have the noun, shereq, with the vb. rāmas; "with any manner of creeping thing that moveth upon the earth." The principal passages where such usages occur are the accounts of the Creation and the Flood and the references to unclean animals in Lev and in the vision of Peter. In the last we have the word herpeton as the Gr equivalent of the Heb words (Acts 10:10). We understand creeping things (lb. i Pet 11:20 ff.), as well as the less gentle, unclean, but an exception is made in favor of the locusts, "which have legs above their feet, whereby to leap upon the earth." ALFRED ELY DAY

CREMATION, kān-nāšān (cf פשך, saraph, Josh 7 15, etc., "shall be burnt with fire"); kāna, kait, I Cor 13:3, "if I give my body to be burnt, etc."); Cremation, while the customary practice of the ancient Greeks, and not unknown among the Romans, was certainly not the ordinary mode of disposing of the dead among the Hebrews or other oriental peoples. Even among the Greeks, bodies were sometimes burned (Plut. Mor. 1346; Plato Phaedo 115 E; Plut. Lyce. xxvii). Cicero thought that burial was the more ancient practice, though among the Romans both methods were in use in his day (De leg. ii.22,56). Lucian (De laetae xxii) expressly says that, while the Greeks burned their dead, the Persians buried them (see Bury, and of 2 S 21:12-14). In the case supposed by Amos (6:10), when it is predicted that Jeh, in abomination of "the excellency of Jacob," shall "burn them up in the city;" and if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die," and "a man's kinsman [ARVm] shall take him up, even he that burneth kim;" etc., the suggestion seems to be that of pestilence with accompanying infection, and that, or the special judgment of Jeh, is why burning is preferred. When Paul (1 Cor 13:3) speaks of giving his body to be burnt, he is simply accommodating his language to the customs of Corinth. (But see Plutarch on Zarmanochegas, and C. Beard, The Universal Chr.).

How far religious, or sanitary, or practical reasons were influential in deciding between the different methods, it is impossible to say. Those bodies were burnt in times of pestilence in the Valley of Hinnom where what is now the Neck of the City as well as the 7th A.D. (the Israelites being descendants of Ezekiel 21). The "very great burning" at the burial of Asa (2 Ch 16:14) is not a case of cremation, but of burning spices and furniture in the king's honor (cf Jer 34:5). Nor is it K. 13:2 a case in point; it is simply a prophecy of a king who shall take the bones of men previously burnt, and the priests of the high places that burn incense in false worship, and cause them to be burnt on the defiled altar to further pollute it and render it abominable.

This is in the NT no instance of cremation, Jewish, heathen or Christian, and cleary the early Christians followed the Jewish practice of burying the dead (see Tert., Apol., xlii; Minuc. Felix,Octav., xxxix; Aug., De civ. Dei, i.12,13). Indeed, cremation has never been popular among Christians, owning largely, doubtless, to the natural influence of the example of the Jews, the indisputable fact that Christ was buried, the vivid hope of the resurrection and the more or less material views concerning the same. It is not surprising then to find that while there is nothing anti-Christian in it, and much in sanitary considerations to call for it in an age of science, it is not likely that it will ever become the prevailing practice of Christendom.

CRETE, kret (Κρήτη, Krētē, ethnic Κρητικός, Krētikós; "increasing"): An assistant of Paul, mentioned in 2 Tim 4:10 as having gone to Galatia. That he was one of the Seventy, and that he founded the church in Vienna in Gaul, are traditions without any trustworthy basis.

1. Early Cretan History from his father the wishdom to which, by a type of myth common in Gr lands, the constitution of the Cretan cities was ascribed. Minos was accepted as a historical personage by Thucydides and Aristotle, who say that he was the first dynast in Greece to establish dominion on the sea. One of his exploits was the suppression of piracy in Cretan waters, a feat which had to be repeated by the Rom Pompeius at a later period. Aristotle ascribes the discovery of the use of the horse in Sparta; the island was said to have been colonized by Dorians from Peloponnese (Politics ii.10). The most important cities in Crete were Knossos (whose palace has been excavated with fruitful results by Mr. Arthur Evans), Gortyna, near the Gulf of Messara, and Cydonia, with its river Iardinus. The excavations of Mr. Evans at Knossos and of the Italians at Phaestos (near Fair Havens) prove that Cret was a center of Mediterranean civilization in the early classical period. In the Homeric poems, Cret is said to have contained an hundred cities; at that period the Cretans were still famed as daring sailors. In the classical age of Gr history they never held a leading position. They are mentioned chiefly as traders and mercenary soldiers, skilled esp. in archery. During the Hellenistic period Crete remained free. Demetrius Nicator made the island his base of operations before his defeat at Azotus in 148.

In 141, the Cretan Jews were influential enough to secure the patronage of Rome. They were being oppressed by the people of Gortyna, and appealed to Rome, which granted them protection. In strengthening the position of the Jews, the Romans were copying the Seleucid policy in Asia Minor; both the Seleucids and the Romans found the Jews among their most devoted supporters in their subject states. This interference of Rome in the interest of her future partisans paved the way for her annexation of the island in the following cent. From this date, the island was ruled prospectorily by a body of Jews in Crete, and Cretans are mentioned among the strangers present at the Feast of Pentecost in Acts 2.11. Its alliance with Mithradates the Great, and the help it gave to the Cilician pirates gave Rome the pretext she desired for making war on Crete, and the island was annexed by Metellus in 67 BC. With Cyrene on the N. coast of Africa, it was formed into a Rom province. When Augustus divided the Empire between the Senate and himself, Crete and Cyrene were sufficiently peaceful to be given to the Senate.

They formed one province till the time of Constantine, who made Crete a separate province. The Saracens annexed Crete in 823 AD, but it was recaptured for the Byzantine Empire by NIcholas Phokas in the following cent. From the 13th till the 17th cent. it was held by the Venetian Republic: from this period dates its modern name "Kandia," which the Venetians gave to the Saracen capital. Its development after this period is evident from the ruins of Messina and Akrotiri. After a desperate resistance, lasting from 1645 to 1669 AD, Crete fell into the hands of the Turks, who still exercise a nominal suzerainty over the island.

In 1803 Crete was ceded to Great Britain. The Philis are descended from the Cherethites, which is usually taken to mean Cretans. The name is given in connection with Caphtor and the OT Caphtorim (Dt 2:25; Jer 47:4; Am 9:7). The similarity between the river-names Jordan and Kardamylos (Homer Odyssey ii. 292) "about whose streams the Kydones dwell," has suggested that Caphtor is to be identified with Cydonia; or possibly it was the name of the whole island. Tacitus believed in an ancient connection between Crete and Pal; the Jews, he said, were fugitives from Crete, and derived their name Iudaei from Mt. Ida (Hist. v.2). Crete is mentioned in connection with the campaign of Demetrius Nicator, referred to above, in 1 Macc 10:67. See CAPHTOR; CYPHERS.

Cretan owes its connection with Pauline history to the accident of a gale which forced the ship carrying Paul to Rome to take shelter on the S. coast of the island. In the second cent. of M. Myra, on the coast of Lycaonia, the centurion in charge of Paul transferred him from the Adramyttian ship which had brought them from Caesarea, to a ship from Alexandria in Egypt, bound for Ostia with a cargo of grain. The fact that the centurion was in virtual command of the ship (Acts 27:11) proves that it was one of the vessels in the imperial transport service. Leaving Myra they came opposite Chandos with difficulty, against a head-wind. The ordinary course from Chandos in good weather was to steer straight for Cythera, but on this occasion the W. or N.W. winds made this route impracticable, and they sailed under the lee of Crete, whose S. coast would shelter them from a N.W. gale, and afford occasional protection from a W. gale. They passed Salamis, the N.E. corner of Crete, with difficulty, and worked round the coast to Fair Havens, a harbor somewhat to the E. of Cape Matale. The great Foul feast fell while they were at Fair Havens; in 39 AD this was October 5, in the middle of the season when the equinoxes made sailing impossible. Paul advised the centurion to winter in Fair Havens, but the captain wished to reach Phoenix, a harbor farther to the W., where ships from Egypt were accustomed to put in during the stormy season. It was decided to follow the captain's advice; but on its way to Phoenix the ship was struck by a N.E. wind called Eurakilo, which rushed down from Mt. Ida. The ship was carried out to sea; it managed to run under the lee of Cauda, an island 23 miles W. of Cape Matale, where they were taken in the boat, undergirded the ship, and slacked sail. On the fourteenth night they were driven on the coast of Malta, and wrecked.

The narrative does not state that Paul landed in Crete, but as the ship laid for some time at Fair Havens (Acts 27:8-9) he had plenty of opportunity to land, but not to travel inland. The centurion gave him permission to land at Sidon. Paul left Titus in Crete (Tit 1:5); tradition made the latter his first bishop, and patron saint.

Cretans were present, as noted above, at the Feast of Pentecost (Acts 2:11). Paul's estimate of the Cretan character (Tit 1:10-16) was the one current in antiquity.

CRIB (נַחֲשׂ, 'ebhāj, "Crib" translates the Heb word 'ebhāj exactly, as it denotes "a barred receptacle for fodder used in cowsheds and foldyards; also in fields, for beasts living out in the winter." The Heb is from a word meaning to feed (נָחַשׂ, 'ebhāj), and is used in the precise sense of the Eng. word in Job 39:9 of the "crib" of the wild ox, in Prov 14:4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean," and in Isa 1:3, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib."

CRICKET, krik'et (נֵרְפֵי, *'arbōp*l): This occurs in Lev 11:22 (AV "beetle"), and doubtless refers to some kind of locust or grasshopper. See BEETLE; LOCUST; INSECT.

CRIER, kri'ër (נָרֵפֵי, 'rebāw, bādō): (1) Neither is this exact word found in EV, nor a word exactly corresponding to it in the Heb Bible, but the character it stands for appears as "one who cries aloud," i.e., proclaims mandates or gives public messages. In Prov 21:1 it is said, "She [Wisdom] crieth in the chief place of coucouse." John the Baptist calls himself "the voice of one crying in the wilderness" (Jn 1:23)—like a herald going before the king.

(2) In the East today every village even has its public crier, selected for his loud or penetrative voice, and appointed to give notice of the fresh orders or mandates of the muqatt ("governor") or other authorities. The muqatt of the Moslems, who at the five appointed times of prayer mounts the minaret and calls the faithful to prayer, is another striking example. Something like the ancient "heralds" of the king were the "heralds" of the Middle Ages in Europe who, preceded by trumpeters, made official proclamations.

CRIME, krim, CRIMES, krimz: This term is used in Eng, as the equivalent of the Heb *'asām, mishkāpāh, "judgment," "verdict" (Ezk 7:23); *'amām, *'ezāmām, *'ashām= "a heinous crime" (Job 31:11); *'asām, *'ašām = "a fault," "sin" (Gen 26 10, EV "guiltiness"); and Gr ἀτίτα, “case,” “cause” (Acts 25 27; RV “charges”). In AV Jn 18 38; 19 4.6, the rendition is “fault.”

Pārakh, ἐκλήμα, “indictment,” “charge” (Acts 25 10) is changed in RV to “matter.” A crime is a transgression against the public right; serious offence against the law; a base weakness or iniquity, all of which are regarded by the Bible as offences against (1) God, or (2) man, or (3) both. An injury to the creature is regarded as obnoxious to the Creator. Specific forms of crime are the following:

Adultery.—See separate art.

Assassination.—This term does not occur in the EV, but, of course, is included in the more general “to kill,” or “to slay” (Ex 1 9; ἀναφρυγ—“to amite with deadly intent,” “destroy,” “kill,” “murder,” “put to death”). The law distinguished between an undetected and premeditated slaying, pronouncing a curse upon the latter (Dt 27 25). David expresses the deepest abhorrence of such an act (2 S 4 9–12). Instances are found recorded in Jgs 3 15; 18 20; Nu 15 10; Dt 27 21), in order, as the Talm says, to obliterate all memory of the crime.

Breach of Covenant (גָּדוֹל, עָבְרָה, pārār 'eth ha-brith).—According to Poucher (HDB, art. “Crimes”), this term included: (1) failure to observe the Day of Atonement (Lev 23 29); work on that day (Lev 23 28); (2) sacrifice of children to Moloch (Lev 20 3); (3) neglect of circumcision (Gen 17 14; Ex 4 20; 4) unauthorized manufacture of the holy oil (Ex 30 33); (5) anointing an alien therewith (Ex 30 33); (6) neglect of the Passover (Nu 9 13). Note also the following: Gen 17 14; Lev 26 15–44; Dt 29 25; 31 16.20. Paul (Rom 9 31) speaks of ἀναφοράς, ἀναθεμάτας “covenant-breakers.”

Breach of Ritual.—A term not found in the Scriptures, but designed to cover a number of acts prohibited by the ceremonial law. They have been expressly designated by the Mosaic law (HDB, art. “Crimes”): (1) eating blood, whether of fowl or beast (Lev 7 27; 17 14); (2) eating fat of the beast of sacrifice (Lev 7 25); (3) eating leavened bread during the Passover (Ex 12 15.19); (4) failure to bring an offering when an animal is slaughtered for food (Lev 17 4); (5) offering sacrifice while the worshipper is under the ban of uncleanness (Lev 7 20.21; 22 3.4.9); (6) making holy ointment for private use (Ex 30 32.33); (7) using the same for perfuming (Ex 30 34); (8) neglect of purification in general (Nu 19 13.20); (9) slaughtering an animal for food away from the door of the tabernacle (Lev 17 4.9); even the alien must comply, so that the introduction of worship at other places might be avoided; (10) touching holy things illegally (Nu 4 16.20 RV “the sanctuary”). The punishment for the non-observance of these prohibitions was the “cutting off” from the transgressor’s people (גָּדוֹל עָבְרָה, nikhrath mīkerebḥah= “cut off from among,” i.e. excommunicated).

Breach of Trust.—See TRUST, BREACH OF.

Bribery.—See separate art.

Burglary.—This term does not occur. The corresponding act is defined as “thievry accompanied by breaking,” and it places the offender beyond protection from violence (Ex 22 2). The crime might be committed in various degrees, and to burglarize the “devoted things” was punishable by death (Josh 7 25), as was also man-stealing (Ex 21 16; Dt 24 7).

Debt.—See separate art.

Deception.—See separate art.

Disobedience.—See separate art.

Divination.—See separate art.

Drunkenness.—See separate art.

Evil Speaking (Slander).—See Speaking Evil.

Falsehood.—Occurs as the rendition of ἀπείτθεν, μαλεβί—“treachery,” “sin,” “trespass” (Job 21 34); and of ἀπείτθεν, sheker—a sham,” “deceit,” “lying” (2 S 18 13; Ps 7 14; 119 118; 144 8.11; Isa 28 15; 57 4; 59 13; Jer 10 14; 13 25; Hos 7 1; Mic 2 11). In every case wilful perversion of the truth or preference for the untruth is at least presupposed, hence falsehood always marks an evil disposition, enmity against truth, and hence against God; consequently is criminal in the fullest sense.

False Swearing.—“Swearing to a lie or falsehood” (πλάσμα, sheker) is mentioned in Lev 6 3.5; 19 12; Jer 5 2; 7 9; Hos 10 4; Zec 5 4. From these passages and their context, it appears that this crime was considered in the twofold sense of a wrong against (1) the neighbor, and (2) against God, for the oath was an appeal to God as a witness to the truthfulness of the statement; hence to swear falsely was to represent God as a supporting false statement.

Fornication.—Hob, ἁπλή, sarah as “to commit adultery,” esp. of the female, and less frequently of mere fornication, seldom of involuntary ravishment; also used figuratively in the sense of idolatry, the Jewish people being regarded as the spouse of Jehovah (2 Ch 21 11; Isa 23 17; Ezek 16 28). One may find the derivative noun τρυπή, τρυπήνα “to be utterly unchaste” is found in Jude ver 7. Every form of unchastity is included in the term “fornication.”

Forswear.—May be found only in Mt 23 18 in the sense of committing perjury (τρυπηνα, eπιρρηκοί).

Harlotry.—The avocational or at least habitual, notorious practice of unchastity. In most instances the ordinary term for unchaste living, ἀπείτθεν, σελήνα, is employed (Gen 34 31; 35 18.24; Lev 21 14; Josh 2 1 (Rabah); Jgs 11 1; 16 1; 1 K 3 16; Prov 7 29; 30 3; Jer 5 7; Am 7 17). For the publicly known woman of the street and the professional devotee in the pagan temple-worship, the term ἀπείτθεν ἡθ, kalēshehād, was employed (Gen 38 21.22 AV; Hos 4 14). The Gr ἀπείτθεν, πόρνη, occurs in Mt 21 31; 22 21; Mk 15 18–30; Lk 11 31; Jas 2 25). Figurative: Often used metaphorically of idolatry or any deflection from the Divine covenant, and applied particularly to Israel (Jas 1 21); the Jewish nation (Jer 2 20; 3 1.6 ff; often in Ezek 16 and 52; Mic 1 7); Israel (Mt 21 38; Mk 1 15); Nineveh (Nah 3 4); Tyre, with reference to the various arts employed to renew her commerce (Isa 23 16) and to her restored traffic (ver 17); and to anti-Christian “Babylon” (Rev 17 5.15; 19 2). See also Fornication.

Homicide = “manslayer” (槎, ἁρπαγή, “to dash in pieces,” “to kill,” “to murder”); Gr αὐθαπαθόος, andροθαπαθόος, with the same meaning.)—Mentioned in Nu 36 6.12; 1 Tim 1 9. The Heb law distinguished between the premeditated and the unpremeditated slaying. See separate art.

Ill-treatment of Parents (Ex 21 15.17; Lev 20 9; Dt 21 18 f.).—See below.

Injuries to the Person (Ex 21 18 f.; Lev 24 19 f.; Dt 25 11).—Lack of respect for God or His natural representatives, the parents or governmental officers. See also Parents, Crimes against; Blasphemy.

Incest.—Designated in Heb by תֹּ֔יֶּרֶן, zim'dah, "vice," "wickedness," "refined immorality" (Lev 18 17; 20 14); also "unnatural vice," †דֹּ֔עַ, teheb, the same word that is used to designate the unnatural co-mingling with beasts. Ammon's deed is designated as תֹּ֔יֶּרֶן, משׁות, indicating the degradation of the tenderness natural between brothers and sisters into a tenderness of an immoral character

The crime of sexual relation of persons within the degrees of relationship forbidden by the Levitical law, as for instance, that of Lot's daughters with their father (Gen 19 33); the son with his father's concubines, as for instance, Reuben (Gen 35 22), and Absalom (2 Sam 16 22; 1 Cor 5 1); that of the father-in-law with his daughter-in-law (Gen 29 11); of the brother with the sister or half-sister, as for instance, Amnon (2 Sam 13 14); of the brother-in-law with the sister-in-law (Mt 14 3); with the wife's mother, or the wife's daughter while living in apparent marriage with the mother (Lev 20 14; 18 17). Illicit relation with the brother's widow is designated (Lev 20 21) as a disgraceful deed, lit. "uncleanness" (excepting the levirate marriage). Such acts were forbidden on the ground that the Jews were to avoid the Mosaic practice of the Canaanites and the Egyptians in regard to marriage within the specified limits, because this would naturally result in breaking down the sanctity of the bonds connecting near relatives, and in throwing open the flood gates of immorality among them. It is the Divine plan that the unions based on mutual choice and love, mingled with carnality, shall become clarified more and more into the purer love of close consanguinal relations; not vice versa. Then, too, such practices were resolutely to be checked and in the production of mentally and physically healthy children, the balancing and evening up of contrasts of Nature, and the production of new and improved types. The principle on which the prohibitions are imposed seems to be this: Marriage is forbidden between any person and a direct ancestor or a direct descendant or any close relative, such as brother or sister of either himself or any of his ancestors or any of his immediate descendants.

Infanticide.—This crime, in the form in which it has been and is prevalent among barbarous nations, seems to have been quite foreign to the minds of the Hebrews, for they had too lofty a conception of the value of human life, and children were considered a blessing; their absence in the home, a curse (cf Jer 15 3; 17 2). For this reason, there appeared to be no reason to prohibit it by law, excepting as the Israelites might be inclined to sacrifice their children to Moloch when following the religious customs of the Canaanites. See Molech.

Kidnapping (Man-Stealing).— dspa'retq·w·̄t, œn·d·q·t·̄, "reaper, harvester" (1 Tim 1 10). This was a mortal offence; but it seems that it, like some other forms of iniquity, was unknown to the Hebrews, excepting as they came in contact with it through their intercourse with other nationalities. Romans and Britons, for instance, whose mythology frequently alludes to such acts.

Lying, Malice, Manslaughter, Murder, Oath.—See separate arts.

Parents, Crimes against.—The law enjoined upon the infant all the reverence toward his parents, esp. the father, that he could bestow on a merely human being. The reason for this lay in the fact that the heads of families were expected to transmit the Divine law to their household, and thus to stand in the place of God. That the mother was to share this reverence practically on equal terms with the father is shown by the fact that each is mentioned separately whenever obedience and reverence are enjoined upon the child (Dt 5 16). As the specific crime against Jeh consisted in blasphemy and open rebellion against the law, so the crime against parents consisted in deliberate disobedience and stubbornness (Dt 21 18). And here again both the father and the mother are directed to lay hands upon him and bring him unto the elders for punishment. How greatly such conduct was held in horror is seen in many of the Proverbs, esp. 30 17. It would be hard to specify all the acts which, in view of the above, would be considered crimes against the parents, but it is evident that everything which would lower their dignity and influence or violate the sense of just recognition must be carefully avoided, as witness the curse visited upon Ham (Gen 9 20—27).

Perjury.—See False Swearing; Forswear above; also art. OATH.

Prophesying, False.—By reason of his position as the recognised mouthpiece of Jeh, the prophet's word was weighty in influence; hence to prophesy falsely was equivalent to practicing fraud publicly. Jeremiah described the condition as "wonderful and horrible," which made such things possible (Isa 5 20, 31). See also Jer 23 22; 29 8, 9; Ezek 21 23; Zec 10 2; Mt 7 15; 24 11, 24; Mk 13 22; Lk 6 26; Acts 13 6 (Bar-Jesus); 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Jn 4 1; Rev 16 13; 19 20; 20 10. See also separate art.

Prostitution.—Heb and Christian morality never condoned this practice, though the Bible recognizes its existence as a fact even among God's people. The Heb father was forbidden (Lev 19 29) to give his daughter over to a life of shame (אֶנְחַ, halal, "to profane a person, place or thing," "to pollute"). See also Fornication, Harlotry, and Whoredom below.

Rape.—דֹּ֔עַ, דֹּ֔עַ, "to seize," "bind," "restrain," "conquer," "force," "ravish." The punishment for this crime was greater when the act was committed against a betrothed woman (Dt 22 25—29). See also Seduction.

Removing Landmarks (Dt 19 14). See LANDMARKS.

Robbery.—דֹּ֔עַ, דֹּ֔עַ, was "to pluck off," "strip," "rob," "take away by force or violence"; forbidden in the law and frequently referred to as despicable (Lev 19 13; 26 22; 1 Sam 31 1; Prov 25 22; Isa 10 2.13; 17 14; Ezek 33 15; 39 10; Mal 3 8, 9).

Sabbath-Breaching.—As the Heb Sabbath was regarded as a day of rest, all acts absolutely unnecessary were considered a violation, a "breaching" of the Sabbath, which appears sufficiently from the commandment (Ex 20 8—11); and the head of the household was held responsible for the keeping of this commandment on the part of all sojourners under his roof.

No other law gave the sophistical lawyers of later Judaism so much opportunity for hair-splitting distinctions as this. In answering the question what labors were forbidden, they mentioned 39 specific forms of work, and then proceeded to define what constituted each particular form. But as even these definitions
Sodom became notorious, so that "sodomite" is the regular tr. of ἱππόλυτος, kădēēs, "a [quasi] sacred person," i.e. (technically) "a [male or female] devoted to licentious idolatry" (Dt 23:17; K 14:24; 15:12; 22:46; 2 K 23:7; Jos 26:14). Though permitted and even encouraged in heathen cult, it was never to be tolerated in the worship of Jah.

Usury.—See separate article.

Witnessing: False.—The Heb idiom is קֵָּּנָּךְ, קֵָּּנָּךְ, "shed blood, witness of a falsehood," "lie" (Ex 20:16; Dt 19:16.18; Prov 6:19; 14:5,25; 19:5,9; Gr φερόμενος, pseudoamorterō, "to bring false testimony"); μαρτυρία, "hearing of false testimony" (Mk 10:19; 14:50,57). It goes without saying that the law was emphatic in its denunciation of this practice, and in order that the innocent might be protected against the lying accuser, a criminal was to be convicted only on the testimony of at least two or three witnesses, testifying to the same facts (Nu 30:30). If one be found testifying falsely, he was to be punished by suffering the penalty which would have been inflicted on him against whom he testified, had he been convicted (Dt 19:16-19).

Whoredom.—See Unnatural Vice.

Slander.—Heb bring an evil שְׁפִּיט, rod] name upon one] (Dt 19:15; 1 K 22:23; Ps 34:13; 41:5; 50:19; 109:20; 140:11; Prov 15:28; 16:30).

Seduction.—דְּבָכ, ta'dāh, "to dissemble," "seduce," and פָּרַך, ta'dāh, with the same meaning; ἁπλανᾶς, ἀπογιλᾶς, "to lead astray"; πλανᾶς, πλάνας, "to go astray," "deceive," "err," "seduce;" and γον, γός, "a wizard," "an impostor," "seducer." In all the passages in which the idea of seduction is expressed in the Eng. the term is used not in the modern sense of a trespass against a woman's person, but in the more general and figurative sense of leading into sin generally (2 K 21:9; Prov 12:26 AV; Isa 19:13 AV; Ezek 13:10; Mk 13:22 AV; 2 Tim 3:13 AV; 1 Jn 2:26 AV; Rev 2:20). However, the modern Eng. idea of the word is expressed in the law found in Ex 22:16.17.

Slander.—See separate article.

Sodom.—See Unnatural Vice.

Stealing.—Heb נָדָב, nādbab, "to steal" (lit. or fig.); by implication, "to deceive," "to carry away," "secretly bring," "steal away" (Gen 44:8; Ex 20:15; 21:16; 22:21; Prov 6:30; Zec 6:3; Gen 31:20; 26:2; 2 S 15:6; 19:3; Job 27:20; Prov 9:17 ["Stolen waters are sweet"; the forbidden is attractive; cf Rom 7:7]). Gr κλητέα, κλητζφ = "to filch," "seal" (Mt 6:19,20); 19:18; Jn 10:10; Rom 2:21; 13:9; Eph 4:28). See Theft.

Suicide.—No special law is found against this crime, for it is included in the prohibition against killing. Contrary to the practice and the philosophy of paganism, the act was held in deep abhorrence by the Hebrews because of the high value placed on human life. It was held inexcusable that any but the most degraded and satanic should lay hands on their own lives. Only the remorse of the damned could drive one to it, as witness Saul (1 S 31:4) and Judas (Mt 27:5).

Theft.—Heb תַּבְרֹת, תַּבְרֹת, "stealing" (concrete), "something stolen," "theft" (Ex 22:3,4); more inclusive in the Heb term than with other wickedness (κλῆμα, klēma) in Mt 19:15; Mk 7:21; and (κλημα, klēma) in Rev 9:21. All three words are used abstractly for the act and concretely for the thing stolen. See Theft.

Unchastity.—No other form of sin is mentioned with disapproval and threats more frequently than the various forms of carnal vice, for no other sin is so natural or widespread. See CHASTITY; LEPROSY; MARRIAGE.

Unnatural Vice (Sodom).—Alluded to with delicacy, but positively condemned as an abomination (Gen 13:13; 19:5,7; Lev 18:22; 20:13). It was the specific form of wickedness through which...

(i) Criticism of Theory

II. Lower or Textual Criticism—We take first lower or textual criticism. There has never been a time when criticism of Scripture—lower criticism of the Bible—had entered so completely upon the study of the books, and in the settlement of the text. Examples are seen in the marginal notes to the Heb Scriptures (K'të and K'thî). The Fathers of the early church compared MSS of the NT books, noting their differences, and judging of the books themselves. The Reformers, it is well known, did not accept blindly the judgments of antiquity, but availed themselves of the best light which the new learning afforded. The materials at the disposal of scholars in that age, however, were much more limited than we have today. As aids multiplied with progress of discovery, comparison of MSS and VSS one with another and with patristic quotations, revealed manifold discrepancies and it became apparent that, in both OT and NT, the text in current use in the church was far from perfect. "Various readings" accumulated. Not a few of these, indeed, were obvious blunders; many had little or no support in the more ancient authorities, and for others, again, authority was fairly equally divided. Some were interpolations which had no right to be in the text at all. How, in these circumstances, was the true text to be ascertained? The work was one of great delicacy, and could only be accomplished by the most painstaking induction of facts, and the strictest application of sound methods. Thus arose a science of textual criticism, which, ramifying in many directions, has attained vast dimensions, and yielded an immense body of secure knowledge in its special department.

The materials with which textual criticism works (apparatus criticus) are, as just said, chiefly MSS, VSS (translations into other tongues), MSS (translations into other tongues), and, of course, MSS (translations into other tongues). The first step is the collection and collation of the material, to which fresh discovery is constantly adding; the noting of its peculiarities, and testing of its age and value; the grouping and designation of it for reference. A next important task is the collection of the "various readings" and other diversities of text (omissions, interpolations, etc), and the collation of the material, and the endeavor to assign these to their respective causes. More frequently than not errors in MSS are unintentional, and the causes giving rise to them are sufficiently obvious. Such are the carelessness of scribes, lapses of memory, similarity of sounds (in dictation), or in shape of letters (in copying), wrong dividing of words, omission of a line or clause owing to successive lines or clauses ending with the same word. Intentional changes, again, arise from insertion in the text of marginal notes or glosses, from motives of harmonizing, from the substitution of smoother for harsher or more abrupt expressions—more rarely, from dogmatic reasons.

Mistakes of the above kinds can generally be detected by careful scrutiny of sources, but a large number of cases remain in which the correct reading is still doubtful. These, next, have to be dealt with by the impartial weighing and balancing of authorities; a task involving great labor and the application of fresh rules. It does not suffice to reckon numbers; MSS and VSS have themselves to be tested as respects reliability and value. Through the presence of peculiarities pointing as a document to MSS or to VSS may preserve a reading which the older MSS have lost. Such rules obtain as that, of two readings, preference is to be given to the more difficult, as less likely to be the result of corruption. But even this has its limits, for a reading may be difficult even to the point of unintelligibility, yet may arise from a simple blunder. As a last resort, in cases of perplexity, conjectural emendation may be admitted; only, however, as yielding probability, not certainty. Hence the study of these principles an important distinction has to be made between the OT and the NT, arising from the relative paucity of material for critical purposes in the one case, and the abundance in the other. The subject is treated here generally, for details see above LANGUAGE OF THE OT; LANGUAGE OF THE NT; TEXT AND MSS OF THE NT.

(1) In the OT, textual criticism labors under the peculiar disadvantage that, with one exception (the Massoretic text), the MSS are from the Decalogue), all known Heb MSS are late (the oldest not going beyond the 9th cent. AD); further, that the MSS seem all to be based on one single archetype, selected by the rabbis at an early date, and thereafter adhered to by copyists with scrupulous care (cf. G. A. Smith, OTJC, 69 ff; Driver, Text of Sam, xxxvii ff; Strack, however, dissent). The variations which these MSS present, accordingly, are slight and unimportant. For a knowledge of the state of the text prior to the adoption of this standard, criticism is dependent on comparison with the VSS—esp. the Septuagint (q.v.), with the Sam Pent (q.v.), and with passages in the OT itself (e.g. in S, K, Ch). Preserved best in the Heb text, giving the larger family differences in names and numbers, shall show that the fixing of the text extensive corruption had already entered. A simple instance of mistake is in Isa 9 3, where the AV reads: "Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy." The context shows that the "not" is out of place: the RV therefore rightly reads (with the Heb K'tre: the sounds are similar), "thou hast increased their joy." In the LXX the divergences are much less (less than in the Hebrew Pentateuch, etc., readings); there are extensive interpolations and omissions (in Jer, Graf reckons that 2,700 words of the Massoretic text are omitted); evidences, where the alterations are not of design, that the Heb MSS employed by the translators often differed widely from those approved in Pal. The Sam recension likewise exhibits considerable differences.

It does not follow that, where difference exists, these rival texts are to be preferred to the Massoretic. Few, since the exhaustive examination of Qumran, are the later better than the Heb. But it is not to be supposed that, in respect of the superordinate of the above texts to the Massoretic to be convinced that, in many instances, the LXX, in some cases, probably, even the Sam, has retained readings from which the MT has departed. OT criticism has, therefore, a clear field for its labors, and there can be little doubt that, in its more important problems, it has reached material results. Less reliance can be placed on the conjectural criticism now so largely in vogue. Dr. G. A. Smith has justly animadverted on the textual criticism of the poetical and prophetic books (through which it drives like a great ploughshare, turning up the whole surface, and menacing not only the minor landmarks, but, in the case of the prophets, the main outlines of the field as well" (Quarterly Rev., January, 1907). This, however, trenches on the domain of the higher criticism.

(2) In the NT the materials of criticism are vastly more abundant than in the OT; but, with the abundance, while a much larger area of certainty is attainable, more intricate and difficult problems are presented. The wealth of MSS of the whole or parts of the Gr NT far exceeds that existing for any other ancient writings (Nestle mentions 3,829: 127 uncials and, 3,702 cursive; Intro to the Textual Criticism of the Gr NT). In the MSS of VSS (excluding the Vulg, reckoned by thousands), are likewise very numerous.

(a) MSS and VSS: Gr MSS are usually divided into uncials and cursive (or minuscules) from the character of their contents, into 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th centuries. The five chief, that alone need be named, are the Codex Sinaiticus (N, 4th cent.), the Codex Vaticanus (B, 4th cent.), the Codex Alexandrinus (A, 5th cent.), the Codex Ephraemi (C, 5th cent.), the Codex Bezae (D, 5th cent., and Lat., 6th cent.). These MSS again are grouped according to affinities (Bengel, Griesbach, Lachmann, are here chief precursors; Westcott and Hort, chief modern authority), N and B going together as representing one type of text, in the opinion of WH the best (the so-called "Neutral"); D representing a "Western" text, with marked peculiarities; A and C exhibiting mixed texts. The VSS, in turn, Syr, Old Lat., Egypt (originating with 2d and 3d centuries), present interesting problems in their relations to one another and to the Gr MSS N, B, and D. With the Syr VSS (Sinaitic, Curetonian, Peshitta), Tatian's Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels, ought to be mentioned. Formerly the "Western" text was taken as generally superior; now, especially, since the discovery of the Lewis (Sinaitic) palimpsest, it tends to be regarded as a later revision of the older Syr texts (probably by Rabula of Edessa, beginning of the 5th cent.). The old Lat., also the old Syr, MSS show marked affinities with the text of D—the "Western" type.

(b) The Western text: The question chiefly exercising scholars at the present time is, accordingly, the relation of the WH text based on N and B to the Western text of Lk. Though now finding early support from the Old Lat and Syr, as well as from quotations in the 2d and 3d Fathers. The Western text is discounted by WH for its paraphrastic character, and "astonishing freedom" in changing, inserting, and omitting (WH, 122 ff); yet, on internal grounds, certain important omissions in this text of the last three chs of Lk are accepted by these authorities as representing the purer text, the rejected readings being termed "Western interpolations." The newer school, however, is disposed to accept the Western text as, to a much larger extent than was formerly supposed, the more original; while some writers, as Blass, Nestle, in part Zahn (cf Nestle, op. cit., 324 ff), seek a solution of the difference of texts in the theory of two editions (Blass, Lk and Acts; Zahn, Acts alone). This theory has not met with much acceptance, and the problems of the Western text must still be regarded as unsolved. The question is not, indeed, vital, as no important doctrine of the NT is affected; but it touches the genuineness of the highest law-values, E.g., the words at the Supper, "which is given for you," etc. (Lk 22 19.20, not in D), and the first word on the cross, "Father, forgive them," etc. (Lk 23 34, in N, omitted by D and Sin Syl), are rejected as Western interpolations. The RV retains these passages with marginal note.

(c) Results. As respects results, it may be said generally that the labor of a long line of scholars have given us a NT text on which, in nearly all essential respects, we can safely rely. Others, it is to be owned, take a less sanguine view (cf Nestle, op. cit., 227 ff). The correct reading seems undeniable settled in a large majority of cases. The RV embodies most of the assured results; doubtful cases are noted in the margin. Among passages long known to be interpolations, now altogether removed, is that on the three witnesses in 1 Jn 5 8. There are many passages not belonging to the original text are the last 12 vs of Mk (16 9–20), and the story of the woman taken in adultery (Jn 7 53–8 11).}

III. Higher Criticism.—The scope of the higher criticism has already been indicated. Many of the inquiries it undertakes were formerly covered by what was called Bib. introduction; the flight of the newer science, however, is bolder, and the problems it seeks to solve are more complicated and far-reaching. An important part of its work is the analysis of books, with the view of determining their component parts (e.g. the J,E,F,D, of the Pent.), the age, origin, and characteristics of each, their connection with external conditions and the state of belief and life of the time. The nature of its task will be better understood from a rapid survey of its procedure.

Higher criticism began, mainly, with the OT. Already in the 2d cent., Gnosticism assailed the OT, and the new critical school, headed by Hengstenberg (1831) and Havernick (1837), contested these conclusions of the critics, and upheld the unity and Mosaic authorship of the Pent. Bolden's spirit, as at home (1835), afterwards led him to the view that the very nature of the higher critical school in declaring that the Levitical laws were latest of all in origin. Their voices were as yet unheeded.

(2) Hupfeld.—A distinct advance on preceding theories was made by Hupfeld (1858), in part anticipated by Beza, 1596. The latter assumed that there was one fundamental document—the so-called Elohist, dated usually in the age of the Judges, or the time of Saul or David—and that the Jehovistic parts were "supplementary" to this (not a separate document). It was the merit of Hupfeld to perceive that not a few of the sections in the "Elohist" document did not bear the usual literary marks of that writing, but closely resembled the "Jehovistic" sections in everything but the use of the Divine name. These portions he singled out and erected into a document by themselves (though they bear no signs of being such), while the Jehovist parts were relieved of their "supplementary character, and this view was not disputed by his contemporaries. There were thus now 3 documents, attributed to as many authors—the original Elohist, the 2d or Younger Elohist and the Jehovist. Dt, as a distinct book, was added to these, making 4 documents in all.

(3) Graf and Wellhausen.—Thus matters stood till the appearance of Graf's work, The Historical Books of the OT, in 1866, through which something like a revolution in the critical outlook was effected. Following in the track of Vatke, earlier, Reuss, of Strassburg, had taken up the idea that the Levitical legislation could not, as was commonly presumed, be earlier than Dt, but was, on the contrary, later—in fact, a product of the age of the exile. Graf adopted and developed this theory. He still for a time, while putting the laws late, maintained an earlier date for the Elohist narratives. He was soon led, however, to see that laws and history must go together; so the whole Elohist writing was removed from its former place, and brought down bodily to the end of the religious development. Graf, at the same time, did not regard it as an independent document. At first the theory was scouted, but gradually, through the able advocacy of Kuenen and Wellhausen, it has now become the current one, and is now regarded as the critical view par excellence. Order and nomenclature of the assumed documents were now changed. The Elohist, instead of standing first, was put last under the designation P or PC (Priestly Code). Wellhausen's symbol for this writing was Q. Its date was taken to be post-exilic. The Jehovist becomes J; the Elohist E. These are placed in the 9th or 8th cent. BC (cir c900–750), but are supposed to have been composed a cent. or so later (JE). Dt, identified with the law-book found in the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 K 23), is thought to have been written shortly after that time. The order is therefore no longer 1st Elohist–Jehovist and 2d Elohist–Dt, but J and E–Dt. The whole, it is held, was finally united into the great law-book (Pent.) brought by Ezra to Jerus from Babylon (468 BC; Ezr 7 6–10), and read by him before the people 14 years later (444 BC; Neh 8).

(4) Literary and historical grounds of theory.—A sketch like this can hardly do justice to the no proper idea of the grounds on which, apart from the distinction in the Divine names, the critical theory just described is based. The grounds are partly literary—the discrimination of documents, e.g. resting on differences of style and conception, duplicates, etc (see PENTATEUCH)—but partly also historical, in accordance with the critic's conception of the development of religion and institutions in Israel. A main reliance is placed on the fact that the codes were written and set down at the time when the history of Dt, is in conflict with the law of that book, which recognizes only one sanctuary as legitimate (ch 12), and equally with the PC, which throughout assumes this centralizing law. The laws of Dt and PC, therefore, cannot be early. The prophets, it is held, knew nothing of a Levitical legislation, and refused to regard the sacrificial system as Divine (Jer 7 22 f.).

(5) The code under which older Israel lived was that formulated in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), which permitted many altars (Ex 20 24 f). The law of Dt was the product of a centralizing movement on the part of the prophets, issuing in the reformation of Josiah. The PC was the work of fertile brains and pens of post-exilian priests and scribes, incorporating older usage, devising new laws, and throwing the whole into the fictitious form of Mosaic wilderness legislation.

(6) Effects on history, etc.—The revolution wrought by new religious ideas on the older traditions, however, is not adequately realized till regard is had to their effects on the picture given in the OT itself of Israel's history, religion and literature. It is not too much to say that this picture is nearly completely subverted by the older code (Jos, Kuenen, Wellhausen, Duhm, Stade, etc) the supernatural element in the history and religion is totally eliminated; even by those who do not go so far, little is left standing. The history of the Pent—indeed the history of the world—the kingdom of God have been largely given up. Gen is legend, Ex hardly more trustworthy, Josh a romance. The histories of Samuel and David are "written up" by a theoretic narrator. None of the laws—even the Decalogue—are allowed to be certain. Monotheism is believed to have come in with Amos and Hosea; earlier, Jeh was a "tribal" God. Ark, tabernacle, priesthood, feasts, as depicted in the PC, are post-exilic fiction. The treatment accorded to the Pent necessarily reacts on the other historical books; the prophetic lit. suffers in an almost equal degree through disintegration and mutilation. It is not Israel alone—where the question has long been mooted—the post-dt origins of chs 40-56 (see ISAIAH); the critical knife is applied with scarcely less freedom to the remaining prophetic books. Few, if any, of the psalms are allowed to be preexilic. Dni is a work of the Maccabean age.

(7) General results.—As a general summary of the results of the movement, which it is thought the future is not likely to reverse," the following may be quoted from Professor A. S. Peake: "The analysis of the Pent into four main documents, the identification of the law on which Josiah's reformation was based, the rejection of the Priestly Code, the compilation of that code in the reign of Manasseh at the earliest, the fixing of the Priestly Code to a date later than Ezekiel, the highly composite character of some parts of the prophetic lit., esp. the Book of Isa, the post-exilian origin of most of the Ps, and large parts of the Book of Prov, the composition of Job not earlier than the exile and probably later, the Maccabean date of Dn, and the slightly earlier date of Ecc" ("Present Movement in Biblical Science," in Manchester, Inaugural Lects, 32).

(8) Criticism of theory.—The criticism of this elaborate theory belongs to the arts, which deal with the several points involved, and is not here attempted at length (cf. the later Part of the present work). The writer referred to it on the literary side in a more exact and scholarly knowledge of the phenomena to be explained (e.g. distinction in the Divine names; distinction of P element in the Pent from that known as JE) are not to be questioned; on the historical and religious side, however, there is much to be learned from enlarged knowledge and correct older ideas which have proved untenable—in general, to place the whole facts of the OT in a clearer and more assured light. On the other hand, much even in the literary criticism is subjective, arbitrary and conjectural, while the main hypothesis of the posteriority of the Levitical law to Ezekiel, with the general view taken of the historical and religious development in Israel, is open to the most serious exception. The OT has its own account to give of the origin of its religion in the monotheism of Abraham, the covenants with the patriarchs, the legislation through Moses, which is not thus readily to be set aside in the interests of a theory resting largely on naturalistic presuppositions (see Bible). There is not a word in the history in Neh 8 to suggest that the law introduced by Ezra was a new one; it was received without demur by a deeply divided community as the ancient law of Moses. So with the law of Dt nor was it ever doubted by no one. The position of the theory, generally, is by no means so secure as many of its adherents suppose. Internally, it is being pushed to extremes which tend to discredit it to sober minds, and it has also met with modifications. Documents are multiplied, dates lowered, authors are converted into "schools." Archaeologists, in large majority, declare against it. The facts they adduce tend to confirm the historicity in part of the kingd. The new Bcb school in Germany (that of Winckler) assails it in its foundations. Recently, the successor of Kuenen in Leyden, Professor B. D. Eerdmans, formerly a supporter, has broken with the theory in its entirety, and subjects the documentary hypothesis to a damaging criticism. It is too early yet to forecast results, but the opinion may be hazarded that, as in the case of the Tubingen NT critical school in last cent. referred to below, the prevailing critical theory of the OT will experience fundamental alteration in a direction nearer to older ideas, though it is too much to expect that traditional views will ever be resuscitated in their completeness.

Higher criticism of the NT may be said to begin, in a Doistic spirit, with Reimarus (Fragmenta, published by Lessing, 1778), and, on

2. The NT

Hegelian lines, with Strauss (Life of Jesus, 1835). In the interests of his mythical theory, Strauss subjected every part of the gospel history to a destructive criticism.

(1) The school of Baur.—In a more systematic way, F. Baur (1826-60), founder of the famous Tubingen school, likewise proceeding from Hegel, applied a different neutermologia to the NT. Strauss started with the Gospels. Baur sought firmer ground in the phenomena of the Apostolic Age. The key to Baur's theory lies in the alleged existence of Pauline and Petrine parties in the early church, in conflict with one another. The true state of matters is mirrored, he holds, not in the Book of Acts, a composition of the 2d cent., written to groze over the differences between the original apostles and Paul, but in the four cor-contemporary and undoubtedly genuine epistles of Paul, Gal, 1 and 2 Cor, and Rom, and in the Book of Heb. In these documents the church is seen rent by a schism that threatened its very existence. By and by attempts were made at conciliation, the stages of which are indicated in the Gospels and remaining writings of the NT. The Fourth Gospel, according to Baur, brings up the rear. This theory, which found influential support in the scholarship of the time (Schwegler, Zeller, etc.), could not stand the test of impartial investigation, and is now on all sides discredited. Professor Bacon, in a recent work, preserves Ehrard's and other views, describing them as "as obsolete as the Ptolemaic geography" (Fourth Gospel, 20). Its influence on later criticism has, however, been considerable.

(2) Synoptic criticism.—Meanwhile more sober scholarship was concentrating itself upon the intricate problem of the relations of the Synoptic Gospels. The problem is a very real one (see Gospels). The three gospels of Mt, Mk, and Lk are seen on inspection to exhibit an amount of agreement in subject-matter, order, often in language, which cannot be accounted for except on the theory of some common source. Suppose the Gospels divided into sections, in 52 of these the narratives coincide, 12 more are common to Mt and Mk, 5 to Mk and Lk, and 14 to Mt and Lk, while 8 are peculiar to Mt, 2 to Mk, and 9 to Lk. The verbal agreement is greater in the recital of the words of others, particularly of words of Jesus, than in the narrative portions.

How is this to be explained? Three forms of the explanation have been proposed—the oral, the documentary, and the hypothesis of dependence of one gospel upon another. Of these theories, the oldest is the 3d (Augustine already held that Mk was an abridgment of Mt and Lk), and to it, in combination with the 2d, through a reversed order (Mt being put first), it will be seen below that criticism has largely reverted. The oral theory, proposed by Gieseler (1815), has, till recently, been the favorite one in England (Westcott, Alford, etc., with Godet, P Reese, etc., on the Continent). In it, the resemblances in the three Gospels are explained by an oral tradition assumed to have attained a relatively fixed form while the apostles were yet teaching together in Jerusalem. The documentary theory took its origin with Eichhorn (1794), but in the hands of Marsh (1801), finally in Eichhorn's own (1804), received so elaborate a development as completely to discredit it. The dependence theory, in turn, went through every possible shape. Gradually, however, a clearer conception of the problem emerged. On this view, the oral report of Mk's words to Mt, to Mk, and Lk, was transmitted in oral combinations which were eliminated (those which put Lk first, or Mt last, or made Mk a middle term), till only two remained—Mt, Lk, Mk (Griesbach 1789-90, Baur, etc.), and Mk, Mt, Lk (Weisse, 1838, Wilke, 1838, etc.). The dependence theory of the Johannine writings is now generally regarded as having been abandoned. The Baur school maintained a temporal ascendancy for the former view—that which put Mk last; this, however, has now quite given way in favor of Mk's priority. There remained a division of opinion as to whether the Mk employed by the other evangelists was the canonical Mk (Weisse, Meyer, B. Weiss, etc.), or an un-Markus (Holtzmann, Reuss, etc.), but the difficulties of the latter hypothesis proved so insurmountable that Holtzmann finally gave it up.

It is obvious, however, that the use of Mk by the other evangelists, even if granted, does not yet completely solve the synoptical problem. There is still to be considered that large mass of matter—chiefly discourses—common to Mt and Lk, not to speak of the material peculiar to Lk itself. For the explanation of these sections it becomes necessary to postulate a second source, usually identified with the much-canvassed Logia of Papias, and designated by recent scholars (Weiss, etc.) Q. It is regarded as a collection of discourses, possibly by Matthew, with or without an admixture of narrative matter (B. Weiss, etc.). This yields the "two-source" theory at present prevailing in synoptical criticism (for a different view, cf Zahn's Introduction). Mt and Lk, on this view, are not independent Gospels, but are drawn upon the basis of (1) Mk and (2) Q—the Logia, with original matter on the part of Luke (see Gospels). A theory which commands the assent of so many scholars has necessarily great weight. It cannot, however, be regarded as finally established, in so much as difficulties remain; there is, besides, a prima facie improbability in a Gospel like Mark's being treated in the manner supposed or included among the "attempts" which Luke's own Gospel was designed to supercede (Lk 1 1-4; cf Wright, St. Luke's Gospel in Gr. xiv, 21).

With criticism of the sources of the Gospels there goes, of course, the question of authorship. A powerful vindication of the Lucan authorship of the 3d Gospel and the Book of Acts has recently come from the pen of Professor A. Harnack, who maintains that in this, as in most other points regarding early Christian lit., "tradition is right" (cf his Luke, the Physician, ET). Outside the Synoptics, the burning question still is the authorship of the Johannine writings. Here also, however, the extreme positions of the Baur school are entirely given up ("It is perfectly apparent," says Professor Bacon, "that Baur mistook the period of dissemination for that of origin," op. cit., 21), and powerful defences of Johannine authorship have been put forward (notably Sanday's Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, and ex-Principal Drummond's Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel; see Gospel of John).

(3) Modern "historical-critical" school.—On the other hand, a more and more intense and aggressive radical school has recently come to the front, the so-called "historical-critical," which treats the text and history of the Gospels generally with a recklessness to which no limits can be put. It is even doubted if Jesus claimed to be the Christ (Wrede). Sayings are accepted, rejected, or mutilated at pleasure.

The latest phase of this school is the "Apocalyptic," which finds the essence of Christ's message in His insistence on the approaching end of the world (cf. Schweitzer, Von Reimarus zu Wrede; ET The Quest of the Historical Jesus). These excesses may be depended on to cure themselves.

(4) Remaining writings of the NT.—For the rest of the writings on the NT, the trend of criticism has been in the same general direction. One by one the Pauline Epistles have been given back to the apostle—doubt chiefly still resting in certain minds on the Pastorals. The Book of Rev is restored to many, but to the age of Domitian, where tradition places it. Its relation to the Fourth Gospel and to St. John is still in dispute, and some moderns would see it in a groundwork of Jewish apocalypse. These and kindred questions are discussed in the article devoted to them.

LITERATURE

1. Preliminary.—In Jer 7 22:23 we read: “For I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices: but this thing I commanded them, saying, Hearken unto my voice; and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people. And they did it: and there was no man among them that did abstain from burnt-offerings and sacrifices. Yet after this there emerged no pious man, such as is referred to in the June 1919 article, who is greatly admired and has been the object of innumerable International reverences. It is not remarkable that those who have been called to the task of interpreting the text have been unable to recover a single phrase, and even less a whole sentence, of the ancient text, as compared with the vague statements of the modernists, who have not been able to make any progress. Indeed, it is not surprising that the ancient text of the Prophets should have been lost, seeing that it was written in a language that is now almost unknown, and that the books of the Prophets are not within the reach of the common reader.

2. Historiography—after statement that a given law was not because it was due to some late author but to the documents. Moses himself, and there are numerous of the laws in the historical books (most notably in Ch) that speak of these laws as in effect from the earliest times. Such evidence must be paid all possible respect and must be overruled only on the most imperative considerations. However, if for the moment the books of the OT be viewed as undated, only uncontroverted, and it be assumed that the possibility of overruling such evidence may well spring from the very well without ruling in question In the slightest degree the good faith of the writers of question passages: for an acquisition of historical perspective comes very late in intellectual evolution, particularly though not only—in the realm of religious history. Even the learned scholar has to be on his guard lest he read back the concepts of his own time into some past generation, while the non-specialist never succeeds in avoiding this error completely. For the uncultured mind, especially for the Oriental, the problem seemed to be that which is generally accepted and which is not obviously novel tends to be classified as such which “always has been.” A law so old that its actual source is forgotten is referred as a matter of course to some great lawgiver of the past. A custom that appears in a city’s own day is universally observed by the priests must always have been observed by the priests. Even documentary evidence to the contrary is not convincing to such a writer, for that document may be wrong is not a modern discovery. To be sure, the earlier document may be copied mechanically or the discrepancy may not even be noticed. But it is never surprising when we find a writer simply accrediting the plausibility of old with the more common view, even if even documentary evidence to the contrary he felt could not be taken. This is not for us, as we understand the words, nor need there be the faintest moral reproach connected with such conduct. Quite on the contrary, such a writer must be acting in the only sense that the conscience of any man of his generation could conceive right.

However, the OT is not a mere collection of human documents, and another question arises. Does the acceptance of inspiration compel us to assume that in every case a writer’s ordinary historical methods were entirely overruled? The question is a rather broad one and does not relate merely to the correct transmission of history. The question is: To be asked, rather, is 3. Inspiration: Did God present to His instruments a mechanically accurate set of past facts which would give a conception of history that no one of the sacred writer’s generation could understand? Or did He suffer His revelation to find expression in terms of the current conceptions of history, much as we are accustomed to say it found expression in terms of the current conceptions of science? A full discussion of the various theological arguments involved can hardly be quite outside the purview of this Encyclopaedia, but reference must be made to two important Bib arguments: (1) In a question which thus affects the amount covered by the inspiration of the Bible, quotations from the Bible itself begin to be of some moment when added to an estimate of the amount covered by the Bible. Moreover, they prove too much. In Jude vs 14.15 there is a quotation from the Book of Hab (1:9), which is made in the most formal manner possible. Will anyone maintain that this conclusion must be used to believe that our Book of Hab was actually written by Enoch, the seventh from Adam? Yet if the quotation had been taken from an OT work, precisely this would have been maintained. (2) More important is the case of the OT by Christ, for here a quite different authority comes in. But the question must be asked: Just how far did Our Lord’s use of a passage involve ratification of all the current ideas about that passage? The good answer is supplied by Acts 1:67. When He asked, “Dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?” we know that the pedantically “correct” answer would have been, “The kingdom never will be restored to Israel in any such sense as ye conceive of it.” Yet this is precisely what Christ does not say. “It is not for you to know times or seasons.” No hint was given at all that the kingdom was universal, for the disciples would find that out for themselves in good time. In order that they should be able to do God’s work there was no need to bewildering, with a truth so far altogether revolutionary. And any close student of the “Kingdom of God” passages would recognize that in the material and terminology as well as the idea, it seems almost materialistic. A literal expectation of grapes would necessitate believing that grapes will grow in the world to come and that Christ will drink wine made from them, and almost certainly the disciples gathered just this idea from the words. But no one today finds them in the least difficulty. The exact extent of the kingdom and the exact nature of the happiness in it were irrelevant to what the disciples had to do. And so it cannot be thought an injustice to great Christians to use the OT by exactly the same rules, all the more as nowhere, not even in Mx 12 36, does the argument turn on the original human author or the date of writing. What Christ Himself, in His inner consciousness, knew on the subject is something beyond our immediate data. But His use of the OT lends no support to a Kenotic theory, not even on the wildest OT critical hypotheses. See KENORIS.

II. The Legislation.—As is well known, among the laws of the Pentateuch there exist several well-defined groups, of which the most formal is Dt 12–26. Another such group is Lev 17–26 or the Holiness Code (H), and still another is Ex 20 22–23 or the Covenant Code (CC). With this last is closely connected the Decalogue and the little compend Ex 34 17–26. Now it will be convenient for present purposes to designate the remaining mass of Pentateuchal legislation under the non-committal symbol X.

In the first place, attention may be directed to CC as a whole. Whatever it is meant to be, it was not meant as a mere interims 2. Covenant code for the period of the wanderings, Code either in its civil or its religious prescriptions. One piece of evidence alone is enough to show the contrary: in the laws touching settlements of disputes it is presupposed that Moses himself is not accessible. And the life assumed is agricultural. Men are living in fields with settled boundaries (22.5.6). The vine and the olive are both under cultivation (22.5.9; 23.11), under such settled circumstances that the rest of the Sabbatical year can be observed. And of the feasts, Weeks and Tabernacles are connected with the harvests (23.16). Of course, Moses may very well have given commands that looked to the future, but the present contention is simply that it was the remote and not the immediate future that is in point on this assumption. The life is Canaan and not the wilderness. But, now, the life is very primitive life. Flocks are of great importance, as is shown by the proportion of space given to laws about them. Rulers are mentioned only in 22.28 (nabî), and judges, as settled officers, are not mentioned at all, for the very rare word in 22.21 and 31; Dt (31.9) should be a "umpire." Indeed in 23.1-9 the duties of citizens, witness and judge are so intermingled as to suggest that judgment was administered by a general gathering of the people. It is taken for granted that a master has marital rights over his maidervants (21.7-11). Coben's money is men- tioned only in 21.32, if there. There is no attempt to define proportions exactly; cf 22.5 ("best of his own field") and 22.29 (the amount of the gift—a tenth?—not stated). Similarly there is no specific dating of the feasts of Weeks and Tabernacles in 23.16, while the exact day in Abib (ver 15) is at least not specified. Now, if this code could be isolated from the rest of the legislation, would not one refer it naturally on the above grounds to a time not very far away from that of Saul?

Now, in what follows, the prescriptions of the various codes will be compared with each other in regard to the various institutions of Israel's religion and also studied in the wider evidence of the historical books. Evidence of Ch, however, will be omitted for the most part, as a separate section is devoted to it (III, 1).

(1) The firstling is to be with its dam seven days, but on the eighth (not later!) it is to be given to God. The offerings from the harvest for righteousness, yet they never even intimate a duty to offer sacrifices in some other place (Am 1.2; Hos 3.5 are irrelevant). Not even do Mic 4.2 and Isa 2.2 imply that Jerus was to have the sole right to the cultus.

(2) Ezekiel is the first prophet who makes the place of sacrifice a matter of paramount importance, and this importance of the place is, in the Pentateuch, emphasized primarily in Dt. It is needless to collect the familiar evidence from Dt, but an illuminating comparison with CC is given by the laws for firstlings. No longer is the firstling given on the eighth day. It must be kept, but not worked or shorn, until the time when "year by year" it may be eaten in the chosen place (Dt 15.19.20). So now the fruits of the field and the "presence" are not offered "without delay" but again "year by year," with a provision for turning them into money if the way be too long to the sanctuary (14. 22-27). Dt and CC evidently have distinct conceptions—and in addition Dt 15.10-16 tells us that CC contains laws for Pal, not for the wilderness. H is as explicit as Dt—sacrifice anywhere except at the Tent is a capital offence (Lev 17.8.9). And the evidence of X need not be collected, but perhaps the most significant moment, Josh 23.18-34 presents Israel as under-standing from the first entrance into Canaan that sacrifice at any altar but the one was the worst of crimes.

(3) How is the offering of sacrifices in various places by such men as Samuel to be explained? That the worship was disorganized and the proper sanctuary could not be reached is hardly an explanation. For no disorganization of the country could be great enough to justify the offering of sacrifices in places not only unauthorized but flatly forbidden in Lev 17.8.9. On the theory of Mosaic origin for the whole of the Pentateuchal legislation, Samuel knew as much about the other statement of the Law as does any Jew of today, but it is clearly enough recognized by all Jews that no disorganization of the county or Divine reparation of the Temple justifies sacrifice in any other place. A key, however, is alone to be a time not very far away from that of Saul! Where sacrifice in various places is actually authorized until such a time as the land should be pacified and the Divine choice given to a place—a time represented in the history of Israel as about the time of David, or perhaps Solomon—this fact is explained by the Law as it is found in Samuel-Kings. Only, it is in flat contradiction with H and X.

This point is important. Dt 12.8-11 not only represents sacrifice in various places as permitted until some later time, but it represents Moses and the Israelites as practicing the same thing in the wilderness—"the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes; for ye are not as yet come," etc; i.e. Dt's conception was that in the wilderness Moses and the Israelites offered sacrifice wherever they thought good. This was to continue until God gave them rest from their enemies round about. Then the sacrifices were to be brought to the chosen place and to be offered nowhere else. Now, the conception in H and X is wholly different. On the mount Moses received directions for the building of the Tabernacle, with its altar. From the beginning it was a capital offence to offer sacrifices on any other altar than this (Lev 17.8.9), which was carried everywhere on the march, the wanderings with the Ark or the days of Phinehas, the offering of sacrifices on a different altar was enough to make civil war justifiable (Josh 22.12). For further discussion see III, 2.

(4) The difficulties of these data are obvious but are completely satisfied by the assumption that different conceptions of past history are present. Dt belongs to a period when the unity of the sanctuary had become an established fact, but still before the memory of the many altars as comparatively legitimate was extinguished. H and X, however, belong to a considerably later date, when the unity of the sanctuary had been so long taken for granted that no pious Israelite could conceive that anything else had ever existed. The reference of the commands to Moses is altogether in oriental manner.

Note.—Ex 20:24 has not been used in the above argument, but with the evidence presented there seems to be no way to treat of the Levites that would avoid granting to these passages a comparative importance. Isa 61:6 is a passage familiar evidence of Jgs is of course merely cumulative.

Lev 1-7 contains a list of the various kinds of sacrifices: (a) the sin offering and the trespass offering, very elaborately treated in 3 F; (b) the burnt offering, and the peace offering; and, standing a little by itself, the meal offering. The latter is of no especial significance for the present discussion and we may pass over it. Now, curiously enough, this list may be noted. In the prophetic writings where Ezek there is not one single reference to class (a). This is not simply the argument from silence, for sacrifices with their special names are mentioned from p., practically, the same class (b), even when presented for penitential purposes. If the offering is not burnt whole, the worshipper eats of it—it is a peace offering. Jer 7:21 is a particularly significant example, but of Am 4:5; 6:22; Hos 8:1; 9:4; Jer 12:14; 28:7,8; Jer 6:20. Turning to Samuel-Kings we find this borne out. The names of the sin and trespass offerings appear in 2 K 12:16, but it is money that is referred to (the EV should be corrected with it). It is also a burnt offering. When a golden miim appears as a trespass offering in 1 S 3:16. And in the codes, neither CC nor Dt mentions class (a) and even in H they appear only in Lev 19:22; i.e. what in late times up to the greatest sacrifices of Israel—by Lev 8 Israel’s first sacrifice was a sin offering—are found only in X and are mentioned in the prophets for the first time in Ezek 40:39, while the other classes are mentioned frequently and in different contexts. Whether Jer actually didAccording to these infer-ence that class (a) appeared relatively late in Israel’s history, a point discussed more fully in IV.

The problem presented by Jer 7:22 is a very serious one. Obviously, to say that the command to offer the burnt offering was a new or extraordinary command would be a gross oversight. The case is made clear that the offering of firstlings and first-fruits was altogether distinct from the regular offerings, it will be seen that Jer can very well presuppose CC or even Dt, both of which contain only regulations prescribing the different classes. Whether Jer actually did make a distinction of CC and Dt as binding (another question is.) But by what exegesis of the passage can Jer pre-suppose X? The natural inference is that the regulations of X became obligatory on Israel after Jeremiah’s day.

What follows is in itself an infinitesimal matter but the evidence is significant. The prohibition of steps for the altar in Ex 20:26 is based on the fact that the Levites were a very sequestered body. On the other hand, the priests were not; and in the case of David the members were described—1 Ch 23:24—"the priests..."; the expression is clearly a later one. In passing, it may be noted that Jer reproves people for wearing the clean clothes of the priests (Jer 6:20). This is corroborated in 1 S 14:20-22, where Michal reproves David for exposing himself. But in X the priests wear rather elaborate vestments (1 S 14:21). Whether this is merely a case of the paraphrase applied to the official ministers of the ark. Besides the ephod he wears a long linen robe and Michal despises him, not for exposing himself, but only for dancing (1 Ch 15:27-29).

(1) CC has no regulations regarding the priesthood, but of course it does not follow that this silence has any significance. However, the preponderance of references to Levites among the Hebrew writers, makes it probable that they had a more important position than the Levites of the Ex. There is a distinct and clear difference in the Hebrew steck at the bringing in of the ark. Besides the ephod he wears a long linen robe and Michal despises him, not for exposing himself, but only for dancing (1 Ch 15:27-29).

There is a great deal of evidence that the Levites were the "sons of Levi," just as in 17:9; 18:1: 24:5 the term is the "priests of the Levites," whereas in the Hebrew text the root word is used (cf. Edom, 1 K 4:25) with no mention of Levites.

(2) In Dt the priesthood appears as limited to the sons of Levi, but it is at least safe to say that no explicit distinction is made within the tribe. Levites are the "sons of Levi," just as in 17:9; 18:1: 24:5 the term is "the priests of the Levites," whereas in the Hebrew text the root word is used (cf. Edom, 1 K 4:25) with no mention of Levites.

(3) In Levi there is a clear distinction between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi. This distinction is between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi.

(4) In the Israelites there was a clear distinction between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi.

(5) In the Israelites there was a clear distinction between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi.

(6) In the Israelites there was a clear distinction between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi.

(7) In the Israelites there was a clear distinction between the priests of Levi and the Levites. The Levites are known to have been the family of the Levites, but not to have been Levites of the tribe of Levi.

8. Priests and Kings.

There is nothing said about their disposition. In Dt, the first-fruits of grain, wine, and oil ("the fleece") belong to the "priests of the Levites." (Ex 23:19). And the first-fruits in the beautiful rite of 26:11-11 probably had the... same destination. Of the general harvest the tithe is to be dedicated, as explained at length in Nu 18 22–24. The worshipper is to eat it himself, but shall take care to see that the Levite receives a portion. Every third year, however, the inheritance spent for the benefit of all who need charity, including the Levite. Note that in either case the Levite receives only a part of the tithe. In X the first-fruits are again assigned to the clergy (but now specifically to the priests—Nu 18 12, 13). But it appears that the tithe is to be given wholly to the Levites in Nu 18 21–24. The contradiction with Dt 14 22–29 is real. That two tithes were to be paid by the worshipper may safely be assumed as impossible, as a tax of one-fifth would have been unendurable. (It may be noted, though, that in later days the very piouso took this interpretation—cf Tob 1 7—but it is certain that no such ruling ever maintained generally.) An alternative explanation offered is that it could be assumed that the Levite would invite the worshipper to join in a feast on the tithe. Frankly, it is difficult to treat this as quite candid. In Dt the worshipper is anything rather than a mere guest at another man's banquet. When the tithe has been brought as money, the worshipper could then be paid, it has been pleasing him, and of the Levite it is said only "thou shalt not forsake him." Moreover, the tithe is to be consumed at the sanctuary and nowhere else (Dt 14 23; cf 12 11). In Nu, however, the tithe becomes the exclusive property of the Levite and it is assigned himself as his source of income (vs 25–32) and so exclusively is it his that it turns tithe. And, far from being turned into a feast at which the worshipper shares, it need not be consumed, the sanctuary at all but may be eaten in "every place," wherever the Levite and his family may happen to live (ver 31). It would be hard to conceive of two rules more mutually exclusive than the tithe directions in Dt and Nu. That the livelihood provided for the Levite in Dt is pitiful is hardly in point and at all events he received more than did the widow and the orphan. But of IV.

(2) Firstlings in CC must be offered on the eighth day (Ex 29 30), but in Dt 15 19–23 they were preserved, without being worked or shorn, until "year by year" they could be taken up to the sanctuary. (Apparently by 14 23–25 it might be converted into money in case of great distance.) Here the worshipper was to offer it and eat of it (a peace offering). Nu 18 17 is much more difficult, and that firstling becomes the personal property of the priest and he receives the flesh of the animal, if it can be sacrificed (i.e. it is his peace offering, not the worshipper's). There is no question of giving back a portion to the worshipper, again. Note, moreover, that in Dt 15 21–23, a flock of sheep for sacrifice was eaten at home by the worshipper and so did not come in contact with the priest at all; contrast Nu 18 15.

(3) A minor matter is found in the portion of the peace offering that went to the priest. In Dt 18 3 it is specified as the shoulder, two cheeks and maw. In X (Ex 29 26–28, etc) this has become the breast and the right thigh—a considerably more advantageous portion.

(4) In Dt it is laid down that a Levite has no inheritance among his brethren (10 9; 12 18; 18 1) and hence is recommended as an object of charity, like the widow and the orphan. And, like the widow and the orphan, he is confined to the same cities as the rest of the Israelites. Now in X the adoration to charity disappear, because he receives a fixed income (from the tithe), but it is said that this tithe is given the Levites in lieu of an inheritance, "Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance."

(5) In Nu 18 21–24. In another part of X, however, there is still a different conception—the Levites receive no less than forty-eight cities with ample "suburbs," expressly said to be given them "from the Dedanites and from the Mahomites, and from the half of the children of Ammon." But in Lev 25 32–34 the houses of the Levites are "their possession among the children of Israel," and the fields "their perpetual possession" and inalienable. Is there any natural explanation of these passages except that they represent increasing desire to provide provision for the Levites for a longer time? That the different rules represent advances within Moses' own period cannot be taken seriously, esp. as on this hypothesis the Dt laws would have been the latest. See, in addition, III.

1. CO and Dt have little mention of coined money and little attempt to define fractions exactly. Contrast the elaborate regulations of, e.g., Lev 27.

2. It is not contended that the Israelites could not have had enough culture in Moses' day to calculate so accurately, but attention must be drawn to the extreme contrast.

3. In CC (Ex 23 16) the year begins in the fall, in H (Lev 23 5) and in Ex 12 2; in Nu 28, 29 it begins in the spring.

4. Dt (16 3) explains the use of unleavened bread at the Passover as due to the haste with which the Israelites left Egypt (as in Ex 12 39), while Ex 12 15–20 makes this use depend on the fact that the first-born were slain. And note that, in Ex 12, vs 18–20 are a repetition of Ex 12 6–13, with precise dating added. For this matter of dating compare the rough statements of CC with the exactness of Lev 23.

5. In both CC (Ex 21 6) and Dt (15 17) life-long slavery is permitted, if the slave desires it, otherwise the slave is free at the end of the sixth year (H 22 39–43), the slave serves until the Jubilee year and then goes free absolutely.

Now, it is not claimed that all the discrepancies in the above can be regarded as incapable of reconciliation, although the examples chosen are among those where reconciliation is extremely difficult. The claim is made, however, that all of this evidence is cumulative—Nu 18 17 on the one hand indicates points more and more forcibly toward a single conclusion—that in the legislation of the Pentateuch, esp. when considered in connection with the Prophets and with Samuel-Rings, there have been incorporated laws belonging to very different periods. And, for the most part, a development from the simple to the highly organized can be traced. And this conclusion explains all the facts.

The above examples have been chosen as those where no changes in the text need be made. Of the other instances, only one need be considered—Lev 17. On its surface, tional Note this ch applies to appear to refer solely to life in the wilderness. But in vs 8.10, 12, 13 it appears that living the Israelites are settled non-Israelites. And the "open field" of ver 5 is a contrast to city, not to tent, life. Now in vs 3–5 the question is not at all idolatry but eating of blood at an ordinary meal. An exact explanation for the favor of Lev 17 12–13, 32–35, where the Israelites sin in eating the blood of animals "slain on the ground"; i.e. in both Lev 17 and 1 S 14, at every slaying of an animal for food, some formal disposition of the blood had to be made. In Lev 17 4 this is specified, and a appearance of the altar in 1 S 14 30 points in the same direction. Now this investing of every slaying of an animal with a sacrificial character, explains the permission of Dt 12:20-25 to eat flesh 'after all the desire of the soul', i.e., without the permission inexplicable unless there had been an earlier contrary practice. It is to be noted, moreover, that in Dt 12:16 the blood is to be disposed of by pouring it on the earth, the practice condemned in 1 S 14:32. The conclusion is that before the legislation of Dt the Israelite offered the blood of every slain sacrificial animal at the local sanctuary. Dt's rigid enforcement of the one sanctuary made this impossible, and so permission was given to eat flesh at home provided the soul was not to be satisfied. Now it is probable that it was disposed of in a non-sacrificial way.

But in Lev 17:5-6 it becomes clear what has happened. The passage reads: "...and things that have been devoted for death, which the person had vowed that..." This passage is taken from Lev 17:5-6 and is interpreted as a reference to the practice of sacrificing animals at the Tabernacle. This interpretation is supported by the fact that the Tabernacle was the only place where sacrifices could be offered under the Law of Moses.

The statement is thus explained as a local custom that was later abandoned. The statement in Lev 17:5-6 is interpreted as a concession to the local custom, and the practice of sacrificing animals at the Tabernacle is thus explained.

3. The House of Shiloh—It may be said at the outset that many of the attacks on the historic value of Ch have been very gravely exaggerated. But, none the less, a close comparison with Samuel-Kings shows that the Chronicler has most certainly read back into history the religious institutions of his own late day—it need not be said, with perfect innocence and sincerity. For instance, in comparing 2 K 11:14 with 1 Ch 23:2-6, we find the statement of K that Jehoiada brought captains of the guard into the house of Jehovah, which has been quite altered. In Ch Jehoiada summons Levites and heads of houses, with the express provision that only Levites shall enter into the house of Jehovah. So holy a priest as Jehoiada could not have acted as K, says he. On the contrary, the Chronicler goes a step further, for he states that Jehoiada brought into the house of Jehovah the whole nation of Israel, and that the Levites were not the only ones who entered. This is a more plausible explanation of the Chronicler's statement than the one given by K.

The Chronicler is not content with merely bringing back the religious institutions of his own day. He goes further, and brings back the religious institutions of the earlier periods of Israel's history. For instance, in 1 Ch 15:14 it is stated that Assai did not remove the high places in the land of Israel, and that this was a great sin. The Chronicler is here clearly exalting the worship of the Temple at Jerusalem, and this is evident from the fact that he states that the worship of the Temple was the only true worship in Israel. This is a common theme in the Chronicler, and it is one that is repeated throughout the book.

4. The Tabernacle—the Tabernacle is the most important of all the religious institutions of the Israelites. It was the center of their worship, and it was the place where the Ark of the Covenant was kept. The Tabernacle was built by Bezaleel and Aholiah, and it was completed by Solomon. The Tabernacle was a portable temple, and it was carried by the Levites from place to place. It was a type of the temple of Solomon, and it was a symbol of the presence of God with the Israelites.

The Chronicler is very fond of the Tabernacle, and he speaks of it in many places throughout the book. He speaks of the Tabernacle as the center of the worship of the Israelites, and he speaks of the Ark of the Covenant as the symbol of the presence of God with the Israelites. The Tabernacle is the most important of all the religious institutions of the Israelites, and it is the most important of all the religious institutions of the Chronicler.

5. The Ark—the Ark of the Covenant is the most important of all the religious institutions of the Israelites. It was the symbol of the presence of God with the Israelites, and it was the center of their worship. The Ark was carried by the Levites from place to place, and it was kept in the temple of Solomon. The Chronicler is very fond of the Ark, and he speaks of it in many places throughout the book. He speaks of the Ark as the symbol of the presence of God with the Israelites, and he speaks of the Ark as the center of the worship of the Israelites.

The Chronicler is very fond of the Tabernacle and the Ark of the Covenant, and he speaks of them in many places throughout the book. He speaks of them as the most important of all the religious institutions of the Israelites, and he speaks of them as the most important of all the religious institutions of himself.
very few important arguments may be mentioned. Simple people tend most naturally to think of heroes of the past as more and more nearly perfect. Now Jgs 1

Conquest describes the conquest of Canaan as a slow and laborious process after Joshua's death. But in Josh 10 40–43; 11 10–23; 21 43–45—esp. 11 16–19—Canaan was completely swept out of its inhabitants by Joshua in a series of annihilatory campaigns, making Jgs 1 quite impossible. Evidently the Josh passages cited belong to a very much later conception of the past history. The fate of Hebron is especially interesting. In Jgs 20 Caleb possesses Hebron at Joshua's death. But in Josh 16 Caleb takes Hebron during Joshua's lifetime and at the latter's death. In Josh 10 36–37, however, Joshua takes Hebron personally and annihilates its inhabitants. Here are three distinct conceptions of Hebron's fate, again. But still a fourth is found in Josh 21 11:2: it was not Caleb who received the city but the Levites. This evidently belongs to the time when the Levitical right to cities had become a commonplace, and was therefore referred to days. The accounts of the annihilation of the Canaanites arose naturally enough. According to Jgs the conquest was gradual and merciful. But the Canaanites seduced Israel to idolatry repeatedly. Therefore they should have been swept out 10–19. But Joshua was righteous and had all power. Therefore he must have rooted them out. How they suddenly reappeared again was a question that was not raised. But perhaps it may be thought a relief that those campaigns of the Israelites are due to reflection and not to descriptions of what actually happened.

Simple people think of God quite naturally and reverently as a greater man. So in Ex 24 9–11 we read that Moses and many others met God in the mount, they all saw Him, etc. But we supposed He was in the form of a cloud. In Ex 23 20, 23; 34 28, however, God (alone) seems to be the form of God. In Ex 33 11, where Moses (but no one else) sees God face to face, and in Dt 1 27, 33; 8 17, 18, that is, the form of God was not of any magnitude. Thus it is a question of a gradual transition. What is prophetically thought of as an exception, the contradiction of the concept was conceived over seventy Israelites besides Moses to have seen God is complete. So Israel was one official and an official throughout the time of Moses can be seen in certain passages where Aaron appears, predominantly. Contrast, e.g., Nu 10 29–31 in Ex 19; 16 9–10; Nu 20 2–13. Yet, despite the importance of Aaron in the latter passages, in Ex 33 11 the minister of Moses in the Tent is Joshua, who is not a priest at all. Contrast similarly 12 41–43; 16 11–12; 22 17–19; 17 9 with that in Ex 19; 16 9–10; Nu 20 2–13.

5. Priest-

Reasons of space preclude a further discussion of the other arguments here, such as the linguistic. As a matter of fact, the sections that contain the more developed concepts contain also a different vocabulary. To be repeated, however, is the fact that the argument is cumulative and that a single explanation of the differences is offered in the hypothesis of very varying dates for the various portions. Of course an exact analysis of every ver and a rigorous reconstruction of every source is not claimed to be possible. Many scholars have been convinced by their enthusiastic analysis into making previous assumptions. But the principal lines of division are sufficiently clear. And it may be hoped the reader will not think that the acceptance of them has been dictated by any motive except that of facing the truth—least of all by any motive of faith in a conspiracy of the power of God or a suspicion of the miraculous.

IV. Reconstruction.—Israel came into Canaan, after having received through the mediation of Moses a covenant relation with God, and by way of the Law a panning legislation. But this legislation seems not to have prescribed the ritual form that the worship of God was to take. In part, old forms were simply continued and in part new forms were gradually developed or appropriated, the emphasis of the Law at that time being on the moral and the ritual being left quite free. In especial, sacrifices were offered wherever Israelites happened to live, doubtless frequently at former Canaanite sanctuaries, now rededicated to the Lord. The local sanctuary was the center of the life. Men went thither to learn God's will and to give a religious character to what we should call purely secular transactions (contracts, etc). Firstlings were offered there on the eighth day, first-fruits at once, every meal of flesh food was given a sacrificial character (peace offering), and, for more solemn purposes, the whole burnt offering was offered. So the local sanctuary corresponded to our "village church." It was the religious home of the people. Certain of these sanctuaries had an especial dignity, above all Shiloh, where the Ark was. Later, when a united Israel had been realized, David brought the Ark to Jerus that the national capital and the center of the national religious life as well, and Solomon enthroned the Ark in the Temple. So to Jerus there resorted naturally the best of Israel's religious leaders, and there the worship of God would be found in its purest form, normally speaking.

As time went on, the progress of culture and the freer contact with other nations had bad effects as well as good. New and degrading religious practices flowed into the country and they revived old but equally degrading religious practices that had survived from the Canaanites. The priesthood at Jerus did not escape a taint, but the place where such rites gained the readiest foothold was of course the obscure local sanctuaries. Not the best-minded king or the most zealous prophet could watch all the services at them all, and attempts at purging them of idolatry or idolatrous rites (Elijah, Jehu, etc) could not effect permanent improvement. And it could not have been very long after David's death that the priests, who had begun to grow that complete prohibition of country sacrifices and the rigid centralization of everything at Jerus was the only measure possible. This would soon become a fixed conviction of the better class of the Jerus priesthood and in a few generations would be a tradition. Detailed precepts to carry this tradition into effect arose necessarily and in turn became a tradition and in course of time were regarded as Moses' work and committed to writing. In this way the legislation of Dt took form and at the time of its discovery under Josiah there is not the slightest occasion to attribute fraud to anyone engaged in the transaction. The document agreed fairly well with what was the tradition of Jerus, and no one at that day could distinguish between a writing a cent. old or even less and a writing of Moses' own time. The country priests and the mass of the people were not consulted as to enforcing it, and they would not have known if they had been consulted. Reading the history, the reforms proceeded from Josiah's day onward, and any general "tradition of the Jews" was non-existent.

particular, realized that only at a single sanctuary could the worship of God be kept pure—the single sanctuary was God's worship. And Ezekiel's influence was immense. Now it is to be noted that at the return only those came back who had a real enthusiasm for Jerusalem, as Babylonia was, materially speaking, a far more attractive place than the Face of that day.

That the single sanctuary could have been questioned by any of these Jews or that they could have conceived of Moses as instituting anything of less dignity is impossible. For this reason also had been at work. Even in Dt the more primitive note of joyousness was maintained in the sacrifices. But joyousness in simple life is often dissipated in cultivated life and the peace offering could be made a debauch (Lea 22 12-14; 1 Sam 26). See also the unique Himself. Is not the peace offering in the Harford must be ascribed to the God of the Bible. The best treatment of the inspiration question from the standpoint of pure dogmatics is critical. CROOK-BACKED, krook'bak'ted (גָּבֶן, gīḇēn; κανόνας, kānōnās): A disqualification for the priesthood (Lev 21 20); was probably an angular curvature of the spine, usually the result of tubercular caries of the vertebrae. It was by no means uncommon in ancient Egypt, where I have found a considerable number of spines affected with this disease. Some Malcolmic authorities (esp. the OT) have given the meaning "very dark colored," but this is unlikely.

The woman bound by the spirit of infirmity and unable to lift herself (Lk 13 11-17) was affected with senile kyphosis, a chronic bone disease often found among aged men (and more frequently women) whose lives have been spent in agricultural labor. In these the vertebrae become altered in shape so that it is impossible to straighten the back. Some rabbinical authorities believed all deformities to be due to sin and to this our Lord seems to have alluded in his rebuke to those who caviled at his healing on the Sabbath. I have found this condition in some Egyptian skeletons, and have seen it in a Palestinian skeleton. A similar affection with a similar curvature was found buried under the threshold of a house at Gezer, where she had evidently been offered as a foundation sacrifice.

Figurative: (1) It designates a course of action that deviates from rectitude, esp. deceit, guile, hypocrisy (Dt 32 5; Prov 2 15; Ecc 1 15; Lk 3 5; 1 Cor 2 16; and Lam 3 9); (2) difficulties (removed by God; Isa 42 16).

CROP: (1) As no other nation could have survived the Bab ally who was returned, and with the element necessarily but now outgrown changed into a form adapted to the new task the nation had before it—the preparation of itself and the world for the advent of Christ. This growth towards the higher, involving as it did the meeting of all kinds of obstacles, the solving of all kinds of problems, the learning when to abandon elements that had been transcended, is unique in the history of religions. And the explanation of its uniqueness can be found only in the guidance of God. And in the history as reconstructed God is seen truly as the Father, who trained His children little by little, giving them only what they were able but bringing them surely to Himself. And in the documents which contain the precepts for each stage of progress God's hand can be seen no less clearly. To be sure, in the secular science of history (as in physics or astronomy) His revelation was expressed in forms that His people could understand. This alteration—and this alteration only—in our view of what is covered by BIBLE inspiration is the sacrifice demanded by the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis.

The cross occurs in at least four different forms: (1) the form usually seen in pictures, the crucifixion, in which the upright beam stands for the preaching of the doctrine of the Atonement (1 Cor 1:18; Gal 6:14; Phil 3:18; Col 1:20). It expresses the bond of unity between the Jew and the Gentile (Eph 2:16), and between the believer and Christ, and also symbolizes sanctification (Gal 5:24). The cross is the center and circumference of the preaching of the apostles and of the life of the NT church.

As an instrument of death the cross was detested by the Jews. "Cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree" (Gal 3:13; cf. Dt 21:23), hence it became a stumbling-block to them, for how could one accused of God be their Messiah? Nor was the cross differently considered by the Romans. Let the very name of the cross be far away not only from the body of a Roman citizen, but even from his thoughts, his eyes, his ears" (Cicero Pro Rabirio 5). The earliest mode of crucifixion seems to have been by impalement, the transfixion of the body by a single long stake. The other mode of death-punishment still well known among the Mongol race. The usual mode of crucifixion was familiar to the Greeks, the Romans, the Egyptians, Persians and Babylonians (Thuc. i. 110; Herod. iii. 57). It was usually executed two thousand Tyrian captives in this way, after the fall of the city. The Jews received this form of punishment from the Syrians and Romans (Ant., XII, v, 4; XX, vi, 2; BJ, I, i, 6). The Roman citizen was considered a slave if crucified. In Pauline liturgy crucifixion was considered the death of a slave (Cicero In Verrem i. 56; Quint. viii. 4). The punishment was meted out for such crimes as treason, desertion in the face of the enemy, robbery, piracy, assassination, sedition, etc.

It continued in vogue in the Roman empire till the day of Constantine, when it was abolished as an insult to Christianity. Among the Romans crucifixion was preceded by scourging, undoubtedly to hasten impending death. The victim then bore his own cross, or at least the upright beam, to the place of execution. This in itself proves that the structure was less ponderous than is commonly supposed. When he was tied to the cross nothing further was done and he was left to die from starvation. If he was fit to be may be put in the region of Christendom. It is said that the East celebrated the stauronous hemera (Crucifixion Day) on September 14, since the 4th cent. The evidence for this is not very clear, but the Saviour had been crucified on May 3, since the time of Gregory the Great in the 6th cent. The finding and publication of the apocryphal "Doctrina Addael" has made it evident that the discovery of the crucifixion by Helena is but a version of the old Edessa legend, which tells of an identical discovery of the cross, under the very same circumstances, by the wife of the emperor Claudius, who had been converted to Christianity by the preaching of Peter.

(2) Scriptural.—The suffering implied in crucifixion naturally made the cross a symbol of pain, distress and burden-bearing. Thus Jesus used it Himself (Mt 27:38; Mark 15:21). In the NT the cross stands for the preaching of the doctrine of the Atonement (1 Cor 1:18; Gal 6:14; Phil 3:18; Col 1:20). It expresses the bond of unity between the Jew and the Gentile (Eph 2:16), and between the believer and Christ, and also symbolizes sanctification (Gal 5:24). The cross is the center and circumference of the preaching of the apostles and of the life of the NT church.

3. Symbolic Uses of the Cross.—(1) Extra-scriptural.—The sign of the cross was well known in the symbolism of various ancient nations. Among the Egyptians it is said to have been the symbol of divinity and of eternal life, and to have been the object of adoration. It is known in Egypt in the form of the cross and in the form of the letter T. The Spaniards found it to be well known, as a symbol, by the Mexicans and Peruvians, perhaps signifying the four elements, or the four seasons, or the four points of the compass.
CROWN, kroun: The word crown in the OT is a tr of five different Heb words, and in the NT of two Gr words. These express the several meanings, and must be examined to ascertain the same.

The five Heb words are as follows: (1) תִּפְנָא, kôdkhôdîm, from חַדָּה, kôdâhâdîm; (2) צֶר, zêr, from צָר, zârâr; (3) נֶזֶר, nezer, or נָזַר, nûzâr; (4) עַרְרָה, 'arârâh, from עָרָה, 'arâh; (5) קֶתֶר, kter, from קָטַר, kôtar.

1. In בָּשָׁל, both from נֶזֶר, nûzâr; (4) עַרְרָה, 'arârâh, Hebrew.

(1) Kôdâhâdîm means "the crown of the head," and is also rendered in AV "top of the head," "scalp," "pate." It comes from קַדָּה, kôdâh, meaning "to shave up," "contract," or bend the body or neck through courtesy. Both RV and ARV, in Dt 28 35 and 33 16, tr it "crown" instead of "top" as in AV. Jacob in his prophecy concerning his sons says: "The blessings of thy father . . . shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crowns of the head of him that is prince among his brethren" (Gen 49 26 ARVm). Other references are: Dt 33 20; 2 S 14 25; Job 2 7; Isa 3 17; Jer 2 16; 48 15; Tr "sculp" in Ps 88 21 and "pate" in Ps 7 14 16.

(2) Zêr means a "chapelet," something spread around the top as a molding about the border, and because of its wreath-like appearance called a crown. That which presses, binds" (BDB). Comes from zôr, meaning "to bind up, to fasten." It is used in Ex 26 11.24.25; 30 3.4; 37 2.11.12.26.27.

(3) Nezer means something "set apart;" i.e. a dedication to the priesthood or the dedication of a Nazarite, hence a chaplet or fillet as a symbol of such consecration. The word in AV is rendered "crown," "consecration," "set apart," "separation," "hair." Comes from nôzâr, meaning "to hold aloof" from impurity, even from drink and food, more definitely, "to set apart" for sacred purposes. i.e. "to separate," "devote," "consecrate." It is found in Ex 29 6; 39 30; Lev 8 9; 21 12; 2 S 1 10; 2 K 11 12; 2 Ch 23 11; Ps 89 39; 132 18; Prov 27 24; Zec 9 16.

(4) 'Arârâh means a crown in the usual sense. Comes from ārâh, meaning "to erect," as in war for offense or defense; also actually and figuratively "to crown." Rendered sometimes "to compass." It is used in 2 S 12 30; 1 Ch 20 2; Est 8 15; Job 19 9; 31 36; Ps 21 3; Prov 4 9; 12 4; 14 24; 16 13; 17 1; Cant 3 11; Is 5 5; 35 5; 62 3; 13 18; Lam 5 16; Ezek 16 12; 21 26; 23 42; Zec 6 11 14; "crowned," Cant 3 11; "crownest," Ps 65 11; "crowneth," Ps 103 4. RV tr "crowned," of Ps 8 5 "hast crowned." ARV prefers tr "crowning," in Isa 23 8, "the bestower of crowns."

(5) Kether means a "circlelet" or "a diadem." From kôthâr, meaning "to inclose:" as a friend, "to crown;" as an enemy, "to besiege." Various trs "best round," "inclose round," "suffer," "compass about." Found in Est 1 11; 2 17; 6 8; "crowned," in Prov 14 18.

The two Gr words of the NT tr crown are: (1) στεφάνος, stephanos, from στέφειν, and (2) διαδέμα, diadema, from διαδέω, "to bind round."

2. In Greek (1) Stephanos means a chaplet (wreath) made of leaves or leaf-like gold, used for marriage and festive occasions, and expressing public recognition of victory in races, games and war; also figuratively as a reward for efficient Christian life and service (see Games). This symbol was more noticeable and intricate than the plain fillet. Only in the Rev of John is stephanos called 'golden'. The "crown of thorns" which Jesus wore was a stephano (woven wreath) of thorns; the kind is not known (Mt 27 29; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2.5). Lk makes no mention of it. Whether intended to represent royalty or victory, it was a caricature crown. Stephanos is found in 1 Cor 9 25; Phil 4 1.1, 1 These 2 19; 2 Tim 4 8; Jas 1 12; 1 Pet 5 4; Rev 2 10; 3 11; 6 2; 12 14; 14 plur. in Rev 4 1.10; 9 7; "crowned" in 2 Tim 2 5; He 2 9; "crownedest" in He 2 7.

(3) Diadema is the word for "diadem," from διά, "through" (about) and δέ (and) (bound), i.e. something bound about the head. In the three places where it occurs (Rev 12 3; 13 1 and 19 12) both RV and ARV tr it not "crowns" but "diadems," thus making the proper distinction between stephanos and diadema, such as is not done either in AV or the LXX (see Trench, Synonyms of the NT). According to Thayer the distinction was not observed in Hellenic Gr. "Diadema" are on the dragon (Rev 12 3), the beast (Rev 13 1) and on the Rider of the White Horse, "the Faithful and True" (Rev 19 12). In each case the "diadema" are symbolic of power to rule.

There are five uses of the crown as seen in the Scripture references studied, viz. decoration, consecration, coronation, exaltation, and

3. Use and remuneration

(1) Decoration. The zêr of Ez, as far as it was a crown at all, was for ornamentation, its position not seeming to indicate... any utility purpose. These wavelet, gold moldings, used in the furnishings of the tabernacle of Moses, were placed about (a) the table of shewbread (Ex 25:24; 37:11); (b) the ark of the covenant (Ex 25:11; 37:2); (c) the altar of incense (Ex 30:3; 37:26). The function of these crowns is a disputed question among archaeologists. Their purpose other than decoration is not known. The encircling gold might signify gratitude, purity and enduring worth.

(2) Coronation.—The nazar was a twofold use as the crown of consecration: (a) It was placed as a frontlet on the miter of the high priest, being tied with a blue lace (Ex 39:30). The priestly crown was a flat piece of pure gold, bearing the inscription, “Holy to Jehovah,” signifying the consecration of the priest as the representative of the people (Ex 29:6; Lev 8:9). (b) Likewise the Heb king (2 K 11:22) was set apart by God in wearing on his head a royal nazar, whether of silk or gold we do not know. It was set with jewels (Zec 9:16) and was light enough to be taken into battle (2 S 1:10).

(3) Coronation.—The ordinary use of the crown. There were three kinds of kingy crowns used in coronation services: (a) The nazar or consecration crown, above referred to, was the only one used in crowning Heb kings. What seems to be an exception is in the case of Joshua, who represented both priest and king (Zec 6:11 ARVm). (b) The ădráh, and (c) the kether were used in crowning foreign monarchs. No king but a Heb could wear a nazar—such a crown. It is recorded that David presumed to put on his own head the ădráḥ of King Malecam (2 S 12:30 ARVm). The kether or jeweled turban was the crown of the Pers king and queen (Est 1:11; 2:17; 6:8).

(4) Exaltation. The ădráh, the stephanos and the diadema were used as crowns of exaltation. Stephanos was the usual crown of exaltation for victors of games, achievement in war and places of honor at feasts. The ădráḥ was worn at banquets (Cant 3:11; Isa 26:13.1), probably taking the form of a wreath of flowers; also as a crown of honor and victory (Ezk 16:12; 21:26; 23:42).

Stephanos is the crown of exaltation bestowed upon Christ (Rev 6:2; 14:14; He 2:9). “Exaltation was the logical result of Christ’s humiliation” (Vincent). The prophetic wearers of this exaltation is seen in the way that it is received by the exaltation of ădráḥ (Rev 12:1; 9:7). The symbolic dragon and beast are elevated, wearing diadēma (Rev 12:3; 13:1). The conquering Christ has “upon his head a golden crown” (Rev 2:10). Further Tertullian, De corona.

(5) Remuneration.—Paul, witnessing the races and games, caught the vision of wreath-crowned victors flush with the reward of earnest endeavor. See Games. He also saw the persistent, faithful Christian at the end of his hard-won race wearing the symbolic stephanos of rejoicing (1 Thess 2:19 AV), of righteousness (2 Tim 4:8), of glory (1 Pet 5:4), of life (Jas 1:12; Rev 2:10). Paul’s fellow-Christians were his joy and stephanos (Phil 4:1), of which Paul might justly make his boast. (Philippians). Before Paul, his Heb ancestors saw the ădráḥ of glory (Prov 4:9) and the ădráḥ of a good wife, children’s children, riches and a peaceful old age (Prov 12:4; 14:24; 16:31; 17:6). For Apoc references see Mt 20:28; 11:35; 13:39.

CROWN OF THORNS, thōrns (ἀκανθόν, στέφανος, akánthos stéphanos): Three of the four evangelists mention the crown of thorns, with which Christ was crowned by Pontius Pilate (Mt 27:29; Mk 15:17; Jn 19:2). All speak of the akantheus (Acanthus) crown, but there is no certainty about the peculiar plant, from the branches of which this crown of cruel mockery was plaited. The rabbinical books mention no less than twenty-two words in the Bible signifying thorny plants, and the word dakantha in the NT Gr is a generic and not a specific term. And this word or its adj. is used in the three Gospels, quoted above. It is therefore impossible definitely to determine what was the exact plant or tree, whose thorny branches were selected for this purpose. Tobler (Denkbl., 113, 179) inclines to the Spina Christi, as did Hassequist. Its botanical name is Zizyphus Spina Christi. It is a very common plant, whose spines are short and sharp, branches soft, round and pliable, and the leaves look like ivy, with a dark, shiny green color, making them therefore very adaptable to the purpose of the soldiers. Others have designated the Palustris aculeatus or the Lycium horridum. Both Geikie (Life of Christ, 549) and Farrar (Life of Christ, note 625) point to the Nubk (Zizyphus lotus). Says the latter, “The Nubk struck me, as it has all travelers in Palestine, as being most suitable both for making thorns and for the sake of its leaves, which are bright and its thorns singularly strong. But though the Nubk is very common on the shores of Galilee, I saw none of it near Jerusalem.” The settlement of the question is manifestly impossible. —Henry E. Dusker CRUCIFIXION, kroo-si-fik’shun. See Cross; Punishments.

CRUEL, kroo’el, CRUELTY, kroo’el-ti (יוּנָא, 'akhasr, "harsh," "fierce," כֱּּפָל, hāmâq, "violence"): There are various uses of the word “cruel” in the OT: (a) the cruel [deadly] venom of asps (Dt 32:33); (b) spoken of men of relentless hate; They hated him because of his good deeds: Prov 5:9; 11:17; 12:10; Jer 6:23; 50:42; (c) Job speaks of God’s dealings with him as “cruel” and arbitrary: “Thou art turned to be cruel to me” (Job 30:21); conscious of his virtue, yet holding God to be the author of his sufferings, Job is driven to the conclusion that God has become his enemy and is bent upon destroying him; (d) the “day of Jeh” — a prophetic phrase to denote the time of God’s manifestation in judgment— is described as “cruel,” as “cruel and angry” (Isa 13:9). The word “cruelty” has nearly disappeared from the Bible. In RV it occurs only in Ps 27:12. AV has it in Gen 49:5; Ps 74:20 (RV “violence”); Ezek 34:4 (7; 9; perekh, “crushing,” RV “rigs”).

The OT reserves many acts on the part of chosen individuals and the elect nation which are marked by gross cruelty, particularly when measured by the standards of our own age. Some of these acts are sanctioned by Scripture or even presented as commanded by God, as, for example, the sacrifice of Isaac, the extermination of the Canaanites, the authorization of the avenger of blood and of human slavery, and of retaliation for evil. Some of the deeds performed by Divinely appointed leaders of Israel are characterized by inhumanity. Samuel “hewed Agag in pieces” (1 S 15:33). David massacred the Ammonites with great barbarity (2 S 12:31). Elijah slew the prophets of Baal (1 K 18:40; cf 2 K 1:10; 10:25). Some of the utterances of the Psalmists breathe the spirit of hate and revenge, as in the so-called imprecatory psalms (Ps 137:8; 139:20). This has often been a matter of great perplexity to the devout student of the Bible. He has found it difficult to reconcile such practices with the bearing of His approval, with the highest standards of Christian morality. It is sometimes urged in justification that these deeds are permitted, but not commanded by God. But this answer hardly meets the facts of the case. We shall arrive at a truer answer if we recognize the fact, which Jesus emphasizes, that the OT religion is a self-accommodation to the low moral standard of those whom it was designed to instruct. This He refers to in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:22-28; 34), and afterward to the hardness of the ancestral Jewish heart (Mt 19:8). In the OT we are dealing with the childhood of the world, in which revelation is compelled to limit itself to the comprehension of its subjects. It must speak so that they can understand. It must start with the question where it finds it. It must lead them along lines in which they of their own volition can walk, that character may grow step by step. A gradual development of spiritual and ethical ideals may clearly be traced in the sacred records. We must therefore read the OT narratives and interpret their teaching, not according to the standards of our own age, but in the light of the age to which these narratives belong.

The spirit of Elijah may not be the spirit of Christ (Lk 9:55). While many of the acts of cruelty and barbarity recorded in the OT are indicative of an age of a low type of morality, yet we must at the same time recognize the fact, that Israel's religion by emphasizing holy living and righteous conduct, created a favorable atmosphere for the growth of high ethical ideals. Wherever this religion is seen at its best, as in the teachings of the prophets, it is the mark of the righteous man to treat human life as sacred and to refrain scrupulously from inflicting unnecessary pain or suffering. Even the Gentiles shall be brought to judgment for their barbarities and inhuman practices (Am 1:2f; 2 K 25:7). Among the blessings of the Messianic kingdom, predicted by the prophet, is the cessation of war with all of its attendant cruelties and horrors. The Law of Israel also reflected this tendency toward humanity, and many of its ordinances, while seemingly inhuman, really tended to mitigate prevailing barbarities. In fact, such ordinances are those referring to the maltreatment of slaves (Ex 21:20), to the Cities of Refuge (Nu 35:19f; cf Josh 20), to rules of warfare (Dt 20:10f), etc. The extermination of the Canaanites is represented as a Divine ordinance, morally correct civilization (Gen 15:16; Dt 12:30). It is declared necessary in order to guard the Hebrews from contamination by the sins of the Canaanites (Ex 23:32). It is not so far back, that many of the practices that are the most esteemed in our Christerian day, were universally and were not thought incompatible with Christian civilization. Even our own time needs to secure a more widespread practical recognition of the principles of humanity, kindness and justice, which are professedly the law of the Christian life. L. KAISER

CRUMB, krumb (φούτον, psichion, "a little bit"): Occurs only in the NT, of remnants of food, scarp. Lazarus desired "to be fed with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table" (Lk 16:21). "Even the [little] dogs eat out of the crumbs" (Mt 15:27; Mk 7:28), "possibly the fragments of bread on which the guests wiped their hands (after thrusting them into the common dish), and flung to the dogs" (Farrar, Life of Christ, I, 476).

CRUSE, kroös: A small earthen vessel or flask, usually for holding liquids (γυμνής, gappath; as water, I S 26 11.12.16; 1 K 19 6; it being porous, the liquid is kept cool; also for holding oil, as in I K 17 12.14.16).

In 1 K 4:3 ("a curse of honey") the word פַּרְשֹׁת, baabbiq, would be better rendered "bottle," doubtless deriving its name from the gurgling sound of issuing liquids. In 2 K 2 20 γνύμης, is not a jar or flask, but a dish, or platter, for salt or other substances.

In the NT a small jar or vial, δαχθρον, δαχθρον, "alabaster cruse" or flask, for holding ointment; not "box" as in AV (Mt 26 7; Mk 14 9; Lk 10 38; 17 38); in Lk 2 7 it is used for "vial" RV. EDWARD BAGGIE Poggolly CRY, CRYING, kри'юng (πλήνεις, z'eb'ak; φυγάδεις, c'ak [and forms], κρηπός, κρητής, κρητεύω, τίνα; ριπήνα; δούλα, δούλη, ράπαρα, κράτει, φωναχτο, φηνήνα;): Various words are used "cry," "crying," etc, the chief of which are those above given; though φυγάδεις denote esp. a cry for help, from pain or distress, and are frequently used for crying to God, e.g. (z'eb'ak, Ex 2 23; Jgs 9 15.; Ps 22 5; 107 13.; Mic 3 4; (z'eb'ak, Ex 8 12; 16 23; Ps 34 17; 77 1; Isa 19 20; Lam 2 18); "krdai (a mimetic word) has the widest signification, but is often used of appealing to God (frequently tr" called," etc, Gen 39 14.15.18; 41 43; Dt 16 9; 24 15; 1 K 18 27; Ps 3 4; 22 2; 27 7; Prov 1 18; Isa 34 11; 52 2, etc); (krdai, Job 29 12; 30 20.28; Ps 18 6.41; 88 13; Jon 2 2; Hab 1 2, etc); rinhadh, "a shouting," whether for joy or grief (1 K 8 27; Ps 17 1; 61 1; 88 2; 119 109; 142 6; Isa 43 14 RV "rejoicing," etc). Other Heb words are 'dnak, "a voice," etc (Ex 20 14 5); "krdai (a mimetic word)" (Prov 24 17 AV; 26 AV); hhamah, "to make a noise" (Ps 55 17 AV); r'v, "to shout" (Jgs 7 21 AV; Job 30 5; Isa 42 13; etc); rtnam, "to cry aloud" (Ps 4 22; Lam 2 19); sh'lim, "criying" (Isa 22 5); rthd'āh, "crying," "noise" (Job 30 6); (to cry). In the NT we have boosō, "to cry," "shout" (Mt 3 3; Mk 1 3; 15 34; Gal 4 27, etc); krazē, (mimetic, the hoarse cry of the raven), "to cry out" (Mt 9 27 14 30; 21 9; 27 50; Mk 5 5; Gal 4 6; Rev 6 10; 7 2, etc); phōnē, "to give forth the voice," "sound" (Lk 8 8; 16 24, 28; Acts 15 28; Rev 14 18 AV); anabodō, "to cry out" (Mt 27 46; Lk 9 38); aphēmi, "to let go," etc, "to send away" (Mt 15 37 AV); epibōθos, "to cry about" (anything) (Acts 25 24); epiphēnēdo, "to give forth the voice upon" (Lk 23 21 AV); krazē, "to make a cry, or outcry, or clamor" (Mt 12 19; 15 22; 11 43; 18 40; 19 6.15; Acts 22 23); anakrēdo, "to cry out" (Mk 13 34; etc); kroug'ē, "a crying out" (Mt 25 6; Acts 25 9 AV; He 5 7; Rev 21 4).

For "cry" RV has "sound" (2 Ch 13 12); "cry because of these things" (Job 30 24 B brought RV: "cry out); (Job 31 38; Lk 17 14) "call"; "be blind" (Isa 29 9); "go" (Ezk 38 16); "pant" (Job 1 20); "cry aloud" (Mt 12 19); "clamor" (Acts 28 8). Among the other changes are, "span" for "cry aloud" (Ps 55 17); "an sound an alarm" (Hos 5 8). "take your pleasure," in "blind yourselves," for "cry ye out" (Isa 29 9); "sigh, but not aloud," for "forth to cry" (Ezk 21 17); "shoutings" for "crying" (Job 39 7); "founding, "for crying"") to the fictitious speech of Job 39 17; "where wept instead of "not let thy soul spare for his crying," "set not thy heart on his destruction," m. Heb "causing him to suffer" (ma'ah, "to put to death"); "wennis for "crying aloud" (Mk 15 8, different text); "cry" for "set" of west of Lk 1 40); for "had cried", for "cry") RVm "has crying." W. L. WALKER CRYSTAL, kris'tal: In EV the word is probably intended to signify rock-crystal, crystallized quartz. This the Greeks called σφραλάζον, krystallos, "ice," believing it to have been formed by water from intense cold. Thus in Rev 4 6; 21 6; 22 1, either "crystal" (EV) or "ice" (RVm) suits the context. The word rendered "crystal" in NIV (Ec 1 22 (72)); koreh) is ambiguous in precisely the same way (RVm "ice"). In Job 28 17 the context favors AV "crystal," rather than RV "glass" (P22 7), z'khakith). Finally, in Job 28:18 RV reads "crystal" for AV "pears" (Heb ḫabbāh, the weight of evidence favors RV in spite of the parallemism suggested by AV). See also Stonew, Precious.

CUB, kub (κοῦβ, kōb; AV Chub): The word occurs only in Ezk 30 5. There is almost certainly a corruption, and we should read, as in LXX, "Lub," i.e. Libya. Libya, in the earlier part of the same yer (AV), is a mistr of "Put," thus correctly rendered in RV.

CUBIT, kū'bit (πότν, 'amnah; πέχων, pēchōn): The standard for measures of length among the Hebrews. They derived it from the Babylonians, but a similar measure was used in Egypt with which they must have been familiar. The length of the cubit is variously estimated, since there seems to have been a double standard in both countries, and because we have no undisputed example of the cubit remaining to the present time. The original cubit was the length of the forearm, from the elbow to the end of the fingers, as is implied from the derivation of the word in Heb and in Lat (cubitum). It seems to been referred to also in Dt 3 11: "after the cubit of a man." But this was too indefinite for a scientific standard, and the Babylonians early adopted a more accurate method of measurement, which passed to the nations of the West. They had a double standard, the so-called royal cubit and the ordinary one. From the remains of buildings in Assyria and Babylonia, the former is made out to be about 20.6 in., and a cubit of similar length was used in Egypt and must have been known to the Hebrews. This was probably the cubit mentioned by Ezk 40 5 and perhaps that of Solomon's temple, "cubits after the first measure" (2 1 3 3), i.e. the cubit of the ancient cubit. The ordinary cubit of commerce was shorter, and has been variously estimated at between 16 and 18 or more inches, but the evidence of the Siloam inscription and of the toms in Pal seems to indicate 17.6 in. as the average length. See Weights and M easures.

This was the cubit of six palms, while the longer one was of seven (Ezk 40 5). The cubit mentioned in Jgs 3 16 is from a different word in Heb ('םכ, 'īmēḏ) and was probably shorter, for Jehud girded it on his thigh under the cloak. (Dt 37 19; cf. Hb Lk 12 25, "Which of you . . . can add a c. unto the measure of his life?"; Jn 21 8, "about two hundred cubits off"); Rev 21 17, "the wall thereof, a hundred and forty and four cubits." (H. Porter

CUCKOW, kok'kō, kuk'kō (קוק, šakaph; ἀμφός, láros; Lat Cuculus canorus): The Heb root from which the word šakaph is derived means "to be lean" and "slender," and in older VSS of the Bible was tēl cuckow (cuckoo). It was mentioned twice in the Bible (Lev 11 16, and practically the same in Dt 14 15 AV "cuckoo"), in the list of unclean birds. The latter term by which we designate the bird is very similar to the Arab., and all names for it in different countries are so nearly the same that they prove themselves based on its double cry, "cuck-ōo," or the single note "kowk" or "gouk." The bird is as old as history, and interesting because the European species placed its eggs in the nests of other birds, which gave rise to much fiction concerning its habits. The European bird is a brownish gray with white bars underneath, and larger than ours, which are a beautiful olive gray, with tail feathers of irregular length touched with white, knobs on the bill, black or yellow, according to species, and beautiful sleek head and shining eyes. Our birds build their own nests, attend their young with care and are much loved for their beauty. Their food is not repulsive in any species; there never was any reason why they should have been classed among the abominations, and for these reasons scientists in search of a "lean, slender" bird of offensive diet and habit have selected the "sea-mew" (q.v.) which is substituted for cuckoo in the RV with good natural-history reason to sustain the change.

CUCUMBER, kū'kum-bér (κυκλωπή, kiskhahu'm; σικους, sikuos): One of the articles of food for which Israel in the wilderness looked back with longing to Egypt (Nu 11 5). Cucumbers are great favorites with all the people of Pal. Two varieties occur, Cucumis sativus (Arab. Khyrāla), originally a product of N.W. India, which is smooth-skinned, whitish and of delicate flavor, and requires much water in its cultivation, and Cucumis chate (Arab. Fajjūs), which is long and slender but less juicy than the former. Probably the Bib. reference is to the latter as it is a plant much grown in Egypt where it is said to attain unusual excellence.

A "garden of cucumbers," or more literally a "place of cucumbers" (παλισάρδας), is mentioned in Isa 1 8; Bar 6 70. "A lodge in a garden of cucumbers" (Isa 1 8) is the rough wooden booth erected by the owner from which he keeps guard over his ripening vegetables. It is commonly raised upon poles and, when abandoned for the season, it falls into decay and presents a dreary spectacle of tottering poles and dead leaves.

CULTURE, kul'tür: Found only in 2 Ess 8 6 AV and RV, "give . . . culture to our understanding," i.e. to nourish it as seed in the ground.

CUMBER, kum'bēr, CUMBERED (καταργεῖ, katargē, "to make idle," περιπομο, "to be drawn about," in mind "to be distracted"): Spoken of the barren fig tree in the parable: "Cut it down; why doth it also cumber [block up, make unproductive] the ground?" (Lk 13 7). Cumbered means to be over-occupied with cares or business, distracted: "But Martha was cumbered about much serving" (Lk 10 40). The word cumbrance occurs in Dt 13 15: "How can I myself alone bear your cumberance?" (יְבָה, yēḇāḥ, "an encumbrance," "a burden"). Cf Isa 1 14, where RV has "cumbrance," RV "trouble." no

CUMMIN, kū'min (קָמָם, kamām; קימונ, kā-mōn): The seed of the herb Cuminum cypnunum (N.O. Umbelliferae). It has carminative properties and is used for flavoring various dishes, esp. during fasts. In flavor and appearance it resembles caraway, though it is less agreeable to western palates. As an illustration of Jeh's wisdom it is said (Isa 28 27) that cumin is scattered in sowing and beaten out with a rod in threshing. These facts are true in Pal today. The Jews paid tithes of cumin (Mt 23 23) (see cut on following page).

CUN, kun (קֻנ, kūn; A, in 5071 והתננ תנים, ek lōn ekeleqōn pōleim, "from the chosen cities"): One of the cities of Hadarezer, king of Syria, spoiled by David (1 Ch 18 8, AV "Chun"). In the || passeeage (2 8 8) its place is taken by Berotthai, which see.

CUNNING, kun'ing (קֻנָג, ḫākmā, ḫūţ, ḫā-

chief Heb words are ḥāḇāh, “wise,” “skilful” (2 Ch 2 7 AV “a man cunning to work in gold”; ver 13; Isa 3 3 AV, etc); ḥāshāh, “to think,” “devise,” “desire” (Ex 26 131; 26 615 AV, etc). We have also ḏā’āh, “knowledge” (K 7 14 AV); bīn, “to be intelligent” (1 Ch 25 7 AV); man ḥāšēbēth, “thought,” “device,” “design” (Ex 31 4; 36 33.35 AV); ḏāḏān, “artificer” (Cant 7 1 AV); yāḏāh, “to know,” once tr “cunning” (Dnl 1 4 AV). For “cunning” ERV gives “skilful” (Ex 31 4, etc; Isa 3 3 “expert”); for “cunning work” the work of the “skilful workman” (Ex 26 131, etc, ERV “cunning workman”); for “curious,” “skilfully woven,” ERV “cunningly woven” (Ex 28 8, etc).

Not only were all commanded to drink of the wine (Mt 26 27), but the very irregularities in the Corinthian church point to its universal use (1 Cor 11 27). Nor does the Rom church attempt to justify its withholding the cup from the laity (the communion cup 4 cup) by any apostolic practice, or upon direct Scriptural authority. This variation from the original institution is an outgrowth of the doctrines of transubstantiation and sacramental concomitance, of the attempt to transform the sacrament of the Eucharist into the sacrifice of the Mass, and of the wide separation between clergy and laity resulting from raising the ministry to the rank of a sacerdotal order. The practice was condemned by Popes Leo I (d. 461) and Gelasius (d. 496); but gained a firm hold in the 12th cent., and was enacted into a church regulation by the Council of Constance in 1415. See also BLESSING, CUP OF.

As to the use of cups for divination (Gen 44 5), the reference is to superstitious practice derived from the Gentiles. For various modes of divining what is unknown by the pouring of water into bowls, and making observations accordingly, see Geikie, Hours with the Bible, 1, 492 f., and art. DIVINATION.

CUPBEARER, kūpˈbər-ər (ΚΥΠΦΗΣ, mashkēh), “one giving drink”; oὐβογός, oinochōs): An officer of high rank at ancient oriental courts, whose duty it was to serve the wine at the king’s table. On account of the constant fear of plots and intrigues, a person must be regarded as thoroughly trustworthy to hold this position. He must guard against poison in the king’s cup, and was sometimes required to swallow some of the wine before serving it. His confidential relations with the king often endeared him to his sovereign and also gave him a position of great influence. This officer is first mentioned in Scripture in Gen 40 1 ff., where the Heb word elsewhere tr “cupbearer is rendered “butler.” The phrase “chief of the butlers” (ver 2) accords with the fact that there were often a number of such officials under one chief (cf Xen. Hellen. vii.1, 38). Nehemiah (ch 11) was cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, and was held in high esteem by the king. In the 12th cent. his financial ability (Neh 5 8.10.14.17) would indicate that the office was a lucrative one. Cupbearers are mentioned further in 1 K 10 3; 2 Ch 9 4, where, though they are among evidences of royal splendor, are not related to having possessed the same kind of favor as the Solomon’s. The title Rabshakeh (Isa 36 2), once thought to mean “chief of the cupbearers,” is now given a different derivation and explained as “chief of the officers,” or “princes” (DBB s.v.). See further on cupbearers Herod. iii.34; Xen. Cyrop. i.3, 8, 9; Jos, Ant, XVI, vii, 1; Tob 1 22.

CUPBOARD, kūbˈərd (ΚΥΛΙΚΟΣ, kullikion, 1 Mac 15 52): A kind of sideboard in or on which Simon’s gold and silver vessels were displayed, and which, among other evidences of his glory, amazed the Syran envoy Athenobius. Cf. the Rom abacus, said to have been introduced into Rome from Asia.

CURDLE, kūrˈdēl (ΣΗΡ, ἐρήπα), “to congeal,” “harden,” “curdle”): Occurs in Job 10 10, “Has thou not . . . curdled me like cheese?” I.e. made him take solid form. “The formation of the embryo is a mystery on which the Heb dwells with a deep and reverent interest” (W. F. Arndt; Ps 139 15–16). “These similes are often met with in the Koran and oriental poetry. See Speaker’s Comm. in loc.

“medicine” means properly the removal of a bandage from a healed wound, and is used figuratively in Hos 5 13; marpe', “healing,” is used in the sense of deliverance of the city in Jer 33 6; with a negative particle in 2 Ch 21 18 it is used to describe the bowel disease of leprosy as invisible. The words used are physical cures (iati5 in Lk 13 32) as contradistinguished from the casting out of demons as Mt 17 16; Lk 7 21; Jn 5 10. Cure is only used in the NT in the sense of physical healing; in the OT usually in the sense of spiritual or national deliverance from disasters.

CURIOSUS, kû-r'î-us (κυρίος, mahâshēbēthah; κύριον, periergos). The above Heb word, meaning “thought,” “device,” “design,” is tr' “curious,” Ex 35 32 AV “curious works”; ERV “cunning,” ARV “skillful”; bâshēb ("device," “devised work”), tr' AV “curious works,” is tr' ERV “woven the woven braid,” ARV “skilfully” (Ex 28 27; 29 39; 50 20; Lev 8 7). In Ps 139 15 râkâm, “embroidered,” “variegated,” is used of a child in the womb, tr' “curiously wrought,” “the body or the fetus being described as woven together of so many different-colored threads, like a cunning and beautiful network or tapestry” (Perowne in loc.). See also CURDLE. Periergos, “working round about,” is used of the “curious arts” of some in Ephesus who brought their books to be burned (Acts 19 19 ARV “magical”). See Astrology 14.

CURSE, kûr's (ךֵּרָשׁ, 'alåh [Nu 5 21.23.27, etc.]; כָּרָשׁ, me'ráh [Pro 3 33; Mal 2 2, etc.]; כָּרָשׁת, ‘alåh [Gen 27 12.13]; כָּרַד, kadra [Gal 3 10.13]). This word as noun and vb renders different Heb words, some of them being more or less synonymous, differing only in degree of strength. It is often used in contrast with “bless” or “blessing” (Dt 11 29). When a curse is pronounced against any person, we are not to understand this as a mere wish, however violent, that disaster should overtake the person in question, any more than we are to understand that a corresponding “blessing” conveys simply a wish that prosperity should be the lot of the person on whom the blessing is invoked. A curse was considered to possess an inherent power of carrying itself into effect. Prayer has been defined as a wish referred to God. Curses (or blessings) were imprecations referred to supernatural beings in whose existence and power to do good or inflict harm primitive man believed.

The use of magic and spells of all kinds is based on the belief that it is possible to enlist the support of the superhuman beings with whom the universe abounds, and to persuade them to help the supplicant’s wishes. It has been suggested that spells were written on pieces of parchment and cast to the winds in the belief that they would find their way to their proper destination—that some demonizing being would act as postman and deliver them at the proper address. In Zec (6 1–3) the “flying roll,” with curses inscribed on it “goeth forth over the face of the whole land.” It would find its way into the house of every thief and perjurer. But it was not always possible to commit curses to writing, it was sometimes enough to utter them aloud.

Generally the name of some deity would be coupled with such imprecations, as Goliath cursed David by his gods (1 S 17 43). Such curses once uttered possessed the power of self-realization.

It was customary of families and of individuals to curse their declining years to bless their children, such a blessing being, not simply a paternal wish that their children should prosper in life, but a potent factor in determining their welfare (Gen 9 25). In this case Jacob seeks his father’s blessing, which was more than his good father’s wishes for his future career. Such blessings and curses were independent of moral considerations. Before moral distinctions played any part in molding the Hebrews, it was not necessary before a spell was pronounced that the individual against whom the spell was pronounced should be deserving, on moral grounds, of the fate which was invoked on him. It was sufficient that he should be the foe of the one to whom the curse was pronounced. We may assume that such curses signified the commencement of a battle. But in course of time such indiscriminate imprecations would not satisfy enlightened moral judgment. In the dramatic situation depicted in Dt (11 29; 12 f) the curse was placed on Mt. Ebal and the blessing on Mt. Gerizim. But the curse was the penalty for disobedience, as the blessing was the reward for obedience. The Book of Prov (26 2) summarily dismisses the traditional belief—“the curse that is causeless, altogether causeless”—“In the discourses of Jesus we find blessings and curses. They are however simply authoritative declarations of the eternal connection between right doing and happiness, wrong doing and misery” (Cheyne).

Whereas curses by ordinary persons were considered more efficacious—some god being always only too glad to speed them on their way to their destination—yet special persons—“holy” persons—in virtue of their special relation to Divine beings possessed special powers of pronouncing effectual curses on account of their powers of enlisting supernatural aid. Balaam, according to the narrative in Nu (22 f), was an expert in the art. Balak was convinced that Balaam’s curse would bring about the utter destruction of the Israelites (see Gray, “Numbers,” ICC).

The term—and the thing signified—plays an important part in Paul’s interpretation of the cross. In the light of the law all men are guilty. There is no acquittal through appeal to a law that commands and never forgives—prohibits and never relents. The violator of the law is under a curse. His doom has been pronounced. Escape is impossible. But on the cross Jesus Christ endured the curse—for “cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree” (Gal 3 13)—and thereby has taken its victim in a spiritual sense. See PUNISHMENTS.

Jesus commands His disciples, “Bless them that curse you” (Lk 6 28; cf Rom 12 14). He Himself cursed the fruitless fig tree (Mk 11 21)—a symbol of the doom that presently awaits the unproductive. A curse is the rendering of כר, kârem, implies a totally different idea (see ACCURSED). T. LEWIS CURTAIN, kûr't'n, -ten, -tin: The word ordinarily used for curtain is כָּרָשׁ, y't'tâsh. Thus in Ex 26 1 f; 36 8 f of the curtains of the tabernacle (see TABERNACLE). In 2 S 7 7; Ps 104 2 (Cant 1 5; Isa 54 2; Jer 4 20; 10 20; 49 29; Hab 3 7).

Figurative: In Isa 40 22 (like Ps 104 2, of the heavens), the word is used כָּרָשׁ, dokh, lit. “gaze.”

CUSH, kush (כּוּשׁ, kâsh):
(1) The first of the sons of Ham, from whom sprang Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah and Sabtecch. He was also the father of Nimrod, who founded Babel (Babylo-
(2) The name of the country around which the Gihon flowed (Gen 2 13), rendered “Ethiopia” in the AV, but in view of the distance... of that country from the other rivers mentioned, this seems to be an unlikely identification. Fried. Dehneicz has suggested (Wo lag das Paradies 74 ff.) that the watercourse in question is the canal "gu-handel" or "gu-handel" of Ezekiel 38:12, and concludes, coming from the S., entered Babylon a little to the E. of the Euphrates, and, flowing alongside the Festival-Street, entered the Euphrates at the N. of Nebuchadrezzar's palace. Koldeweij (Tempel von Babylon und Bronze age, 38) regards the "gu-handel" as the section of the Euphrates itself at this point. There is no indication, however, that the district which it enclosed was ever called Kâšû or Cush, and the suppression of the final syllable of "gu-handel" would remain unexplained. Moreover, the identification of Cush with a possible Câsh, for Kâšû, "Chaldea," seems likewise improbable, esp. as that name could only have been applied, in early times, to the district bordering on the Persian Gulf (see Chaldea). Another theory is, that the Cush of Gen 2:13 is the Kâšû of certain Assyrian letters, where it seems to designate a district in the neighborhood of Cappadocia. This identification apparently leads us back to an ancient tradition at least of Euphrates-time current in the East, but later forgotten, which caused the Pyramus river to assume the name of Jôhân (i.e. Gihon). This stream rises in the mountains N.E. of the Gulf of Alexandretta, and, taking a southwesterly course, flows into the Mediterranean near Karatash. Though nearer than the Ethiopian Cush, this is still too far W., and therefore unsatisfactory as an identification—all the streams or waterways of the Garden of Eden ought to flow through the same region.

(3) The well-known country of Cush or Ethiopia, from Syene (Ezk 39:10) southward—Egypt Kôl, Bab Kâšû, AssyR Kâšû. This name sometimes denotes the land Ethiopian (Isa 11:11; 38:1; Zeph 3:10; Ezek 19:10; Job 28:19; Est 1:1; 8:9), sometimes the people (Isa 20:4; Jer 46:9; Ezek 38:5); but is in many passages uncertain. Notwithstanding that the descendants of Ham are always regarded as non-Semitic, the Ethiopians, Ge'ez or Cushites, are regarded themselves, as having a Sem language of special interest on account of its likeness to Himyaritic, and its illustration of certain forms in Assyro-Babylonian. These Cushites were in all probability migrants from another (more northerly) district, and akin to the Canaanites—like them dark, but by no means black, and certainly not Negroes. W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, 113 n.) states that it cannot be proved whether the Egyptians had quite black neighbors (on the S.). In earlier times they are represented as brown, and later as brown mingled with black, implying that negroes only came to their knowledge as a distinct and extensive race in comparatively late times. Moses' wife (Nu 12:1) was certainly therefore not a Negro, but merely a Cushite woman, probably speaking a Sem language—prehistoric Ge'ez or Ethiopian (see Cushite Woman). In all probability Sem tribes were clasped as Hamitic simply because they acknowledged the supremacy of the Hamitic Egyptians, just as the non-Semitic Elamites were set down as Semites (Gen 10:22) on account of their acknowledging Babylon supremacy. It is doubtful whether the Hebrews, in ancient times, knew of the Negro race—they probably became acquainted with them only through contact with the Egyptians in the interior.

In the opinion of W. Max Müller (A. und E., 112), the Egyptians, when they became acquainted with the Negroes, having no word to express this race, classed them with the nekeš, which thereafter included the Negroes. If the Hebrew name Phinehas (Phin'eh-as) be really Egyptian, and mean "the black," there is still no need to suppose that this meant the "Negro," for no Israelite

5. Negroes would have borne a name with such a Probably significant. The treasurer of Candace (Cush) in Ethiopia, mentioned in the Old Testament (Esther 1:11; 3:1), was of African extraction, and, according to later tradition, was a Cushite eunuch—was an Abyssinian, not a Negro; and being an educated man, was able to read the Heb Scriptures in the Gr. (Sept.) version. Cush (nêth Kusi, pr. Kušhî) is frequently mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions in company with Meluhha (Meroûha) to indicate Ethiopia and Meroë. See Eden; Ethiopia; Table of Nations. T. G. Pinches

CUSH, Kush (kušâ, kishâ); LXX xwovôl, Choseul, Ps 7 title: A Benjamite, perhaps he that "was without cause" the "adversary" of David (Ps 7:4). See Cushi.

CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, ku'shan-rish-a-tha'im (kušān-rîshâthâ'im); kushan rish'thyain, tr', or rather interpreted, "a man from Cush, of the tribe of the prince's; Cush, the prince's crime"; LXX xworâpôaiâ, Chôwaraššâim, AV Chushan-rishathaim: Mentioned in Jgs 3:8-10 as a king of Mesopotamia who was chosen by God as his tool to chastise the Israelites for their idolatry. After Joshua's death the children of Israel soon began to affiliate themselves with the heathen peoples among whom they dwelt. This was the fertile source of all their troubles. God delivered ("sold") them into the hands of the heathen. Cush is the first whose name is given in this connection. Barring this short passage in Jgs nothing is known of the man. Eight years the Israelites were under his dominion, when the Lord raised up a deliverer to them, Othniël, the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother—the first of the judges. William Bauer CUSHI, ku'shi: This name represents (kušâ, kishâ), in the original (LXX xwovôl, Choseul, Xwovî, Chouost), rather with or without the art. With the art. (so in 2. S 15:21-22 seven out of eight times, all readings supported by LXX) it simply indicates that the person so designated was of the Cushite people, as in Jer 38:7 ff. Its use without the art. has doubtless developed out of the foregoing according to a similar etymology. For the Cush of Ps 7, title read "Cushi" with LXX.

(1) The messenger (RV "the Cushite") sent by Joab to acquaint David with the victory over Absalom. That this man was in fact a foreigner is indicated by his ignorance of a shorter path which Ahimaaz took, by his being unrecognized by the watchman who recognizes Ahimaaz, and by his ignorance, as compared with Ahimaaz, of the sentiments of David, whom he knows only as a king accused, not as a Sem (Ps 32:21) (twice, the second time without the art.), 22:23.31 (32:16). (Swete.)

(2) The great-grandfather of Jehudi, a contemporary of Jeremiah (Jer 36:14). The name Jehudi itself ("is a man of Judah") is sufficient reutation of the opinion that the use of C. as or in lieu of a proper name “seems to show that there were but few Cushites among the Israelites.”

(3) The father of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph 1:1).

J. Oscar Boyd

CUSHION, kūsh‘îm (προσψφάλαιον, προσψφάλαιοι): In NT, only in Mk 4:38 RV. The word means literally, a cushion for the head (AV “pillow”) but was also used of one for sitting or reclining upon, e.g., of a rower’s cushion. The art. used with it in this passage suggests that it was one of the custom-made furnishings of the boat and was probably similar to the cushion placed for the comfort of passengers in the stern of modern boats on the Sea of Galilee. “Silken cushions” of Am 3:12 RV is a rendering of the Heb 덤שקב from its supposed connection with darnask. These cushions formed the divan, often the only article of furniture in an oriental reception room. “Cushions” occurs further in the somewhat doubtful RV renderings of Prov 7:16; 31:22.

Benjamin Heno Downer

CUSHITE, kūsh‘ît: Whereas פְּתַשְׂחֵת, kūshāt, is elsewhere rendered Ethiopian, in 2Sa 18:21-32 it is rendered Cushite in the RV (see Cush and of Cusite Woman). Its pl., which occurs in Zep, Dn1 and 2Ch, also in the form פְּתַשְׂחֵת, kūshāthim, in Am, is uniformly tr Cushites, following LXX.

The other OT books use simply פְּתַשְׂחֵת, kūshāt, for people as well as land.

CUSHITE, kūsh‘ît (ETHIOPIAN) WOMAN: In Nu 12:1 Moses is condemned by his sister Miriam and his brother Aaron because of the Cushite woman פְּתַשְׂחֵת הָא-כֻּשִּׁית whom he had married”; and the narrator immediately adds by way of needed explanation, “for he had married a Cushite woman” פְּתַשְׂחֵת כֻּשִּׁית. Views regarding this person have been of two general classes: (1) She is to be identified with Zipporah (Ex 2:21 and elsewhere). Moses’ Midianitish wife, who is here called “the Cushite,” either in scorn of her dark complexion (cf Jer 13:23) and foreign origin (so most older exegetes), or as a consequence of an erroneous notion of the late age when this apocryphal addition to the Cusite S’s, etc., was inserted in the narrative (so Wellhausen). (2) She is a woman whom Moses took to wife after the death of Zipporah, really a Cushite (Ethiopian) by race, whether the princess of Meroë of whom Jos (Av, 11, x. 2) speaks or one of the “mixed multitude” (Ex 12:38; cf. Nu 11:4) that accompanied the Hebrews on their wanderings (so Ewald and most). Dillmann suggests a compromise between the two classes of views, viz., that this woman is a mere “variation in the sugga,” from the wife elsewhere represented as Midianitish, yet because of this variation she was understood by the author as distinct from Zipporah. The implication of the passage, in any case, is clearly that this connection of Moses tended to injure his prestige in the eyes of race-proud Hebrews, and, equally, that in the author’s opinion such a view of the matter was obnoxious to God. J. Oscar Boyd

CUSTODY, kus’tê-di (תֵּעָדָה, yâdâh, יַעַדָּה, pr-yâdâh): In Est 2:3 8 bis 14, yâdâh, “the hand,” is tr “custody”; pr-yâdâh, “numbering,” “charge”; occurs in Nu 3:36 RV “the appointed charge,” m Heb, “the office of the charge.”

CUSTOM, kus’tum (takm): (a) פְּתַשְׂחֵת, halâdakh, Exz 4:13:20; 7:24 AV; (b) פְּתַשְׂחֵת, bëlî, Exz 4:13 (tr.

(c) פְּתַשְׂחֵת, telâmōn, Mt 9:9; Mk 2:14; Lk 5:27, “receipt of custom” AV, RV “place of toll,” the collectors’ office; (d) תָּאָשָׁה, tâshâ., Mt 17:25 (RV “toll”); Mt 17:27; 1Mac 11:35 (RV “tolls”; cf 1Mac 10:31). The tax designated by יָדָה, halâdakh in Exz 4:13, etc., is usually taken to mean a road tax, a toll, from root halâdâh, but of AOF, II, 463, which derives from root likâ, a command, a decree, hence an imposed tax, is supposed to be a tax on merchandise or produce (as distinguished from “tribute,” or the tax on houses, lands and persons), usually paid in kind and levied for the support of the native or provincial government. See also, Cambridge Bible, Exz-Heb, loc. cit. Teleological: NT and Macz is an indirect tax farmed out to the publicans.

Peter R. Betteridge

CUSTOM, kus’tum (usage): In the OT, except Gen 21:35 where RV renders, better, “manner” (“דֶּרֶךְ, derekh, "way"), the words tr “custom” are יָדָה, yâdâh, “statute,” and misphâp, “judgment.” Such passages as Jgs 11:39; Jer 32:7, and esp. Ezr 3:4 (AV “custom,” RV “ordinance”), illustrate the difficulty of deciding upon the proper tr in cases where “custom” might well “usage” establish itself as “law.” In Lev 18:30; Jer 10:3 the reference is to heathen religious practices.

In the NT Lk 1:9; 2:42; Acts 6:14; 15:1 (AV “manner”); 16:21; 21:21; 28:5; 28:17 (ἀπὸ, ἀπό); and Lk 2:27 from the same Gr root, refer likewise to definitely established religious practices; in every case except Acts 16:21, those of the Jewish law. Thus RV makes the tr of εθνικὸς (the AV “custom”) in Acts 16:16 (Acts 13:36, etc.) and in Jn 19:40; Acts 25:16; He 10:25 (AV “manner”). Gr εὐλογία, εὐλογίας, from the same root, is rendered “custom” in Lk 4:16 by RV, and by RV also in Acts 17:2, its only other occurrence in the NT. In Jn 18:39; 1Cor 16:11 “custom” is the tr of Gr συνθήκη, in the sense of “usage” rather than of “law.” F. K. Farr Cut, Cutting (כָּטַּה, karath, כִּגְּדָה, gudâh, כְּגָדָה, kâhâdah, פְּתַשְׂחֵת, kâhâth;_panotov, apokopâ, kâkotov, etc): Many Heb words are tr “cut.” Of these karath, “to cut down, cut off, out,” is the most frequent. As “cut off” it is used in the sense of laying or destroying (Gen 9:11; Dt 12:9; 1K 11:10; 1Ch 1:52, etc.) or as “cutting off transgressors from the community of Jehu, which meant probably separation, or exclusion, rather than death or destruction (Gen 17:14; Ex 12:9, 10). Other words are dâmah, “to be silent,” “cease” (Jer 24:4; Ps 48:14, 23, 68:23); dâmah, “to make one’s self,” “to cut one’s self,” is used of cutting of one’s flesh before heathen gods in mourning for the dead, which was forbidden to the Israelites (Dt 14:1; 1K 18:29; Jer 16:6; 41:7; 47:5, etc.) “cut-off, sârâth, incision,” are also used of those “cuttings of the flesh” (Lev 19:28; cf 21:5). See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. The cutting of the hair of head and beard in mourning for the dead is referred to in Isa 15:2; “Every beard is cut off” (gudâh), and Jer 7:29, 29, “cut off thy hair [RV “thy crown”], O Jerusalem” (cf Isa 21:12; Jer 16:6; Eze 7:18; Am 8:10). This early and widespread practice was also forbidden to the Israelites as being unworthy of them in their relation to Jeh (Lev 19:27; Dt 14:1). Hârâhâth, “carving,” “engraving,” is used for the “cutting of stones” (Ex 31:5; 35:33).

In the NT we have apokopâ, “to cut away” (Mk 9:43:45; Gal 5:12 AV; see CONCESSION); disprâ, “to cut through” (Acts 13:33; 18:11, “cut to the heart”); dichalomô, “to cut in two” (Mt 51:41); sun lémmô, “to cut together” (Rom 9:28), “finishing it and cutting it short,” i.e. “making it conclusive and brief.”

CUTH, kuth, CUTHAH, k'th'ha (קותר), kólth, קוטה, קותיה, kotha; Cuth, Chud, Cuthse, Cuthenthe: The longer writing is better be the two, and gives the Hebr form of the name of one of the cities from which Sargon of Assyria brought colonists to fill the voids of the cities which his army deported from Samaria in 772 BC (2 K 17 24-30). Probably in consequence of their predominating numbers, the inhabitants of Samaria in general were then called kâtî'îm, or Cuthians.

Two contract-tablets found at Tel-Ilumah by the late Hormuzd Rassam, on which the ancient name of the place is given as Gadua or Kûthâ, it would seem that that is the site which has to be identified with the city of Cuthah. It lies to the N.E. of Babylon, and was one of the most important cities of the Bab empire. The explorer describes the ruins as being about 3,000 ft. in circumference and 280 ft. high, and adjoining them on the W. lies a smaller mound, crowned with a sanctuary dedicated to Abram (Abraham). From the nature of the ruins, Rassam came to the conclusion that the city was much more densely populated after the fall of Babylon than in earlier times. A portion of the ruins were in a very perfect state, and suggested an unfinished building.

The great temple of the city was called E-mesilam, and was dedicated to Nergal (cf 2 K 17 30), one of whose names was Meslim-ta-ê. Both city and temple would seem to have been old Sumerian foundations, as the name Gadua and its later Sem form, Kûtâ, imply.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH (סערת, sâret, סערת; sâreetah): For relatives or friends to cut or beat themselves even to free blood-flowing, especially in the violence of grief in mourning for their dead (see BURIAL; MOURNING), was a widely prevalent custom among ancient peoples, and is well-nigh universal among uncivilized races today (see Spencer, Prin. of Soc., 3d ed, I, 163 f). The fact is abundantly attested for most of the nations of antiquity, but there are two notable exceptions, the Egyptians (Herod. ii. 61, 85; Wilk., Anc. Egy., II, 574), and the Hebrews (Dt 14 1; Lev 21 5). According to Phutarch and Strabo, the women of Athens beat themselves to the effusion of blood, and the laws of the Twelve Tables, quoted by Cic. (De leg. ii. 23) contains a prohibition. Among the ancient Arabs the forbidden practice was associated, as among the Hebrews, with the cutting off of the hair (Wellhausen, Skizzen, III, 160 f).

That the prohibition among the Hebrews was urgently called for is made clear by the way it is dealt with by the Law and the prophets. The Law of Holiness reads: "Ye are the children of Jeh your God: ye shall not cut yourselves (Dt 14 1), or "make any incision" (סערת, sâret; Lev 19 29, סערת, sâreteh; LXX ἐριστός, entomos) in the flesh for the dead." Probably the earliest reference to this custom as actually prevalent among the Hebrews is in Hos 7 14 (ERVm). It was widely prevalent in the time of Jeremiah among his countrymen, even as among the Philies (Jer 47 5) and the Moabites (48 37; cf Am 5 10; Isa 3 24; 15 22; 12 19, 3d Soc), Ezek 7 14 (ERV).

In seeking for the reason or purpose underlying all such prohibitions, we may note, first, that the "cuttings" and "laxness" forbidden are alike said to be for the dead." Not less explicitly are they said to be incompatible with Israel's true relation to Jeh—a relation at once of sonship (Dt 14 1) and of consecration (14 2). Moreover such mutilations of the body are always dealt with as forming part of the religious rites of the heathen (as of the Camauniti Boul 1 [1 K 18 28] note "after their manner," see art. in HDB, s.v.). Both such shedding of blood and the dedication of the hair are found in almost all countries of that day in intimate connection with the rituals of burial and the pre-�calling beliefs and ceremonies connected with the spirit of the deceased. The conclusion, then, seems clearly warranted that such tokens of grief were prohibited because they carried with them inevitably ideas and associations distinctly hateful in character and so incompatible with Israel's true relation to Jeh, and unworthy of those who had attained to the dignity of the sons ("children") of Jeh. CYPRIANS, sî-pré-ans (Κύπριοι, Kýprioi): Occurs in 2 Mac 4 29. Menelaus who was high priest at Jerus, and Sostratus who was governor of the island, were summoned by King Antiochus to appear before him. "Menelaus left his own brother Lysimachus for his deputy in the high-priesthood; and Sostratus left Crates, who was over the Cyprians." The Cyprians were the inhabitants of the island of Cyprus. Barnabas, who was Paul's associate on his first missionary journey, was a Cyprian \((K\upsilon\rho\iota\omicron\varsigma; \text{see Acts 4:36})\). RV designates him as a man of Cyprus. The governor of the island was called a Cypriarch (see 2 Macc 12:2, and of Asia Minor). A. W. Fortune

CYPRIUS, n. plur. \((K\upsilon\rho\iota\omicron\varsigma, K\upsilon\rho\iota\omicron\varsigma)\): An island situated near the N.E. corner of the Levant, in an angle formed by the coasts of Cilicia and Syria. In the OT it is called Kittim, after the name of its Phoenician capital. The identification is expressly made by Josephus (Ant. I, vi, 1) and by the Cypriarch bishop Euphanius (\(H\alpha\epsilon\rho\varsigma, \text{xxx}.25\)). In the tablets from Tell el-Amarna it is referred to as Alashia (E. Meyer, \(G\alpha\epsilon\epsilon\chi, d\ell\alpha\tau\varepsilon\tau\homicron\varsigma\mu\varsigma\), I, $499), in Egypt records as As, while in the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions it is named Yavan.

The island is the largest in the Mediterranean with the exception of Sardinia and Sicily. It is the area being about 3,584 sq. miles. It lies in 34° 30'-35° 41' N. latitude and 35° 12'-34° 30' E. longitude, only 46 miles distant from the nearest point of the Cilician coast and 60 miles from the Syrian. Thus from the northern shore of the island the mainland of Asia Minor is clearly visible, and Mount Lebanon can be seen from Eastern Cyprus. This close proximity to the Cilician and Syrian coast, and the position of the island between Asia Minor and Egypt, proved of great importance for the history and civilization of the island. Its greatest length, including its two capes, is 140 miles, its greatest breadth 60 miles. The S. W. portion of Cyprus is mountainous. The plains are cultivated in the peaks of Troodos (4,066 ft.), Madhadi (5,305 ft.), Papoalida (5,124 ft.), and Machtara (4,674 ft.). The greatest length of the island is 30 miles. It is situated between its capes, is 10 miles in each direction, and 10 to 20 in breadth, in which lies the modern capital Nicosia. It is bordered with water on all sides except with the east, which is bordered by the Pedieas (\(\varphi\epsilon\delta\iota\alpha\varsigma\), or Pedias), and is bounded on the N. by a mountain range, which is continued to the E. N. in the long, narrow promontory of the Cape of Karpas, lying off in Cap Andrea, the ancient Dinahorion. Its greatest peaks are Buffavento (5,135 ft.) and Hagios Elias (5,105 ft.). The shore of the island is low, but remarkably fertile.

Cyprus is richly endowed by nature. Its fruits and flowers were famous in antiquity. Strabo, writing under Augustus, speaks of it as producing wine on a large scale, and its vineyards were proverbial. Its products and oil in abundance and corn sufficient for the needs of its inhabitants (XIV, 684). The elder Pliny refers to Cyprian salt, alum, kyperm, mica, unguentum, hyacinth, storax, resin and precious stones, including agate, Jasper, amethyst, lapis lazuli and several species of rock-crystal. His list includes the diamond (xxxvi.78) and the emerald (xxxvii.79). He says that under the name of rock-crystal and the beryl are intended. The chief source of the island's wealth, however, lay in its forests and forest products. It is mentioned by Strabo (loc. cit.) among its products: copper, which was not extensively worked except after the conquest of the island, was extensively mined there from the earliest period down to the Middle Ages; iron too was found in considerable quantity, especially in the mountains, until Roman times. Scarce- less important were the forests, which at an early date are said to have covered almost the whole island. The cypress seems to have been the principal tree, but Pliny tells of a giant cedar, 130 Rom feet in height, felled in Cyprus (xvi.205), and the island supplied timber for shipbuilding to many successive powers.

The original inhabitants of Cyprus appear to have been a race akin to the peoples of Asia Minor. Its vast resources in copper and timber, and its location and importance for trade and wide commercial relations at a very remote period. Its wealth attracted the attention of Babylonia and Egypt, and there is reason to believe that it was conquered by Sargon I, king of Assyria, and reoccupied by Alexander, more than a millennium later by Thracian II, and the third, of the XVIIIth Egyptian Dynasty (1501-1447 BC). But the influences which molded its civilization came from other quarters also. Excavation has shown that in Cyprus were several seats of the Minoan culture, and that the influence of the period of the pre-Herodotean Ionians was evident. The island was attached to the Cyprian race and shared the culture and manners of Crete. The Cyprian writing may well be the source of the curious Cyprian syllabic script, which continued in use for the representation of the Gr language down to the 4th cent. BC (A. J. Evans, \(S\epsilon\iota\pi\tau\alpha\pi\alpha\iota\varsigma\ M\iota\nu\omicron\alpha, I\)). But the Minoan origin of the Cyprian syllabary is still doubtful, for it may have been derived from the Hittite hieroglyphs. Phoen influences too were at work, and the Phoen settlement—Cium, Amathus, Paphos and others—so back to the very early date of the Minoan civilization was followed by a "Dark Age," but later the island received a number of Gr settlers from Arcadia and other Hellenic states, as we judge not only from Gr tradition but from the evidence of the Cyprian dialect, which is closely akin to the Arcadian. In 709 BC Sargon II of Assyria made himself master of Cyprus, and tribute was paid by its seven princes to him and to his grandson, Esarhaddon (681-667 BC). The overthrow of the Assyrian Empire probably brought with it the independence of Cyprus, but it was conquered afresh by Aahmes (Amaus) of Egypt (Herod. ii. 182) who retained it till his death in 526 BC; but in the following year the defeat of his son and successor Psamtek III (Psammeneus) by Cambyses brought the island under Pers dominion (Herod. iii.19, 91).

In 501 the Gr inhabitants led by Onesius, brother of the reigning prince of Salamis, rose in revolt against the Persians, but were decisive in their defeat. The Persians garrisoned the island, and the Greeks with which Xerxes attacked Greece (Herod. vii.90). The attempts of Pausanias and of Conon to win Cyprus for the Hellenic cause met with but poor success, and the withdrawal of the Athenian forces from the Levant after their great naval victory off Salamis in 449 was followed by a strong anti-Hellenic movement throughout the island led by Abelon, prince of Cium. In 431 BC the city of Paphos was captured by the Persians and set to work to assert Hellenic influence and to champion Hellenic civilization. He joined with Pharnabazus the Pers satrap and Conon the Athenian to overthrow the naval power of Sparta at the battle of Cipasa in 424, and in 387 revolted from the Persians. He was followed by his son Nicocles, to whom Isocrates addressed the famous panegyric of Eucorsis and who formed the subject of an enthusiastic eulogy by the same writer. Cyprus seems to have remained under Persian control until the Pers rule, but after the battle of Issus (333 BC) it voluntarily gave in its submission to Alexander the Great and rendered him valuable aid at the siege of Tyre. On his death (323) it, like the rest of the Hellenic Polynes of Egypt, was, however, seized by Demetrius Poliorcetes, who defeated Ptolemy in a hotly contested battle off Salamis in 306. But eleven years later it came into the hands of the Ptolemics and remained a province of Egypt or a separate but dependent kingdom until the intercession of Rome (cf 2 Macc 10.13). We hear of a body of Cyprians, under the command of a certain Cato, serving among the troops of Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria and forming part of his garrison of Jericho (2 Macc. 172 BC. 2 Macc. viii. 4 29). This interpretation of the passage seems preferable to that according to which Cato had been governor of Cyprus under the Ptolemies before entering the service of Antiochus.

In 88 BC the Romans resolved to incorporate Cyprus in their empire and Marcus Porcius Cato was intrusted with the task of its annexation. The reigning prince, a Cato, brother of Ptolemy Auletes of Egypt, received the offer of an honorable retirement and was one of those who accepted it, but he preferred to end his life by poison, and treasures amounting to some 7,000 talents passed into Rom hands, together with the island, which was attached to the province of Cilicia. In the partition of the Roman empire between Senate and Emperor, Cyprus was at first (27-22 BC) an imperial province ( Dio Cassius lli.12), administered by a prœfectus or praefectus or by the imperial legate of Cilicia. In 22 BC, however, it was handed over to the Senate together with southern Gaul in exchange for Dalmatia ( Dio Cassius lli.12; liv.4) and was subsequently governed by ex-prœfectors bearing the honorary title of proconsul and residing at Paphos. The names of about a score of these governors are known to us from ancient authors, inscriptions and coins and will be found in D. G. Hogarth, Devia Cyprus, App. Among them is Sergius Paulus, who was proscribed by the time of Paul's visit to Paphos in 46 or 47 AD, and we may notice that the title applied to him by the writer of the Acts (13:7) is strictly accurate.

7. Cyprus and the Jews

The proximity of Cyprus to the Syrian coast rendered it easy of access from Pal, and Jews had probably begun to settle there even before the time of Alexander the Great. According to the number of Jewish residents under the Ptolemies was considerable (1 Mace 15:23; 2 Mace 12:2) and it must have been increased later when the copper mines of the island were farmed to Herod the Great (Jos, Ant, XVI, iv 5; XIX, xxvi, 25; cf CIG, 2628). We shall not be surprised, therefore, to find that at Salamis there was more than one synagogue at the time of Paul's visit (Acts 13:5). In 168 AD the Jews of Cyprus rose in revolt and massacred no fewer than 240,000 Gentiles. Hadrian crushed the rising with great severity and drove all the Jews from the island. Henceforth no Jew might set foot upon it, even under stress of shipwreck, on pain of death ( Cassius lxxvi.32). In the life of the early church Cyprus played an important part. Among the Christians who fled from Judaea in consequence of the persecution which followed Stephen's death (Acts 8:1), several travelled first in Cyprus as Phoenicia, and Cyprus (Acts 11:19) preaching to the Jews only. Certain natives of Cyprus and Cyrene took a further momentous step in preaching at Antioch to the Greeks also (Acts 11:20). Even before this time Joseph Barnabas, a Levite born in Cyprus (Acts 4:36), was prominent in the early Christian community at Jerusalem, and it was in his native island that he and Paul, accompanied by Barnabas' nephew, John Mark, began their first missionary journey (Acts 13:4). After landing at Salamis they passed "through the whole island" to Paphos (Acts 13:6), probably visiting the Jewish synagogues in its cities. The Peutingen Table tells us of two roads from Salamis to Paphos in Roman times, one of which ran inland by way of Dac othrus, Tamassus and Soli, a journey of about 4 days, while the other and easier route, occupying some 3 days, ran along the south coast by way of Citium, Amathus and Curium. Whether the "earlier disciple" Mepison or llippos was one of the converts made at this time or had previously embraced Christianity we cannot determine (Acts 21:16).

Barnabas and Mark revisited Cyprus later (Acts 15:39), but Paul did not again land on the island, though he sighted it when, on his last journey to Jerusalem, he sailed south by way of Patara in Lycia to Iconium (Acts 21:3), and again when on his journey to Rome he sailed "under the lee of Cyprus," that is, along its northern coast, on the way from Sidon to Myra in Lycia (Acts 27:4).

In 401 AD the Council of Cyprus, held at Nicosia, chief in consequence of the claims of theophilus of Alexandria, the inveterate opponent of Origenism, and took measures to check the reading of Origen's works. The island, which was divided into 12 bishoprics, was declared autonomous in the 5th cent., after the alleged discovery of Matthew's Gospel in the tomb of Barnabas at Salamis. The bishop of Salamis was made metropolitan by the emperor Zeno with the title "archbishop of all Cyprus," and his successor, who now occupies the see of Nicosia, still enjoys the privilege of signing his name in red ink and is primate over the three other bishops of the island, those of Paphos, Kition and Kyrenia, all of whom are of metropolitan rank.

9. Later History

Cyprus remained in the possession of the Rom and then of the Byzantine emperors, almost always and temporarily occupied by the Saracens, until 1184, when its ruler, Isaac Comnenus, broke away from Byzantium and declared himself an independent emperor. From this time it was ruled by the Crusaders under Richard I of England, who bestowed upon Guy de Lusignan, the titular king of Jerusalem, and his descendants.

In 1489 it was ceded to the Venetians by Catherine Cornaro, widow of James II, the last of the Lusignan kings, and remained in their dominion, with the exception of part which was captured by the Ottoman Turks under Sultan Selim II, who invaded and subjugated the island in 1570 and laid siege to Famagusta, which, after a heroic defence, capitulated on August 3, 1571. Since that time Cyprus has formed part of the Turkish empire, which has been subjected to various revolts and temporary occupation and administration by the government, subject to an annual payment to the Sublime Porte of 292,800 and a large quantity of salt. The High Commissioner, who resides at Nicosia, is assisted by a Legislative Council of 15 members. The estimated population in 1907 was 249,250, of whom rather more than a fifth were Moslems and the remainder chiefly members of the Gr Orthodox church.

CYRÈNE, si-ré'në (Ku-rē'ne, Ku-rē'nē, "wall"); Cyrene was a city of Libya in North Africa, lat. 32° 31' N., long. 22° 15' E. It lay W. of the ancient desert, and occupied the territory now belonging to Barca and Tripoli. It was situated on an elevated plateau about 2,000 ft. above the sea, from which it was reached by a high range of mountains that lies to the S., about 90 miles N. of Tripoli. This shelters the coast land from the scorching heat of the Sahara. The range drops down toward the N. in a series of terrace-like elevations, thus giving to the region a great variety of climate and vegetation. The soil is fertile.

Cyrene was originally a Gr colony founded by Batti in 690 BC. Because of the fertility of the soil, the variety in climate and vegetation, together with its commercial advantages in location, the city soon rose to great wealth and importance. Greater fame, however, came to it through its distinguished citizens. It was the home of Callimachus the poet, Carneades the founder of the New Academy at Athens, and Eratosthenes the mathematician. To these must be added, from later times, the elegant ancient Christian writer Synesius. So important did this Gr colony become that, in little more than half a century, Amasia II of Egypt formed an alliance with Cyrene, marrying a Gr lady of noble, perhaps royal, birth (Herod. ii.181). Ptolemy III (Euergetes I), 231 BC, incorporated Cyrene with Egypt. The city continued, though with much restlessness, a part of the Egypt empire until Apion, the last of the Ptolemies, willed it to Rome. It henceforth belonged to a Rom province.

In the middle of the 7th cent., the conquering Saracens took possession of Cyrene, and from that time to this it has been the habitation of wandering tribes of Arabs.

Cyrene comes into importance in Bib. history through the dispersion of the Jews. Ptolemy I, son of Lagus, transported Jews to this and other cities of Libya (Jos, Cap, 4). The chosen importance II, 4 and from this time on Jews were very numerous there. By the return of the Jews of the Dispersion to the states at Gerus, Cyrenians came to have a conspicuous place in the NT history. "A man of Cyrene, Simon by name," was caught by the Rom soldiers and compelled to bear the cross of Jesus (Mt 27:32; cf Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26). See Cyrenian. Jews from Cyrene were among those present on the day of Pentecost. Their city appears as one of the important points in the wide circle of the Dispersion described by Peter in his sermon on that occasion (Acts 2 10). Cyrenian Jews were of sufficient importance in those days to have their name associated with a synagogue at Jerus (69). And when the persecution arose about Stephen, some of these Jews of Cyrene who had been converted at Jerus, were scattered abroad and came with others to Antich and preached the word "unto the Jews only" (11:19. 20 AV.), and one of them, Lucius, became a prophet in the early church there. In this case, as in so many others, the wise providence of God in the dispersion of the Jews in preparation for the spread of the gospel of the Messias is seen.

In the ruins of Cyrene are to be seen the remains of some beautiful buildings, and a few sculptures have been removed. The most interesting remains of the wonderful civilization of this Gr colony are in a great system of tombs, some built, but the finest cut in the solid rock of the cliff. Doric architecure and brilliant decorative painting adorn these tombs.

The son of the earlier Cambyses, of the royal race of the Achemenians. His genealogy, as given by himself, is as follows: 'I am Cyrus, king of the host, the great king, the mighty king, king of Tindir [Babylon], king of the land of Sumeru and Akkad, king of the four regions, son of Cambyses, the great king, king of the city Anshan, grandson of Cyrus, the great king, king of the city Anshan, great-grandson of Sipis [Tarcespas], the great king, king of the city Anshan, the all-enduring royal seed whose sovereignty Del and Nebo love,' etc (W.AI, V, pl. 35, 20-22).

As, in the Bab inscriptions, Anshan (Anshan, Anzan) is explained as Elam—the city was, in fact, the capital of that country—it is probable that Cyrus' name was Elamite; but the meaning is doubtful. The Anshan or old Gr etymology connecting it with Anzan kbar, "the sun," in Persian, may therefore be rejected. According to Strabo, he was at first called Agradates, the name by which he was universally known being taken from that of the river Cyrus. This, however, is more likely to have been the reason why his grandfather (after whom he was probably named) was called Cyrus.

Several versions of his birth and rise to power are recorded. Herodotus (i.55) mentions three. In that which he quotes (i.107 ff), it is said that Mandane was the daughter of the Median king Astyages, who, in conversation (Herodotus) sequence of a dream which he had had, foretelling the ultimate triumph of her son over his dynasty, gave her in marriage to a Persian named Cambyses, who was not one of his peers. A second dream caused him to watch for her expected offspring, and when Cyrus came into the world Astyages delivered the child to his relative, Harpagus, with orders to destroy it. Being unwilling to do this, he handed the infant to a shepherd named Mitradates, who, his wife having brought forth a still-born child, consented to spare the life of the infant Cyrus. Later on, in consequence of his impious acts, Cyrus was recognized by Astyages, who came to learn the whole story, and spared him because, having once been made king by his companions in play, the Medes held the prediction of the Median oracle as real and correct, and the royal status which they expected to have been fulfilled. The vengeance taken by Astyages upon Harpagus for his apparent disobedience to orders is well known: his son was slain, and a portion, disguised, given him to eat. Though filled with grief, Harpagus concealed his feelings, and departed with the remains of his son's body; and Cyrus, in due course, was sent to stay with his parents, Cambyses and Mandane. Later on, Harpagus persuaded Cyrus to induce the Persians to revolt, and Astyages having blindly apportioned Harpagus commander-in-chief of the Median army, the last-named went over to the side of Cyrus. The result was an easy victory for the latter, but Astyages took care to impale the Medes who had betrayed Cyrus. Having gathered another, but smaller, army, he took the field in person, but was defeated and captured. Cyrus, however, who became king of Media as well as of Persia, treated him honorably and well.

According to the sources, Persian Cyrus in the 12th [Xenophon, Cyropaedia 5.2], Cambyses, the father of Cyrus, was king of Persia.

Until his 12th year, Cyrus was educated in Persia, when he was sent for, with his mother, by Astyages, to whom he manifested a striking affection. Astyages is said to have been succeeded by his son Cyaxares, and Cyrus then became his commander-in-chief, subduing, among others, the Lydians. He twice defeated the Assyrians (= Babylonians), his final conquest of the country being while the Median king was still alive. As, however, the Cyropædia is a romance, the historical details are not of any great value.

Nicolaus of Damascus describes Cyrus as the son of a Median king, named Atratades, his mother's name being Argostræ. While

5. Nicolaus in service in the palace of Astyages, he was adopted by Artémbaræs, a cupbearer, and thus obtained prominence. Cyrus, the bandit father strap of Persia, and, with base ingratitude, plotted against his king and benefactor. The preparations for a revolt having been made, he and his general Oibaras were victorious at Hyrba, but were defeated at Parsagade, where his father Atratades was captured and later on died. Cyrus now took refuge in his mountain home, but the taunts of the women sent him and his helpers forth again, this time to victory and dominion.

Cesias also states that there was no relationship between Cyrus and Astyages (Astyigas), who, when Cyrus conquered Media, fled to Ecbatana, and was there hidden by his daughter Amytis, and Spitamæger, his husband, but they did not appear. Cyrus, it is said, would have tortured them, with their children. Cyrus afterward libeled Astyages, and married his daughter Amytis, whose husband he had put to death for telling a falsehood. The infant Cyrus had been so satisfied at the reconciliation of Cyrus with Astyages and his daughter, that they voluntarily submitted. Cyrus is said by Cesias to have been taken prisoner by the Sacae, but he was ransomed. He died from an arrow in battle with the Derbios, assisted by the Indians.

His Reign

the Cylinder of Nabonidus

According to the inscriptions, the conflict with Astyages took place in 549 BC. From the cylinder of Nabonidus we learn that the Medes had been very successful in their warlike operations, and had gone even as far afield as Huran, which they had besieged. The Babylonian king Nabonidus desired to carry out the instructions of Merodach, revealed in a dream, to restore the temple of Sin, the Moon-god, in that city. This, however, in consequence of the siege he could not do, and it was revealed to him in a dream that the power of Astyages would be overthrown at the end of three years, which happened as predicted. "They [the gods Sin and Merodach] then caused Cyrus to be born to Artaxerxes, a young servant, with his little army, to rise up against him [the Median]; he destroyed the widespread Ummân-manda [Medes], Ġišuweq [Astyages], king of the Medes, he captured, and took [him] prisoner to his [own] land. His army in the Babylonian Chronicle (which is, perhaps, Cyrus' own), is as follows: "[Astyages] gathered his army, and went against Cyrus, king of Anshan, to capture him, and [as for] Astyages, his army was given to Cyrus." The cylinder concludes, it seems, with the statement that Ashurbanipal, son of Ashurbanipal, had been defeated by Cyrus, and the Medes were his subjects. This latter statement is not necessarily intended to mean that the Medes were actually conquered, but that they submitted to Cyrus, who was then able to concentrate his forces on the final conquest of Babylonia.

8. The Babylonian

Chronicle

Cyrus went to the land of Ecbatana, his royal city. He carried off from Ecbatana silver, gold, furniture, merchandise, and took to the land of Anshan the furniture and merchandise which he had captured.

The above is the entry for the 6th year of Nabonidus, which corresponds with 549 BC; and it will be noticed that he is here called "king of Anshan." The next reference to Cyrus in the Cylinder of Nabonidus is the entry for Nabonidus' 9th year (546 BC), where it is stated that "Cyrus, king of the land of Parsu [Persia], gathered his army, and crossed the Tigris below Arbela," and in the following month (Iyyar), he entered the land of his father, and took to have taken a bribe, garrisoned the place, and afterward a king ruled there. The passage, however, is imperfect, and therefore obscure, but we may, perhaps, see therein some preparatory move on the part of Cyrus to obtain possession of the tract over which Nabonidus claimed dominion.

The next year (545 BC) there seems to have been another move on the part of the Persians, for the Elamite governor (?) is referred to, and had apparently some dealings with the governor of Ezech. All this time things seem to have been the same in Babylonia, the king's son (he is not named, but apparently Belshazzar is meant) and the soldiers remaining in Akkad (possibly used in the old sense of the word, to indicate the district around Sippur), where it was seemingly expected that the main attack would be delivered. The reference to the governor of Ezech might imply that some conspiracy was on foot more to the south—a movement of which the native authorities possibly remained in ignorance.

After a gap which leaves four years unaccounted for, we have traces of four lines which mention the goddess Istar of Ezech, and the gods of the land of Par... (?Persia) are referred to. After this comes the long entry, which, though the date is broken away, must refer to the 17th year of Nabonidus. A royal visit to a temple is referred to, and there is mention of the religious ceremonies, which had been performed, and others omitted. In the month Tammuz, Cyrus seems to have fought a battle in Opis, and succeeded in capturing the army of Akkad on the Tigris. On the 15th of the month, Susa was taken, without fighting, and Nabonidus fled. On the 16th Ugharu (Gobryas) governor of Media, entered Babylon, with the army of Cyrus, without fighting, and there Nabonidus was captured with his followers. At this time E-aggal and the temples of the land seem to have been closed, possibly to prevent the followers of Nabonidus from taking sanctuary there, or else to prevent plotters from coming forth; and on the 3d of Marcheswan (October), Cyrus entered Babylon. "Crowds collected before him, proposing peace for the city; Cyrus commanded the peace of Babylon, all of it." Gobryas, his vice-regent, then appointed governors in Babylon, and the gods whom Nabonidus had taken down to Babylon, were returned to their shrines. On the night of the 11th of Marcheswan, Ugharu was brought against (some part of Babylon), and the son of the king died; and there was mourning for him from the 27th of Adar to the 3d of Nisan (six days). There is some doubt as to whether the text speaks of the king or the son of the king. Suppos, as there is a record that Nabonidus was exiled to Carmania, it would seem most likely that the death of Belahazar "in the night" is here referred to. The day after the completion of the month of Nisan, Cambyses, son of Cyrus, performed ceremonies in the temple E-nig-lad-kalakama, probably in connection with the new year's festival, for which Cyrus had probably timed his arrival at Babylon. According to Herodotus (i.191), Babylon was taken during a festival, agreeing with Dnl 5 1 ff.

The other inscription of Cyrus, discovered by Mr. H. Rassam at Babylon, is a kind of proclamation justifying his seizure of the crown.

He states that the gods of the various cities of Babylonia forsook their dwellings in anger that he (Nabonidus) had made them enter within Su-anna (Babylon). Merodach, the chief divinity of Babylonia, was the king of the reign of his heart, whose hand he might hold—Cyrus, king of Anshān, he called his title—to all the kingdoms together (his) name was proclaimed.

The glory of Cyrus' conquests probably appealed to the Babylonians, for Cyrus next states that Merodach placed the whole of the troops of Qutā (Media) under his feet, and the whole of the troops of the Manda (barbarians and mercenaries). He also caused his hands to hold the people of the dark head (Asiatics, including the Babylonians, Jews, and Phoenicians), and his heart was prepared for war. He commanded that he should go to his city Babylon, and walked by his side like a friend and a companion—without fighting and battle Merodach caused him to enter Su-anna. By his high command, the kings of every region from the upper sea to the lower sea (in the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf), the kings of the Amorites, and the dwellers in tents, brought their valuable tribute and kissed his feet within Su-anna (Babylon). From Nineveh(?), the city Si-ši, Susa, Agade, the city of the land of Elam, Zambā, Mē-Tjuran, and Dēru, to the borders of Media, the gods inhabiting them were returned to their shrines, and all the people were collected and sent back to their dwellings. He finishes by soliciting the prayers of the gods to Bel and Nebel for length of days and happiness, asking them also to appeal to Merodach on behalf of Cyrus "his worshipper," and his son Cambyses.

It was probably between the defeat of Astyages and the capture of Babylon that Cyrus defeated Cambyses (Herod. 1.189) the Persian king, and Cambyses, and had again to be reduced to submission, this time by Harpagus, his faithful general, after a determined resistance. It was at this period that Cyrus subdued the nations of Upper Asia, his next objective being Babylonia (§9 and the two preceding paragraphs). In this connection it is noteworthy that, in the Bab official account, there is no mention of his engineering works preparatory to the taking of Babylon—the turning of the waters of the Gyndes into a number of channels in order to cross (Herod. i.189); the siege of Babylon, long and difficult, and the final capture of the city by changing the course of the Euphrates, enabling his army to enter by the bed of the river (Herod. i.190-91). There may be some foundation for this statement, but if so, the king did not mean in his next word because it did not entail any real labor, for the irrigation works already in existence may have been nearly sufficient for the purpose. It seems likely that the conquest of Babylon opened the way for other military exploits. Herodotus states that he next entered the Massagetae, who were located beyond the Araxes. One-third of their Massagetae army was defeated, and the son of Cambyses was captured by a stratagem; but on being freed from his bonds, he committed suicide. In another exceedingly fierce battle which followed, the Pers army was destroyed, and Cyrus himself brought his life to an end there, after a reign of 20 years. He had ruled over Media for 11, and over Babylonia (and Assyria) for 9 years. According to the Bab contract-tablets, Cambyses, his son, was associated with him on the throne during the first portion of his 1st year of rule in Babylon, and, in the course of time, the Persians conquered the whole of the upper and lower regions.
Bab inscriptions do not reproduce Bab opinion, but the fact that on the occasion of the siege of Babylon the people trusted to his 16. Cyrus' honor and came forth asking peace for Reputation the city (apparently with every confidence that their request would be granted); and that the Babylonians, as a whole, were contented under his rule, may be regarded as tacit confirmation. Nabonidus, before the invasion of his territory by the Pers forces, was evidently well disposed toward him, and looked upon him, as we have seen, as "the young servant of Merodach," the patron deity of Babylon. It is not altogether clear, however, why the Babylonians submitted to him with so little resistance—their inscriptions contain no indication that they had real reason to be dissatisfied with the rule of Nabonidus—he seems to have been simply regarded as 16. Why Did somewhat unorthodox in his worship the Baby- lions accept better in that respect? Dissatisfaction on the part of the Babylonian priesthood was undoubtedly at the bottom of their discontent, however, and may be held to supply a sufficient reason, though it does not redound to the credit of Bab patriotism. It has been said that the success of Cyrus was in part due to the aid given him by the Jews, who, recognizing him as a monotheist like themselves, gave him more than a sufficient reason, but it is probable that he could never have conquered Babylonia had not the priests, as indicated by their own records, spread discontent among the people. It is doubtful whether we may attribute a higher motive to the priesthood, though that is not altogether impossible. The inner teaching of the Bab polytheistic faith was, as is now well known, monothestic, and there may have been, among the priests, a desire to have a ruler holding that to be the true faith, and also not so inclined as Nabonidus to run counter to the people's (and the priest's) prejudices. Jewish influence would, in some measure, account for this.

If the Jews thought that they would be more sympathetically treated under Cyrus' rule, they were not disappointed. It was he who gave orders for the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerus (2 Ch 36 23; Ezr 1 2 5 13; 6 3), restored the vessels of the House of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away (Ezr 1 2 5 6); probably provided funds to buy cedar trees from Lebanon (3 7). But he also restored the temples of the Babylonians, and brought back the images of the gods to their shrines. Nevertheless the Jews evidently felt that the favor he granted them showed sympathy for them, and this it probably was which caused Issiah (44 28) to see in him a "shepherd" of the Lord, and an anointed king (Messiah, τό χριστός μου, τό Christou mou, Isa 41 1)—a title suggesting to later writers that he was a type of Christ (Hieron., Comm. on Isa 41 1).

From Persia we do not get any help as to his character, nor as to the estimation in which he was held. His only inscription extant is above his idealized bas-relief at Murghâb, where he simply writes:

relief

The stone shows Cyrus standing, looking to the right, draped in a fringed garment resembling those worn by the ancient Babylonians, reaching to the feet. His hair is combed back in the Pers style, and upon his head is an elaborate crown, two horns extending to front and back, with a uræus serpent rising from each end, and between the serpents three vase-like objects, with discs at their bases and summits, and serrated leaves between. There is no doubt that this crown is symbolical of his dominion over Egypt, the three vase-like objects being modifications of the triple helmet-crown of the Egyptian deities. The king is represented as four-winged in the Assyro-Babylonian style, probably as a claim to divinity in their hierarchy as well as to dominion in the lands of Merodach and Assy. In his right hand, which is raised to the level of his shoulder, he holds a kind of scepter seemingly terminating in a bird's head—in all probability also a symbol of Bab dominion, though the emblem of the Bab cities of the South was most commonly a bird with wings displayed.

DABBESHETH, dab'e-sheth; דבשֶת, dabesseth; דבשֶת, Dabbathet; AV Dabbasheth, dab'e-sheth): A town on the western boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 11). It is probably identical with the modern Dabashe, a ruined site of the E. of Acre.

DABERATH, dab'er-ath (דבֵּרָת, ha-dâhrâth, "pasture"); דבשֶת, Dabeðoth): A city in the territory of Issachar, on the boundary between that tribe and Zebulun (Josh 19 12). It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 28; 1 Ch 6 72). The most probable identification is with Dabbâriyeh, a village on the lower western slopes of Tabor.

It was he who gave orders for the rebuilding of the Temple of the Lord (2 Ch 36 23; Ezr 1 2 5 13; 6 3), restored the vessels of the House of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away (Ezr 1 2 5 6); probably provided funds to buy cedar trees from Lebanon (3 7). remained intact. The Heb says: “Dagon alone remained.” Whether we resort to an emendation (דָּגָן, daqôn, “his fish-part”) or not, commentators appear to be right in inferring that the idol was half man, half fish. Classic authors give this form to Derceto. The sacred writer adds that from that time on the priests of Dagon and all those that entered the house of Dagon refrained from stepping upon the mephiton of Dagon. See 1 Sam 5 1–6. The prophet Zephaniah (1 9) speaks of an idolatrous practice which consisted in leaping over the mephiton. The Septuagint in 1 8 indeed adds the clause: “but we go not to leap.” Leaping over that threshold was probably a feature of the Phil ritual which the Hebrews explained in their way. A god Dagon seems to have been worshipped by the Canaanites; see Beth-dagon.

DAILY, dā'ī, This word, coming as it does from the Heb דָּיָא, yôm, “day,” and the Gr ἡμέρα, hēméra, suggests either day by day (Ex 8 13), that which is prepared for one day (Neh 5 18), as e.g. our “daily bread,” meaning bread sufficient for that day (Mt 6 11); or day by day continuously, one day after another in succession, as “the daily burnt offering” (Nu 29 6 AV), daily ministration (Acts 6 2), and “daily in the temple” (Acts 5 42 AV). The meaning of the word “daily” as used in the Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6 11) seems to indicate sufficient for our need, whether we consider that need as a day at a time, or day after day as we are permitted to live. “Give us bread sufficient for our sustenance.”

DAILY OFFERING, or SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE.

DAINTIES, dā’ntis, DAINTY, MEATS (גִּמְבָּרִים, maf‘ammōth, “things full of taste,” בֵּין בֵּין, man‘ammin, בֶּן בֶּן, ma‘ādān; ἄραπος, ἵππαρος, “fat,” “shining”): Jacob is represented as predicting of Asher, “He shall yield royal d.” (Gen 49 20; cf َِب clause, “His bread shall be fat,” and Dt 33 24, “Let a loaf of bread be a shield for him;”—Ps 105 24); David, in praying to be delivered from the ways of “men that work iniquity,” cries, “Let me not eat of their d.” (Ps 141 4). The man who sitteth “to eat with a ruler” (Prov 23 3–5) is counseled, “if thou be a guest of his d, see that they are deceitful food” (cf John’s words in the woes upon Babylon [Rev 18 14], “All things that were d. and sumptuous are perished from thee, and Homer’s ἱδιάμ [Pope], xviii, 456). “Dainties,” then, are luxuries, costly, delicate and rare. This idea is common to all the words thus rendered; naturally associated with kings’ tables, and with the lives of those who are lovers of pleasure and luxury. By their associations and their softening effect they are to be abstained from or indulged in moderately as “deceitful food” by those who would live the simple and righteous life which wisdom sanctions. They are also “offered not from genuine hospitality, but with some by-ends.” He should also shun the dainties of the niggard (Prov 23 6), who counts the cost (ver 7 RVm) of every morsel that his guest eats. See DELICATE; FOOD, etc.

GEO. B. EAGER

DAISAN, dā’săn, dā’i-san (Δαϊσάν, Daisan): Head of a family of temple servants (1 Esd 5 31) called Rezin in Exs 23 25; 28, and 7 50, the interchange of D and R in Heb being not uncommon.

DAKUBI, da-kŭbi, da-kō’bi (Δακοῦβ, Dakouβ), Δακουβί, Dakoubi; AV Dacobil: Head of a family of gate-keepers (1 Esd 5 28) called “Akkub” in the canonical lists.

DALAIH, da-lā’i, da-lā’i’a. See DELAIH.

DALAN, dā’lan (Δαλάν, Dalān; AV Ladan): Head of a family that returned to Jerusalem, but which “could shew neither their families, nor their stock, how they were of Israel” (1 Esd 5 37); corresponds to Delaiha (Ezra 2 60). Another reading is “Asan.”

DALE, dāl, KING’S (יָדָק בְּרֵכָה, ’emek ha-melekh): (1) “Absalom in his lifetime had taken and reared up for himself the pillar, which is in the king’s dale” (2 Sam 18 18). According to Jos (Ant. VII, x, 3) this was a marble pillar, which he calls “Absalom’s hand” and it was two furlongs from Jerusalem. Warren suggests that this dale was identical with the KING’S GARDEN (q.v.), which he places at the open valley formed at the junction of the Tyropon with the Kidron (see JERUSALEM). The so-called Absalom’s pillar, which the Arabs still hold with stones in reparation of Absalom’s disobedience, and which a comparatively recent tradition associates with 2 Sam 18 18, is a very much later structure, belonging to the Graeco-Rom period, but showing Egypt influences.

(2) King’s Vale (Gen 14 17; AV dale). See KING’S VALE; VALE. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

DALETH, dā’leth (ד; D): The 4th letter of the Heb alphabet, and as such used in Ps 219 to designate the 4th section; transcribed in this Encyclopaedia with the daqesh as d, and, without, as dh (＝th in the). It came also to be used for the number four (4), and with the dieresis for 4000. With the apostrophe it is sometimes used as abbreviation for the tetragrammaton. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

DALLY, dā’li: Occurs in Wis 12 26: “But they that would not be reformed by that correction wherein he daliiled with them” (εἰς οὗ διαταγματίζεται, eis hou diatagmatizeitai, “child play of correction”), the reference being to the earlier and lighter plagues of Egypt. It is used by the Rsv in 2 Tim 4 10, “by a correction which was as children’s play,” Gr (as above). He first tried them by those lighter infictions before sending them on the heavier. In later usage “daily” implies delay.

DALMANTHA, dał-mant’thā. See MAGON. Cf Mk 8 10; Mt 15 39.

DALMATIA, dal-mă’ti-a (Δαλματία, Dalmatia, “deceitful”): A district of the Rom empire lying on the eastern shore of the Adriatic. Writing from Rome to Timothy during his second imprisonment (in 66 or 67 AD, according to Romans’s chronology), Paul records the departure of Titus to Dalmatia (2 Tim 4 10). “I have declared my mind to you, that I might not make a prayer to you in vain: and we desire that you may rather be without our apprehension.” The name was extended to the entire province. On the whole it seems most probable that the apostle uses it in this last sense. See further s.v. ILYRICUM.

MARCUS N. TORD
DALPHON, dal-fon (דרפון, dalphôn, “crafty”): The second of the ten sons of Haman, slain by the Jews (Est 9 7).

DAM (דאם, ‘em, ordinary Heb word for “mother”): Heb law prohibited the destruction of the “dam” and the young of birds at the same time, commanding that if the young be taken from a nest the dam be allowed to escape (Dt 22 6.7). In the same spirit it enjoined the taking of an animal for slaughter before it had been seven days with its “dam” (Ex 22 30; Lev 22 27; cf Ex 23 19).

DAMAGE, dam’āj (דָּםָה, hândâhā): This word expresses any inflicted loss of value or permanent injury to persons or things. “Why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?” (Eze 4 22). In Prov 26 6 “damage” means “wrong,” “injury” (Heb דם, dam). The tr of Est 7 4 is doubtful: “Although the adversary could not have compensated for the king’s damage” (RV “For our affliction is not to be compared with the king’s damage”; AV “For our captivity is not like the king’s damage”); but Heb דם signifies “blood.”

DALMAS, dam-a-ris (דָּמָרְס, Damaris, possibly a corruption of דָּמָלָס, dalmalis, “a heifer”): The name of a female Christian of Athens, converted by Paul’s preaching (Acts 17 34). The fact that she is mentioned in this passage together with Dionysius the Areopagite has led some, most probably in error, to regard her as his wife. The singling out of her name with that of Dionysius may indicate some personal or social distinction. Cf Acts 17 12.

The Eng. name is the same as the Gr Δαμασκός, Damaskós. The Heb name is דמשק, Damšeq, but the Aram. form דמשק, Damasek, occurs in 1 Ch 16 5; 2 Ch 28 5. The name appears in Egypt inscriptions as Tivas-skw (16th cent. BC), and Sir-ta-tam-aks (13th cent. BC), which W. M. Müller, Asien u. Europa, 227, regards as representing Tr-ma-sak, concluding from the ‘ram’ in this form that Damascus had by that time passed under Aram. influence. In the Am Tab the forms Tr-mak-si and Dimasak-ki occur. The Arab. name is Dimasakh esh-Sham (“Damascus of Syria”) usually contrasted to ‘Es-Sham simply. The meaning of the name Damascus is unknown. ‘Es-Sham (Syria) means “the left,” in contrast to the Yemen (Arabia) = “the right.”

Damascus is situated (33° 30’ N. lat., 36° 18’ E. long.) in the N.W. corner of the Ghuta, a fertile plain about 2,300 ft. above sea level.

2. Situation. W. of Hermon. The part of and Natural. The Ghuta E. of the city is called el-Merj, the “meadow-land” of Damascus. The river Barada (see Abana) flows through Damascus and waters the plain, through which the Nahar el-Avaj (see Pharpar) also flows, a few miles S. of the city. Surrounded on three sides by bare hills, and bordered on the E., its open side, by the desert, its well-watered and fertile Ghuta, with its streams and fountains, its fields and orchards, makes a vivid impression on the Arab of the desert. Arab. lit. is rich in praises of Damascus, which is described as an earthy paradise. The European or Arab idea is that these praises are exaggerated, and it is perhaps only in early summer that the beauty of the innumerable fruit trees—apricots, pomegranates, walnuts and many others—justifies enthusiasm. To see Damascus in the Arab season is to approach it, as he does, from the desert. The Barada (Abana) is the life blood of Damascus. Confined in a narrow gorge until close to the city, where it spreads itself in many channels over the plain, only to lose itself in a few miles more in the marsh which fringes the desert, its whole strength is expended in making a small area between the hills and the desert really fertile. That is why a city on this site is inevitable and permanent. Damascus, almost defenceless from a military point of view, is a rich and fertile plain, and factory of inland Syria. In the course of its long history it has more than once enjoyed and lost political supremacy, but in all the vicissitudes of political fortune it has remained the natural harbor of the Syrian desert.

Damascus lies along the main stream of the Barada, almost entirely on its south bank. The city is about a mile long (E. to W.) and about half a mile broad (N. to S.). The city is on the south side a long suburb, consisting for the most part of a single street, called the Meidan, stretches for a mile beyond the line of the city wall, terminating at the Bauwabat Allah, the “gateway of God,” the round point of the Haj, the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. The city has thus roughly the shape of a broad-headed spoon, of which the Meidan is the handle. In the Gr period, a long, colonnaded street ran through the city, doubling the present street which is called Susiana; (Acts 9 11). This street, along the course of which remains of columns have been discovered, runs westward from the Babesh-Sherki, the “East Gate.” Part of it is still called Derb el-Mustakim (“Straight Street”), but it is not certain that it has borne the same name through all the intervening centuries. It runs between the Jewish and Christian quarters (on the left and right, respectively, going west), and terminates in the Sūk el-Mudaiyjeh, a bazaar built by Mihdat Pasha, on the north side of which is the main Moslem quarter, in which are the citadel and the Great Mosque. The houses are flat-roofed, and are usually built round a courtyard, in which is a fountain. The streets, with the exception of Straight Street, are mostly narrow and tortuous, but on the west side of the city there are some good covered bazaars. Damascus is not rich in antiquities. The Omayyad Mosque, or Great Mosque, replaced a Christian church, which in its time had taken the place of a pagan temple. The site was doubtless occupied from time immemorial by the religious edifice of the city. A small part of the ancient Christian church is still extant. Part of the city wall has been preserved, with a foundation going back to Rom times, surmounted by Arab work. The traditional site of Paul’s escape (Acts 9 28;
2 Cor 11. 33) and of the House of Naaman (2 K 5) are pointed out to the traveler, but the traditions are valueless. The charm of Damascus lies in the life of the bazaars, in the variety of types which may be seen there—the Druse, the Kurd, the Bedouin and many others—and in its historical associations. It has always been a manufacturing city. Our word “damask” bears witness to the fame of its textile industry, and the “Damascus blades” of the Crusading period were equally famous; and though Timur (Tamerlane) destroyed the trade in arms in 1399 by carrying away the armorers to Samarcand, Damascus is still a city of busy craftsmen in cloth and wood. Its antiquity casts a spell of romance upon it. After a traceable history of thirty-five centuries, it is still a populous and flourishing city, and, in spite of the advent of the railway and even the electric street car, it still preserves the flavor of the East.

(1) The early period (to cir 950 BC).—The origin of Damascus is unknown. Mention has already been made (§ 1) of the references to the city in Egyptian inscriptions and in the Amarna tablets. It appears once—possibly twice—in the history of Abraham. In Gen 14. 15 we read that Abraham pursued the four kings as far as Hobah, “which is on the left hand [i.e. the north] of Damascus.” But this is simply a geographical note which shows only that Damascus was well known at the time when Gen 14 was written. Greater interest attaches to Gen 15. 2, where Abraham complains that he is childless and that his heir is “Dammesek Eliezer” (ERV), for which the Syr version reads “Eliezer the Damaschul.” The clause, however, is hopelessly obscure, and it is doubtful whether it contains any reference to Damascus at all. In the time of David Damascus was an Aramaean city, which assisted the neighboring Aramaean states in their unsuccessful wars against David (2 S 8. 5f). These campaigns resulted indirectly in the establishment of a powerful Aramaean kingdom in Damascus. Rezon, son of Eliada, an officer in the army of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, escaped in the hour of defeat, and became a captain of banditti. Later he established himself in Damascus, and became its king (1 K 11. 23ff). He cherished a not unnatural animosity against Israel, and the rise of a powerful and hostile kingdom in the Israelitish frontier was a constant source of anxiety to Solomon (1 K 11. 25).

(2) The Aramaean kingdom (cir 950–732 BC).—Whether Rezon was himself the founder of a dynasty is not clear. He has been identified with Hezion, father of Tab-rimmon, and grandfather of Ben-hadad (1 K 15. 18), but the identification, though a natural one, is insecure. Ben-hadad (Biridri) is the first king of Damascus, after Rezon, of whom we have any detailed knowledge. The disruption of the Heb kingdom afforded the Aramaeans an opportunity of playing off the rival Heb states against each other, and of bestowing their favors now on one and now on the other. Ben-hadad was induced by Assh of Judah to accept a large bribe, or tribute, from the Temple treasures, and relieve Assyria by attacking the Northern Kingdom (1 K 15. 18ff). Some years later (cir 880 BC) Ben-hadad (or his successor?) defeated Otni of Israel, annexed several Israelitish cities, and secured the right of having Syrian “streets” (i.e. probably a bazaar for Syrian merchants) in Samaria (1 K 20. 34). Ben-hadad II (according to Winekler the two Ben-hadads are really identical, but this view, though just possible chronologically, conflicts with 1 K 20. 34) was the great antagonist of Ahab. His campaigns against Israel are narrated in 1 K 20. 22. At first successful, he was subsequently twice defeated by Ahab, and after the rout at Aphek was at the mercy of the conqueror, who treated him with generous leniency, claiming only the restoration of the lost Israelitish towns, and the right of establishing an Israelitish bazaar in Damascus. On the renewal of hostilities three years later Ahab... fell before Ramoth-gilead, and his death relieved Ben-hadad of the only neighboring monarch who could challenge the supremacy of Damascus. From this time the history of Damascus is generally known from the Assyrian inscriptions.

In 854 BC the Assyrians defeated a coalition of Syrian and Palestinian states (including Israel) under the leadership of Ben-hadad at Karkar. In 849 and 846 BC renewed attacks were made upon Damascus by the Assyrians, who, however, did not effect any considerable conquest. From this date until the fall of the city in 732 BC the power of the Aramean kingdom depended upon the activity or quiescence of Assyria, who made use of the fact. Ben-hadad and usurped his throne c. 844 BC, was attacked in 842 and 839, but during the next thirty years Assyria made no further advance westward. Hazael was able to devote all his energies to his western neighbors, and Israel suffered severely at his hands. In 803 Mari of Damascus, who is probably identical with the Ben-hadad of 2 K 13 3, Hazael's son, was made tributary to Ramman-nirari III of Assyria.

This blow weakened Aram, and afforded Jehu an opportunity of avenging the defeats inflicted upon his country by Hazael. In 773 Assyria again invaded the territory of Damascus. Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 BC) pushed vigorously westward, and in 726 BC Rezin paid tribute. A year or two later he revolted, and attempted in concert with Pekah of Israel, to coerce Judah into joining an anti-Assyrian league (2 K 15 37; 16 5; 13 7). His punishment was swift and decisive.

In 734 the Assyrians advanced and laid siege to Damascus, which fell in 732. Rezin was executed, his kingdom was overthrown, and the city suffered the fate which a few years later befell Samaria.

4) The middle period (c. 732 BC–650 AD).—Damascus had now lost its political importance, and for more than two centuries we have only one or two inconsiderable references to it. It is mentioned in an inscription of Sargon (722–705 BC) as having taken part in an unsuccessful insurrection along with Hamath and Arpad. There are incidental references to it in Jer 49 23 ff and Ezek 27 18; 47 16 ff. In the Pers period Damascus, if not politically of great importance, was a prosperous city.

The overthrow of the Persian empire by Alexander was soon followed by the establishment of the Seleucid kingdom of Syria, with Antioch as its capital, and Damascus lost its position as the chief city of Syria. The center of gravity was moved toward the sea, and the maritime commerce of the Levant became more important than the trade of Damascus with the interior. In 111 BC the Syrian kingdom was divided, and Antiochus Cyzicenus became king of Coele-Syria, with Damascus as his capital. His successors, Demetrius Eupater and Antiochus Dionysus, had troubled careers, being involved in domestic conflicts and in wars with the Parthians, with Alexander Jannaeus of Judea, and with Aretas the Nabataean, who obtained possession of Damascus in 85 BC. Tigranes, being of Armenia, held Syria for some years after this date, but was defeated by the Romans, and in 64 BC Pompey finally annexed the country. The position of Damascus during the first cent. and a half of Rom rule in Syria is obscure. For a time it was in Rom hands, and from 31 BC – 33 AD its coins bear the names of Augustus or Tiberius. Subsequently it was again in the hands of the Nabataeans, and was ruled by an ethnarch, or governor, appointed by Aretas, the Nabataean king. This period of political indecision, which adhered to Paul (2 Cor 11 32 f). Later, in the time of Nero, it again became a Rom city. In the early history of Christianity Damascus, as compared with Antioch, played a very minor part. But it is memorable in Christian history on account of its associations with Paul's conversion as the scene of his earliest Christian preaching (Acts 9 1–25).

All the NT references to the city relate to this event (Acts 9 1–25; 22 5–11; 26 12, 20; 2 Cor 11 32, 1; Gal 1 17).

Traditional House of Ananias.

Afterward, under the early Byzantine emperors, Damascus, though important as an outpost of civilization on the edge of the desert, continued to be of secondary importance to Antioch and Seleucia.

(4) Under Islam.—Damascus has now been a Moslem city, or rather a city under Moslem rule, for nearly thirteen centuries. For about a cent. after 650 AD it was the seat of the Qarmad caliphs, and enjoyed a position of preeminence in the Moslem world. Later it was supplanted by Bagdad, and in the 18th cent. it came under the rule of the Fatimides of Egypt. Toward the close of the 11th cent. the Seljuk Turks entered Syria and captured Damascus. In the period of the Crusades the city, though never of decisive importance, played a considerate part, and was for a time the headquarters of Saladin. In 1300 it was plundered by the Tartars, and in 1399 Timur exacted an enormous ransom from it, and carried off its famous armories, thus robbing it of one of its most important industries. Finally, in 1516 AD, the Osmans Turks under Sultan Selim conquered Syria, and Damascus became, and still is, the capital of a province of the Ottoman Empire.

DAMMESEK ELIEZER (Gen 15 2 ERV). See Eliezer (1).

DAMN, dam, DAMNATION, dam`n-`shun, DAMNABLE, dam`n-a-b'l: These words have undergone a change of meaning since the time of the LXX. They are derived from Lat damneare = "to inflict a loss," "to condemn," and that was their original meaning in Eng. Now they denote exclusively the idea of everlasting punishment in hell. It is often difficult to determine which meaning was intended by the translators in AV. They have been excluded altogether from RV. The words for which they stand in AV are:

(1) ἐστίλεος, apōleia, "destruction," is a "damnable" and "destruction" only in 2 Pet 21 3 (RV "destructive," "destruction"). False prophets taught doctrines calculated to destroy others, and themselves incurred the sentence of destruction such as overtook the fallen angels, the world in the Deluge, and the cities of the Plain. Apōleia occurs otherwise 16 times in the NT, and is always in AV and RV by either "perdition" or "destruction": twice of waste of treasure (Mt 26 8 = Mk 14 4); twice of the beast that comes out of the abyss and goes into perdition (Rev 17 8, 11). In all other cases, it refers to men, and denotes the destiny that befalls them as the result of sin: Judas is the "son of perdition" (Jn 17 12). Peter consigns Simon Magus and his money to perdition (Acts 8 20).
Some men are "vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction" (Rom 9 22), and others, their "end is perdition" (Phil 3 19). It is the antithesis of salvation (He 10 39; Phil 1 28). Of the two ways of life, one leads to destruction (Mt 7 13). Whether it is utter, final and irretrievable destruction is not stated.

(2) κρίνω, κρίνα, trd "damned" only in AV of 2 Thess 2 12 (RV "judged") means "to judge" in the widest sense, "to form an opinion" (Lk 7 43), and forensically "to test and try" an accused person. It can only acquire the sense of "judging guilty" or "condemning" in the wrong context, in the sense of "condemning to death" (23). κατακρίνω, κατακρίνα, trd "damned" only in AV of Mk 16 16; Rom 14 23 ("condemned in RV), means properly "to give judgment against" or "to condemn" and is so trd 17 t in AV and always in RV.

(4) κρίνω, κρίσις, trd "damnation" in AV of Mt 23 33; Mk 3 29; Jn 5 29 (RV "judgment, but in Mk 3 29, "sin" for ἀδικία, harmóntera, means (a) judgment in general like κρίνω, and is so used about 17 t, besides 14 t in the phrase "day of judgment"; (b) "condemnation, like katakρίνω, about 14 t.

(5) κρίμα, κρίμα, trd in AV "damnation" 7 t (Mt 23 14 = Mk 12 40 = Lk 20 47; Rom 3 18; 13 2; 1 Cor 4 6; 12 15), "condemnation" 6 t, "judgment" 13 t, "law" and "sentence," and RV "condemnation" 9 t (Mt 23 14 only inserted in m), "judgment" 17 t, and once in m, "lawsuit" and "sentence" once each. "Judgment" may be neutral, an impartial judge weighing the evidence (so in Mt 7 2; Acts 24 25; Rom 11 33; He 6 2; 1 Pet 4 17; Rev 20 4) and "lawsuit" (1 Cor 6 7); or it may be inferred from the context that judgment is unto condemnation (so in Rom 2 2; 5 9; 6 10; 11; 1 Pet 4 14; Rev 17 1; 18 29; and RV Rom 13 2; 1 Cor 11 29). In places where κρίμα and κρίσις are rightly tr fourth, "condemnation," and where "judgment" regarded as an accomplished fact involves a sentence of guilt, they together with katakrίνω define the relation of a person to the supreme authority, as that of a criminal, found and held guilty, and liable to punishment. So the Roman empire regarded Jesus Christ, and the thief on the cross (Lk 23 40; 24 20). But generally these words refer to man as a sinner against God, judged and condemned by Him, and liable to the just penalty of sin. They imply nothing further as to the nature of the penalty or the state of man undergoing it, nor as to its duration. Nor does the word "eternal" (αἰώνιος, e.g. Mt 25 46; Mat 27 57, αἰώνιον, trd "eternal" in AV when added to them, determine the question of duration. Condemnation is an act in the moral universe, which cannot be determined under categories of time.

These terms define the action of God in relation to man's conduct, as that of the Supreme Judge, but they express only one aspect of that relation which is only fully conceived, when coordinated with the more fundamental idea of God's Fatherhood. See Eschatology; Judgment.

DAMSEL, dam'zel: A young, unmarried woman; girl (lass); daughter of Fr. In RV in Mt 26 69; Jn 18 17; Acts 12 13; 16 16 gives "maid" for παιδίσκη, παιδίσκη, "a girl," i.e. (spec.) a maid-servant or young female slave (AV "damsel"), and "child" for παιδίον, παιδίον, "a half-grown boy or girl," in Mk 5 39:40:61:41.

DAN (דנ, đān, "judge"); דָּאנָה, Dānā: The fifth of Jacob's sons, the first borne to him by Bilhah, the maid of Rachel, to whom, as the child of her slave, he legally belonged. At his birth Rachel, whose barrenness had been confirmed by trial to her, exclaimed "God hath judged me".

1. Name and habitation: Me a son," so she called his name Dan, i.e. "judge" (Gen 30 6). He was full brother of Naphtali. In Jacob's Blessing there is an echo of Rachel's words, "Dan shall judge his people" (Gen 49 16). Of the patriarch Dan almost nothing is recorded. Of his sons at the settlement in Egypt only one, Hushim, is mentioned (Gen 46 23). The name in Nu 26 43 is Shuham. The tribe however stands second in point of numbers on leaving Egypt, numbering 62,700 men of war (Nu 1 39); and at the second census they were 64,400 Tribe strong (26 43). The standard of the camp of Dan in the desert march, with which were Asher and Naphtali, was on the north side of the tabernacle (Nu 2 25; 10 25; of Josh 6 9 AV "gathering host"). The prince of the tribe was Ahiezer (Nu 1 12). Among the spies Dan was represented by Ammiel the son of Gemalli (13 12). Of the tribe of Dan was Othniel (AV "Aholibah") one of the wise-hearted artificers engaged in the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 31 6). One who was stoned for blasphemy was the son of a Danite woman (Lev 24 10). At the ceremony of blessing and anointing, "Dan stood on Mount Ebal toac while the other Tribes were on Gerizim (Dt 27 13). The prince of Dan at the division of the land was Bukki the son of Jogli (Nu 34 22).

The priests assigned to Dan adjoined those of Ephraim, Benjamin and Judah, and lay on the western slopes of the mountain. The

3. Territory reference in Jgs 5 17: And Dan, why did he remain in ships?" seems to mean that the Danites had readied their ships. The passage is one of difficulty. We are told that the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain (Jgs 1 34), so they did not enjoy the richest part of their ideal portion, the fertile plain between the mountain and the sea. The strong hand of the house of Joseph kept the Amorites tributary, but did not drive them out. Later we find Dan oppressed by the Philis, against whom the heroic exploits of Samson were performed (Jgs 14 ff).

The expedition of Danain the Danite, Jgs 18 is referred to in Josh 19 47 ff. The

4. The story affords a priceless glimpse of the Danite Raib conditions prevailing in those days. Desiring an extension of territory, the Danites sent out a man who reconnoitered Ramah, whereupon Laish, a city at the north end of the Jordan valley. The people, possibly a colony from Sidon, were careless in their fancied security. The land was large, and there was "no want of anything that was in the earth." The expedition of the 600, their dealings with Micah and his priest, their capture of Laish, and their founding of an idol shrine with priestly attendants, illustrate the strange mingling of lawlessness and superstition which was characteristic of the time. The town newly built on the site of Laish they called Dan—see following art. Perhaps 2 Ch 2 14 may be taken to indicate that the Danites intermarried with the Philomicians. Divided between its ancient seat in the S. and the new territory in the N., the tribe retained its place in Israel for a time (1 Ch 12 35; 27 22), but it played no part of importance in the subsequent history.

The name disappears from the genealogical lists of Ch; and it is not mentioned among the tribes in Rev 7 5 ff.

Samson was the one great man produced by Dan, and he seems to have embodied the leading characteristics of the tribe: unsteady, unscrupulous, violent, possessed of a certain grim humor; stealthy in a serpent in the way, an adder in the path" (Gen 49:17) — but swift and strong in striking — a lion's whelp, that leapteth forth from Bashan" (Deut 32:11). Dan ranked as a city in which the true customs of old Israel were preserved (2 S 20:18 LXX). W. Ewing

DAN: A city familiar as marking the northern limit of the land of Israel in the common phrase "from Dan even to Beer-sheba" (Jgs 20:1; 1 S 3:20, etc.). Its ancient name was Laish or Leshem (Jgs 18:7, etc.). It was probably an outlying settlement of Tyre on Sidon. Its inhabitants, pursuing the ends of peaceful traders, were defenseless against the onset of the Danite raiders. Having captured the city the Danites gave it the name of their own tribal ancestor (Jgs 16). It lay in the valley near Beth-rehob (ver 28). Jos places it near Mt. Lebanon and the fountain of the lesser Jordan, a day's journey from Sidon (Ant, V, iii, 1; VIII, viii, 4; BJ, IV, i, 1). Onom says it lay 4 Roman miles from Panes on the way to Tyre, at the source of the Jordan. This points decisively to Tell el-Kady, in the plain W. of Banias. The mound of this name — Kady — is the exact Arab. equivalent of the Heb Dan — rises from among the bushes and reeds to a height varying from 40 to 80 ft. The largest of the springs of the Judean Dan rises on the west side. The waters join with those of a smaller spring on the other side to form Nahar el-Leddān which flows southward to meet the streams from Bānīds and Hashebjeh. The mound, which is the crag of an ancient volcano, has a certain aura that remains on the south side, while the tomb of Sheshi Meruz is sheltered by two holy trees. The sanctuary and ritual established by the Danites persisted as long as the house of God was in Shiloh, and the priesthood in this idolatrous shrine remained in the family of Jonathan till the conquest of Tiglath-pileser (Jgs 18:30; 2 K 15:29). Here Jeroboam I set up the golden calf. The ancient sanctity of the place would tend to promote the success of his scheme (1 K 12:28 ff., etc.). The calf, according to a Jewish tradition, was taken away by Tiglath-pileser. Dan fell before Benhadad, king of Syria (1 K 15:20; 2 Ch 16:4). It was regained by Jeroboam II (2 K 14:25). It shared the country's fate at the hands of Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15:29). It was to this district that Abraham pursued the army of Chedorlaomer (Gen 14:14). For Dr. G. A. Smith's suggestion that Dan may have been at Bānīds see HGLI, 473, 480 ff. W. Ewing

DANCING, dan'sing. See Games.

DANDLE, dan'dl (דנְדֶל, shâ'desh', a Pual form, from root דָּשָׁל, shâ'da', with sense of "to caress"). Occurs in Iaa 66:12, "shall be dandled upon the knee."

DANGER, dăn'jër: Danger does not express a state of reality but a possibility. In Mt 5:21 f., however, and also AV Mk 3:29 (RV "but is guilty of an eternal sin") the expression "danger" refers to a certainty, for the danger spoken of is in one case a judgment which one brings upon himself, and in the other the committing of an unpardonable sin. Both are the necessary consequences of a man's conduct. The reason for translating the Gr ἐπιφοβος, ἐφανός (lit. "to be held in anything so one cannot escape") by "is in danger," instead of "guilty" or "liable," may be due to the translator's conception of these passages as legal, Dan referring to a warning against such an act rather than the act itself, a statement of the judgment which stands pronounced over every man who commits the sin. DANIEL, dan'ý-el (דָּנִיֵּל, dâniyêl, דָּנִיֵּל, dâni'êl, "God is my judge"); Dâvîh, Daniel:

1. Early Life

We know nothing of the early life of Daniel, except what is recorded in the book bearing his name. Here it is said that he was one of the youths of royal or noble seed, who were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar in the third year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah. These youths were without blame, fair, well-favored, skilful in all wisdom, endued with knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability to stand in the king's palace. The king commanded to teach them the knowledge and tongue of the Chaldeans; and appointed for them a daily provision of the best victuals, and of the wine which he drank. After having been thus nourished for three years, they were to stand before the king. Ashpenaz, the master or chief of the eunuchs, into whose hands they had been intrusted, following a custom of the time, gave to each of these youths a new and Bab name. To Daniel, he gave the name Bełteshazāz. In Bab this name was probably Belu-lita-shārri-urân, which means "O Bel, protect thou the house of the king." The name Bełteshazāz is the name for one of the four places in which Daniel occupied as a hostage of Jehoiakim at the court of the king of Babylon. The youths were probably from 12 to 15 years of age at the time when they were carried captive. (For changes of names, of Joseph see note to Zaphenath-paneah [Gen 41:45]; Elîakim, to Jehoiakim [2 K 23:34]; Mattanîah, to Zedeckiah [2 K 24:17]; and the two names of the high priest Johanan's brother in the Sachau Papyri, i.e. Ostan and Azanî.)

Having purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the food and drink of the king, Daniel requested of Ashpenaz permission to eat vegetables and drink water. Through the favor of God, this request was granted, notwithstanding the fear of Ashpenaz that his head would be endangered to the king on account of the probably resulting poor appearance of the youths living upon this blood-diluting diet, in comparison with the expected healthiness of appearance of the other youths of their class. However, ten days' trial having been first granted, and at the end of that time their countenances having been found fairer and their flesh fatter than the other youths', the permission was made permanent; and God gave to Daniel and his companions knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom, and to Daniel understanding in all visions and dreams; so that at the end of the three years when the king communed with them, he found them much superior to all the magicians and enchanters in every matter of wisdom and understanding.

Daniel's public activities were in harmony with his education. His first appearance was as an interpreter of the dream recorded in Dnl 2. Nebuchadnezzar having seen in his dream a vision of a great image, excellent in brightness and terrible in appearance, its head of fine gold, its breast and its arms of silver, its belly and its thighs of brass, its legs of iron, its feet part of iron and part of clay, beheld a stone cut out without hands smiting the image and breaking it into pieces, until it became like chaff and was carried away by the wind; while the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. Then the king awoke from his troubled sleep, he forgot as soon as he had forgotten, the dream, and summoned the wise men of Babylon both to tell him the dream and to give the interpretation thereof. The wise men having said that they could not tell the dream, nor interpret it as long as it was untold, the king threatened them with death. Daniel, who seems not to have been consulted when the other wise men received their reply, before the king, when he was informed of the threat of the king, and that preparations were being made to slay all the wise men of Babylon, himself, and his three companions included, boldly went in to the king and stated that he would appoint a time for him to appear to show the interpretation. Then he went to his house, and he and his companions prayed, and the dream and its interpretation were made known unto Daniel. At the appointed time, the dream was explained, and the four Hebrews were loaded with wealth and given high positions in the service of the king. In the 4th chapter, we have recorded Daniel's interpretation of the dream of Nebuchadnezzar about the great tree that was hewn at the command of an angel, thus prefiguring the irrevocability of the king.

Daniel's third great appearance in the book is in ch 5, where he is called upon to explain the extraordinary writing upon the wall of Belshazzar's palace, which foretold the fall of the Medes and Persians. For this service Daniel was clothed with purple, a chain of gold put around his neck, and he was made the third ruler in the kingdom.

Daniel, however, was not merely an interpreter of other men's visions. In the last six chapters we have recorded four or five of his own visions, all of which are taken up with revelations concerning the future history of the great world empires, esp. in their relation to the people of God, and predictions of the final triumph of the Messiah's kingdom.

In addition to his duties as seer and as interpreter of signs and dreams, Daniel also stood high in the governmental service of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede, and perhaps also of Cyrus.

5. Official of the Kings

The Book of Dan, our only reliable source of information on this subject, does not tell us much about his official duties and performances. It does say, however, that he was chief of the wise men, that he was in the gate of the king, and that he was governor over the whole province of Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar; that Belshazzar made him his third ruler; and that Darius made him one of the three presidents to whom his hundred and twenty satraps were to give account; and that he even thought to set him over his whole kingdom. In some of these positions he seems to have conducted himself with faithfulness and judgment. While in the service of Darius the Mede, he aroused the antipathy of the other presidents and of the satraps. Unable to find any fault with his official acts, they induced the king to make a decree, apparently general in form and purpose, but really aimed only at Daniel alone. They saw that they could find no valid accusation against him, unless they found it in connection with something concerning the law of his God. They therefore caused the king to make a decree that no one should make a request of anyone for the space of thirty days, save of the king. Daniel, having publicly prayed three times a day as he was in the habit of doing, was caught in the act, accused, and on account of the irrevocability of a law of the Mede and Persians, was condemned - with the decree to be cast into a den of lions. The king was much troubled at this, but was unable to withhold the punishment. However, he expressed to Daniel his belief that his God in whom he trusted continually would deliver him; and so indeed it came to pass. For in the morning, when the king drew near to the mouth of the den, and called to him, Daniel said that God had sent His angel and shut the mouths of the lions. So Daniel was taken up unharmed, and at the command of the king his accusers, had not been cast into the den, were destroyed before they reached the bottom.

I. NAME.—The Book of Dan is rightly so called, whether we consider Daniel as the author of it, or as the principal person mentioned in it.

II. PLACE IN THE CANON.—In the Eng. Bible, Dan is placed among the Major Prophets, immediately after Ezek, thus following the order of the Sept and of the Lat Vulg. In the Heb Bible, however, it is placed in the third division of the Canon, called the Kethuvim or writings, by the Hebrews, and the hagnographa, or holy writings, by the Seventy. It has been claimed that Dan was placed by the Jews in the third part of the Canon, either because they thought the inspiration of its author to be of a lower kind than was that of the other prophets, or because the book was written after the second or prophetical part of the Canon had been closed. It is more probable, that the book was placed in this part of the Heb Canon, because Daniel is not called a nabi ("prophet"), but was rather a hakekh ("seer") and a hokham ("wise man"). None but the works of the nabi, according to Jewish thought, are prophetic in form. A confusion has arisen from the fact that Dnl was placed by the Jews in the third part of the Jewish Canon, the third being reserved for the heterogeneous works of seers, wise men, and priests, or for those that do not mention the name or work of a prophet, or that are poetical in form. A confusion has also arisen from the fact that Dnl was placed by the Jews in the third part of the Jewish Canon, the third being reserved for the heterogeneous works of seers, wise men, and priests, or for those that do not mention the name or work of a prophet, or that are poetical in form. According to the languages in which the book is written, it may be divided into the Aram. portion, extending from 2:4b to the end of ch 7, and a Heb. portion embracing the rest of the book. The language of the book is partly Heb and partly a dialect of Aram., which has been called Chaldee, or Bib. Aram. This Aram. is almost exactly the same as that which is found in portions of Ezra. On account of the large number of Bab. and Pers. words characteristic of this Aram., and of that of the papyri recently found in Egypt, as well as on account of the general similarity of the nominal, verbal and other forms, and of the syntactical construction, the Aram. of this period might probably be called the Bab.-Pers. Aram. With the exception of the sign used to denote the sound db, and of the use of koph in a few cases where Dnl has t̂ayin, the spelling in the papyri is the same in general as that in the Bib. books. Whether the change of spelling was made at a later time in the MSS of Dnl, or whether it was a peculiarity of the Bab Aram., as distinguished from the Egypt., or whether it was due to the unifying, scientific genius of Daniel himself, we have no means at present to determine. In view of this the Eleusinian Papyrus frequently employ the d sign to express the dh sound, and that it is always employed in Ezr to express it; in view further of the fact that the z sign is found as late as the earliest Nabatæan inscription, that of 70 BC (Euting, 3:49; Lagarde, 1:48), it seems fatsious to insist on the ground of the writing of these two sounds in the Book of Dnl, that it cannot have been written in the Pers. period. As to the use of koph and t̂ayin for the Aram. sound which corresponds to the Heb. dh when equivalent to an Arab. dh, any hasty conclusion is debarred by the fact that the Aram. papyri of the 5th cent. BC, the MSS of the Sam. Tg and the Mandæa MSS written from 600 to 900 AD all employ the two letters to express the one sound. The writing of 'aleph and heth without any proper discrimination occurs in the papyri as well as in Dnl. The only serious objection to the early date of Dnl upon the ground of its spelling is that which is based upon the use of a final n in the pronominal suffix of the second and third persons masc. pl. instead of the m of the Aram. papyri and of the Zakir and Sendschirî inscriptions. It is possible that Dnl was influenced in this by the corresponding verb in the Heb. Tg and Mandæa dialects of the Aram. agree with the Bab. in the formation of the pronominal suffixes of the second and third persons masc. pl., as against the Heb. the Syr. Mannean, Sabaean and Ethiopic. It is possible that the occurrence of m in some west-Aram. documents may have arisen through the influence of the Heb. and Phoen., and that pure Aram. always had n just as we find it in Assy and Bab., and in all east-Aram. documents thus far discovered.

The claim that the use of Dnl as a preservative of the third person masculine of the imperfect proves a Palestinian provenience has been shown to be untenable by the discovery that the earliest Syr. also used y. (See M. F ageon, Inscriptions sémitiques, première partie, 47.)

This inscription is dated 73 AD. This proof that in the earlier stages of its history the east Aram. was in this respect the same as that found in Dnl is confirmed by the fact that the forms of the 3d person of the imperfect found in the prophecies of the Sibyl in the Book of Dnl, and the names upon the Aram. docket of the Assy inscriptions also have the preservative y. (See CIS, 11, 47.)

V. Purpose of the Book.—The book is not intended to give an account of the life of Daniel. It gives neither his life, career, nor history, nor any account of the events of his long career. Nor is it meant to give a record of the history of Israel during the exile, nor even of the captivity in Babylon. Its purpose is to show how by His providential guidance, His miraculous interventions, His foreknowledge and almighty power, the God of heaven controls the events of nations, the lives of Heeb captives and of the mightiest of the kings of the earth, for the accomplishment of His Divine and beneficent plans for His servants and people.

VI. Unity of the Book. The unity of the book was first denied by Spicque, who suggested that the first part was taken from the chronological works of the Chaldaæans, basing his supposition upon the difference of language between the former and latter parts. Newton followed Spicque in suggesting two parts. But the narrative passes over from the 3d to the 1st person. Köhler follows Newton, claiming, however, that the visions were written by the Daniel of the exile, but that the first 6 chapters were composed by a later writer who described the person of Daniel. Von Orelli holds that certain prophecies of Daniel were enlarged and interpolated by a Jew living in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, in order to show his contemporaries the bearing of the predictions of the book upon the times of oppression. Zeckler and Lange hold to the unity of the book in general; but the former thought that 11:5—45 is an interpolation; and the latter, that 10:1—11:44 and 12:5—13:3 were originally inserted. A few have been in the present Kuhn, who has shown that the Aram. portions existed as early as the times of Alexander the Great—a view to which Strack also inclines. Eichhorn held that the book consisted of ten different original sections, which are bound together merely by the circumstance that they are all concerned with Daniel and his three friends. Finally, De Lagarde, believing that the fourth kingdom was the Rom., held that ch 7 was written about 69 AD. (For the best discussion of the controversy concerning the unity of Dnl, see Eichhorn, Einleitung, §§ 612—19, and Buhl in RE, IV, 449—51.)

VII. Genuineness.—With the exception of the neo-Platonic Porphyry, a Gr non-Christian philosopher of the 3d cent., the genuineness of the Book of Dnl was denied by no one until the rise of the deistic movement in the 17th cent. The attacks upon the genuineness of the book have been based upon (1) the predictions, (2) the miracles, (3) the text, (4) the language, (5) the historical statements.

The assailants of the genuineness of Dnl on the ground of the predictions found therein, may be divided into two classes—those who deny the predictions in general, and those who claim that the apocalyptic character of the predictions of Dnl is a sufficient proof of their lack of genuineness. The first of these two classes includes properly those who deny the mere Christian unity, but the latter, and the answering of them may safely be left to those who defend the doctrines of theism, and particularly of revelation. The second class of assailants is, however, of a different character, since it consists of those who are sincere believers in Christianity and predictive prophecy. They claim, however, that certain characteristics of definiteness and detail, distinguishing the predictive portions of the Book of Dnl from other predictions of the OT, bring the genuineness of Dnl into question.

The kind of prediction found here, ordinarily called apocalyptic, is said to have arisen first in the 2d cent. BC, when parts of the Book of Ez and of the Sibyline Oracles were written; and a main characteristic of it seemed to be that it records past events as if they were still future, bringing the speaker back into some distant past time, for the purpose of producing on the reader the impression that the book contains real predictions, thus gaining credence for the statements of the writer and giving consolation to those who are thus led to believe in the providential foresight of God for those who trust in Him.

Since those who believe that the God has spoken unto man by His Son and through the prophets will not be able to set limits to the extent and definiteness of the revelations which He may have seen fit to make through them, nor to prescribe the method, style, time and character of the revelations, this attitude on the genuineness of Dn need only be left to the defenders of the possibility and the fact of a revelation. One who believes in these may logically believe in the genuineness of Dn, as far as this objection goes. That there are spurious apocalypses is no more proved that all are spurious than that there are spurious gospels or epistles proves that there are no genuine ones. The spurious epp. of Philarias do not prove that Cicero's Letters are not genuine; nor do the false statements of 2 Macc, nor the many spurious Acts of the Apostles, prove that 1 Mac or Luke's Acts of the Apostles is not genuine. Nor does the fact that the oldest portions of the spurious apocalypses which have been preserved to our time are thought to have been written in the 2d cent. BC, proves that apocalypses, no matter genuine or spurious, were written before that time. There must have been a beginning, a first apocalypse, at some time, if ever. Besides, if we admit that the earliest parts of the Book of En and of the Sybyline Oracles were written about the middle of the 2d cent. BC, whereas the Book of E seal was written about 300 AD, 450 years later, we can see no good literary reason why Dn may not have antedated En by 350 years. The period between 500 BC and 150 BC is the most entirely known of all known Hebrew literary productions as to render it exceedingly precarious for anyone to express an opinion as to what works may have characterized that long space of time.

Secondly, as to the objections made against the Book of Dn on the ground of the number or character of the miracles recorded, we shall only say that they affect the whole Christian system, which is full of the miraculous from beginning to end. If we begin to reject the books of the Bible because miraculous events are recorded in them, where indeed shall we stop?

Thirdly, a more serious objection, as far as Dn itself is concerned, is the claim of Eichhorn that the original text of the Aram. portion 3. The Text has been so thoroughly tampered with and changed, that we can no longer get at the genuine original composition. We ourselves can see no objection to the belief that these Aram. portions were written first of all in Heb, or even, if you will, in Bab; nor to the supposition that some Gr translators modified the meaning in their version either intentionally, or through a misunderstanding of the original. We claim, however, that the composite Aram. of Dn agrees in almost every particular of orthography, etymology and syntax, with the Aram. of the North Sem inscriptions of the 9th, 8th and 7th cents. BC and of the Egypt papyri of the 5th cent. BC, and that the vocabulary of Dn has an admixture of Heb, Bab and Pers words similar to that of the papyri of the 5th cent. BC; whereas, it differs in composition from the Aram. of the Nabateans, which is devoid of Pers, Heb, and Bab words, and which is prophetic, and from that of the Psalms, which is full of Gr words, while having but one or two Pers words, and no Heb or Bab. As to different recensions, we meet with a similar difficulty in Jeremiah without anyone's impugning on that account the genuineness of the work as a whole. As to interpolations of verses or sections, they are found in the Sam recension of the Heb text and in the Sam and other Tgs, as also in certain places in the text of the NT, Jos and many other ancient literary works, without causing us to distrust in the genuineness of the rest of their works, or of the works as a whole.

Fourthly, the objections to the genuineness of Dn based on the presence in it of three Gr names of musical instruments and of a number of Pers words do not seem nearly as weighty today as they did a hundred years ago. The Gr inscriptions at Abn Simbal in Upper Egypt dating from the time of Psamtik II in the early part of the 6th cent. BC, the discovery of the Minoan inscriptions and ruins in Crete, the revelations of the wide commercial relations of the Phoenicians in the early part of the 1st millennium BC, the lately published inscriptions of Sammanerib about his campaigns in Cilicia against the Gr seafarers to which Alexander Polyhistor and Abydenus had referred, telling about his having carried many Greeks captive to Nineveh about 700 BC, the confirmation of the wealth and expensive ceremonies of Nebuchadnezzar made by his own inscriptions and other, still more recent, evidence, will assure us of the possibility of the use of Gr musical instruments at Babylon in the 6th cent. BC. This, taken along with the well-known fact that names of articles of commerce and esp. of musical instruments go with such things, leaves no room to doubt that a writer of the 6th cent. BC may have known and used borrowed Gr terms. The Aramaeans being the great commercial middlemen between Egypt and Greece on the one hand and Babylon and the Orient on the other, and speaking a subject people, would naturally adopt many foreign words into their vocabulary.

As to the presence of the so-called Pers words in Dn, it must be remembered that many words which were formerly considered to be such have been found to be Bab. As to the others, perhaps all of them may be Median rather than Pers; and if so, the children of Israel who were carried captive to the cities of the Medes in the middle of the 8th cent. BC, and the Medes, then Medo-Persians, may be the object of being like the Medes, at least from the time of the fall of Nineveh about 607 BC, may well have adopted many words into their vocabulary from the language of their rulers. Daniel was not writing merely for Jews who had been carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar, but for all Israelites throughout the world. Hence, he would properly use a language which his scattered readers would understand rather than the purer idiom of Judaea. Most of his foreign terms are names of officials, legal terms, and articles of clothing, for which there were no suitable terms existing in the earlier Heb or Aram. There was nothing for a writer to do but to invent new terms, or to transfer the current foreign words into his native language. The latter was the preferable method and the one which he adopted.

Fifthly, objections to the genuineness of the Book of Dn are made on the ground of the historical misstatements which are said to be found in it. These may be classified as follows: (1) Chronological, (2) geographical, and (3) various.

1. Chronological objections. The first chronological objection is derived from Dn 1:1, where it is said that Nebuchadnezzar made an expedition against Egypt, which is spurious, whereas Jeremiah seems to imply that the expedition was made in the 4th year of that king. As Daniel was writing primarily for the Jews of Babylon, he would naturally use the system of dating that was employed there; and this system differed in its method of denoting the 1st year of a reign from that used by the Egyptians and by the Jews of Jerus for whom Jeremiah wrote.

The first objection is derived from the fact that Daniel is said (Dnl 1 21) to have lived unto the 1st year of Cyrus the king, whereas in 10 1 he is said to have seen a vision in the 3d year of Cyrus, king of Persia. These statements are easily reconciled by supposing that in the former case it is the 1st year of Cyrus as king of Babylon, and in the second, the 3d year of Cyrus as king of Persia.

The third chronological objection is based on 6 28, where it is said that Daniel prospered in the kingdom of Darius and in the kingdom of Cyrus the Persian. This statement is harmonized with the facts revealed by the monuments and with the statements of the book itself by supposing that Darius reigned synchronously with Cyrus, but as sub-king under him.

The fourth objection is based on 8 1, where Daniel is said to have seen a vision in the third year of Belshazzar the king. If we suppose that Belshazzar was king of the Chaldaeans while his father was alive, just as Conrad was king of Babylon while his father, Cyrus, was king of the lands, or as Nabonidus II seems to have been king of Harran while his father, Nabonidus I, was king of Babylon, this statement will harmonize with the other statements of the book and with the history of Belshazzar.

(2) Geographical objections.—As to the geographical objections, three only need be considered as important. The first is, that Shushan seems to be spoken of in 7 2 as subject to Babylon, whereas it is supposed by some to have been at that time subject to Media. Here we can safely rest upon the opinion of Winckler, that at the division of the Assyrian dominions among the allied Medes and Babylonians, Elam became subject to Babylon rather than to Media. If, however, this opinion could be shown not to be true, we must remember that Daniel is said to have been at Shushan in a vision.

The second geographical objection is based on the supposition that Nebuchadnezzar would not have gone against Jerus, leaving an Egyptian garrison at Carchemish in his rear, thus endangering his line of communication and a possible retreat to Babylon. This objection has no weight, now that the position of Carchemish has been shown to be, not at Cireasium, as conjectured, but at Jirabis, 150 miles farther up the Euphrates. Carchemish would have cut off a retreat to Nineveh, but was far removed from the direct line of communication with Babylon.

The third geographical objection is derived from the statement that Darius placed 120 satraps in, or over, all his kingdom. The objection rests upon a false conception of the meaning of satrapy and of the extent of a satrapy, there being no reason why a subject of Persia should be under a satrap who was tributary under him as Sargon of Assyria had governors and deputies under him; and the latter king mentions 117 peoples and countries over which he appointed his deputies to rule in his place.

(3) Other objections.—Various other objections to the genuineness of Dn1 have been made, the principal being those derived from the supposed non-existence of Kings Darius the Mede and Belshazzar the Chaldean, from the use of the word Chaldean to denote the wise men of Babylon, and from the silence of other historical sources as to many of the events recorded in Dn1. The discussion of the existence of Belshazzar and Darius the Mede will be found under BELSHAZZAR and DARIUS. As to the argument from the silence, it turns upon the assumption that it proves itself in fact to the absence of all reference to Daniel on the monuments, in the Book of Eclesius, and in the post-exilic lit. As to the latter books it proves too much; for Hag, Zec, and Mal, as well as Ezr, Neh, and Est, refer to so few of the older canonical books and earlier historical persons and events, that it is not fair to demand of them to refer to Daniel—at least, to use their not referring to him or his book as an argument against the existence of either before the time when they were written. As to Eclesius, we might have expected him to mention Daniel or the Three Children; but who knows what reasons Ben Sira may have had for not placing them in his list of Heb heroes? Perhaps, since he held the views which later characterized the Sadducees, he may have passed Daniel by because of his views on the resurrection and on angels. Perhaps he failed to mention any of the four companions because none of their deeds had been wrought in Pal; or because their deeds exalted too highly the heathen monarchies to which the Jews were subject. Or, more likely, the book may have been unknown to him, since very few copies at best of the whole OT can have existed in his time, and the Book of Dn1 may not have had general currency in Pal before it was made so preeminent by the fulfillment of its prophecies to Cyrus.

It is not satisfactory to say that Ben Sira did not mention Daniel and his companions, because the stories concerning them had not yet been imbedded in a canonical book, inasmuch as he does not mention any of the other Israel's great men, although he is not mentioned in any canonical book. In conclusion, it may be said, that while it is impossible for us to determine why Ben Sira does not mention Daniel and his three companions among the other Israel's great men, at least it is more possible to understand how these stories concerning them cannot merely have arisen but have been accepted as true, between 180 BC, when Eclesius is thought to have been written, and 169 BC, when, according to 1 Mac, Matthias, the first of the Asmonaees, executed his brethren to follow the example of the fortitude of Ananias and his friends.

As to the absence of all mention of Daniel on the contemporary historical documents of Babylon and Persia, such mention is not to be expected, inasmuch as those documents give the names of none who occupied positions such as, or similar to, those which Daniel is said to have had.

VIII. Interpretation.—Questions of the interpretation of particular passages may be looked for in the commentaries and special works. As to the general question of the kind of prophecy found in the Book of Dn1, it has already been discussed above under the caption of "Genuineness." As to the interpretation of the world monarchies which precede the monarchy of the Messian Prince, it may be said, however, that the latest discoveries, ruling out as they do a separate Median empire that included Babylon and parts of the Medes, that the four monarchies are the Bab, the Pers, the Gr, and the Rom. According to this view, Darius the Mede was only a sub-king under Cyrus the Pers. Other interpretations have been made by selecting the four empires from those of Assyria, BABYLONIA, MEDIA, PERSIA, MEDO-PERSIA, ALEXANDER, THE SELECTED, THE ROMANS, AND THE MOHAMMEDANS. The first and the last of these have generally been excluded from serious consideration. The main dispute is as to whether the 4th empire was that of the Seleucids, or that of the Romans, the former view being held commonly by those who hold to the composition of Dn1 in the 2d cent. BC, and the latter by those who hold to the traditional view that it was written in the 6th century BC.

IX. Doctrines.—It is universally admitted that the teachings of Daniel with regard to angels and the resurrection are more explicit than those found elsewhere. Daniel attributes to them names, ranks, and functions not mentioned by others. It has become common in certain quarters to assert that these peculiarities of Daniel are due to Pers influences. The Bab monuments, however, have revealed the fact that the Babylonians believed in both good and evil spirits with names, ranks, and different functions. These spirits correspond in several respects to the Heb angels, and may well have afforded Daniel the background for his visions. Yet, in all such matters, it must be remembered that the sources gave us a vision, or revelation; and a revelation cannot be bound by the ordinary laws of time and human influence.

As to the doctrine of the resurrection, it is generally admitted that Daniel adds some new and distinct features to that which is taught in the other canonical books of the Old Testament. But it will be noted that he does not dwell upon this doctrine, since he mentions it only in 12:2. The materials for his doctrine are to be found in Zech 14:21 and 66:24; Ezek 37:1-14, and in Job 14:12; 19:25; Hosea 6:2; 1 K 4:2; 2 K 4, and 8:1-5, as well as in the use of the words for sleep and awakening from sleep, or from the dust, for everlasting life or everlasting sin (Isa 26:13; 63:1; 2 K 13:27:2; Dtn 31:16; 2 S 7:12; 1 K 1:21; Job 7:21, and Jer 20:11; 23:40. The essential ideas and phraseology of Daniel's teachings are found in Isa, Jer, and Ezek. The first two parts of the books of En and Mal have much to do with the resurrection; but on the other hand, Ecel seems to believe not even in the immortality of the soul, and Wisd and 1 Mac do not mention a resurrection of the body.

That the post-exilic prophets do not mention a resurrection does not prove that they knew nothing about Dn1 any more than it proves that they knew nothing about Isa, Jer, and Ezek.

There are analogies, it is true, between the teachings of Daniel with regard to the resurrection and those of the Apocrypha. But so are there between his doctrines and the ideas of the Egyptians, which had existed for millenniums before his time. Besides there is no proof of any derivation of doctrines from the Persians by the writers of the canonical books of the Hebrew Bible. In the New Testament, however, both the ideas and verbiage of Daniel are to be found in the acknowledged early Heb literature. And finally, this attempt to find a natural origin for all Bib. ideas leaves out of sight the fact that the Scriptures contain revelations from God, which transcend the ordinary course of human development. To a Christian, therefore, there can be no reason for believing that the doctrines of Dn1 may not have been promulgated in the 6th cent. BC.

The best commentaries on Dn1 from a conservative point of view are those by Calvin, Moses Stuart, Kell, Zöckler, Strong in Lange's Biblical Word-Finders, in the Scoresby Commentary, Thomson in the Pulpit Commentary, and Wright, Daniel and His Critics. The best defenses of Daniel's authenticity and genuineness are Hengstenberg, Authorship and Authenticity of the Book of Daniel, Triggold, Dn1, as it appeared in the best of its kind by C. H. H. Wright, Daniel and His Critics, Kennedy, The Book of Daniel from the Christian Standpoint, Joseph Wilson, Daniel, and Sir Robert Anderson, Daniel in the Critics' Den. One should consult also Pinches, The Old Testament in the Light of the Ancient Historia and Religion, and Light on the Old Testament from Babyl. and Orr, The Problem of the Attribution of Dn1. The best reading of the text is represented by Driver in his Lit. of the OT and in his Dn1; by Bevan, The Book of Daniel; by Prince, Commentary on Daniel, and by Cornill in his Introdo to the OT.

X. Apocryphal Additions.—In the Gr translations of Dn1 three or four pieces are added which are not found in the original Heb. Aram. text as it has been shown above. These are The Prayer of Azarias, The Song of the Three Holy Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon. These additions have all been rejected from the Canon by the Protestant churches because they are not contained in the Heb. Canon. In the Church of England they are read for example of life and instruction of manners. The Three was 'ordered in the rubric of the first Prayer Book of Edward VI (AD 1549) to be used in Lent as a responsive to the OT Lesson at the Morning Prayer.' It contains the Prayer of Azarias from the midst of the burning flames, and the song of praise by the three children for their deliverance; the latter being couched largely in phrases borrowed from Ps 148. Sus presents us to the story of a virtuous woman who resisted the seductive attempts of two judges of the elders of the people, whose machinations were exposed through the wisdom of Daniel who convicted them of false witness by the evidence of their own mouth, so that they were put to death according to the law of Moses; and from that day forth Daniel held in great reputation in the sight of the people. Bel contains three stories. The first relates how Daniel destroyed the image of Bel which Nebuchadnezzar worshipped, by showing by means of ashes strewn on the floor of the temple that the image was not of gold, but the work of those who came secretly into the temple by night. The second tells how Daniel killed the Dragon by throwing lumps of mingleted pitch, fat and hair into its mouth, so causing the Dragon to burst asunder. The third relates how the three children were cast into the fiery furnace, stating that there were seven lions and that Daniel lived in the den six days, being sustained by broken bread and potage which a prophet named Habakkuk brought to him through the air, an angel of the Lord having taken food to him every day, and which he received by the hair of his head and through the vehemence of his spirit set him in Babylon over the den, into which he dropped the food for Daniel's use.

DANITES, Dan'sits (דנֵ֥י, ha-danî:): Occurs as describing those belonging to Dan in Jgs 13 2; 18 111; 1 Ch 12 35.

DAN-JAAN, Dan-jâ'ân (דני, dăn ya'ân; בְּדנֵי, bô Danî:): A place visited by Job and his officers when taking the census (2 S 24 6). It is mentioned between Gilead and Sidon. Some would identify it with K'in Dânân, a ruined site N. of Asheib. The text is probably corrupt. Klostermann would read 'toward Dan and Ijon' (cf 1 K 15 20).

DANNAH, Dan'a (דנֶ֫ה, dànnâh; דנֶ֫ה, dànnâh; דנֶ֫ה, dànnâh): One of the cities in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 49) between Socoh and Kirjath-sannah (Dahr), habitation Idnah—the Jedia of the Onom—Sélales W. of Hebron. See PEF, III, 305, 330.

DAPHNE, Daf'nâ (דָֽפָּה), Daphné, "bay-trees"): A suburb of Abydos in the Oronian, in the valley to Strabo and the Jeros itinerary, about 40 furlongs, or 8 miles distant. It is identified with Belit el-Mâd on the left bank of the river, to the S.W. of the city. Here were the famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo. The grove and shrine owed their origin to Seleucus Niger. It was a place of great natural beauty, and the Seleucid kings spared no outlay in adding to its attractions. The precipices enjoyed the right of asylum. Hither fled Onias the high Dara, dăr'a (דארא, dăr'a). See Darda.

Darda, dăr'da (דרד, dar'da), "pearl of wisdom"): One of the wise men to whom Solomon is compared (1 K 4 31). He was either a son of Mahol (ibid) or a son of Zerah, son of Judah (1 Ch 2 6, where the corresponding name in the same list is given as Dara). In rabbinc lore the name has been interpreted as dăr'da as "the generation of knowledge"—the generation of the wilderness.

Dare, dăr: The expression "to dare" in the Scriptures has the meaning of "to defy," "to challenge," or "to terrify." It is always found as the tr of ṭeḥād, ṭolmāh, "to manifest courage." This is particularly evident from 2 Cor 10 12, "for we are not bold to number or compare ourselves" (AV "for we dare not make ourselves the number").

Darin, dar'ik (דאריק, dar'ikōn, and דאריק, dar'ikōn; דריך, dar'ikō; דאריק, dar'ikō; דאריק, dar'ikō; דאריק, dar'ikō): A Pers gold coin about a guinea or five dollars in value. The first form of the word occurs in 1 Ch 29 7; Ezr 2 69, and Neh 7 70 72; the second in Ezr 8 27 and is rendered "dram" in AV and "daric" in RV. In the passage in Ch, it must refer to a weight, since at the time of David there were no coins, but in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah the Pers darics were current. See Money.

Darius, da-r'i-us: The name of three or four kings mentioned in the OT. In the original Pers it is spelled "Dara-yavasht"; in Bab, usually "Dar'amush"; in Susian (?), "Tariymanash"; in Egypt, "Antaryavash"; on Aram, inscriptions, שֶׁרֶם or שֶׁרֶם; in Heb, שֶׁרֶם; בָּרֶם, dar'amwash; in Gr, δαρμασθ, Darias; in Lat., "Darius." In meaning it is probably connected with the new Pers word Dara, "king." Herodotus says it means in Gr, ἔγειρε, ἔφεστος, co-extinctor, "restrain," "compel," "commander.

1) Darius the Mede (Dnl 6 1; 11 1) was the son of Ahasuerus (Ahas) of the seed of the Medes (Dnl 9 1). He received the government of Belshazzar the Chaldean upon the death of that prince (Dnl 5 30 31; 6 1), and was made king over the kingdom of the Chaldeans.

2) From Dnl 6 28 we may infer that Darius was king contemporaneously with Cyrus. Outside of the Book of Dnl there is no mention of Darius the Mede by name, though there are good reasons for identifying him with Goburu, or Ugbaru, the governor of Gubaru, who is the Nabonaid-Cyrus Chronicle to have been appointed by Cyrus as his governor of Babylon after its capture from the Chaldeans. Some reasons for this identification are as follows:

(a) Goburu is possibly a tr of Darius. The same radical letters in Arab. mean "king," "compeller," "restrainer." In Heb, derivations of the root mean "lord," "mistress," "queen"; in Aram., "mighty," "almighty."

(b) Guburu was the designation of the country N. of Babylon and was in all possibility in the time of Cyrus a part of the province of Media. It was the residence of Medes as a nation. It is possible therefore that Guburu was a part of Media at that time, it was the custom of Pers kings to appoint Medes as well as Persians to satrapies and to the command of armies. Hence Darius-Goburu may have been a Mede, even if Guburu were not a part of Media. Such a Mede among the Chaldeans never included either Media or Persia, there is absolutely no evidence in the Book of Dnl that its author ever meant to imply that Darius the Mede ever ruled over either Media or Persia.

(c) That Guburu is called governor (pihatus), and Darius the Mede, king, is no objection to this identification; for in ancient as well as modern oriental empires the governors of provinces and cities were often called kings. Moreover, in the Aram. language, no noun can carry the dual form that "king" can be found to designate the ruler of a sub-kingdom, or province of the empire.

(f) That Darius is said to have had 29 satraps under him does not conflict with this; for the Pers word "satrap" is indefinite as to the extent of his rule, just like the Eng. word "governor." Besides, Guburu is said to have appointed pihatus under himself. If the kingdom of the Chaldeans which he received was as large as that of Sargon he may easily have appointed 120 of these sub-rulers; for Sargon names 117 subject cities and countries over which he appointed his prefects and governors.

(g) The peoples, nations and tongues of ch 6 are no objection to this identification for Babylonia itself at this time was inhabited by Babylonians, Chaldeans, Babylonians, Arameans, and Jews, and the kingdom of the Chaldeans embraced also Assyrians, Elamites, Phenicians and others within its limits.

(h) This identification is supported further by the fact that there is no other prominent king of the Chaldean or Mede dynasty that can be well meant. Some, indeed, have thought that Darius the Mede was a reflection into the past of Darius Hystaspes; but this is rendered impossible both in the character, deeds and empire of Darius Hystaspes, which were well known to us from his own monuments and from the Gr historians, do not resemble what Daniel says of Darius the Mede.

2) Darius, the fourth king of Persia, called Hystaspes because he was the son of a Pers king named Hystaspis, is mentioned in Ezr (4 5, et al.), Hag (1 1) and Zec (1 1). Upon the death of Cambyses, son and successor to Cyrus, Smerdis the Magian usurped the kingdom and was de-throned by seven Pers nobles from among whom Darius was selected to be king. After many rebellions and wars he succeeded in establishing himself firmly upon the throne (And, XI, 1). He reorganized and enlarged the Pers empire. He is best known for his general history from his conflict with Greece culminating at Marathon, and for his re-digging of the Suez Canal. In sacred story he stands forth as the king who enabled the Jews under Joshua and Zerubabel to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem.

3) Darius, called by the Greek Nearchus, was called Ochus before he became king. He reigned from 424 to 404 BC. In the Scriptures he is mentioned only in Neh 12 22, where he is called Darius the Pers, probably to distinguish him from Darius the Mede. It is not necessary to suppose that Darius Codomannus who reigned from 336 to 330 BC, is meant by the author of Neh 13, because he mentions Jaddua; for (a) Johanan, the father of this Jaddua, was high priest about 408 BC, as is clear from the Aram. papyrus from Elephantine lately published by Professor Sachau of Berlin, and Jaddua may well have succeeded him in those troublous times before the death of Darius Nothus in 404 BC. And (b) that a high priest named Jaddua met Alexander in 332 BC, is attested only by Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 5). It is not fair to take the testimony of Jos to Jaddua, but to take his testimony as to the meeting with Alexander and as to the appeal of Jaddua to the predictions of the Book of Dan. But even if Jos be right, there may have been two Jadduas, one high priest in 404 BC, and the other in 332 BC; or the one who was alive and exercising his functions in 404 BC may still have been high priest in 332 BC. He need not have exceeded 90 years of age. According to the Eshki Harran inscription, which purports to have been written by himself, the priest of the temple in that city had lived for 107 years. In our own time how many men have been vigorous in mind and body at the age of 90, or thereabouts! Bismarck and Gladstone, for example? R. Dick Wilson

DARK, dark, DARKNESS, dark'nes (יוּם, yom; ἱσόθεκ, σκώτος, σκότος): The day and night, light and darkness, are notable antitheses in Ps 82 5; Prov 2 13; Is 3 19; Rom 13 12, and their reward is to “sit in darkness” (Ps 107 10) or to be “cast forth into the outer darkness” (Mt 8 12): “The night man does not know what he is doing in the darkness,” (1 K 8 12; Ps 97 2); (c) of trouble and affliction (2 S 22 26; Job 5 14; Prov 20 20; Isa 2 2; of Gen 15 12); (d) of punishment (Lam 3 3; Ezk 32 8; Zeph 1 15); (e) of death (1 S 2 9; Job 10 21; Ecc 11 8); (f) of nothingness (Job 3 4–6); (g) of human ignorance (Job 19 8; 1 Ja 2 11). “A dark [RV ‘squallid’] place” (2 Pet 1 19) refers esp. to the state of things described in ch 2.

DARKLY, dark’li: The word occurs in 1 Cor 13 12, “For now we see in a mirror, darkly;” in tr. of the words τῷ αἰσθήματι, en aisthēmati, RVm “in a riddle.” The contrast is with the “face to face” vision of Divine things in eternity. Earth’s best knowledge is partial, obscure, enigmatic, a broken reflection of the complete truth (“broken light of Thee”).

DARKON, dār’kon (יוֹם, yom; ἱσόθον, “carrier”): Ancestor of a subdivision of “Solomon’s servants,” so called, in post-exilic times (Ezr 2 56; Neh 7 58; Lsoon; 1 Esd 6 33).

DARk SAYINGS (Prov 1 6; Ps 78 2; sing., Ps 49 4); ἱδθόθον, sing. ἱδήθοθ, ἱδθόθα, elsewhere rendered “riddle,” “proverb”): In the head-

The canonical Book of Prov, the general term “proverbs” is made to include “a proverb [יִתְּנָה, mashḥâl], and a figure [or, an interpretation, סְפָר מְשִׁיחֲל, mitschēl], the words [sing. יִשְׁנָה, dâḇakh] of the wise, and their dark sayings [or, riddles].” The “proverb” is either a saying current among the people (cf 1 S 10 12; “the proverb of the ancients” 24 13[14]), or a sentence of ethical wisdom composed by the order of wise men (יִתְּנָה, hâkhamim). Of the latter kind are the sententious maxims of the Wisdom lit. (chiefly Prov, but also Job, Ecc, and among the uneccanonical writings Ecclus). They are characterized by a secular touch; wisdom, moreover, flourished among the neighbors of Israel as well; so in Edom and elsewhere. Whatever the date of the collection known as the “Proverbs of Solomon,” the wise men existed in Israel at a very early period; the prophets allude to them. But the Heb mashâl is sometimes of a more elaborate character corresponding to our “parables”; frequently a vein of taunt runs through them, and they played an important part in compositions directed against other nations (cf Nu 21 27). The prophets are fond of employing this genre of literary production; in their hands the mashâl becomes a fig, or allegorical discourse (cf Es 21 5 f. [8 ff]). The mashâl in the sense of a didactic poem occurs also in the Psalms (Ps 49 and 78). Hence it is that “proverb” and “figure,” or “proverb” and “dark saying” are interchangeable terms. The “dark saying” is the popular “riddle” (cf Ag 11, where all the dignity of elaborate production. It is in short an allegorical sentence requiring interpretation. Both prophets and psalmists avail themselves thereof. The word God comes to the prophet in the form of a vision or a dream, visions of Adams are such; the truth presents itself to them in the form of a simile. To the perfect prophet of the type of Moses the revelation come directly in the shape of the naked truth without the mediation of figures of speech or obscure utterances requiring elucidation (of Nu 12). In the same way St. Paul (1 Cor 13) distinguishes between the childish manner of speaking of things spiritual and the manner of a man: “For now we see in a mirror, darkly [or ‘in a riddle’]; but then face to face.” Paul, who experienced these riddles, was aware that other prophets saw God and things Divine in a dim mirror, Moses saw them in a polished, clear mirror. Both St. Paul and the rabbis feel the difference between mediate and immediate vision, the revelation which demands dark sayings and the clear perception which is the direct truth.

MAX L. MARGOLIS

DARLING, dār’ling (יוֹם, yom; יִיָּד, yādih, "only," AVm “only one”; ARVm “dear life”): Used poetically for the life or soul (Ps 22 20; 55 17).

DART, dārt (יוֹם, yōm; בְּדֹּה, bēlos): A pointed missile weapon, as an arrow or light spear (2 S 18 14; Job 41 26). See ARMOR, ARMIS, III, 4; ARMOR.

Figurative: (1) Of the penalty of sin (Prov 7 23 AV); (2) of strong suggestions and fierce temptations to evil (Eph 6 16; cf 1 Mac 5 51).

DART-SNAKE, dārt’snake (Isa 54 15): See ARROWSNAKE.

DASH: The idea of “to throw violently” or “to strike” with purpose of causing destruction is usually connected with the word “to dash.” There is perhaps but one exception to this, but also Ps 9 12 and the quotations of this passage in the NT (Mt 4 6; Lk 4 11, προσεπτω, προσβάπτω), have the meaning “to strike against accidentally” and not intentionally. Nah 2 1, “he that dasheth in pieces is doubtful.”
"He that scattereth" would be in better harmony with the Heb יָמִּית, 'mephit, and the following description of destruction. In all other cases "to dash" is connected with the idea of destruction, esp. the infliction of punishment which is usually expressed by יָמִּית, rādašh, "to dash to the ground." (2 K 3:12; Isa 13:16 ff., etc., "to dash in pieces," AV "vastly, "breatheth"); but also by יָמִּית, 'madhāq, "to break to pieces" (Ps 2:9; 137:9, etc.). See also PUNISHMENTS.

DAUGHTER-IN-LAW. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

DAVID, dā'vid (דָּוִד, dāvidh, or דָּוִד, dāvīd, "beloved"); Dāuwîd, Dàuwîd, also in NT, David, Daddel; see Thab's Lex.

I. Name and Genealogy.—This name, which is written "defectively" in the older books, such as those of S, but plene with the yodh in Ch and the later books, is derived, like the similar name Jedidiah (2 S 12:23), from a root meaning "to love." The only person who bears this name in the Bible is the son of Jesse, the second king of Israel. His genealogy is given in the table appended to the Book of Ruth (4:18–22). Here the following points are to be noted: David belonged to the tribe of Judah; his ancestor Nahshon was of the tribe of Moab, the mother of his grandfather Obed being Ruth the Moabitess. Of the wife or wives of Jesse we know nothing, and consequently are without information upon a most interesting point—the personality of the mother of David; but that she too may have been of the tribe of Moab is rendered probable by the fact that, when hard pressed, David placed his parents under the protection of the king of that country (1 S 19:4).

II. Early Years.—The home of David when he comes upon the stage of history was the picturesque town of Bethlehem. There his family had been for generations, in fact, ever since Nahshon, the grandson of Judah, had overruled the land of Canaan. His father was apparently not only the chief man of the place, but he seems to have been chief of the whole clan to which he belonged—the clan of Judah. Although the country round Bethlehem is not much described in the Bible, it is certain that in the neighborhood of Jerus, the inhabitants joined to the cultivation of the soil the breeding of cattle (Lk 2:8). David's father, not only cultivated his ancestral fields, but kept flocks of sheep and goats as well. He would take his sheep every day to pasture in the neighboring valleys attended by the herdsmen armed so as to defend themselves and their charge, not only against marauders from the surrounding deserts, but also from the lions and bears with which the country was then infested. David seems to have been in the habit of accompanying his father's servants in their task (1 S 17:20,22), and on occasion would be left in full charge by himself. Nor was his post at such times a sinecure. He had to be able to keep a sharp look-out for thieves, but on more than one occasion had with no other weapon than his shepherd's club or staff to rescue a lamb from the clutches of a lion or a bear (vs 34 ff.). Such adventures, however, must have been rare, and David must often have watched eagerly the lengthening of the shadow which told of the approach of sunset, when he could drive his charge into the zariba for the night and return home. There is, indeed, no life more monotonous and enviable than that of an eastern shepherd; but David must have made good use of his idle time. He seems, in fact, to have made such good use of it as to have neglected his whole life of eheep. The incidents of which he boasted to Saul would not have occurred, had his proper occupation taken up all his thoughts; but, like King Alfred, his head seems...

David, like Nelson, does not seem to have known what it was to be afraid, and it was not to be expected that he could be satisfied with

2. Slinger the lot of the youngest of eight sons of the now aged chief (1 S 17:12; 1 Ch 2:13 ff). In the East every man is a soldier, and David's bent was in that direction. The tribesmen of Benjamin near whose border his home was situated were famed through all Israel as slingers, some of whom had long hair and not must (Jgs 20:16). Taught, perhaps, by one of these, but certainly by dint of constant practice, David acquired an accuracy of aim which reminds one of tales of William Tell or Robin Hood (1 S 17:49).

Another of the pastimes in the pursuit of which David spent many an hour of his youthful days was music. The instrument which he

3. Harpist used was the "harp" (Heb kinnōr). This instrument had many forms, which may be seen on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments; but the kind used by David was probably like the modern Arab, rubāba, having only one or two strings, played not with a plectrum (Ant, VII, xii, 8) but by the hand (cf 1 S 16:23, etc, which do not quote the nature of the instrument). D. acquired such proficiency in playing it that his fame as a musician soon spread throughout the countryside (ver 18). With the passing of time be becomes the Heb Orpheus, in whose music birds and mountains joined (cf Korān, ch 21).

To the accompaniment of his lyre David no doubt sang words, either of popular songs or of lyrics of his own composition, in that wailing eastern style which demanded an imit.

4. Poet the bleating of flocks. The verses he sang would recount his own adventures or the heroic prowess of the warrior of his clan, or celebrate the loveliness of some maiden of the tribe, or consist of elegies upon those slain in battle. That the name of D. was long connected with music the reverse of sacred appears from the fact that Amos denounces the people of luxury of his time for improvising to the sound of the viol, inventing instruments like D.'s (Am 6:5). Indeed, to which clause "like D." belongs, probably to both. The only remains of the secular poetry of D. which have come down to us are his elegies on Saul and Jonathan and on Abner (2 S 1:18-27; 33:24), which prove him to be a true poet.

Did D. also compose religious verses? Was he the "sweet psalmist of Israel" (2 S 23:1)? In the oldest account which we have, con.

5. Psalmist tained in the books of S. D. appears as a musician and as a secular poet only, for it is obvious the poetical passages, 2 S 22:1-23:7, do not belong to the original form of that book but are thrust in in the middle of a long list of names of D.'s soldiers. The position is the same in Am (6:5). It is in the later books and passages that sacred music and psalms begin to be ascribed to him. Perhaps the earliest instance is the passage just cited containing the "last words" of D. (2 S 23:1-7). The Chronicler (about 800 BC) seems to put parts of Ps 105:96 and 106 into the mouth of D. (1 Ch 15:7 ff), and Nehemiah (12:36) regards him apparently as the inventor of the instruments used in the Temple service (1 Ch 23:5), or as a player of sacred music. So too in the LXX psalter (151:2) we read, "My hands made an organ, my lips a harp for psaltery," and a psaltery or harp in the whole of the Psalms came to be ascribed to D. as author. In regard to this question it must be remembered that in the East at any rate there is no such distinction as that of sacred and secular.

By sacred poetry we mean poetry which mentions the name of God or quotes Scripture, but the Heb or Arab poet will use the name of God as an accompaniment to a dance, and will freely sprinkle even comic poetry with citations from his sacred book. D. must have composed sacred poems if he composed at all, and he would use his musical gift for the purposes of religion as readily as for those of amusement and pleasure (2 S 6:14-15). Whether any of our psalms was composed by D. is another question. The titles cannot be considered as conclusive evidence, and internal proofs of his authorship are wanting. Indeed the only psalm which claims to have been written by D. is the 18th (= 2 S 22). One cannot help wishing that the 23rd were sung by the little herd lad as he watched his father's flocks and guarded them from danger.

There are sayings of Mohammed that the happiest life is that of the shepherd, and that no one became a prophet who had not at one time tended a flock of sheep. What Mo-

6. Tribesman hammed meant was that the shepherd enjoys leisure and solitude for reflection and for plunging into those day dreams out of which prophets are made. If D., like the Arab poet Tarafa, indulged in sport, in music and in poetry, even to the neglect of the office, he need not be disdained as one whose themes were coarse. Indeed, if he had been a shepherd of the poetical tribe he might have been as little chagrined as he learnt that whereas the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, Naphtali, Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulon, Levi, Dan, and even the non-Israelite tribes of Gilead and the debatable land of Gilead could boast of having held the hegemony of Israel and led the nation in battle, his own tribe of Judah had played a quite subordinate part, and was not even mentioned in the national warps. It may be that the poets of these tribes he could boast in his verses only of Ishbok who belonged to his own town of Bethlehem (Jgs 12:8). The Jerahmeelites were no doubt a powerful clan, but neither they nor any other of the subdivisions of Judah had ever done anything for the common good. Indeed, when the twelve pathfinders had been sent in advance into Canaan, Judah had been represented by Caleb, a member of the Umlander tribe of Kenaz (Nu 13:6).

He became adviser, but his advice was not always clear and had so D. might claim kinship with him, and through him with Othniel the first of the judges (Jgs 1:13). D. thus belonged to the least efficient of all the Israelitish tribes except one, and one which, considering its extensive border, had a true poet. For it may not have played a worthy part in the confederacy. It is difficult to believe that the young D. never dreamed of a day when his own tribe should take its true place among its fellows, and when the deliverer of Israel from its oppressors should belong for once to the tribe of Judah.

III. In the Service of Saul.—The earliest events in the career of D. are involved in some obscurity.

This is due mainly to what appears to

1. David be a double difficulty in the 16th and First Meets 17 of 1 S. In ch 16, D. is engaged Saul to play before Saul in order to dispel his melancholy, and becomes his squi or armorer (16:21), whereas in the following chapter he is unknown to Saul, who, after the death of Goliath, asks Abner who he is, and Abner replies that he does not know (17:55). This apparent contradiction may be accounted for by the following considerations: (a) 16:14-23 may be inserted out of its chronological order for the sake of the contrast with the sequel, and the slaying of Goliath, and the presentation of JHVH came mightily upon D. from that day forward . . . . the spirit of JHVH departed from Saul" (16:13-14); (b) the fact of D. becoming Saul's squire does not imply constant personal attendance upon him; the text says D. became an (not his) armor-bearer to Saul. The king would have many such squires: Joab, though only commander-in-chief, had, it seems, eighteen (2 S 23 37 reads "armor-bearers"); (c) D. would not play before Saul every day: his presence might not be required for a space of weeks or months; (d) Saul's failure to recognize D. may have been a result of the 'evil spirit from JHVT' and Abner's denial of knowledge may have been feigned out of jealousy. If we accept all the statements of the dramatic persons in these narratives we shall not get very far. The facts seem to have been somewhat as follows: It had become evident that Saul was not equal to the task to which he had been set—

2. His First the task of breaking the Phili power, Exploit and it became the duty of Samuel, as the vicar of Jeh and as still holding very large powers, to look about for a successor. He turned to the tribe of Judah (the full brother of his own ancestor Levi), a tribe which was fast becoming the most powerful member of the federation. The headman of this clan was Jesse of Bethlehem. His name was well known in the country—Saul does not require to be told who he is (1 S 16 18; 17 58)—but he was by this time advanced in years (17 12). He had been the only one of the Davidic line in the East who often foretold a great future for a young boy (cf Lk 2 34). Samuel saw that D. was formed of other clay than his brothers, and he anointed him as he had done Saul (1 S 10 1). But whereas the anointing of Saul was divine and for a definite purpose which was explained at the time (10 1), that of D. was performed before his whole family, but with what object he was not told (16 13). His brothers do not seem to have thought the matter was serious and for a definite purpose, and any one who could conclude from it was that he was destined to some high office—perhaps that of Samuel's successor (cf 1 K 19 15.16). It would have the effect of serving him for any adventure and raising his hopes high and steeling his courage. Whether by accident or by contrivance he became attached to Saul as minstrel (cf 2 K 3 15) and subsequently as one of his armor-bearers. He would probably be at this time about twenty years of age. It must have been after a few years of service that an event happened which made it impossible for Saul ever again to forget the existence of D. This was the famous duel between D. and the Phili Goliath, which saved the situation for Saul for the time (ch 17). In regard to the duel itself it was that Saul and David were not set (12-31.41.50.55-58 and the first five verses of ch 18 are wanting in the best MS of the LXX, that is, the sending of D. from Bethlehem and his fresh introduction to Saul and Saul's failure to recognize him are left out. With the omission of these verses all the difficulties of the narrative vanish. For the reason why D. could not wear the armor offered him was not because he was still a child, which is absurd in view of the fact that Saul was exceptionally tall (1 S 17), but because he had had no practice with it (17 39). It is ridiculous to suppose that D. was not at this time full-grown, and that two armies stood by while a child advanced to engage a giant. The event gained for D. the reputation won in modern times at the cannon's mouth, but also the devoted friendship of Jonathan and the enmity of Saul (1 S 13 1-9).

The next years of D.'s life were spent in the service of Saul in his wars with the Phili. D.'s success and Saul's fear that he might be becoming a gratifyingly only inflamed the jealousy of the latter, and he determined to put D. out of the way. More than once he attempted to do so with his own hand (15 11; 19 10), but he also employed stratagem. It came to his ears that his daughter Michal, as well as his son Jonathan, loved D., and Saul undertook to give her to D. on condition of his killing a hundred Philis. The gruesome dowry was paid, and D. became Saul's son-in-law. The

3. Envoy of Saul and Flight of David Heb text states that Saul first offered his elder daughter to D., and then failed to implement his promise (18 17-19.21b), but this passage is not found in the Gr. D.'s relation to Saul did not mitigate the hatred of the latter; indeed his enmity became so bitter that D. determined upon flight. With the help of some staging on the part of Michal, this was effectuated and D. betook himself to Samuel at Ramah for counsel and advice (19 18). Thither Saul pursued him, but when he came into the presence of the prophet his courage failed and he was overcome by the contagion of the prophetic ecstasy (19 24) as he had been on a previous occasion (10 11). D. returned to Gibeah, while the coast was clear, to meet Jonathan, but Saul also returned immediately, his hatred more intense than before. D. then continued his flight and came to Ahimelech the priest at Nob (21 1). It is sometimes supposed that we have here two inconsistent accounts of D.'s flight, according to one of which he fled to Samuel at Ramah, and according to the other to Ahimelech at Nob; but this theory may be safely rejected. D. must have made sure that D. would not return is shown by the fact that he gave his daughter Michal to a man of the tribe of Benjamin as wife (26 44).

The relation existing between Jonathan and David was one of the most intimate (15 1-3); it was also the reason why it should not be so. A heredi-

4. Jonathan tary monarchy did not yet exist in and David Israel. The only previous attempt to establish such an institution—that of Gideon's family (Jgs 9)—though not of Gideon himself (8 23)—had ended in failure. The principle followed hitherto had been that of election by the shekhs or caids of the clans. To this Saul owed his position, for the lot was a kind of ballot. Moreover, behind this event there seems to have been power of the prophets, the representatives of Jeh. Saul was indebted for his election to Samuel, just as Barak was to Deborah (Jgs 4 6). Like the judges who preceded him he had been put forward to meet a desperate situation. That is the rise of the prophetic power (9 16). Had he succeeded in crushing these invaders, the newly established kingdom would in the absence of this bond of union have dissolved again into its elements, as had happened on every similar occasion before. He was the only judge who had failed to accomplish the task for which he was appointed, and he was the only one who had been appointed on the understanding that his son should succeed him, for this constituted the tradition between the king and the prophet. Moreover, not only was Saul aware that he had failed, but he saw before him the man who was ready to step into his place and succeed. His rival had, besides, the backing of the mass of the people and of Samuel who was still virtual head of the state and last court of appeal. It is not to be wondered at that Saul was hostile to D. Jonathan, on the other hand, acquainted in the turn things had taken and bowed to what D. believed to be the inevitable. Much was his love for D. that he would, instead of being vaezer (vizier) when D. came to the throne (1 S 23 17). D.'s position was perhaps the most difficult imagi- nable. He had to fight the battles of a king whose one idea was to bring about his ruin. He was thebeson friend of a prince whom he proposed to supplant in his inheritance. His hope of salvation lay in the death of his king, the father of his wife and of his best friend. The situation would in ordinary circumstances be intolerable, and it would have been impossible but for the fact that those concerned were obsessed by a profound belief in Fate. Jonathan bore no grudge against D. For aiming at the throne because to the throne he was destined by the will of Jeh. To D. it would never occur that he had the choice of declining the high destiny in store for him. Had he had the power to refuse what he believed to be the decrees of Fate, he would hardly escape censure for his ambition and disloyalty.

IV. David in Exile.—From the moment of his flight D. became an outlaw and remained so until the death of Saul. This period of his career is full of stirring adventures and he made no move to seek the protection of his countrymen. As an outlaw he now had more security than ever before. He became chief of a band of outlaws who numbered about 400. Of such stuff some of his bravest soldiers were made (2 S 23 12 ff.). He had an augur, too, to direct his actions, and, after the massacre of Nob, a priest of Philiot, carrying an ephod with which to cast lots (1 S 25 8; 23 6). During this period he supported himself and his men by making raids on the Philistines and levying blackmail on his own countrymen (2 S 21), in return for giving them protection from the Philistines (1 S 21). Hardly pressed between Saul and the Philistines (who had established themselves even in Bethlehem) he committed his parents to the keeping of the king of Gath, and months afterward the conspiracy (25 15–25; 26). On two occasions D. had Saul in his power, but refused to seize the opportunity of taking his life (24–26). Here again there are no adequate grounds for supposing we have Saul's death in view. For the same incident. During his wandering D.'s followers increased in numbers (2 S 2; 23 13; 25 13). His chief lieutenant was his nephew Abishai, the son of his sister Zeruiah, but his brothers Joab and Asahel do not seem to have joined D. yet. Another of his nephews, Jonathan, the son of Shimeon (Shammah), is mentioned (2 S 21 1 of 1 S 16 9) and the Chronicler thinks many other kindred joined him during this period (1 Ch 11 10 ff.). The position of D. at this time was very similar to that of the brigand Rajaui of late in Morea. That there was some stability in it is shown by his taking two wives at this time—Ahinoam and Abigail (1 S 25 42; 43). D. now, abandoning all hope of ever consolidating the king (1 S 27 1), made a move which shows at once his reckless daring and consummate genius. He offered the services of himself and his little army of 600 men to the enemies of his country.

2. David Joins the Philistines

The town of Gath appears to have been an asylum for the outlaws of all Israel. The first impulse on his flight from Saul had been to seek safety there (1 S 21 10–15). Then, however, he was the hero of Israel, whose assassination would be the highest gain to the Philist; now he was the embittered antagonist of Saul, and was welcomed accordingly. Achish placed at his disposal the fortified town of Ziklag in the territory of the now extinct tribe of Simeon, and there he and his followers, each of whom had his family with him, took up their quarters for sixteen months (27 6–7). The advantage to D. wore many. He was safe at last from the persecution of Saul (27 4); he could secure ample supplies by making raids upon the Amalekites and other tribes hostile to Israel toward the S. (27 8); and if the opportunity presented itself he could deal a serious blow to Saul's army, which was in no wise a guaranty of the Amalekites (30 1, 2). By this time he had recovered the spoil and returned in triumph to Ziklag the battle of Gilboa had been fought and Saul was slain. The conduct of D. toward his relations was far more reprehensible than that of the Cid who allied himself with Al-Mu'taman of Saragossa, or of Coriolanus who went over to the Volsci. D. composed upon the death of Saul and Jonathan an elegy over their fallen houses which has been widely quoted.

V. David as King.—D. immediately removed from Ziklag and took up his quarters at Hebron, where he was at once anointed king over his own tribe of Judah. Thus began the cleavage between Judah and Israel. The presence of Saul at Nob, a priest of Philiot, carrying an ephod with which to cast lots (1 S 25 8; 23 6). During this period he supported himself and his men by making raids on the Philistines and levying blackmail on his own countrymen (2 S 21), in return for giving them protection from the Philistines (1 S 21). In his new position D. left Saul alone in the center of a wild and now archaic world which had long been the envy of the civilized nations of his day. The kingdom of Judah was an anachronism. Its neighbors were all in a state of turmoil and decline. Egypt and Syria, the two great powers of the time, were involved in a prolonged conflict. The West was dominated by the Medes, whose gradual advance was made possible by the decay of the Babylonian empire. The East was in the hands of the Chaldeans, who had already begun to threaten the Persian empire. The only power that could claim to be the center of the world was the Roman empire, but even it was far removed from the scene of action. D. was therefore able to carry on his work with relative freedom. He was able to build up a kingdom that was destined to become one of the most powerful in the world. He was a man of great natural talent and a great leader. He was also a man of great personal courage. He was able to inspire his followers with a sense of purpose and a sense of possibility. He was able to overcome all obstacles and to achieve his aims. He was able to build up a kingdom that was destined to become one of the most powerful in the world. 6.8), a post which he held as long as D. lived. The materials and the skilled workmen for the erection of the palace were supplied by Hiram of Tyre (2 S S 11). D. now turned his attention to the surrounding tribes. The most formidable enemy, the Philis, were worsted in several campaigns, and their power crippled (2 S S 17ff; 8 1). In one of these D. so nearly came by his death, that his people would not afterward permit him to take part in the fighting (21 16-17). One of the first countries against which D. turned his arm was the land of Maob, which he treated with a severity which would suggest that the Moabite king had ill-treated D.'s father and mother, who had taken refuge with him (8 2). Yet his conduct toward the B'nah 'Ammon was even more cruel (12 31), and for a less cause (10 11 ff). The king of Zobah (Chalkis) was defeated (8 3), and Israelite garrisons were placed in Syria of Damascus (8 6) and Edom (8 14). The B'nah 'Ammon formed a league with the Syrian kingdoms to the N. and E. of Pal (10 6-16), but these also had no success. All these people became tributary to the kingdom of Israel under D. (10 18-19) except the B'nah 'Ammon who remained actually exterminated for the time being (12 31). The Israelites conducted the fighting of the "great powers" of the world during the reign of D. and his immediate successor.

There is no doubt that the expansion of the boundaries of Israel at this period almost to their ideal limit was largely due to D.'s policy.

3. Political to the fact that the two great empires, Egypt and Assyria, were at the moment passing through a period of weakness and decay. The Assyrian monarchy was weakened during the 3rd century B.C. and the 221 Dynasty—by which Shishak belonged (1 K 14 25)—had not yet arisen. D., therefore, had a free hand when his time came and found no more formidable opposition than that of the petty states bordering upon Pal. Against the combined forces of all the Israelitic tribes these had never been able to effect much.

It had been the custom of the Israelites on setting out on expeditions in which the nation as a whole took part to carry with them the sacred ark.

4. The Ark, this box or "ark" which contained the two stone tablets (Josh 4 7, etc.). When D. had secured the fortress of Jebus for his metropolis he was anxious to give it a more permanent setting. The ceremony was conducted with military honors (2 S S 6 1) and with religious dancing and music (6 5; 14) and festivity (6 18-19). A tent was pitched for it, in which it remained (7 2), except when it was sent with the army to the seat of war (11 1ff), or when D. himself, or had already built for himself a stone palace, and he wished now to add to it a chapel royal in the shape of a small temple, such as the neighboring kings had. He was the more anxious to do so as he had much of the material ready to hand in the precious metals with which he had furnished the most valuable part of the spoil of the conquered races, such as bronze from Chalkis (8 8), gold and silver (8 11) and the vessels which he had received as a present from the king of Hamath (8 10). He was persuaded, however, by the prophet Nathan to forego that task, on the ground of his having shed much human blood, and to leave it to his successor (1 Ch 22 8; 28 3).

VI. Domestic Life.—In accordance with the practice of the kings of his time D. had several wives. His first was the younger daughter of Saul. When D. Wives and Children died, she was given to Phal- The killed, but was restored to D. after Saul's death. She does not appear to have borne any children. In the 22 8 "Michal" should be Merab (1 S 15 19). During the period of separation from Michal, D. took to wife Ahinoam of Jezreel and Abigail the wife of Nabal (1 S 25 43-42), who accompanied him to Ziklag (27 3ff), when they were among those captured by the Amalekites (21 16). D. married the daughter of Talmai of Geshur, Maacah, whom he had captured in war (27 8; 2 S 3 3). When he removed to Hebron Ahinoam bore him his eldest son Amnon, and Abigail his second son Chileb or Daniel (2 S 3 3; 1 Ch 3 1). D.'s sons did not largely due to the fact of Solomon being dead and Chileb apparently of no account.

2. Domestic most unvarnished account of these troubles given in 2 S 11-20—it has been suggested by Abiathar the priest in order to avenge himself on Solomon for his disgrace (1 K 2 25; 1 Ch 20 27). Solomon's mother Bathsheba (2 S 11, 12). Ch. 13 recounts the wrong done to Tamar, the daughter of D. and Maacah, and sister of Absalom, and how the last named, having avenged his sister's honor by killing Amnon, his eldest brother, fled to the court of the king of Geshur. Thence after two years he returned (ch 14), only to foment rebellion against his father (ch 15), leading to civil war between D. and Judah on the one side and Absalom and Israel on the other (ch 16). Absalom, in the absence of his eldest brother, endeavored to make himself (ch 18) and of Amasa, D.'s nephew, at the hands of his cousins Joab and Abishai (30 7ff), as well as nearly precipitating the disruption of the newly founded kingdom (19 43). The rebellion of Absalom was probably due to the fact of Solomon not having been designated D.'s successor (cf 12 24; 1 Ch 22 9), for Absalom had the best claim, Amnon being dead and Chileb apparently of no account.

VII. His Officials.—As D.'s circumstances improved he removed some of the officials of his affairs. The beginning of his

1. Prophets good fortune had been the friendship of the prophet Samuel (1 S 16 13; 19 18). The prophet or seer was keeper of the king's conscience and was not appointed by him, but claimed Divine authority (2 S 7 3ff; 12 1ff; 24 11ff). Among the persons who discharged this duty for D. were Gad the seer (1 S 22 5) and Nathan the prophet (1 K 1 11ff). All these are said to have written memoirs of their times (1 Ch 29 20; 2 Ch 9 20).

Next to the prophet came the priest. The kohen (priest) was, as the name indicates, a soothsayer or diviner. The duty of Abiathar, 2. Priests D. first priest (1 S 22 20ff), was to carry the ephod—and objects casting lots (23 6ff), in order to decide what to do in cases where there was no other way of making up one's mind (30. 7). It is not to be confused with the dress of the same name (1 S 2 18). Later, at Hebron, Abiathar was given a colleague, Zadok (1 Ch 12 28), and it became their duty to carry the ark of God and the book of the law (Ezr 3 2), Shortly after the death of D., Abiathar was deposed by Solomon for his part in Adonijah's attempt to seize the throne (1 K 2 26-27), and Zadok remained sole priest to the king (2 35). D.'s sons also acted in the same capacity (2 18). An extra private priest is mentioned in 2 S 20 26 (cf 23 26-38).

When still an outlaw D. required the services of a henchman to take command of his men in his absence. This post was held at first by different persons according to circumstances, but generally, it seems, by his nephew Abishai (1 S 26 6).

It was only after the death of Saul that his brother Joab threw in his lot with D. His great military talents at once gave him a leading place, and as a reward for the capture of Jebus he was given the chief command, which he held against all rivals (2 S 3 27; 20 10) during the whole reign. D.'s special body-guard of Phi's troops—the Cherethites and Pelethites—were commanded by Benaiah, who in his turn succeeded D. (2 S 3 35; 18). The office of recorder or magister memoriae was held during this reign and in the following by Jehoshaphat (2 S 8 16); and that of secretary by Serahiah (2 S 8 17), also called Shaphan (1 K 4 3). There were also the counsellors, men noted for their great acumen and knowledge of human nature, such as Ahithophel and Hushai.

It was natural that there should be much mutual jealousy and rivalry among these officials, and that of some of them should attach themselves to one of D.'s many sons, others to another. Thus Amnon is the special patron of D.'s nephew Jonadab (2 S 13 3; cf 21 21), and Absalom is backed by Amasa (17 25). The claim of Adonijah to the throne is supported by Joab and Abiathar (1 K 1 7), as against, that of Solomon who was backed by Nathan, Benaiah, and Zadok (1 K 1 18).

4. Other Officials. Rivalry to another. Thus Amnon is the special patron of D.'s nephew Jonadab (2 S 13 3; cf 21 21), and Absalom is backed by Amasa (17 25). The claim of Adonijah to the throne is supported by Joab and Abiathar (1 K 1 7), as against, that of Solomon who was backed by Nathan, Benaiah, and Zadok (1 K 1 18).

5. Mutual rivalry. We should obtain a very different idea of the personal character of D. as we drew our conclusions from the books of S and K or from the books of Ch. There is no doubt whatever that the former books are much more to the fact, and any estimate or appreciation of D. or of any of the other characters described must be based upon them. The Chronicler, on the other hand, is biased by the religious ideas of his own time and is prejudiced in favor of some of those whose biographies he writes and against others. He accordingly supplements the facts of D.'s life, e.g. the murder of Uriah (1 Ch 20), or sets them in a favorable light, e.g. by laying the blame of the census upon Satan (1 Ch 21 1). D.'s success, esp. as against Saul's misfortune, is greatly exaggerated (12 22). Ceremonial functions are greatly elaborated (ch 16; cf 2 S 6). The various orders of priests and singers in the second temple have their origin traced back to D. (16 4 ff; 2 chs 25-27), and the temple of Solomon itself is held to be an imitation of D.'s temple of Zadok (ch 22 22). At the same time there may be much material in the shape of names and isolated statements not found in the older books, which so long as they are not tinged with the Chronicler's pragmatism or "tendency," may possibly be authentic records preserved within the circle of the priestly caste, e.g. we are told that Saul's skull was fastened in the temple of Dagon (1 Ch 10 10). There is no doubt that the true names of Ish-bosheth, Mephibosheth and Eliada (2 S 2 8; 4 4; 5 16) were Ish-baal (Esh-baal), Merib-baal and Geb (cf 1 K 2 14 7); that the old name of Jerusalem was Jebus (11 45; cf Jgs 19 10,11); perhaps a son of D. called Nogah has to be added to 2 S 8 15 from 1 Ch 3 7; 14 6; in 2 S 8 and 21 18, for Beath and Geb read Tehanah and Geh; cf 1 Ch 19 22; 24: 1 Ch 20 4). The incident recounted in 2 S 23 9 ff happened at Pasdammim (1 Ch 11 13). Shammah the Harodite was the son of Eljia (2 S 23 25; cf 1 Ch 11 27), and other names in this list have to be corrected after the readings of the Chronicler. Three (or seven) years of famine was the alternative offered to D. (2 S 24 13; cf 1 Ch 21 12).

If we could believe that the Book of Ps was in whole or in part the work of D., it would throw a flood of light upon the religious side of his nature.

2. Psalms. Indeed, we should know as much about his private life as anyone. Unfortunately the date and authorship of the Ps are questions regarding which we have no certain opinions. In the early Christian centuries all the Ps were ascribed to D. and, where necessary, explained as protests, e.g. as the psalm which speaks of the Book of Ps simply as "David" (4 7). The text, however, of these books is the same as that of the poems to D., and the Hebrew only 73. Some of these are not D.'s, and in the whole book there is only one which professes from its contents to be his, namely, Ps 13 (1=2 S 22). The occasion on which a psalm was composed is stated only once (18), while many are ascribed to D. Each of these is referred to some incident recorded in the books of S; although sometimes the citation is erroneous (see Psalms). The Psalms supplies occasions to two or three more psalms: but all such statements are merely the conjectures of readers and scribes and are of no historical value.

To form a correct opinion of anyone is much more difficult than to state the facts of his life; to form an opinion which will be generally accepted is impossible. Of D.'s character the most opposite estimates have been formed. On one hand he is exulted as a saint, and yet few men have committed worse crimes. The character of D. must remain, like that of everyone, an insoluble enigma. A person is to be judged first by his actions, and one's true motives are unknown even to oneself (Jer 17 9). There are several sides of D.'s nature in regard to which there cannot be two opinions.

Perhaps the feature of his character which stands out most prominently in his earlier years, at any rate, is his boundless physical courage.

4. Physical. He never shirked danger (1 S 17 28). Courage (34 7) and delight in hard-earned escapes (36 6). Like most Semites he was fond of gambling and liked to take risks (18 26; cf 23 9; 30 7), even when modesty would have led him to decline them (17 32; cf Jgs 8 20). A native indifference to the shedding of blood grew into a liking for it, giving rise (as in the case of Goliath (1 S 27 9; 2 S 8 2; 16 7, etc.). He had need, indeed, to be a brave man, considering the character of the men whom he ruled (1 S 22 2). Yet he could rule them by gentleness as well as by force (30 25). All classes had unbounded confidence in his personal courage and soldierly qualities (2 S 18 3), and were themselves driven to restrain his military ardor (21 17).

Whether D. possessed moral courage to an equal degree is another matter. Had he done so he would hardly have permitted the execution of seven sons of Saul (2 S 21 1 ff), Courage and that, too, at the cost of breaking his pledged word (1 S 24 21); he would not have stood in awe of the sons of his sister Zeruiah (2 Sam. 3:39), and would have punished Joab instead of weakly invoking an imprecation on his head (ver. 30), however much he might have felt the loss of his services. But it makes no matter to his natural sense of justice was blunted by the superstitions of the age in which he lived.

But D. was even more prudent than courageous. He is so described by the persons who recommended him (sophologically) to Saul.

6. Prudence (1 Sam. 16:18). Prudence or wisdom was indeed what his biographer most remarks in him (16:5,30), and situated as he was he could not have too much of it. It shows itself in the fact that he consistently made as many friends as and as few enemies as was possible. His wonderful foresight is shown in such acts as his conciliating the Judean chiefs with gifts taken from his spoil (30:26 ff.), in his commendation of the men of Jabesh-gilead (2 Sam. 2:12), and above all in the way by which he obtained introduction or re-introduction to Saul (1 Sam. 17:26 ff) afford some justification for the opinion which his eldest brother held of him (ver. 28).

With the constant looking forward to the future is away from the spontaneity of his virtue. His greatness is often a keen sense of favors to come. His kind-ness to his men resides in his prudence. He did spare advantage (ch. 9:19,24 ff.), and his clemency to Shimei helped to win him the tribe of Benjamin (19:16 ff.). Even in his earliest youth he seems to have preferred to attain his ends by roundabout ways, and by which he obtained introduction or re-introduction to Saul (1 Sam. 17:26 ff) afford some justification for the opinion which his eldest brother held of him (ver. 28).

For his advantage in the future, D. did not look on the past as contrasted with the dwellings of the peasantry and the farmer class (19:28,35), but his palace was always small and plain, so that it could be left to the keeping of ten women when he removed from it (16:16).

low as to fear losing the good opinion even of Joab, this ready instrument of his worst crime (11:25).

One reason for the high position D. held in the popular estimation was no doubt his almost uninterrupted success. He was regarded as the chosen of Heaven, by friend and foe alike (1 S 33 17; fortune 2; to favor him). Nothing could have been more timely than the death of Saul and Jonathan, of Ishbaal and Abner, of Absalom and Amasa, and he did not raise his hand against one of them. As a sequel to this brief history of his position (1 S 24 2; 26 2), he was not a great general. Most of the old judges of Israel did in one pitched battle what D. effected in a campaign (1 S 18 30; 19 8; 26 1 ff; 2 S 5 17 ff; 21 15 ff). Most of his conquests were won for him by Joab (1 Ch 11 6; 2 S 11 1), who willingly accorded D. the credit of what he himself had done (2 S 12 27 28; 2 S 8 13; 1 Ch 18 11 with the title of Ps 60). And to crown all, when he came to turn his arms east and west, he found his two most formidable opponents in these directions crippled and harmless. That he ever survived Saul he owed to a timely incursion of the Philis (1 S 23 24 ff), and his whole career is largely to be explained by the fact that at the moment, the tribe of Judah as a whole was passing from insignificance to supremacy.

In the prosecution of his military achievements D. employed everyone who came to his hand as an instrument without any question of nationality. This is not to impugn his patriotism. Eastern peoples are united not by the ties of country but of religion. Still it does seem strange that two of D.'s closest friends were two enemies of his nation—Nahash, king of the Ben Ammon (1 S 11 1; 2 S 10 1 ff) and Achish, lord of Gath (1 S 21 10; 27; 28 1 ff; 29). He appears to have found the Philis more reliable and trustworthy than the Hebrews. When he became king his personal body-guard was composed of mercenaries of that nation—the Cherethites and Peletithes—with whom he had become acquainted when at Ziklag (1 S 30 14; 2 S 8 18; 20 25). It was to be a native of Gath that the care of the sacred ark on its passage from Kiriaith-jeirm to Jerus (2 S 6 10 11). When the rebellion broke out under Absalom, he committed one-third of his forces to a banished soldier of the same town, who had come to him a little while before as head of followers (2 S 16 19 ff; 18 2). Some of the soldiers in whom he placed the greatest confidence were Hitites (1 S 26 6; 2 S 11 6), and his commissariat was furnished by persons outside of Israel (2 S 17 27; the Machir tribe were half Syrian; Gilead is the son of Machir, 1 Ch 7 14). The threshing-floor of a Jebusite became the site of the temple of Solomon (2 S 24 18 ff).

D. was a strong believer in the power of Nemesis, and that daughter of Night played a considerable part in his life. He felt a lurid satisfaction in being undeservedly cursed by Shimeil, in a conviction that poetic justice would in the end prevail (2 S 16 12). He must have felt that the same unseen power was at work when his own eldest son was guilty of a crime such as his father had committed before him (2 S 13 11), and when the grandfather of the wife of Uriah the Hititte became the enemy whom he had most to fear (2 S 11 13; 24; of whom Amnon, D.'s own son, was the child. He spent instead of being spent in repose and peace following upon a strenuous and successful life, were passed in meting out vengeance to those who had incurred his displeasure as well as commending those who had done him service (1 K 2 5 ff).

Even as early as Ezechiel D. became the ruler who was to govern the restored people of Israel (34 23; 24; 37 24). If there were to be a ruling house it must be the Davidic dynasty; it did not occur to the Jews of the NT to think of any other solution (Am 9 15; Hos 3 5; Jer 12 8). That Jesus was descended from D. (Mt 1 27, etc) is proved by the fact that his enemies did not deny that he was so (22 41 ff). In the NT, D. is regarded as the author of the Ps (Acts 4 25; Rom 4 6; He 4 7) and as one of the OT saints (He 11 32) whose actions (unless otherwise stated) are to be imitated (Mt 12 3); but yet not to be compared with the Messiah (Acts 2 29 ff; 13 36) who has power over the life to come (Rev 5 7) and who is "the Root of David" (6 5; 22 16).

DAVID, ROOT, root, OF (חָ רָ ה, hê rha David, Rev 5 5; 22 16) Root here means stock, family, descendant, hence 'the Root of David' is that which descended from David, and is that from which David descended. Jesus Christ in His human nature and family connections was a descendant of David, a member of his family.

DAWN, dön, DAWNING: The word means the approach of the morning light, the breaking of the day. There are several words in the Bible that indicate this: nehash, "twilight" of the morning (Job 7 4; Ps 127 4). The same word is used for evening twilight (1 S 30 17; 2 K 5 7, 8), נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "the turning" of the morning, the change from darkness to light, approach of the morning (Jgs 19 26); נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "the eyelids" of the morning (Job 3 9; 41 18 [100]; נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "dôth ha-shahar, the "ascent" or "rise" of the morning (Josh 6 15); נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "to grow white," the approach of the dawn (Mt 28 1; Lk 23 54); נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "to grow bright," the approach of the day (Ps 90 3); נַעַשׂ נָהָשׂ, "until the day dawn"; fig. of the Second Coming of Christ (cf ver 16). DAY, da, דַּעַ, yom; ħêpâq, hâmənē̂r: This common word has caused some trouble to plain readers, because they have not noticed that the word is used in several different senses in the Eng. Bible. When the different uses of the word are understood the difficulty of interpretation vanishes. We note several different uses of the word:

(1) It sometimes means the time from daylight till dark. This popular meaning is easily discovered by the context, e.g. Gen 1 5; 8 22, etc. The marked periods of this daytime were morning, noon and night, with the day ending to night (24); the earth's own day divided into twelve hours, instead of being spent in repose and peace following upon a strenuous and successful life, were passed in meting out vengeance to those who had incurred his displeasure as well as commending those who had done him service (1 K 2 5 ff).

(2) Day also means a period of 24 hours, or the time from sunset to sunset. In Bible usage the day begins with sunset (see Lev 23:32; Ex 12:15–20; 2 Cor 11:25, where night is put before day). See Day and Night.

(3) The word “day” is also used of an indefinite period, “that day,” or “day that” means in general “that time” (see Gen 2:4; Lev 14:2); “day of trouble” (Ps 20:1); “day of his wrath” (Job 20:28); “day of Jehovah” (Isa 2:12); “day of the Lord” (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10); “day of salvation” (2 Cor 6:2); “day of Jesus Christ” (Phil 1:6).

(4) It is used figuratively also in Jn 9:4, where “while it is day” means “while I have opportunity to work, as daytime is the time for work.” In 1 Thess 5:5,8, “sons of the day” means spiritually enlightened ones.

(5) We must also bear in mind that with God time is not reckoned as with us (see Ps 90:4; 2 Pet 3:8).

(6) The apocalyptic use of the word “day” in Dan 12:11; Rev 2:10, etc., is difficult to define. It evidently does not mean a natural day. See Apoc.

(7) On the meaning of “day” in the story of Creation we note (a) the word “day” is used of the whole period of creation (Gen 2:4); (b) these days are divided from one another, each being a thousand years; the whole age or period of salvation is called “the day of salvation”; see above. So we believe that in harmony with Bible usage we may understand the creative days as creative periods. See also Astronomy: Creation: Evolution.

Figurative: The word “day” is used figur. in many senses, some of which are here given.

(1) The span of human life.—Gen 5:4: “And the days of Adam were eight hundred years.” “And if thou wilt walk . . . then I will lengthen thy days” (1 K 3:14; cf Ps 90:12; Isa 40:5).

(2) An indefinite time.—Existence in general: Gen 3:14: “All the days of thy life” (cf Gen 21:34; Nu 3:10; Josh 23:3; 1 K 1:24; Acts 21:10).

(3) A set time.—Gen 25:24: “And when her days were fulfilled”; Dn 12:13: “Thou shalt stand in thy lot, at the end of the days” (cf Lev 12:6; Dn 2:44).

(4) A historical period.—Gen 6:4: “The Nephilim were in the earth those days”; Jgs 17:6: “In those days there was no king in Israel” (cf 1 S 3:1; 1 Ch 5:17; Hos 2:13).

(5) Past time.—Ps 15:8: “the day of my calling.” Ps 78:5: “I have considered the days of old” (cf Mic 7:20; Mal 3:7; Mt 33:30).

(6) Future time.—Dt 31:14: “Thy days approach that thou must die”; Ps 72:7: “In his days shall . . .” (cf Eek 23:14; Joel 2:29; Mt 24:19; 2 Pet 3:3; Rev 9:6).

(7) The eternal.—In Dn 7:9,13, where God is called “the ancient of days.”

(8) A season of opportunity.—Jn 9:4: “We must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh, when no man can work.” (Rom 13:12:13; 1 Thess 5:5–8. See Day (4), above.

(9) Time of salvation.—Specially referring to the hopes and prospects of the parousia (see Eschatology of NT). Rom 13:12: “The night is far spent, and the day is at hand.”

DAY AND NIGHT: “Day.” בָּרָא, yôm; ordinar-ily, the Heb “day” lasted from dawn to the coming forth of the stars (Neh 4:21). The context usually makes it clear whether the term “day” refers to the period of twenty-four hours or to daytime; when there was a possibility of confusion, the term לָיָּבָה, lautâb, “night,” was added (Gen 7:4:12; 31:39). The “day” is reckoned from evening to evening, in accordance with the order noted in the account of Creation, viz. “And there was evening and there was morning, one day” (Gen 1:5); Lev 23:32 and Dn 8:14 reflect the same mode of reckoning the day. The phrase רְמָא בָּרָא, erekh bôêr, “evening-morning,” used in this last passage, is simply a variation of yôm and bôêr, “day” and “night”; it is the equivalent of the Gr ἐρέμος, ἐρευμής, nuxthémon (2 Cor 11:25). That the custom of reckoning the day as beginning in the evening and lasting until the following evening was probably of late origin is shown by the phrase sun (or早上) all night). Jgs 19:19–20, the context shows that the day is regarded as beginning in the morning; in the evening the day “declined,” and until the new day (morning) arrived it was necessary to “tarry all night” (of also Nu 11:22).

The transition of day to night begins before sun- set and lasts till after sunset; the change of night to day begins before sunrise and continues until after sunrise. In both cases, neither erekh, “evening,” nor bôêr, “morning,” indicate an exact space of time (cf Ex 13:11; Ex 10:11; Jer 33:10). The term לָיָּבָה, lautâb, is used for both evening twilight and morning dawn (cf 1 S 10:17; 2 K 7:5; Jb 7:4). As there were no definite measurements of the time of the day, the various periods were indicated by the natural changes of the day; thus “midday” was the time of the day when the sun was highest (לָיָּבָה, lautâb); afternoon was part of the day when the sun declined (לָיָּבָה, lautâb) and evening was the time of going down of the sun (לָיָּבָה, erekh). “Between the evenings” (לָיָּבָה לָיָּבָה, lautâb lautâb; בֵּין הָאָרָבָיִם) was the interval between sunset and darkness. The day was not divided into hours until a late period. לָיָּבָה, shâdîth = Aram. (Dn 3:6), is common in Syr and in later Heb; it denoted, originally, any short space of time, and only later came to be equivalent to our “hour.” (Driver). The threefold division of the day into watches continued into post-exilic Rom times; but the Rom method of four divisions was also known (Mk 13:35), where all four divisions are referred to: at even (שָׁם, ope), midnight (מַשָּׁה, mesonuktion), at cock crowing (אֵלֶּכֶת-פֹּרְשָׁה, alektorophoria), in the morning (שָׁמָּה, shâma), at dawn (סְפַּר, spâr). These last extended from six to six o’clock (cf also Mt 14:25; Mk 13:35; Acts 12:4 speaks of four parts of the night. Rom 13:12 speaks of four parts of the time of night, each of whom had to keep guard during one watch of the night. In Brâkkâth 38, Rabbi Nathan (2nd cent.) knows of only three night-watches; but the patriarch, Rabbi Judah, knows four. See also Day.

DAY BEFORE THE SABBATH (הָסֶבֶט, הֶסְבֶּט), “preparation”): Considered as a day of preparation, in accordance with Ex 16:23, both before the regular Sabbath and before a fast Sabbath (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:44; Jn 19:14–31:42). At 3 PM, the Hebrews began to prepare their food for the next day, and to perform all labors which were forbidden to be done on the Sabbath and yet must be done. They bathed and purified themselves, dressed in festive apparel, set their tables, and lighted their lamps. On the day before Easter, the Hebrews of the later period made it their chief business to remove all leaven from the house (1 Cor 5:7). This custom of converting at least a portion of the day before the Sabbath into a holy day was recognized by the Romans to such an extent that, according to a rescript of Augustus, Jews need not appear in court after 3 PM on such days. Criminal cases were not brought before court on this day, and journeys exceeding 12 Rom miles were prohibited. The signal for the preparations was given by the priests by means of trumpets blown six times at intervals.

DAY, LAST (ἡ ἐσχάδα, hē eskháda hēméra): Repeatedly used by Jesus in Jn (6 39; 40; 44; 54; 11 24; 12 48) for the day of resurrection and judgment (see Eschatology of the NT). Cf. the usage in the OT (Isa 2 2; Mic 4 1) and the NT (Acts 2 17; 2 Tim 3 1; 2 Pet 3 3; 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18) of "last days" and "last time" to denote the Messianic age. See Latter Days; Last Days; Last Time.

In Jn 7 37, "the last day, the great day of the feast" refers to the eighth day of the feast of Tabernacles. This closing day was observed as a Sabbath (Lev 23 36). On it the libation of water made on other days was not made; hence the allusion of Jesus to Himself as the Giver of the living water.

DAY OF THE LORD (JEHOVAH) (ἡμέρα τοῦ Κυρίου, hēmēra tou Kurious): The idea is a common OT one. It denotes the consummation of the kingdom of God and the absolute cessation of all attacks upon it (Isa 2 12; 13 6 9; 34 8; Ezk 13 5; 30 3; Joel 1 15; 2 11; Am 6 15; Zeph 1 14; Zee 3 1). It is a "day of visitation" (Jo 10 3), a day "of the wrath of Jeh" (Ezk 7 19), a "great day of Jeh" (Zeph 1 14). The entire conception in the OT is dark and foreboding.

On the other hand the NT idea is pervaded with the elements of hope and joy and victory. In the NT it is eminently the day of Christ, the day of His coming in the glory of His Father. Very conception of Him as the "Son of Man" points to this day (E. Kuehl, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 68). Jn 5 27: "And he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater works than these shall he do; for whatsoever he asketh of the Father in my name, he shall give him" (cf Mt 24 27 30; Lk 12 8). It is true in the NT there is a dark background to the bright picture, for it still remains a "day of wrath" (Rom 2 5 6; a "great day" (Rev 6 17; Jude ver 6), a "day of God" (2 Pet 3 12), a "day of judgment" (Mt 10 15; 2 Pet 3 7; Rom 2 16). Sometimes it is called "that day" (Mt 7 22; 1 Thess 5 4; 2 Tim 4 8), and again it is called "the day" without any qualification, as if it were the only day worth counting in all the history of the world and of the race (1 Cor 3 13). To the unbeliever, the NT depicts it as a day of terror; to the believer, as a day of joy. For on that day Christ will raise the dead, esp. his own dead, the bodies of those that believed in Him—"that day all that which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day" (Jn 6 39). In that day He comes to His own (Mt 16 27), and therefore it is called "the day of our Lord Jesus" (2 Cor 1 14), "the day of Jesus Christ" or "of Christ" (Phil 1 6 10), the day when there "shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven" (Mt 24 30). All Paulinick lit. is esp. suffused with this longing for the "parousia," the day of Christ's glorious manifestation. The entire conception of that day centers therefore in Christ and points to the everlasting establishment of the kingdom of heaven, from which sin will be forever eliminated, and in which the antithesis between Nature and grace will be changed into an everlasting synthesis. DAYS JOURNEY, יָוֹם (yom), derekh yom, Gen 30 36; Nu 10 33; 11 31; ἡμέρας, hēmēras hodos, Lk 2 44): The common way of estimating distances in the East is by hours and days. This is natural in a country where roads are mere bridle paths or non-existent, as in the desert. The distance traveled must of course differ largely according to the difficulties of the way, and it is more important to know where night will overtake the traveler than the actual distance accomplished. A day's journey is now commonly reckoned at about 3 miles per hour, the distance usually covered by a loaded mule, the number of hours being about 8. Hence a day's journey is about 24 miles, and this may be taken as a fair estimate for Bible times.

DAYS, LAST. See Last Days.

DAYSMAN, דָּם (dam), yadahkim, "to argue, decide, convince," RV UMPIRE: The use of this word appears to have been more common in the 16th cent. than at the later date of the tr of AV, when its adoption was infrequent. The oldest instance of the term given in the Oxford English Dictionary is Plumptre Corresp. (1889), p. 82: "Sir, the daysmen cannot agree us." It appears also in the 1551 text of the OT in 1 2 25, where the AV reads "is third daysman." Tindale's tr has for Ex 21 22, "He shall paye as the daysmen appointye him" (EV as the "judges determine"). See also Edmund Spenser's Faerie Queene, ii, 6, 8, published in 1590. As used in AV (Job 9 38) the word means an arbitrator, umpire, referee; one who stands in a judicial capacity between two parties, and decides upon the merits of their arguments or case at law. "Neither is there any daysman (RV 'umpire') betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon the mouth of either of us" (Gen 31 37). It was the eastern custom for a judge to lay his hands upon the heads of the two parties in disagreement, thus emphasizing his adjudicatory capacity and his desire to render an unbiased verdict. Job might consider a human being capable of acting as an umpire upon his own claims, but no man was worthy to question the purposes of Jeh, or metaphorically, to "lay his hands upon" Him.

In the NT (1 Cor 4 5, ἀρбитροί, anthrōpōi, ἡμέρας, hēmēra) "man's judgment" is lit. "man's day," in the sense of a day fixed for the trial of a case. Both Tindale and Coverdale so translate. See also 1 Tim 2 25, where the Saviour is termed the "one mediator between God and men." Here the word understands a pleader, an advocate before an umpire, rather than the adjudicator himself (see Job 19 25 27).

DAYSpring, דָּם (dayspring): This beautiful Eng. word, in current use, the time of the AV, is found in the OT as the tr of "יָוֹם (yom), shahar," "Hast thou caused the dayspring to know his place?" (Job 38 12 AV). This is no doubt intended lit. for the dawn. The "place" of the dayspring is the particular point of the horizon at which the sun comes up on any given day. This slowly changes day by day through the year, moving northward from midwinter till midsummer, and back again southward from midsummer to midwinter. See Astronomy, I, 2. Also once in the NT for ἀνατολή, anakotē, "a rising."
The dayspring from on high hath visited us" (AV); RV "shall visit us," Lk 1:78. Also in Apost., "At the dayspring pray unto him" (Heb 1:6). RV "plead with him at the dawning of the light," Wis 16:28.

Both the Heb and Gr words, however, are of frequent occurrence, but variously rendered, "dawn," "break of day," "morning," "sunrise," "east." Note, e.g., "the spring of the morning" (1 S 9:26), "the day began to spring" (Jgs 19:25). Used with "helios," "sun," for rising of the sun (Rev 7:2; 16:12).

In LXX the same Gr word is used for Heb שָׂאָל, "branch," to designate the Messiah (Jer 23:5; Zec 6:12). But this sense of the word is why it is unknown in profane Gr. The word is also employed in LXX to express the rising of a heavenly body, as the moon (Isa 60:19). This is good Gr.

What is the meaning of anatolē in Lk 1:78? Certainly not branch; that does not fit any of the facts, unless it be rendered "branch of light" (see Reynolds, John the Baptist, 115). It occurs in Zacharias' hymn over the birth of his son. The Gr. ode consists of two parts, "The glorious appearing of the Messiah's kingdom," and "The glory of the Forerunner." The expression before us is in the latter part. It naturally refers, therefore, not to the Messiah himself but to John. He is the dayspring from on high who hath visited the poor (Rev 22:16) in darkness and the shadow of death. With Godet we believe that the word is borrowed from the caravan which has missed its way in the desert. The unfortuned pilgrims, overtaken by the night, are sitting down expecting death, when suddenly a star brightly beams above them. They take courage at the sight. The whole caravan leaps to its feet. It is the herald of the coming day and soon they see the great orb himself filling the east with orient pearl and gold. Is not one tempted to go a little farther and see here the morning star, herald of the coming sun to be obliterated by his rising? "He must wax, but I must wane" (Jn 3:30).

What was John's work but, by his own testimony, to guide the benighted pilgrims into the way of peace, that is, to Him who was the Prince of Peace? If, however, as by most commentators, it be taken to refer to the Messiah, it probably implies prophetic knowledge that the great work of Jewish Christianity, which had already taken place, and that the Messianic era was at hand, when the Jewish world should be filled with spiritual splendor. See Day-Star.

Day-Star

Day-Star (דֵּעוֹן, דֵּיֶךָן, ἡτήλ ben-sahabah, Isa 14:12; ψφάφωρος, ψφάφωρος, 2 Pet 1:19): The OT passage is rendered in AV "Lucifer, son of the morning," in AVM and RV "day-star," i.e. the morning star. The reference is to the king of Babylon (ver 4). In 2 Pet 1:19, "Until the day-star arise in your hearts," the word is lit. "light-bringer." It is applicable, therefore, not only to the planet Venus, seen as a morning star, herald of the dawn, but to the sun itself, and is used here as a title of Our Lord. See Astronomy, 1,6.

Deacon (דֵּקָן, דֵּכָה, DEACONESS, di'ck-ez' ees): The term דֵּקָן, דֵּכָה, and its cognates occur many times in the NT, as do its synonyms ὡραίη, ἱππορήθα, and δωσῖς, δώσοι, with their respective cognates. It may be said in general that the terms denote the service or ministration of the bondservant (ὁ δοῦλος, δοῦλος, δοῦλος, δώσοι), all shades and gradations of meaning both literal and metaphorical. It would serve no useful purpose to list and discuss all the passages in detail.

Christianity has from the beginning stood for filial service to God and His kingdom and for brotherly helpfulness to man, and hence terms expressive of these functions abound in the New Testament. We may inquire with wonder and wonder how they occur in a technical sense sufficiently defined to denote the institution of a special ecclesiastical office, from which the historical diaconate may confidently be said to be derived.

Many have sought the origin of the diaconate in the institution of the Seven at Jerus. (Acts 6), and this view was countenanced by many of the church Fathers. The Seven were appointed to "serve tables" (diakonoin τροφοδοτεῖν), in order to permit the Twelve "to sit down still fastly in prayer, and in the ministry [diakonia] of the word." They are not called deacons (diakonoi), and the qualifications required are not the same as those prescribed by Paul in 1 Tim 3:8-12; furthermore, Stephen appears in Acts 6:5 as a deacon, and Philip as an evangelist. Paul clearly recognizes women as deaconesses, but will not permit a woman to teach (1 Tim 2:12). The obvious conclusion is that the Seven may be called the first deacons only in the sense that they were the earliest recorded helpers of the Twelve as directors of the church, and that they served in the capacity, among others, of specially appointed ministers to the poor.

Paul says, "I commend unto you Phoebe our sister, who is a servant (οὐκ ἁγιάζεται) of the church that is at Cenchreae" (Rom 16:1). This is by many taken as referring to an officially appointed deaconess; but the fact that there is in the earlier group of Paul's epistles no clear evidence of the institution of the diaconate (or deacon) makes this interpretation unlikely. Phoebe was clearly a honored helper in the church closely associated with that at Corinth, where likewise evidence of special ecclesiastical organization is lacking.

In Phil 1:1 and Timothy send greetings "to all the saints . . . . at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." Here then we find mention of "deacons" in a way to suggest a formal diaconate; but the want of definitions as to their qualifications and duties renders it impossible to affirm with certainty the existence of the office.

In 1 Tim 3:8-12, after prescribing the qualifications and the method of appointment of a bishop or overseer, Paul continues: "Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre; holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then let them serve as deacons, if any be blameless, the man that ruleth well his household. Deacons must be the husband of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well." Deacons and deaconesses are here provided for, and the character of their qualifications makes it clear that they were to be appointed as dispensers of alms, who should come into close personal relations with the poor.

We conclude, therefore, that the Seven and Phoebe did not exercise the diaconate in a technical sense, which appears first certainly in 1 Tim 3, although it is not improbably recognized in Phil 1:1, and was foreshadowed in the various agencies for the dispensing of alms and the care of the poor of the church instituted in various churches at an earlier date. Dead (דָּמָה, mût; νεκρός, nekro's): Used in several senses: (1) as a substantive, denoting the body deprived of life, as when Abraham speaks of burying his dead (Gen 23); (2) as a collective noun including all those that have passed away from life (as Rev 20:12). In several passages dead in this sense is used in contrast to the quick or living (as Nu 16:48). This collective mode of expression is used when resurrection is described as “rising from the dead”; (3) as an adj., coupled with body, ear-case or man, as in Nu 14:8, AV; (4) with the vb. “to be,” it is used as a complement of the vb. “to be,” referring to the condition of being deceased or the period of death, e.g. 2 S 12:19; Mk 5:35; (5) in the sense of being liable to death it occurs in Gen 20:3; Ex 12:35; 2 S 16:9; (6) as an intensive adj. it is used in the phrase “dead sleep,” to mean profound sleep simulating death (Ps 76:6); (7) figuratively “dead” is used to express the spiritual condition of those who are unable to attain to the life of faith.

They are dead in trespasses, as in Eph 2:1, or conversely, those who by the New Birth are delivered from sin, are said to be dead to the Law (as Col 2:20, etc.). They are a death which does not show its life in the practical virtues of Christianity is called dead (Jas 2:17); 8) in Rom 4:19; Heb 11:12, “dead” signifies the sense condition of loss of vigor and virility.

The passage in Job (36:5), wherein in AV “dead things” seem to mean things that never had life, is more accurately tr4 in RV as “they that are deceased,” i.e. the shades of the dead.

The second reference to the physical accompaniments of the act of dying. Deborah has a poetical account of the death of Sisera (Jgs 5:24ff), and in Eccl 12, where the failure of the bodily faculties in old age culminates in death, it is pictorially compared to the breaking of a lamp extinguishing the flame (“golden”) being probably used of “oil,” as it is in Zec 4:12, and the loosing of the silver hebel or chain by which the lamp is suspended in the tent of the Arab.

The dead body defiled those who touched it (Lev 11:31) and therefore sepulture took place speedily, as in the case of Lazarus (Jn 11:17-39) and Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:6-10). This practice is still followed by the fellahin.

The uselessness of the dead is the subject of a proverb (Eccl 9:4) and the phrase “dead dog” is used as a contemptuous epithet as of a person utterly worthless (1 S 24:14; 2 S 9:8; 15:9).

DEAD BODY. See Corpse.

DEADLING, deadli. In the OT two words are used in the sense of a “mortal” (Heb nephesh, “hateful,” “foul”] enemy (Ps 17:9), and in the sense of “fatal disease,” the destructiveness of which causes a general panic (Heb màweth, “death,” 1 S 6:11). In the NT we have in Rev 12:12 the expression “deadly wound” (Gr thánatos), better “death-stroke,” as in RV, and the phrases “deadly thing,” i.e. poison (thandásimon, it, Mk 16:18), and “full of deadly poison” (mæth iou thanatiphphorou, Jas 3:8), said of an unruly tongue. Both Gr words convey the idea of “causing or bringing death” and occur in classical lit., in a variety of uses in combination with the bite of venomous reptiles, deadly poisons, mortal wounds and fatal contagion.

VIII. HISTORY

LITERATURE

The name given by Gr and Lat writers to the remarkable inland lake occupying the deepest part of the depression of the Arabah (q.v.). In the Bible it is called the Salt Sea (Gen 14:3; Dt 3:17); the Sea of the Plain (‘Arđhkhā) (Josh 3:10); and the (East) Eastern Sea (Ex 47:18; Joel 2:20). Among the Arabs it is still called Bahr Lut (Sea of Lot). By Jos it was called Lake Asphalities (Ant, I, ix) from the quantities of bitumen or asphalt occasionally washed upon its shores and found in some of the tributary wadies.

I. PRESENT AREA—The length of the lake from N. to S. is 47 miles; its greatest width 10 miles narrowing down to less than 2 miles opposite Point Molyneux on el-Lisba. Its area is approximately 300 sq. miles. From various levellings its surface is found to be 1,192 ft. below that of the Mediterranean, while its greatest depth, near the eastern shore 10 miles S. of the mouth of the Jordan is 1,278 ft. But the level varies from 10 to 15 ft. semiannually, and at long intervals, and we are not certain from which of these levels the above figures have been derived. Throughout the northern half of the lake on the E. side the descent to the extreme depth is very rapid; while from the western side the depth increases more gradually, esp. at the extreme northern end, where the lake has been filled in by the delta of the Jordan.

About two-thirds of the distance to the southern end, the peninsula, el-Lisba ("the Tongue," projects from the S. more than half-way across the lake, being in the shape, however, of a boat rather than a tongue, with the toe to the N., forming a bay between it and the eastern mainland. The head of this bay has been largely filled in by the débris brought down by Wady Kerak, and Wady Ben Hamid, and shoals very gradually down to the greatest depths to the N. The toe of this peninsula is named Point Costigan, and the heel, Point Molyneux, after two travelers who lost their lives about the middle of the 19th cent. in pioneer attempts to explore the lake. Over the entire area S. of Point Molyneux, the water is shallow, being nowhere more than 15 ft. deep, and for the most part not over 10 ft., and in some places less than 6 ft. In high water the lake extends a mile or more beyond low-water mark, over the Mud Flat (Sekhah) at the south end.

From the history of the crossing of the Jordan by Joshua and the expedition of Chedorlaomer when Lot was captured, it is evident that the outlines of the sea were essentially the same 3,500 years ago as they are now, showing that there has been no radical change in climatic conditions since then.

II. FORMER ENLARGEMENT—But if we go back a few thousand years into prehistoric times the evidence is abundant that the valley has witnessed remarkable climatic changes (see Arabah). At Ain Abu Werideh, about 40 miles beyond the south end of the lake, Hull in 1883 discovered deposits of an abandoned shore line 1,400 ft. above its level (see Arabah). A pronounced abandoned shore line at the 650 ft. level had been observed first by Tristram, and noted afterward by many travelers. But from the more detailed examination made by Professor Ellsworth Huntington in 1909 (see Pal and Its Transformation) five abandoned shore lines of marked size have been determined, surrounding the valley at the following approximate heights above the present level of the lake: 1,430, 640, 430, 300 and 250 ft. He writes that "at its greatest extent the sea stretched at least 30 miles south of its present termination, while northward it probably covered the Sea of Galilee and the Waters of Merom, and sent an arm into the Vale of Jezreel. ... Lacustrine deposits exist in the Jordan valley shortly south of the Sea of Galilee. A mile north of Jar el-Majmuweh, as the modern railroad bridge is called, a tilted series of clays, apparently lacustrine, lies under some untilted whitish clays, also apparently lacustrine. The elevation here is about 840 ft. below that of the Mediterranean Sea, or 450 above the Dead Sea. ... So far as can be detected by the aneroid the highest deposits [about the Dead Sea] lie at the same elevation on all sides of the lake."

There are also numerous minor strand below the 250 ft. major strand. These are estimated by Huntington as 210, 170, 145, 115, 90, 70, 56, 40, 30 and 12 ft. above the lake successively. It is noted, also, that the lower beaches all show less erosion than those above them. This certainly points to a gradual diminution of the water in the basin during the prehistoric period, while on the other hand there is much evidence that there has been a considerable rise in the water within the historic period. Date palms and tamarisks are seen standing out from the water in numerous places some little distance from the present shore where the water is several feet deep. These are of such size as to show that for many years the soil in which they grew was not subject to overflow. As long ago as 1876 Merrill noticed such trees standing in the water 40 ft. from the shore, near the N.E. corner of the lake (East of the Jordan, 224). Numerous trunks of date palms and tamarisks can now be seen submerged to a similar extent along the western shore. In 1818 Irby and Mangles (Travels, 454) saw a company of Arabs ford the lake from Point Molyneux to the west side, and noted that the banks of the ford was marked by the branches of trees which had been stuck into the bottom. In 1838 Robinson found the water at such a stage that the ford was impracticable and so it has been reported by all travelers since that time. But Mr. A. Forde, having recently examined the evidence for the Pal Exploration Fund, learns from the older Arabs that formerly there was a well-known causeway leading from the Dead Sea opposite Wady Kerak to Wady Umm Baghek, across which sheep, goats and men could pass, while camels and mules could be driven across anywhere in the water. Moreover the Arab guide said that the channel "was so narrow that the people of his tribe used to sit on the edge of the Lips and parley with Arabs from the west as to the return of cattle that had been stolen by one or other of the parties." (See PEFS [April, 1910], 112.)

III. Level of, in Early Historic Times.—Numerous general considerations indicate that in the early historic period the level of the water was so much lower than now that much of the bay S. of Point Molyneux was dry land. In Josh 15:25.5 the south border of Judah is said to extend from the "bay [tongue, Lips] that looketh southward"; while the "border of the north quarter was from the bay [tongue, Lips] of the sea at the end of the Jordan; and the border went up to Beth-hoglah, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah." If the limits of the north end of the Dead Sea were the same as now the boundary must have turned down to the mouth of the Jordan by a sharp angle. But according to the description it runs almost exactly E. and W. from beyond Jerus to Beth-hoglah, and nothing is said about any change in direction, while elsewhere, any such abrupt change in direction as is here supposed is carefully noted. Furthermore, in detailing the boundary of Benjamin (Josh 18:19) we are told that "the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward; and the going out of the border were at the north bay [tongue, Lips] of the Salt Sea, at the south end of the Jordan: this was the south border." This can hardly have any other meaning than that the north end of the Dead Sea was at Beth-hoglah. From these data Mr. Clermont-Ganneau (see Recueil d'archéologie orientale, V [1902], 267–80) inferred that in the time of Joshua the level of the sea was so much higher than now that a tongue-like extension reached the vicinity of Beth-hoglah, while the underlying topography was essentially the same as now. On the contrary, our present knowledge of the geologic forces in operation would indicate that at that time the Dead Sea was considerably lower than now, and that its rise to its present level has been partly caused by the sitting up of a bay which formerly extended to Beth-hoglah.
The geological evidence concerning this point is so interesting, and of so much importance in its bearing upon our interpretation of various historical statements concerning the region, that it is worth while to present it somewhat in detail. As already stated (see Arabah), the present level of the Dead Sea is determined by the equilibrium established between the evaporation (estimated at 20,000,000 cubic ft. per diem) over the area and the amount of the extent to which these encroachments have tended to narrow the limits of the original lake. The sediment deposited by the Jordan, at the north end of the Dead Sea, is practically all derived from the portion of the drainage basin between it and the Sea of Galilee—the latter serving as a catch-basin to retain the sediment brought down from the upper part of the valley. The Zór, or narrow channel which the Jordan has eroded in the sedimentary water brought into the valley by the tributary streams. The present area of the sea is, in round numbers, 300 sq. miles. The historical evidence shows that this evaporating surface has not varied appreciably since the time of Abraham. But the encroachments of the delta of the Jordan upon this area, as well as of the deltas of several other streams, must have been very great since that period. The effect of this would be to limit the evaporating surface, which would cause the water to rise until it overflowed enough of the low land at the south end to restore the equilibrium.

It is easy to make an approximate calculation of the plain through which it flows (see Jordan, Valley of), is approximately half a mile wide, 100 feet deep, and 60 miles long. All the sediment which formerly filled this has been swept into the head of the sea, while the Jarmuk, the Jabbok, and a score of smaller tributaries descending rapidly from the bordering heights of Gilead, three or four thousand ft. above the valley, bring an abnormal amount of debris into the river, as do a large number of shorter tributaries which descend an equal amount from the mountains of Galilee, Samaria, and Judah. The entire area thus contributing to this part of the Jordan is not less than 5,000 sq. miles.
All writers are impressed by the evidence of the torrential floods which fill these water courses after severe storms. The descent being so rapid, permits the water after each rainfall to run off without delay, and so intensifies its eroding power. The well-known figure of our Lord (Mt 7:26 ff.) in describing the destruction of the house which is built upon the sand, when the rains descend and the winds beat upon it, is drawn from nature. The delta terraces at the mouths of such mountain streams where they debouch on the lowlands are formed and re-formed with extreme rapidity, each succeeding storm tending to washed the previous delta down to lower levels and carry away whatever was built upon it.

The storms which descend upon the plains of Gilead, as well as those upon the Judaean hills, are exceedingly destructive. For though the rainfall at Jerus, according to the observations of Chaplin (see J. Glaniber, "On the Fall of Rain at Jerus." PEFS [January, 1894], 29) averages but 20 inches annually, ranging from 32.21 inches in 1877 to 15.59 inches in 1970, nearly all comes in the three winter months, and therefore in quantities to be, more effective in erosive capacity. And this is effective upon both sides of the Jordan valley, in which the rainfall is very slight. "Day after day," Tristram remarks, "we have seen the clouds, after pouring their fatness on Samaria and Judaea, pass over the valley, and then descend in torrents on the hills of Gilead, and Moab," a phenomenon naturally resulting from the rising column of heated air coming up from the torrid conditions of the depressed Jordan valley.

Tristram (The Land of Moab, 23, 24) gives a vivid description of the effect of a storm near Jerus. As his party was encamped during the night the whole slope upon which they pitched became a shallow stream, while "the deep ravines of the wilderness of Judah [were] covered with torrents, and tiny cascades rolling down from every rock. . . . So easily disintegrated is the soft limestone of these wadis, that the rain of a few hours . . . did more to deepen and widen the channels than the storms of several years could effect on a Northumbrian hillside. No geologist could watch the effect of this storm without being convinced that in calculating the progress of denudation, other factors than that of time must be taken into account, and that denudation may proceed most rapidly where rains are most uncertain."

Lieutenant Lynch writes that while ascending the Kerak "there came a shout of thunder from the dense cloud which had gathered at the summit of the gorge, followed by a rain, compared to which the gentle showers of our more favoured clime are as dew drops to the overflowing cistern. . . . The black and threatening cloud soon enveloped the mountain tops, the lightning playing across it in incessant flashes, while the loud thunder reverberated from side to side of the appalling chasm. Between the peals we soon heard a roaring and continuous sound. It was the torrent from the rain cloud, sweeping in a long line of foam down the steep declivity, bearing along huge fragments of rocks, which, striking against each other, sounded like mimic thunder."

I can bear similar testimony from observations when traveling in Turkestan where the annual rainfall is only about 4 inches. At one time a storm was raging upon the mountains 20 miles away, where it spent its entire force without shedding a drop upon the plain. Upon skirting the base of the mountain the next day, however, the railroad track was covered for a long distance 2 or 3 ft. deep with débris which had been washed down by the cloud burst. No one can have any proper comprehension of the erosive power of the showers of Pal without duly taking into account the extent and the steepness of the descent from the highlands on either side, and the irregularity of the rainfall. These form what in the Rocky Mountains would be called arroyos. After the débris has been brought into the Jordan by these torrents, and the rise of water extending 2 miles farther south with an average width of one-half mile to Rās Feshkah, which rises abruptly from the water's edge, and renders it impossible for travelers to follow along the shore. But just beyond Rās Feshkah a delta half a mile or more in length and width is projected into the sea at the mouth of Wādy en-Nār, which comes down from Jerus. and descends into the sea at the mouth of the Rātibah of Beit Jibrin, but is separate from it by a part of the Kerām. This is the wady which passes the continent of Mar Saba and is referred to in such a striking manner in Ezek. 47. Like most of the other wadies coming into the Dead Sea, this course the most of its course southwardly, and being driven up a delta at its mouth covered with "fragments of rock or boulders swept along by the torrent in its periodical overflows." (De Sauley, 1, 137, 138).

From Rās Feshkah to Rās Merid, a distance of 15 miles, the shore is bordered with a deposit of sand and gravel averaging a half a mile in width, while opposite Wādy el-Derṣah and Wādy el-Hakab (which descend from Mount Precipice) the width is fully one mile. At the mouth of one of the smaller wadys, De Sauley noted what geologists call a "cone of deposition" where "the gravel washed down from the heights was heaped up to the extent of nearly 250 yards." (I, 44).

Rās Merid, again, obstructs the passage along the shore almost as effectually as did Rās Feshkah, but farther south there is no other obstruction. The plain of En-gedi, connected in such an interesting manner with the history of David and with numerous other events of national importance, is described by the Pal Exploration Fund as "about half a mile broad and a mile in length." This consists of material brought down for the most part by Wādy el-Arejeh, which descends from the vicinity of Hībron to the flat below the Jordan. The principal path leading from the west side of the Dead Sea to the hills of Judaea follows the direction of this wady.

Between En-gedi and Sebbeh (Masada), a distance of 10 miles, the limestone cliffs retreat till they are fully 2 miles from the shore. Across this space numerous wadys course their way bringing down an immense amount of debris and depositing it as deltas at the water's edge. These projecting deltas were noticed by Robinson as he looked southward from the height above En-gedi, but their significance was not understood.

"One feature of the sea," he says, "struck us immediately, which was unexpected to us, viz., the number of shoal-like points and peninsulas which run into its southern part, appearing at first sight as small islands. Below us on the S. were two such projecting banks on the western shore, composed probably of pebbles and gravel, each extending out into the sea for a considerable distance. The larger and more important of these is on the S. of the Lydda; the other, which is the Wady el-Hakab, is flanked by an indentation in the western precipice, where the water, flowing into shallow basins when it is high, evaporates, and deposits salt. This spot is just S. of the mouth of Wādy en-Khbarah." (BR, 1, 501). One of these deltas is described by De Sauley as 500 yds. in breadth and as indifferently large.

Six miles S. of Masada, probably at the mouth of Wādy Umm Baghek, Lynch notes a delta extending "half a mile out into the sea." Still farther S. the combined delta of the Wady Zuweirah and Wady Muhawat covers an area of 2 or 3 sq. miles, and is dotted with bowlders and fragments of rock a foot or more in diameter, which have been washed over by the torrential floods. Beyond Jebel Usdum, Wady Fi'ireh, delta of an area of 200 or 300 sq. miles, has deposited an immense amount of coarse sediment on the W. side of the Sebkah (a mud flat which was formerly occupied, probably by a projection of the Dead Sea). Into the S. end of the depression, extending from the Sebkah to the Ascent of Akrabbim, deltas of Wady el-Jelb, Wady el-Khanzir and Wady Tufilch have in connection with Wady Fi'ireh encroached upon the valley to the extent of 12 or 15 sq. miles. Altogether these washes drain an area of more than 3,000 sq. miles, and the granitic formations over which they pass have been so disintegrated by atmospheric influences that an excessive amount of coarse sediment is carried along by them (see Hull, Mount Seir, etc., 104–6). In ascending them, one encounters every indication of occasional destructive floods.

Following up the eastern shore, Wady el-Hessi coming down from the mountains of Edom has built up the plain of Sebkah which pushes out into the neck of the Sebkah and covers an area of 5 or 4 sq. miles. Farther N., Wady Karab and Wady Beni Hamid have with their deltas encroached upon the extent of 25 or 30 sq. miles upon the head of the bay, projecting into the Lisan east of Point Costigan. Still farther N., Wady Moujib (or Arnon) and Wady Zerka Ma'ain (coming down from the hot springs of Callirrhoes) have built up less pronounced deltas because of the height of the water on the E. side, but even so they are by no means insignificant, in each case projecting a half-mile or more into the lake.

Putting all these items together, there can be little doubt that the area of the Dead Sea has been encroached upon to the extent of 25 or 30 sq. miles since the time of Abraham and that this has resulted in a rise of the general level of the water sufficient to overflow a considerable portion of the lagoon at the S. end, thus keeping the evaporating area constant. The only escape from this conclusion is the supposition that the rainfall of the region is less than it was at the dawn of history, and so the smaller evaporating area would be sufficient to maintain the former level. But of this we have no adequate evidence. On the contrary there is abundant evidence that the climatic conditions connected with the production of the Glacial Period had passed away long before the conquest of the Vale of Siddim by Amraphel and his confederates (Gen 14).

The consequence of this rise of water are various and significant. It lends credibility to the persistent tradition that the sites of Sodom and Gomorrah are covered by the shallow water at the S. end of the sea, and also to the statement of Scripture that the region about these cities (on the supposition that they were at the S. end of the sea) was like the garden of the Lord; for that plain was then much larger than it is now, and was well watered, and possessed greater elements of fertility than are now apparent. Furthermore, this supposed lower level of the lake in early times may have greatly facilitated the passage of armies and caravans from one end to the other, thus rendering it more easy to understand the historical statements relating to the earliest periods of occupation. Even now the road at the base of Jebel Usdum which is open at low water is impassable at high water. On the last day of December, 1883, Professor Hull (Mount Seir, etc., 135) traversed the shore at the base of the salt cliffs along a track 100 ft. wide, but further on descended in a descent of about 5 ft. to the line of driftwood which marked the upper limit of the water.” On the 1st of January, 1901, the water along the base of the salt cliffs was so deep that it was impossible for my party to pass along the shore. It is easy to believe that the level might have been lowered sufficiently to expose a margin of shore which could be traversed on the W. side from one end to the other.

IV. Constitution of the Water.—As in the case of all inclosed basins, the waters of the Dead Sea are imprisoned to an excessive degree with saline matter. “The salt which they contain,” however, “is not wholly or even principally common salt, but is mostly the chloride and bromide of magnesium and calcium, so that they are not merely a strong brine, but rather resemble the mother liquors of a salt pan left after the common salt has crystallized out” (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 123). The following analysis is given by Booth and Muckle of water brought by Commander Lynch and taken by him May 5 from 195 fathoms deep opposite the mouth of Wady Zerka Ma‘ain. Other analyses vary from this more or less, owing doubtless to the different localities and depths from which the specimens had been obtained.

What is here labeled bromide of potassium, however, is called by most other analysts bromide of magnesium, it being difficult to separate and distinguish these elements in composition. The large percentage of bromide, of which but a trace is found in the ocean, is supposed to have been derived from volcanic emanations. As compared with sea water, it is worthy of note that that of the Dead Sea yields 26 lbs. of salts to 100 lbs. of water, whereas that of the Atlantic yields only 6 lbs. in the same quantity. Lake Urmiah is as salt as the Dead Sea.

As results of this salinity the water is excessively buoyant and is destructive of all forms of animal life. Lynch found that his metal boats sank an inch deeper in the Jordan when equally heavily laden than they did in the Dead Sea. All travelers who bathe in it relate that when they throw themselves upon their backs their bodies will be half out of the water. Joe (BJ, IV, viii, 4) relates that the emperor Vespasian caused certain men who could not swim to be thrown into the water with their hands tied behind them, and they floated on the surface, with their “abrupt eyes” terminated in a descent of about 5 ft. to the line of driftwood which marked the upper limit of the water.” On the 1st of January, 1901, the water along the base of the salt cliffs was so deep that it was impossible for my party to pass along the shore. not fly over the lake has no foundation in fact, as some species of birds are known even to light upon the surface and sport upon the waters. The whole depression is subject to frequent storms of wind blowing through its length. These produce waves whose force is very destructive of boats encountering them owing to the high specific gravity of the water; but for the same reason the waves rapidly subside after a storm, so that the general appearance of the lake is placid in the extreme.

The source from which these saline matters have been derived has been a subject of much speculation—some having supposed that it was derived from the dissolution of the salt cliffs in Jebel Usdum. But this theory is disproved by the fact that common salt forms but a small portion of the material held in solution by the water. It is more correct to regard this salt mountain as a deposit precipitated from the saturated brine which had accumulated, as we have supposed, during the Cretaceous age. Probably salt is now being deposited at the bottom of the lake from the present saturated solution to appear in some future age in the wreck of progressive geological changes. The saline of the Dead Sea, like those in all similarly inclosed basins, have been brought in by the streams of water from all over the drainage basin. Such streams always contain more or less solid matter in solution, which becomes concentrated through the evaporation which takes place over inclosed basins. The ocean is the great reservoir of such deposits, but is too large to be affected to the extent noticeable in smaller basins. The extreme salinity of the Dead Sea water shows both the long continuance of the isolation of the basin and the abundance of soluble matter contained in the rocks of the inscribed area. The great extent of recent volcanic rocks, esp. in the region E. of the Jordan, accounts for the large relative proportion of some of the ingredients.

V. Climate.—Owing to the great depression below sea level, the climate is excessively warm, so that palms and other tropical trees flourish on the borders of the rivers wherever fresh water finds soil on which to spread itself. Snow never falls upon the lake, though it frequently covers the hills of Judaea and the plateau of Moab. As already explained the rainfall in the Jordan valley is less than on the bordering mountains. During the winter season the Arab tribes go down to the valley with their flocks of sheep and goats and camp upon the surrounding plains. But the excessive heat of the summer, rising sometimes to 130° F., drives them back to the hills again.

VI. Roads.—Except at the N. end the approaches to the Dead Sea are few and very difficult to travel. On the W. side the nearest approach is at En-gedi, and this down a wending descent of 2,000 ft. where a few men at the top of the cliff could hold an army at bay below. The path up from the Jordan to the N. end of Jebel Usdum is scarcely better. Upon the S. end the path leads up Wady Fitzkhef for a considerable distance on the W. side of the Mud Flat, and then crosses over to the Wady el-Jeb, up whose torrential bed during the dry season caravans can find their way through the Arabah to Alabah. More difficult paths lead up from the E. of the Mud Flat into the Arabah, and through the mountains of Moab to Petra in the plains beyond and the Pilgrim route from Damascus to Jerusalem a difficult path leads up Wady Kerak to the fortress of the same name 20 miles distant and 5,000 ft. above the lake. Another path a little farther north leads up the Wady Beni Hamid to Ar of Moab. From the Arnon the Dead Sea the mountains are so precipitous that travel along the shore is now practically impossible. But there are, according to Tristram (The Land of Moab, 335), remnants of an "old and well-engineered road of ancient times" extending as far S. at least as the Zerka Ma‘ain.

VII. Miscellaneous Items.—There are numerous points about the border of the lake of special interest. When Lot and Abraham looked from the heights of the hill Mamre (Plain of the 13 10 ft) they are said to have beheld Jordan "all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before Jeh destruction Sodom and Gomorrha, like the garden of Jeh, like the land of Egypt, as thou guest unto Zear. So Lot chose him all the Plain of the Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: . . . . and Lot dwelt in the cities of the Plain, and moved his tent as far as Sodom. The word "Plain" is kikkor (Ciccar), meaning "circle," and indicating the appearance from Bethel of the Jordan valley surrounding the N. end of the Dead Sea. From this fact, many recent writers have located Sodom and Gomorrha at that end of the sea (see Circles of the Plain). But it is by no means certain that it is necessary thus to narrow down the meaning of the phrase. Though the S. end of the Dead Sea is not visible from the heights of Bethel, it is so connected with the general depression that it may well have been in the minds of Abraham as they were dividing the country between them, one choosing the plain, a part of which was visible, the other remaining on the bordering mountainous area, so different in all its natural resources and conditions. The extent of the region chosen by Lot may therefore be left to be determined by other considerations. Ain Jid, "fountain of the kid" (?) (see En-gedi) is an oasis at the base of the western cliffs about half way between Beth and the S. ends of the lake, fed by springs of warm water which burst from beneath the overhanging cliffs. The 650 ft. shore line composed of shingle and calcareous marl is here prominent, and, as already remarked, there is an extensive gravel terrace at the present water level. Palms and vines formerly flourished here (Cant 1 14), but now only a few bushes of acacia and tamarisk are to be found. From time immemorial, however, it has been the terminus of the principal trail which encourages the up the cliffs to the plateau, across which paths lead to Hebron and Bethlehem.

The Fortress of Masada was the last stronghold held by the fanatical Jews (Zealote) after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and offers a bird’s eye view of the Dead Sea, which is as instructive as it is interesting. It is situated half-way between Jebel Ushum and En-gedi, directly opposite the northern promontory of el-Lisân. Here on a precipitous height, 2,000 ft. above the sea, is a plateau about 700 yds.
long, and 200 wide, adorned with ruins of dwellings, palaces and temples of the Herodian age. Standing upon this height one sees the outlines of the Rom camp, near the shore of the sea, and those of another camp in a depression several hundred yards to the W., from which the final attack of the besiegers was made over a pathway constructed along a sloping ridge.

Jebel Ushum (Mount of Sodom) is a salt mountain extending 7 or 8 miles along the S.W. shore of the lake and on the W. side of the

Here many miles away from their base of supplies the Romans slowly but irresistibly drew in their besieging lines to the final tragic consummation when the last remnant of the defenders committed suicide
(B. J. VII, ix, 1). The view gives one a profound impression of the difficulties attending military campaigns in all that region. Upon lifting up one’s eyes to take in the broader view, he sees the Dead Sea in its whole length with the low ridge of Jebel Ushum, the Valley of Salt, the Ascent of Akrahbin, the depression of the Arabah, and Mt. Hor, to the S., while across the whole horizon to the E. is the long wall of Moab dissected by Wady Kerak and the river
Arnon, leading up to the strongholds of Ker, Aroer and Dibon, of Moab; while immediately in the front are the white cliffs of el-Lisân, and to the N., near by, the green oasis of En-gedi, and, dimmed by distance, the plains of Jericho, and the cluster of peaks surrounding Mt. Pisgah; while the sea itself sparkles like a gem of brilliant azure in the midst of its desolate surroundings, giving no token of the deadly elements which permeate its water.

worn furrows and gullies in it. The eastern face presents a precipitous wall of rock salt, which, as said above, at the time of my visit (January, 1901), was washed by the waves of the lake making it impossible to pass along its base. At other times when the water is low, travelers can pass along the whole length of the shore. This wall of salt presents much the appearance of a glacier, the salt being as transparent as ice, while the action of the waves has hollowed out extensive and picturesque caverns and left isolated towers and connected pinnacles of salt often resembling a Gothic cathedral.
These towers and pinnacles are, of course, being displaced from time to time, while others are formed to continue the illusion. Any pillar of salt known to the ancients must be entirely different from those which meet the eye of the modern traveler. It follows also as a matter of course that the gradual dissolution of this salt must partly account for the excessive salinity of the Dead Sea.

It is uncertain how deep the deposit extends below the surface. It rises upward 200 or 300 ft., where it is capped by consolidated strata of sedimentary material, consisting of sand and loam, which most geologists think was deposited at the time of the formation of the 650 ft. terrace already described, and which they connect with the climatic conditions of the Glacial period.

This view is presented as follows by Professor B.K. Emerson: "In the earlier portion of the post-glacial stadial, a final sinking of a fraction of the bottom of the trough, near the S. end of the lake, dissected the low salt plateau, sinking its central parts beneath the salt waters, while fragments remained buttressed against the great walls of the trench forming the plains of Jebel Usdum and the peninsula el-Lisdn with the swampy Sebhah between... it exposed the wonderful eastern wall of Jebel Usdum: 7 miles long, with 30-45 m. of clear blue salt at the base, capped by 125-140 m. of gypsum-bearing marls impregnated with sulphur, and conglomerates at times cemented by bitumen" ("Geological Myths," Proc. Am. Assoc. for Adv. of Sci. [1896], 110, 111). If this was the case there has been a depression of the S. end of the Dead Sea to the extent of several hundred feet within a comparatively few thousand years, in which case the traditional view that Sodom and Gomorrah were overwhelmed by Dead Sea water at the time of their destruction would refer to an occurrence exactly in line with movements that have been practically continuous during Tertiary, Glacial, and post-Glacial times.

With more reason, Lartet contends that this salt is a Cretaceous or Tertiary deposit covered with late Tertiary strata, in which case the sinking of the block between Jebel Usdum and el-Lisdn, for the most part, took place at a much earlier date than the formation of the 650 ft. terrace. A striking corollary of this supposition would be that the climatic conditions have been practically the same during all of the post-Carboniferous times, there having been cycles of moist and dry climate in that region succeeding each other during all these geological periods.

The Vale of Siddim (Gen 14 3.8.10) is probably the same as the Valley of Salt (2 K 14 7; 1 Ch 18 southern part of the Dead Sea. After the earthquake of 1834 a large quantity was cast upon the shore near the S.W. corner of the lake, 3 tons of which were brought to market by the Arab natives. After the earthquake of January, 1837, a mass of asphaltum was driven aground on the W. side not far from Jebel Usdum. The neighboring Arabs swam off to it, cut it up with axes and carried it to market by the camel load, and sold it to the value of several thousand dollars. At earlier times such occurrences seem to have been still more frequent. Jos affirms that "the sea in many places sends up black masses of asphaltum having the form and size of headless oxen"; while Diodorus Siculus relates that the bitumen (asphaltum) was thrown up in masses covering sometimes two or three acres and having the appearance of islands (Jos, BJ, IV, vii, 4; Diod. Sic. ii.48; Pliny, NH, vii.13; Tac. Hist. v.6; Dioecor., De re Med., i.99).

Since asphalt is a product of petroleum from which the volatile elements have been evaporated, the ultimate source of these masses is doubtless to be found in the extensive beds of bituminous limestone which appear in numerous places on both sides of the Dead Sea. An outcrop of it can be observed at Neby Mousa, on the road from Jerus to Jericho, which Dawson describes as resembling dry chalk saturated with coal tar. When long weathered this substance and chalky surface, so that a mass of it, quite white externally, reveals an intense blackness when broken. It is this that the people of Bethlehem call "Dead Sea stone," and which they carve into various ornamental articles and expose for sale. Some specimens of it are sufficiently bituminous to burn with flame like candell-coal. These beds are still more abundant about the S. end of the lake and doubtless underlie the whole region, and for all time must have been exuding bituminous and gaseous matter, but much more abundantly in former times than now.

In these accumulations of bitumen at the S. end of the Ghôr we probably have the incentive which led the Babylonians under Amraphel and Chedorlaomer to make such long expeditions for the sake of conquering the region and holding it under their power. Bitumen was much in demand in Babylonia.

El-Usdân (the Tongue), which projects half-way across the lake from the mouth of Wady Kerah, is, like El-Usdân, a promontory of white calcareous sediment containing beds of salt and gypsum breaking off the western side in a cliff 300 ft. high. Its upper surface rises in terraces 3000 ft. level with the E., as El-Usdân does on the W. The length of the promontory from N. to S. is 9 miles. This corresponds so closely in appearance to that of El-Usdân on the opposite side of the lake that we find it difficult to doubt the time of Professor Emerson, who stated that the formation originally extended across and that a block of the original bottom of the lake has dropped down leaving these large terraces extending up the sides. Of consequent occurrences similar to this are noted by the United States geologists in the Rocky Mountain region.

8. History.—Difficulty of access has prevented the Dead Sea from playing any important part in history except as an obstruction both to commerce and to military movements. Boats have never been used upon it to any considerable extent. From earliest times salt has been gathered on its western shores and carried up to market over the difficult paths leading to Jerus. A similar commerce has been carried on in bitumen, that from the Dead Sea being specially prized in Egypt, while as already remarked, it is by no means improbable that the pits of bitumen which abounded in the "Wâl of Siddim," the plain between the kings of Babylonia to undertake long expeditions for the conquest of the region. Productive as may have been the plain at the S. end of the sea, it was too far outside the main line of coast communication, which led the kings of Babylonia to undertake long expeditions for the conquest of the region. Still the settlements on the eastern border of the Vale of Siddim were of sufficient importance in medieval times to induce the Crusaders to visit the Abay and leave their marks upon it. The Arabian town of Zoghar, probably the Bib. Zoor, appears at one time to have been a most important place, and was the center of considerable commercial activity. Indigo was grown there, and the oasis was noted for its fine species of dates. The country round about abounded in springs and there was much arable land (see Le Strange, Pal under the Moselos, 256 f.). The hot springs upon the eastern shore of the Dead Sea at Callirrhoe some distance up the Wady Zerka Mal'in were much resorted to for their medicinal properties. Here Herod came as a last resort, to secure relief from his loathsome malady, but failed of help. The fortress of Machaerus, where John the Baptist was imprisoned, is situated within a mile of Callirrhoe. The road to it is of great importance, but access to this region is possible only through a difficult road leading over the mountains a few miles E. of the sea.

On four occasions important military expeditions were conducted along the narrow defiles which border the S.W. end of the Dead Sea: (1) That of the Moabites under Simeon and Ammah, who seem first to have opened the way past Petra to the mines of the Sinaitic Peninsula, and then to have swept northward through the land of the Amalekites and Amorites and come down to the Dead Sea at En-gedi, and then to have turned to subdue the Cities of the Plain, where Lot was dwelling. This accomplished, they probably retraced along the west shore of the lake, which very likely afforded at that time a complete passageway to the west coast of the Jordan, which they may have gone eastward to the line of the present pilgrim route from Damascus to Mecca and followed it northward. (2) In the early part of the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20), the Moabites, Ammonites and some other tribes joined together, forming a large army, and, following around the S. end of the Dead Sea, marched along the W. shore to En-gedi, and having ascended the zigzag path leading up the precipitous heights to the wilderness of Tekos, were there thrown into confusion and utterly annihilated. (3) Not many years later Jehoram and Jehoshaphat "fetched a compass [RV "made a circuit"] of seven days' journey" (2 K 3 9) around the S. end of the Dead Sea and attacked the Moabites in their own country, but they were defeated in the completion of the conquest. The particulars of this expedition are given in 2 K 3 and in the inscription on the Moabite Stone. (4) The Romans shortly after the destruction of Jerus conducted a long siege of the fortress of Masada, of which an account has already been given in a previous section (VII, 3). All their supplies must have come down the tortuous path to En-gedi and thence been brought along the western shore to the camp, the remains of which are still to be seen at the base of the fortress.

For many cents, indeed for well-nigh 1,800 years, the Dead Sea remained a mystery, and its geology and physical characteristics were practically unknown. The first intimation of the depression of the lake below sea level was furnished in 1837 by Moore and Beke, who made some imperfect experiments with boiling water from which they inferred a depression of 500 ft. In 1841 Lieutenant Simons of the British navy, and, on the basis of observations, estimated the depression to be 1,312 ft. In 1835 Costigan, and again in 1847 Lieutenant Molyneux ventured upon the sea in boats; but the early death of both, consequent upon their experiences, prevented their making any full reports. Appropriately, however, their names have been attached to prominent points on the Lisan. In 1848 Lieutenant Lynch, of the United States navy, was dispatched to explore the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The results of this expedition were most important. Soundings of the depths were carefully and systematically conducted, and levels were run from the Dead Sea by Jerus to the Mediterranean, giving the depression at the surface of the Dead Sea at 1,316 ft., and its greatest depth, 1,575 ft. More recently Sir C. W. Wilson in connection with the Ordinance Survey of Pal carried levels over the same route with the result of reducing the depression to 1,292 ft., which is now generally accepted to be correct. But as already stated the stage of water in the lake is not given, and that is known to vary at least 15 ft. annually, and still more at longer intervals.

DEAD, def (ΔΑΘΙ), hērōsh; κωφός, kōphos): Used either in the physical sense, or figuratively as expressing unwillingness to hear the Divine message (Ps 58 4), or incapacity to understand it for want of spirituality (Ps 35 13). The prophetic utterances were sufficiently forcible to compel even such to hear (Isa 42 18; 43 6) and thereby to receive the Divine mercy (Isa 18 18; 35 5).

The expression “deaf adder that stoppeth her ear” (Ps 58 4) alludes to a curious notion that the adder, to avoid hearing the voice of the charmer, laid its head with one ear on the ground and stopped the other with the tip of its tail (Diary of John Manningham, 1602). The adder is called deaf by Shakespeare (2 Hen VI, iii, 2, 76; Troilus and Cressida, ii, 2, 172). The erroneous idea probably arose from the absence of external ears.

Physical deafness was regarded as a judgment from God (Ex 4 11; Mic 7 16), and it was consequently ineptly to curse the deaf (Lev 19 14). In NT times deafness and kindred defects were attributed to evil spirits (Mk 9 18 6). See DUMS.

DEADLI, dēlē: The noun “dead” is not found in RV. The AV tr of ὄρθροι, ὀρθρὸν, “the tenth deal” (Ex 29 40; Lev 14 10, et al.) is rendered uniformly “the tenth part” in RV (see Wrights and Measurements). The vb, “to deal” often means “to appore, ” “to distribute” (cf 2 S 6 19; 1 Ch 3 8; Isa 58 7; Rom 12 3), but more frequently it is used in the sense of “to act,” “to do,” “to have transaction of any kind with.” In the Ps “to deal” always means “to confer benefit,” “to deal boundlessly,” with the exception of Ps 106 25, where it means “to deal subtly with.” The expression “to deal,” i.e. “to be engaged in,” is not found in the Scriptures. The tr of συγγείρομαι, συγγείρον, in Jn 4 9, “Jews have no dealings with Samaritans,” conveys the idea that they have nothing in common.

DEAR, dër, DEARLY, dër'li ("held at a great price," "highly valued"): In Acts 20 24, Paul does not hold his life dear; cf 2 Cor 13 12, "costly stones"; 1 Pet 1 19, "precious blood." Lk 7 2, the servant was "dear" to the centurion (εὔρρως, ἐντίμος, "highly prized"); cf Phil 2 29; 1 Pet 2 6). These 5, "very dear to us" (ἀγαπόμενος, ἀγαπαῖος, "beloved"), in RV, agonpōdos is generally thr "beloved." "Dearly" before "beloved" of AV is omitted in all passages in RV. The word "dear" occurs but once in the OT, viz. Jer 31 20. RV correctly changes "dear Son" of AV (Col 1 13) into "the Son of his love." See H. E. Jacobs.

DEATH, dōth. See FAMINE.

DEATH (ΤΆΘΗ, mōuth; ἄναπτος, thänatos):

Physiological and Figurative View: The word “Death” is used in the sense of (1) the process of dying (Gen 21 16); (2) the period of deception (Gen 27 7); (3) as a possible synonym for poison (2 K 4 40); (4) as descriptive of person in danger of perishing (Jgs 15 18; "in death off!") 2 Cor 11 23). In this sense the shadow of death is a familiar expression in Job, the Psalms and the Prophets. (5) death is personified in 1 Cor 15 55 and 20 14. Deliverance from this catastrophe is called the "issues from death" (Ps 68 20 AV; τρε escape" in RV). Judicial execution, "putting to death," is mentioned 39 times in the Levitical Law. Figuratively: Death is the loss of spiritual life as in Rom 6 8; and the final state of the unregenerate is called the "second death" in Rev 20 14.

ALEX. MACALISTER

Theological View: According to Gen 2 17, God gave to man, created in His own image, the command not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and 1. Conception of Sin that thou eat thereof, thou shalt surely die." Though not exclusively, reference is certainly made here in the first place to bodily death. Yet because death by no means came upon Adam and Eve on the day of their transgression, but took place hundreds of years later, the expression, "in the day that," must be conceived in a wider sense, or the delay of death must be attributed to the entering-in of mercy (Gen 3 15). However this may be, Gen 2 17 places a close connection between man’s death and his transgression of God’s commandment, thereby attaching to death a religious and ethical significance, and in the other hand makes the life of man dependent on his obedience to God. This religious-ethical nature of life and death is not only decided and clearly expressed in Gen 2, but it is the fundamental thought of the whole of Scripture and forms an essential element in the revelations of salvation.

The theologians of early and more recent times, who have denied the spiritual significance of death and have separated the connection between ethical and physical life, have tried to trace back in opinions to Scripture; and those passages which undoubtedly see in death a punishment for sin (Gen 2 17; Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21), they take as individual opinions, which form no part of the teaching of revelation. But this endeavor shuts out the organic character of the revelation of salvation. It is true that death in Holy Scripture is often measured by the weakness and frailty of human nature (Gen 1 6; Job 15 12; Ps 39 5; 106 14; Eccl 3 20, etc). Death is seldom connected with the transgression of the first man either in the OT or the NT, as mentioned in a specified punishment for sin (Jn 8 44; Rom 5 12; 6 23; 1 Cor 15 21; Jas 1 15), for as it is portrayed as something natural (Gen 5 5; 9 29; 15 15; 35 8, etc), a long life being presented as a blessing in contrast to death in the midst of days as a disaster and a judgment (Ps 103 235; Isa 66 20). But all this is not contrary to the idea that death is a consequence of sin, or a punishment for sin. But in every case, everyone who agrees with Scripture that death is held out as a punishment for sin, speaks in the same way. Death, though come into the world through sin, is nevertheless at the same time a consequence of man’s physical and frail existence now; it could therefore be threatened as a punishment to man, because he was taken out of the ground and was made a living soul, of the earth earthy (Gen 3 7; 1 Cor 15 45 47). If he had not sinned, he would not have returned to dust (Gen 3 19, but have pressed forward on the path of spiritual development (1 Cor 15 46 51); his return to dust was possible simply because he was made from dust (see ADAM in the NT). Thus, although death is in this way a consequence of sin, yet a long life is felt to be a blessing and death a disaster and a judgment, above all when man is taken away in the bloom of his youth or the strength of his years. There is nothing strange, therefore, in the manner in which Scripture speaks of death; we all express ourselves daily in the same way, though we at the same time consider it as the wages of sin. Beneath the ordinary, everyday expressions about death lies the deep consciousness that it is unnatural and contrary to our innermost being.
2. The Meaning of Death

The idea is utterly contrary to the Israeli consciousness, and is nowhere found in the OT. The whole man dies, when in death the spirit (Ps 146 4; Ecc 12 7), or soul (Gen 35 18; 2 S 4 14; Job 17 21). In the apostle's view, the soul is a gift of God and belongs to heaven, not to Sheol. Not only his body, but his soul also returns to a state of death and belongs to the nether-world; therefore the OT can speak of a death of one's soul (Gen 37 21 [Heb]; Nu 23 10 m; Dt 22 21; Jgs 18 30; Job 36 11; Ps 78 50), and of deliverance by coming in contact with a dead body (Lev 19 28; 21 11; 22 4; Nu 6 2; 6 6; 9 6; 19 10 f; Dt 14 1; Hag 2 13). This death of man is not annihilation, however, but a deprivation of all that makes for life on earth. The soul (sh'chon) is in contrast to the land of the living in every respect (Job 38 13; Prov 15 24; Ezk 26 20; 32 23), it is an abode of darkness and the shadow of death (Job 10 21. 22; Ps 98 12; 143 3), a place of destruction, yea destruction of the destruction (Job 31 19. Ps 88 11; Prov 27 20), without any order (Job 10 22), a land of rest, of silence, of oblivion (Job 3 17 18; Ps 94 17; 116 17), where God and man are no longer to be seen (Isa 38 11), God no longer praised or glorified (Ezk 24 27 28). His perfections are no more acknowledged (Ps 88 10–13; Isa 18 19), His wonders not contemplated (Ps 88 12), where the dead are unconscious, do no more work, take no account of anything, possess no knowledge nor wisdom, nor can they either receive a portion in anything that is done under the sun (Ecc 9 5.6.10). The dead ("the Shades" RVm; of art. Deceased) are asleep (Job 26 5; Prov 2 18; 9 18; 21 6; Ps 88 11; Isa 14 10, weakened (Isa 14 10) and without strength (Ps 88 4).

The dread of death was felt much more deeply therefore by the Israelites than by ourselves. Death to them was separation from the once they loved, from God, from the service, from His land, from all the rich companionship in which they lived. But now in this darkness appears the light of the revelation of God in His goodness and mercy. The God of Israel is the living God and the fountain of all life (Dt 5 26; Josh 3 10; Ps 36 9). He is the Creator of heaven and earth, whose power knows no bounds and whose dominion extends over life and death (Ps 89 10). He can give life to man (Gen 1 26; 2 7), and creates and sustains every man still (Job 32 8; 33 4; 34 14; Ps 104 29; Ecc 12 7). He connects life with the keeping of His law and appoints the death of His creation of His will (Gen 2 17; Lev 18 5; Dt 30 20; 32 47). He lives in heaven, but is present also by His spirit in Sheol (Ps 139 7–8). Sheol and Abaddon are open to Him even as the hearts of the children of men (Job 26 6; 38 17; Prov 15 11). He knows and conceivable, becomes known to Sheol and raising from thence again (Dt 32 39; 1 S 2 6; 2 K 5 7). He lengthens life for those who keep His commandments (Ex 20 12; Job 5 26), gives escape from death, can deliver when death menaces (Ps 68 20; Isa 35 5). He permits Enoch and Eljah to Himself without dying (Gen 5 24; 2 K 21), can restore the dead to life (1 K 17 22; 2 K 4 34; 13 21). He can even bring death wholly to nothing and completely triumph over it by raising from the dead (Job 13 9; 14 19 25–27; Hag 2 13; 14 14; 26 19; Ezk 37 11.12; Dnl 12 2).

This revelation by degrees rejects the old con-
millions, who through fear of death are all their life-time subject to bondage (He 3 15)? Such a mystery has death remained up to the present day. It may be said in words of Wasserheit, Voigt and others that the "cell" is the beginning, and the old, gray man is the natural end of an uninterrupted life-development, or with Metzschkoff, that science will one day so lengthen life that it will fade away like a rose at last and death lose all its dread; death still is no less a riddle, and one which swallows up all the strength of life. When one considers, besides, that a number of creatures, plants, trees, animals, reach a much higher age than man; that the largest half of man's declining days may be spent in the work of meditation or study; that another large percentage dies in the bloom of youth or in the prime of life; that the law of the survival of the fittest is true only when the fact of the survival is taken as a proof of their fitness; that the greybeards, who, spent and decrepit, go down to the grave, form a very small number; then the enigma of death increases more and more in mysteries. The endeavors to bring death into connection with certain activities of the organism and to explain it by increasing weight, by growth or by fertility, have all led to shipwreck. When Weismann took refuge in the immortality of the "einzellige Protozoen," he raised a hypothesis which not only found many opponents, but which also left the "Körperplane" an insoluble mystery (Bith, "Über Ursache und Zweck des Todes, Glauben und Wissen (1909), 285-304, 335-48). Thus science certainly does not compel us to review Scripture on this point, but rather furnishes a key to the deepest mystery of death. When Pelagius, Socinus, Schleiermacher, Ritschl and a number of other theologians and philosophers separate death from its connection with sin, they are not compelled to do so by science, but are led by a defective insight into the relation between ethos and physis. Misery and death are not absolutely always consequences and punishment of a great personal transgression (Lk 13 2; Jn 9 3); but that they are connected with sin, we learn from the experience of every day. Who can number the victims of mammonism, alcoholism and licentiousness? Even spiritual sins exercise their influence on corporal life; envy is a rottenness of the bones (Prov 14 30). This connection is taught us in a great measure by Scripture, when it predicted the not yet fallen man in a Paradise, where death had not yet entered, and eternal life was not yet possessed and enjoyed; when it sends fallen man, who, how- ever, is destined for redemption, into a world of misery and death; and at last assigns to the wholly renewed man a new heaven and a new earth, where death, sorrow, crying or pain shall no longer exist (Rev 21 4).

Finally, Scripture is not the book of death, but of life, of everlasting life through Jesus Christ Our Lord. It tells us, in of-repeated and unmistakable terms, of the dreaded reality of death, but it pro-claims to us still more loudly the wonderful power of the life which is in Christ Jesus. DEATH, SECOND (א prwprs dhrwros, ho de- terns dhrons): An expression, peculiar to the Book of Rev (2 11; 20 6,14; 21 8) in Scripture, denoting the final penalty of the unrighteous; parallel with another expression likewise peculiar, "the lake of fire," in 20 14; 21 8. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT.

DEBATE, dé-bá'te: This word is used only once in RV (Prov 26 9). It evidently refers to the set- tling of a difficulty with a neighbor, and anticipates Mt 18 15. It argues for and shows the advantage of private, peaceable settlement of difficulties. Cf Ecclus 28 9, and see MAKEBATES.

DEBIR, dè-bèr (דבær, d'bhèr, or דבִּחְר, "oracle"): King of Eglon, one of the five Amorite kings whose confederation against Israel was overcome and who were killed by Joshua (Josh 10 3).

DEBIR, dè-bèr (דבэр; דבiteral, Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḇēr; Dāḏhēr, signifying "bee"): (1) Beebekah's nurse, who died near Bethel and was buried under "the oak of weeping" (Gen 35 8m).

(2) A prophetess, fourth in the order of the "judges." In aftertimes a palm tree, known as the "palm tree of Deborah," was shown between Ramah and Bethel, beneath which the prophetess was wont to administer justice. Like the rest of the "judges" she became a leader of her people in times of national distress. This time the oppressor was Jabin, king of Hazor, whose general was Sisera. Deborah summoned Barak of Kedesh-Naphtali and delivered him a challenge to meet Sisera in battle by the brook Kishon. Barak induced Deborah to accompany him; they were joined by 10,000 men of Zebulun and Naphtali. The battle took place by the brook Kishon, and Sisera’s army was thoroughly defeated. While Barak pursued the fleeing army, Sisera escaped and sought refuge with Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite, near Kedesh. The brave woman, the prototype of Judith, put the Canaanite general to sleep by offering him a draft of milk and then slew him by driving a peg into his temple. Thus runs the story in Jgs 4. It is on the whole substantiated by the odes in ch 5 which is ascribed jointly to Deborah and Barak. It is possible that the editor mistook the archaic form זנה, yerah, in ver 7 which should be rendered “shou arosest?” instead of “I arose.” Certainly the ode was composed by a person who, if not a contemporary of the event, was very near it in point of time. The song is spoken of as one of the oldest pieces of Heb lit. Great difficulties meet the exegete. Nevertheless the general substance is plain. The Lord is described as having come from Sinai near the “field of Edom” to take part in the battle; “for from heaven they fought, the very stars from their courses fought against the people’s enemies” (cf. Jgs 5:10). The victory was in a sense a plight, oppressed by a mighty king, and the tribal loth to surrender their separatist tendencies. Some, like Reuben, Gilead, Dan and Asher remained away. A community by the name of Meroz is mentioned (11:1), and it is said they came not to the help of Jeh, to the help of Jeh among the mighty (ver 23; of RVm). Ephraim, Issachar, Machir, Benjamin were among the followers of Barak; “Zebulun, . . . Jeopardized their lives unto the death, and Naphtali, upon the high places of the field” (ver 18). According to the song, the battle was fought at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo; Sisera’s host was swept away by “that ancient river, the river Kishon” (ver 21). Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, receives here due meed of praise for her heroic act. The psalm vividly paints the waiting of Sisera’s mother for the home-coming of the general; the delay is ascribed to the great beauty which the conqueror is distributing among his Canaanite hostresses, “all desireth beauty” (ver 22), concluding the song; “O Jeh: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might.” It is a song in praise of the “righteous acts” of the Lord, His work of victory which Israel’s leaders, the four-hundred princes, wrought, making their lives freely to the nation’s cause. And the nation was sore beset because it had become faithless to the Lord and chosen new gods. Out of the conflict came, for the time being, victory and moral purification; and the inspiring genius of it all was a woman in Israel, the prophetess Deborah.

(3) Tobit’s grandmother (AV “Debora,” Tob 1:8).

DEBT, det, DEBTOR, det′r: It is difficult nowadays to think of debt without associating it with the idea of interest, and even usury. Certain it is that this idea is associated with the OT idea of the word, at least in the later periods of OT history. This is true of the NT entire. The Heb word (שֵׁיָּה, n’shā) always carries with it the idea of “biting interest” (cf 2 K 4:7). The Gr words δανεῖον, dānēion (Mt 18:25), and ὀφθήμα, ὀφθῆμ (Mt 18:32), may point only to the fact of indebtedness; the idea of interest, however, is clearly taught in the NT (cf Mt 25:27).

Quite extensive legislation is provided in the OT governing the matter of debt and debtors. Indebtedness and loaning had not, however, the commercial aspect among the Jews so characteristic of the nations surrounding Pal. Indeed the Mosaic legislation was probably directed to prevent emergence, not just such commercialism. It was looked upon as a misfortune to be in debt; it indicated poverty brought on probably by blighted harvests; consequently those in debt were to be looked upon with pity and dealt with in lenience. There must be no lending to the poor under such circumstances (Ex 22:25; Dt 23:19-20; Ezek 18:18). Even where a pledge is given and received, certain restrictions are thrown around it, e.g. the creditor must not take a mill and a measure of barley from a poor man’s order. It is permitted, but not rendering “shou arosest?” instead of “I arose.” Certain the ode was composed by a person who, if not a contemporary of the event, was very near it in point of time. sense also as indicating the obligation of a righteous life which we owe to God. To fall short in righteous living is to become a debtor. For this reason we pray, "Forgive our debts" (Mt 6 12). Those who are ministered to in spiritual things are said to be debtors to those who minister to them (Rom 15 27). To make a vow to God is to put one's self in debt in a moral sense (Mt 23 16-18; Rv 26 14-17). In a deeply spiritual sense the apostle Peter professed to be in debt to all men in that he owed them the opportunity to do them good (Rom 1 14).

The parables of Jesus as above named are rich with comforting truth. How beautiful is the willingness of God, the great and Divine Creditor, to release us from our indebtedness! Just so ought we to be imitators of the Father in heaven who is merciful.

DECALOGUE, déka-lo'g. See TEN COMMANDMENTS.

DECAPOLIS, dé-kap'o-lis (Δεκάπολις, Dekápolis): The name given to the region occupied by a league of "ten cities" (Mr 4 25; Mk 5 20; Lk 7 51), which Egyptian dynasties (Oenom or as "lybians in the Peraea, round Hippos, Pella and Gadara.") Such combinations of Gr cities arose as Rome assumed dominion in the East, to promote their common interests in trade and commerce, and for mutual protection against the peoples surrounding them. This particular league seems to have been constituted about the time of Pompey's campaign in Syria, 65 BC, by which several cities in Decapolis declared their eras. They were independent of the local tetrarchy, and answerable directly to the government of Syria. They enjoyed the rights of association and asylum; they struck their own coinage, paid imperial taxes and were liable to military service (Ant, XIV, iv, 4; BJ, i, vii, 7; II, xviii, 5; III, iv, 7; V, viii, 65, 14). Of the ten cities, Scythopolis, the ancient Bethshean, alone, the capital of the league, was on the W. side of Jordan. The names given by Pliny (N.H., v.18) are Scythopolis (Beitān), Hippos (Susiyeh), Gadara (Umm Keis), Pella (Fahl), Philadelphia (Akrabad, Geselin), Decapolis (Adén), Cre- natha (Kanosvat), Damascus and Raphana. The last named is not identified, and Dion is uncertain. Other cities joined the league, and Ptolemy, who omits Raphana, gives a list of 18. The Gr inhabitants were never on good terms with the Jews; and the herd of swine (Mk 5 11 f) indicates contempt for what was probably regarded as Jewish prejudice. The ruins still seen at Gadara, but esp. at Kanawat (see KANATA) and Jerash, of temples, theaters and other public buildings, attest the splendor of these cities in their day.

DECEAY, dê-kâ'.: Although this word is still in good use in both its lit. sense, of the putrefaction of either animal or vegetable matter, and its derivative sense, denoting any deterioration, decline or gradual failure, the RV has replaced it by other expressions in Lev 25 35; Ecol 10 18; Isa 44 20; He 8 13; in some of these cases with a gain in accuracy of tr. In Neh 4 10 (יֵשָע, kâšâh, "to be feeble," "stumble") RV retains is "decayed"; in Job 14 11 (יָדָד, ṣâ̂dâq, "to be dried up") ARV substitutes "dried out"; by Js 11 39 ARV has "the body decaying" instead of the more literal or offensive to modern ears ( Depths, ọzâ, "emits a smell")

DECEASE, dê-sâs', IN OT AND APOC (נֶג, râphâh, pl. râphâ'în, "ghosts," "shades," is tr by "deceased," "dead," and "died") and (נֶא, nê'â, "deceased") in both AV and RV: The word seems to mean "soft," "inert," but its etymology is uncertain (see RPHAIM). The various writers of the OT present, as is to be expected on such a subject, different conceptions of the condition of the deceased. In the beginning probably a vague and impersonal idea prevailed (Gen 4 15-18), and when the Son of Man was held, without the activities (Isa 69 10) and the joys of the present life (Ps 49 17). They dwell in the "land of forgetfulness" (Job 14 21; Ps 88 5; cf Isa 25 14), they "tremble" of cold (Job 26 5), they totter and "stumble at noonday as at the twilight" (Isa 69 10), their voice is described as low and muttering or chirping (Isa 8 19; 29 4), which may refer to the peculiar pitch of the voice of the spirit medium when a spirit speaks through him. (The calling up of the dead, which was strictly forbidden to Israel (Lev 19 31; 20 27) is referred to in Is 28 13 and perhaps in Isa 49 14.) The deceased are separated from their friends; love and hatred have both ceased with them (Ecc 9 5-6); "There is no work, nor device, or knowledge, nor wisdom, in Sheol" (Ecc 9 10). The deceased are unable to praise Jeh (Ps 6 5; 88 10-12; Isa 38 18; Bar 2 17; Sir 17 27-28). Nor does there seem to have been at first any anticipation of reward or punishment after death (Ps 88 10; Sir 41 4), nor was death probably because the shades were supposed to be lacking the organs by which either reward or punishment could be perceived; nevertheless they are still in the realm of God's power (1 S 2 6; Ps 88 13; 139 8; 149 6; Jer 15 11; Isa 7 11; Hos 13 14; Am 9 2; Tob 13 2).

Gradually the possibility of a return of the departed was conceived (Gen 5 24; 2 K 13 21; Ps 49 15; 73 24; 86 13; Hos 13 14; 3 Wld 5 1-7; 4 13 15; 18 19; 19 10). By the 2nd cent. it is often more the idea of the immortality of the soul than that of the resurrection of the body, and some of these passages may be interpreted as allegorical expressions for a temporal rescue from great disasters (e.g. 1 S 2 6); nevertheless this interpretation presupposes the existence of a deliverance from the shadows of Sheol to a better life in the presence of Jeh. Some passages refer clearly to such an escape at the end of the age (Dni 12 2; Isa 26 19). Only very few of the OT believers reached the sublime faith of Job (19 25-26) and none the blessed expectation taught in the NT, for none but Christ has "brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tim 1 10; Jn 5 26-28).

The opinion that the dead or at least the newly buried could partake of the food which was placed in graves, a custom which recent excavations have clearly shown to have been almost universal in Pal, and which is referred to in Dt 25 4 and Tob 4 17, was soon doubted (Sir 30 18), and food and drink prepared for the funeral was henceforth intended as the "bread of comfort" and the "cup of consolation" for the mourners (Jer 16 7; 2 S 3 35; Ezek 14 17). Similarly the offering and burning of incense, originally offered to the deceased, became a relief for the mourner (2 Ch 16 14; 21 19; Jer 34 5). See also Wisd 3 2; 7 6; Sir 38 23, and arts. DECEASE, dê-sâs', IN NT (ταλαιπώρω, telelai'ow, "to come to an end," "married and deceased") [Mt 22 25]: With θανάτω, thanâtō, "death," "die the death," (Mt 15 4; Mk 7 10, RVn "surely die"). Elsewhere the word is used only of death after the resurrection: Mt 5 19; Mk 8 45 and A.V.; He 11 22, RV "end of life." Also, the suf., ἀνθέω, άνθέω, "exodus," "exit," "departure," "his decease which he was about to accomplish" (Lk 9 31, RVn "departure"); "after my decease" (2 Pet 1 15, RVn "departure").

DECIEUT, dê-sê'et (παπαίω, mýmâbô, ἀδικεῖω, ἀλογό:): The intentional misleading of another;
Perplexing questions were many times decided by the casting of lots. The people believed that God would in this way direct them to the

3. Methods right decision (Prov 16 33; Josh 7 of Form: 2 Thess 3:10; but in such passages as Ps 55 11; Prov 20 17; 26 26; 1 Thess 1 2, renders a variety of words, more accurately than the AV, "oppression," "falsehood," "guile," "error.")

DECEIVABILITY, dé-é-sév'·a-bil·i·ties, DECEIVE, dé-é-sév' (Nú'ú, nó'ásh, "to lead astray"): "the pride of thy heart hath deceived thee" (Jer 49 10), i.e. "Thy stern mountain fastnesses have persuaded thee that thou art impregnable." In Jer 20 7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived," rá'á'h, signifies "to be enticed," "persuaded," as in AV and RvM.

In the OT most often, and in the NT regularly, the various words rendered in AV "deceive" denote some deliberate misleading in the moral or spiritual realm. False prophets (2 Chr 38 3), false teachers (Eph 5 6) and Satan himself (Rev 12 9) are deceivers in this sense. In the gospels, AV "deceive" (πáná, planáó, 9 t., Mt 24 4.5 | Mk 13 5.6 | Lk 21 8; Mt 24 11.24; Jn 7 42) becomes in RV "lead astray" a sense unchangeable in J 2 26; 3 7; but elsewhere (13 t.) both AV and RV render planáó by "deceive."

"Deceivableness" (dé-dá'n, apá'dl), only in 2 Thess 2 10, signifies power to deceive, not liability to deception; RV "deceit."

DECENCY, dé-sent·li (év·ón·yá·dus, euaphé·sos): Only once is this word found in our Eng. Bible (1 Cor 14 40). It is in the last verse of that remarkable chapter on the proper use of spiritual gifts in the church and the proper conduct of public worship. It does not refer here to absence of impurity or obscenity. It rather refers to good order in the conduct of public worship. All things that are done and said in public worship are to be in harmony with that becoming and reverent spirit and tone that befit the true worshippers of God.

DECISION, dé-síz·'un: Has several different shades of meaning. It expresses the formation of a judgment on a matter under consideration. It expresses the quality of being firm or positive in one's actions. It expresses the termination of a contest or question in favor of one side or the other, as the decision of the battle, or the decision of the judge.

Until recent times the decision of disputed points between nations was determined by force of arms. Thus the questions of dispute were

1. National decided between Israel and the surrounding nations.

2. Judicial Israel became a nation men were no longer judges to assist him (see Ex 15 13-26). One important function of those who are called judges was to decide the difficulties between the people. At this first was one of the most important duties of Moses, but when he left the task became too great he appointed judges to assist him (see Ex 15 13-26). One important function of those who are called judges was to decide the difficulties between the people (see Jgs 4 4.5). The kings also decided questions of dispute between individuals (2 Sam 4 1-4 | 1 K 3 16-29). As the people developed in their national ideals the decisions in judicial matters were rendered by councils appointed for that purpose.

DECISION, VALLEY OF. See Jehoshaphat, Valley of.

DECLARATION, dé·ka·ná-rá·shun, DECLARE, dé·klá·rè: "Declare" is the tr. of a variety of Heb and Gr words in the OT and NT, appearing to bear uniformly the meaning "to make known," "set forth," rather than (the older meaning) "to explain" (Dt 1 5). Declaration (Est 10 2 AV, RV "full account"); Job 41 17; Ecclus 43 4 (1 LAV, RV "narrative"); 2 Cor 8 10 AV, RV "to show" has the like meaning.

DECLINE, dé·klí·nè (nán, súr, or nán, súr, nán, nádóh): In AV this word occurs 9 t. in its original sense (now obsolete) of "turn aside." RV substitutes "turn aside" in Ex 23 2; Dt 17 11; 2 Ch 34 2; Job 11 11. In Ps 102 11; 109 23, the lengthening shadows of afternoon are said to "decline," and RV introduces the word in the same general sense in Jgs 19 8; 2 K 20 10; Jer 6 4. See Afternoon.

DEDAN, dé·dán, DEDANITES, dé·dán·te·s (AV Dedanim, ded·a·nim; ?'; ?', dé·dán·im): An Arabian people named in Gen 10 7 as descended from Cush; in Gen 25 3 as descended from Keturah. Evidently they were, like the related Sheba (Sabaeans), of mixed race (cf Gen 10 7.28). In Isa 21 13 allusion is made to the "caravans of Dedanites" in the wilds of Arabia, and Ezek mentions them as supplying Tyre with precious things (Ezk 27 20; in ver 15, "Dedan" should probably be read as in LXX, "Rodan," i.e. Rhodians). The name seems still to linger in the island of Dedan, on the border of the Persian Gulf. It is found also in Min. and Sab. inscriptions (Glazer, II, 392 ff).

DEDICATE, ded·i·kát, DEDICATION, ded·i·ká·shún (qá·tún), hánika·kóh, "initiation," "consecration," "rúp, šá·dók, "to be clean," "sanctify"; יַעֲנֵה, "a thing devoted [to God]"): Often used in Heb of the consecration of persons, but usually in the EV of the setting apart of things to a sacred use, as of the altar (Nu 7 10f.84.88; cf Dn 3 2.8, "the d. of the image"); of silver and gold (2 S 8 11; 2 K 12 4), of the Temple (1 K 6 35; Ezr 6 16); of Ex 29 44), of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 27), of private dwellings (Dt 20 5). RV substitutes "devoted" for "dedicated" in Ezk 44 29. See CONSECRATION; SANCTIFICATION.

DEDICATION, ded·i·ká·shún, FEAST OF (rā·yá·sá·na, ša·qá·kón·i·ná, Ju 10 22): A feast held by the Jews throughout the country for eight days, commencing on the 25th Kislev (December), in commemoration of the cleansing of the temple and dedication of the altar by Judas Maccabaeus after their desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 4 50.59). The feast was to be kept "with mirth and gladness." 2 Macc 10 6.7 says it was kept DEER, dēd: Used in its ordinary modern sense in EV. In the OT it is used to tr five Heb words: gônâlā, Eq. "recompense" (Isa 50 18); dâdbḥ, lit. "harm," "wound" (2 Ch 36 27 AV, RV "wound"); Est 1 17 18; Jer 28) ma'dâsch (Gen 20 9; 44 15; Ezr 9 13); dâlah (1 Ch 16 8 AV, RV "doings"); Ps 106 1 AV, RV "doings"); pôl (Ps 82 4 AV, RV "work"); Jer 25 14). In the NT "deed" very frequently translates ἐργα, ἐργον (same root as Eng. "work"); cf "energy," which is still more frequently (esp. in RV) rendered "work." In Lk 25 51; Acts 19 18; Rom 8 13; Col 3 9 AV, RV doings, it stands for Gr πᾶσας, πολιτεία, lit. "a doing," "transaction," each time in a bad sense, which is more frequently associated with the pl. of πρᾶξις (cf. Eng. "practices") in the sense of trickery; so often in Polity. Deissmann maintains that πρᾶξις was a technical term. Also used in the creation, and the subterranean reservoir of water (Gen 7 11; 8 2; 49 25; Dtt 33 13; Ezek 31 4, etc.). In the RV the Gr word first noted is rendered, lit., "abuses." See ASTRONOMY, III, 7.

DEEP SLEEP. See SLEEP, DEEP.

DEER, dēr (גָּר, 'ayyàl, fem. גָּרָה, 'ayyâlah, and גָּרָא, 'ayyelah [cf Arab. 'ayyâd and 'iyd], "deer," and וָּר, 'ayyâl, "ram," and Lat caper and capra, "goat," capra, capra, "wild goat," "sheep," or "wild sheep," yâhâm, of Arab. yâhâm, "deer"); לֹֽאַ בּוּר, 'ayyâlah, fem. of בּוּר, 'ayl (cf Arab. wa'l), "Pers wild goat"); כֹּể, c'bîhî, and fem. כֹּֽאֲבִיתוּת, c'bîyâhâ [cf Arab. sâ'bî and fem. sâ'bîyâh, "gazelle"]; כֹּֽֽפְּר, 'ophâr [cf Arab. ghâfr and ghâfr], "young of the mountain goat").

Of the words in the preceding list, the writer believes that only the first two, i.e. 'ayyàl (with its fem. forms) and yâhâm should be tr "deer." 'ayyâl for the roe deer, and yâhâm for the fallow deer. Further, he believes that yâhâm (incl. yâhâh) should be tr "ibex," and c'bîhî, "gazelle." 'Ophâr is the young of a roe deer or of a gazelle.

'AYYâl and its fem. forms are regularly in EV rendered "hart" and "hind," terms which are more commonly applied to the male and female of the red deer, Cervus elaphus, which inhabits Great Britain, the continent of Europe, the Caucasus and Asia Minor, but which has never been reported as far south as Syria or Pal. The roe deer, Capreolus capreolus, however, is more widely distributed. The British Isles, the greater part of Europe, the Caucasus and Persia, is certainly found in Pal. The museum of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirût possesses the skeleton of a roe deer which was shot in the mountains near Tyre. As late as 1890 it was fairly common in southern Lebanon and Carmel, but has now become very scarce. The fallow deer, Cervus dama, is a native of Northern Africa and countries about the Mediterranean. It is found in central Europe and Great Britain, where it has been introduced from its more southern habitat. A variety of the fallow deer, sometimes considered a separate species under the name of Cervus Mesopotamicus, inhabits northeastern Mesopotamia and Persia. It may in former times have been found in Pal, and Tristram reports having seen the fallow deer in Galilee (Palaeo. Flora of Pal., while Bristram was a remarkably acute observer, he appears to have been too readily satisfied, and his observations, when unaccompanied, as in this case, by specimens, are to be accepted with caution. Now 'ayyâl (and its fem. forms) occurs in the Bible 24 t, while yâhâm occurs only twice, i.e. in the list of clean animals in Dt 14 5, and in 1 K 4 23, in the list of animals provided for Solomon's table. In both places AV has "fallow deer" and RV "roe-buck." In view of the fact that the roe deer has within recent years been common in Pal, while the occurrence of the fallow deer must be considered doubtful, it seems fair to render 'ayyâl "roe deer" or "roe-buck," leaving yâhâm for fallow deer.

The Arabic equivalent for 'ayyâl and its fem. forms is the word 'ál. 'Alâ el (incl. ya'dâlah) occurs 4 t. In Job 39 1; Ps 104 18; 1 S 24 2, EV renders ya'âl by "wild goat." For yâhâm in Prov 6 19, AV has "roe," while RV has "doe," which is non-committal, since the name, "doe," may be applied to the female of a deer or of an ibex. Since the Arab 'álâ, which is etymologically closely akin to ya'âl, means the Pers wild goat, it might be supposed that that animal was meant, were it not that the plains of the Syrian desert, and not the mountains of Southern Pal, where the ibex lives. At least two of the passages clearly indicate the latter locality, i.e. Ps 104 18: "The high mountains are for the wild goat." In 1 S 24 22 David, seeking the young of the roe deer", and 2 K 25 9: "Asahel was as light of foot as a wild roe, and 1 Ch 12 8: "were as swift as the roes upon the mountains." 'Ayyâd and c'bîhî occur together in Dt 12 15 22; 14 5; 15 22; 1 K 4 23; Cant 2 9 17, i.e. in 7 of the 16 passages in which we find c'bîhî. If therefore it be accepted that 'ayyâl is the roe deer, it follows that c'bîhî must be something else. Now the gazelle both in the Bible and in Pal satisfies perfectly every passage in which we find c'bîhî. Further, one of the Arab names of the gazelle is sâbî, a word which is etymologically much nearer to c'bîhî than appears in this translation.

'Ohphâr is akin to 'éphâr, "dust," and has reference to the color of the young of the deer or gazelle, to both of which it is applied. In Cant 2 9 17 and 8 14, we have 'éphâr hâ-'ayyâdîm, EV "young hart," lit. "fawn of the roe deer." In Cant 4 5 and 7 3, we have 'ophîrin t'ôvân c'bîyâhâ, AV "young does that are twins," RV "fawns that are twins of a roe."
RVM 'gazelle' (for "roe"). For further reference to these questions, see ZOOLOGY.

With the exception of mere lists of animals, as in Dt 14 and 1 K 4, the treatment of these animals is highly poetical, and shows much appreciation of their grace and beauty.

ALFRED EYD DAY

DEFAME, dē-fām', DEFAMING, dē-fām'ing: These words occur but twice in AV, and are translations of ἁμαρτανεῖν, dābāth, "to slander," or spread an evil report, and φανερώσειν, blassphēmē, "to speak injuriously" of anyone (Jer 20 10; 1 Cor 4 13). "To defame" differs from "to revile" in that the former refers to public slander, the latter to personal abuse.

DELECT, dē-fekt', DEFECTIVE, dē-fekt'iv (ἀπόθεομαι, ἀποθέτω, "loss," "a defect"): Occurs in 1 Cor 6 7; "Nay, already it is altogether a defect in you [AV "there is utterly a fault among you"]; that is, have you not one another. "Defect" means "want or absence of something necessary for completeness" (RVM "a loss to you"). The meaning of the passage in RV is that when Christians have lawsuits one with another it produces a lack of something necessary for completeness, they suffer a spiritual loss or defeat, and perhaps defect is not quite strong enough fully to express that idea.

DEFER, dē-fōr' (נָאֶב, 'aḇar [in Hiphil], נָאֶך, 'arakh [in Hiphil], נָאֶה, māshākha [in Niphal], "to postpone," more or less definitely; "delay"); In OT passages such as Is 48 9; Ezek 12 25-28; Dnll 9 19, the idea of indefinite postponement agrees with the Heb and with the context. In the only NT occurrence of the word (ἀρξάμενοι, ἀραβαλδίνοι, in the χύτραν νεκρῶν ones with another). One with another. "Defect" means "want or absence of something necessary for completeness" (RVM "a loss to you"). The meaning of the passage in RV is that when Christians have lawsuits one with another it produces a lack of something necessary for completeness, they suffer a spiritual loss or defeat, and perhaps defect is not quite strong enough fully to express that idea.

Defilement in the OT was physical, sexual, ethical, ceremonial, religious, the last four, esp., overlapping.

1. Physical: "I have washed my feet; how shall I d. them?" [Cant 6 17]; 1 Peter's 1 21; 2 Sexual: as to the OT moral or moral; of individuals by illicit intercourse (Lev 18 20), or by intercourse at forbidden times (15 24; 1 S 21 5); of the land by adultery: "Shall not that land be greatly defiled?" [Jer 3 1 ARV "polluted," usually substituted where the moral or religious predominates over the ceremonial].

2. Ethical: Your hands are defiled with blood (Isa 65 9); "Neither shall they d. themselves any more with any of their transgressions" [Ezk 37 23].

3. Ceremonial: to render ceremonially unclean, i.e. disqualified for religious service or worship, and capable of communicating the disqualification.

(a) Persons were defiled by contact with carcasses of unclean animals (Lev 11 24); or with any carcass (17 15); by eating a carcass (22 8); by contact with issues from the body, one's own or another's, e.g. abnormal issues from the genitals, male or female (15 22-23); menstruation (Lev 15 19); or by contact with anyone thus unclean. Thus defilements are: (I) defilement for childbirth (12 2-5); by contact with unclean persons (5 3), or unclean things (22 6), or with leprosy (esp. defiling: 13 14), or with the dead (Nu 6 12), or with those unclean persons in which contact (15 19); by contact with creeping things (22 5), or with unclean animals (11 26). (b) Holy objects were ceremonially defiled by the contact, entrance or approach of the defiled (Lev 15 11; Nu 19 13); by the presence of defiled persons remains of the dead (Ezk 9 7; 2 K 23 16; Josiah's defilement of heathen altars by the ashes of the priests; by the entrance of foreigners (Ps 79 1; see Acts 21 26); by forbidden treatment, as the altar by being trodden (Ex 20 25); objects in general by contact with the unclean. Ceremonial defilement, strictly considered, implied, not sin, but ritual unfitness. (5) Religious: not always easily distinguished or entirely distinguishable from the ceremonial, still less from the ethical, but in which the central attitude and relationship to Jeh as covenant God and God of righteousness, was more fully in question. The land might be defiled by bloodshed (Lev 17 10; Num 35 33), esp. by blood of just or innocent; by adultery (Jer 3 1); by idolatry and idolatrous practices, like sacrificing children to idols, etc (Lev 20 3; Ps 106 39); the temple or altar by disrespect (Mal 1 7.12); by offering the unclean (Hag 2 14); not ceremonially cleansed (Ezk 36 17); by the presence of idols or idolatrous paraphernalia (Jer 7 30).

The scope of defilement in its various degrees (direct, or primary, as from the person or thing defiled; indirect, or secondary, tertiary, further, by contact with the person or thing in NT defiled) had been greatly widened by rabbinism into a complex and immensely burdensome system whose shadow falls over the whole NT life. Specific mentions are comparatively few. Physical d. is not mentioned. Sexual d. appears, in a figurative sense: "These are they that were not defiled with women" (Rev 14 4). Ceremonial d. is found in, but not approved by, the NT: the OT concept of "stain," "common," not ceremonially cleansed: "eating with unclean hands (Mk 7 2); by eating unclean, "common", (food (Acts 10 14; Peter's vision); by intimate association with Gentiles, such as eating with them (not expressly forbidden in Mosaic law; Acts 11 4), or entering into their houses (Lk 8 41); or Pharisees refusing to enter the Praetorium); by the presence of Gentiles in the Temple (Acts 21
28. But with Christ's decisive and revolutionary dictum (Mk 7:19): "This he said, making all meats clean," etc., and with the command in Peter's vision: "What God hath cleansed, make not thou common" (Acts 10:15), the bold and consistent teaching, "All things indeed are clean" (Rom 14:20, etc.), the idea of ceremonial or ritual d., having accomplished its educative purpose, passed. Defilement in the NT teaching, therefore, is uniformly ethical or spiritual, the two constantly merging. The ethical is found more predominantly in: "the things which proceed out of the mouth come forth out of the heart; and they defile the man" (Mt 15:18); "that did not defile their garments" (Rev 3:4); "defileth the whole body" (Jas 3:6). The spiritual seems to predominate in: "defiled and unbelieving" (Tit 1:15); "conscience being weak is defiled" (by concession to idolatry) (1 Cor 8:7); "lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby the many be defiled" (Heb 12:15). For the supposed origins of the idea and details of defilement, as from hygienic or aesthetic causes, "natural aversions," "taboo," "totemism," associations with ideas of death, or evil life, religious symbolism, etc., see Poliarchus, Jordanus, Caelestis, etc. Whatever use God may have made of ideas and feelings common among many nations in some form, the Divine purpose was clearly to impress deeply and indelibly on the Israelites the ideas of holiness and sacredness in general, and of Jeho's holiness, and their own required holiness and separateness in particular, thus preparing for the deep NT teachings of sin, and of spiritual consecration and sanctification.

DEFEY, דֶּפֶּה (De 29:7; Lev 7:23; zâhman): In 1 S 17 10.25.26.36.45 (the story of David and Goliath) and kindred passages, this word is used in its most familiar sense—to taunt, "challenge to combat" (Heb 5hrâph). In Nu 23 7.8 "denounce" would be a better tr than "defey" (Heb zâm).

DEGENERATE, דֶּגֶנֶּר-אָט: Only in Jer 2 1, where Judah is compared to a "noible vine" which it "turned into the degenerate branches of a foreign vine." God's Christ was "Dag'ráy" or "Dag' disgr (shoots), from gâr= "to turn aside," esp. to turn aside from the right path (Gr pòkria, lit. "bitterness").

DEGREE, דֶּשֶּר (De 33:7, ma'âlâd, "a going up" or "ascent," hence a staircase or flight of steps; "rank": τάξις, tapeinôs, "low"): By derivation it should mean "a step down" (Lat. de, down, gradus, step). It is used, however, of any step up or down; then of grade or rank, whether high or low. (1) In its literal sense of step (as of a stair), it is used in the pl. to translate Heb ma'âlôth ("steps"), in the parallels 2 K 20 9–11 AV (5 t); Isa 38 8 AV (3 t), where we read of the "degrees" (RV "steps") on the "dial of Ahaz" (Heb "steps of Ahaz"). See DIAL OF AHAZ. It seems to mean steps or progressive movements of the body toward a certain place in the phrase "A Song of Degrees" (RV "Ascents"), which forms the title of each of the Ps 120–34, probably because they were sung on the way up to the great feasts at Jerusalem. See Psalms. (2) The secondary (but now the more usual) sense of rank, order, grade is found in the following passages: (a) 1 Ch 15 18, "their brethren of the second degree of歌s"; (b) 2 Chron 25 7, "Elkanah that was next to the king," Heb, "the king's second," i.e. in rank; (c) 1 Ch 17 17, "a man of high degree" (Heb ma'âlôth, "step"); (d) Ps 62 9, "men of low degree . . . men of high degree," a paraphrase of Heb "sons of man . . . sons of man," the first "man" being Heb 'âdâm ("common humanity"); cf Gr ânthropos, Lat homo, Welsh dyn), and the second Heb 'ât (man in a superior sense; cf Gr anér, Lat vir, Welsh gar); (d) "of low degree" for Gr tâpetinos in Sir 11 1; Ps 1 9); (e) 1 Tim 3 1, AV "a good degree" (Gr batômos kalôs, RV "a good standing") is assured to those who have "served well as deacons." Some take this to mean promotion to a higher official position in the church; but it probably means simply a position of moral weight and influence in the church gained by faithfulness in service (so Hoft).

DEGREES, SONGS OF (דָּשֶּר יָדָעַת, shîr ha-ma'âlôth; LXX θῶν ἀναμέτρητον, σῶν τῶν αναμετρητῶν; Vulg. menticum graduum, RV "a song of ascents"): The title prefixed to 15 psalms (Psal 120–34) as to the significance of which there are four views: (1) The Jewish interpretation. According to the Mish, Malekoth 2 5, Sukkah 51b, there was in the temple a semicircular flight of stairs with 15 steps which led from the court of the men of Israel down to the court of the women. Upon these stairs the Levites played on musical instruments on the evening of the holy day of Tabernacles. Later Jewish writers say that the 15 psalms derived their title from the step of exile. (2) Gesenius, Delitzsch and others affirm that these psalms derive their name from the step-like progressive rhythm of their thoughts. They are called Songs of Degrees because they move forward climatically by means of the resumption of the immediately preceding one. But this characteristic is not found in several of the group. (3) Theodoret and other Fathers explain these 15 hymns as traveling songs of the returning exiles. In Ezr 7 9 the return from exile is called "the going up (ha-ma'âlôth) from Babylonia." Several of the group suit this situation quite well, but others presuppose the temple and its stated services. (4) The most probable view is that the hymns were sung by pilgrim bands on their way to the three great festivals of the Jewish year. The journey to Jerusalem was called a "going up," whether the worshipper came from north or south, east or west. All of the songs are suitable for use on such occasions. Hence the title Pilgrim Psalms is preferred by many scholars. See DIAL OF AHAZ.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

DEHAYITES, דֵּהָיֵטִים (Nîyîyê, dehâwê; AV Dehavites): A people enumerated in Ezr 4 9 with Elamites, etc. Among those settled by the Assyrian king Osnapper (Assur-anapal) in Samaria. The identification is uncertain.

DEHORI, דֵּהָרִית (הֶרְצָרָה, apotrepô̔th; RV DISSUADE): Not found in the Eng. Bible; once only in Apoc (1 Macc 9 9). An obsolete Eng. word; the opposite of "exhort." It means "to dissuade," "to forbid," "to restrain from."

DEKAR, דֵּכָר (דָּכָר, deber, "lance"): Father of one of Solomon's commissaries (1 K 4 9 AV). See Ben-deker.

DELAIAH, דֵּלְיָה (Dâlîyêh, "God has raised"): (1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24; AV "Dalahiah"). (2) One of David's priests and leader of the 23d course (1 Ch 23 18).

(3) One of the princes who pleaded with Jehoiakim not to destroy the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer 36 12:25).

(4) The ancestor of a post-exilic family whose genealogy was restored (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62; 1 Esd 5 37 m.). See Dala

(5) The father of timorous Shemaiah (Neh 6 10).
DELEVY, dél-lá'; The noun “delay” (Acts 25 17, “I made no delay”; AV “without any delay”) means “procrastination.” The vb. “to delay” (Ex 22 20; Dan 3, “stah”; Ex 32 “take pleasure in”) involves the idea “to stop for a time,” the people being admonished not to discontinue a custom. The Pl. pf. of[délyah, [bshah (Ex 32 “be pleased to come”) expresses not only the fact that he tarried, but also the disappointment on the part of the people, being under the impression that he possibly was put to shame and had failed in his mission, which also better explains the consequent action of the people. “To delay” (xovrai, chronizo; Ev) is used transitively in Mt 24 48 (RV “My lord tarrieth”) and in Lk 12 45. The meaning here is “to prolong,” “to defer.”

DELECTABLE, de-lek-ta-b’le (Exx, bhamanah, “to desire”): Found only in Isa 44 9 AV: “Their delectable things shall not profit,” AVM “desirable.” ARV translates: “the things that they delight in.” The reference is to idols or images. Deltsch renders it “savor.” Their darlings are good for nothing.” This word may be traced back to the Lat dlectabilis, “pleasant,” or “delightful!”

DELECTACI (1 K 19 2), (tô otrhno, tô sthno): Found only in Rev 15 3 AV: “The merchants of earth rejoiced for the abundance of her delicacies.” RV has very properly changed delicacies to delectances, and “luxury” in the margin, which is much nearer to the original.

DELICATE, de-li-kat, DELICATELY, de-li-kat-li (Gen 40 7, “thanken, Gen 27, “thou/thou, ev terph), en terph): “Delicate” usually an adj, but once a subst. (Jer 51 34 AV, “He hath filled his belly [RV ‘maw’] with my delicacies.” RV retards the word, but ARV very properly has replaced it with “delicacies.” In Acts 20 1, “luxurious” or “daintily bred” would certainly be nearer the original than “delicate.” “Delicate children” of Mic 1 16 AV is changed by RV to “children of thy delight,” i.e. beloved children, rather than children begotten in passion. The advb. “delicately” is employed in the same sense as the adj. (Lam 4 6; Lk 7 27). In the old Eng, writers “delicate” is often used for voluptuous: “Divs for his delicate life to the devil went!” (Piers Plowman). The meaning of “delicated” (ma‘dah 1) in 1 Sam 15 32 (AV) is a real puzzle. The AV reads, “And Agag came unto him delicately,” with a possible suggestion of weakness or fear. ARV and RV substitute “cheerfully.” Others, by metaphor or change of consonants in the Heb. tr “in bonds” or “fetters.”

W. W. DAVIES

DELICIOUSLY, de-lis-hus-li (strophous, stremmed, “to live hard or wantonly”); “She [Babylon] . . . lived deliciously” (Rev 18 7 AV, RV “wantonly.” RVM “luxuriously”)

DELIGHT, de-lit (vb, PET), ἥπεσ, ἀπό, ἡρμα ποι, ἐπιθελλομαι, platei), “to be most frequently expressed by ἥπεσ, which means originally “to bend” (of Job 40 17, “He moveth his tail,” Deut. 25 “to take pleasure in”), it is used of God’s pleasure in His people (Nu 14 8; 2 S 22 20; Ps 18 19, etc), and in righteousness, etc (Isa 66 4; Jer 24; Mic 7 8, etc), also of man’s delight in God and His will (Ps 40 8; 73 25; AV and RV, “There is none upon earth that I desire besides thee”), and in other objects (Gen 34 19; 1 S 18 22; Est 2 14; Is 66 3); sh’d’a, “to stroke,” “caress,” “be fond of,” occurs in Ps 94 19, “Thy comforts delight my soul” 119 16.67.70, “I will delight myself in thy statutes.” Similarly, St. Paul says “Rom 7 22, “I delight [enjoy] in the law of God after the inward man.” This is the only occurrence of the word in the NT.

“To delight one’s self” (in the Lord) is represented ideally by &aph (Job 22 26; 27 10; Ps 37 4111; Is 58 13).

DELIGHT, noun, chiefly ἱππες (1 S 16 22; Ps 1 2; 16 3), ῥαγόν (Prov 11 1.20; 12 22; 16 8), sh’ha’sh’vum (Ps 119 24.77.92.143.174; Ps 80 30. 31). RV has “delight” for “desire” (Neh 1 11; Ps 22 8; 61 10), for “observing,” different reading (Prov 23 20), “no delight” for “smell in” (Am 5 21), “delightest in me” for “favoroest me” (Ps 41 11), “his delight shall be in” (m “Heb sect”) for “of quick understanding” (Isa 11 3).

The element of joy, of delight in God and His law and will, in the Heb religion is noteworthy as being something which we are apt to fall below even in the clearer light of Christianity.

DELIGHTSOME, de-lit’sum (TP, ἱππες, is rendered “delightsome”): Mal 1 2, “Thou shalt be a delightsome land,” lit., “a land of delight.”

DELILAH, de-li’la (TP, dli‘lah, “dainty one,” perhaps; LXX Διλαθής, Deliledi, Delathē, Dalithē): The woman who betrayed Samson to the Philis (Jgs 16). She was presumably a Phil, though not expressly stated. She is not spoken of as Samson’s wife, though many have understood the account in that way. The Philis paid her a tremendously high price for her services. The account indicates that for beauty, personal charm, mental ability, self-command, nerve, she was quite a wonderful woman, a woman to be admired for some qualities which she exhibits, even while she is to be utterly disapproved. See SAMSON.

WILLIS J. BRECHER

DELIVER, de-li’vér (TP, nāgol, lā, ndhan, ἔφεκα, ἐφοιμα, μαραθωμα, paradidōμαι, paradidōmi, 1): Occurs very frequently in the OT and represents various Heb terms. The Eng. word is used in two senses, (1) “to set free, or to save” (2) “to give, as a gift” (given over, OT). (1) The word most often used “deliver” in the first sense is nāgol, meaning originally, perhaps, “to draw out.” It is used of all kinds of deliverance (Gen 32 11; Ps 25 20; 143 9, etc; Jer 7 10; Ezek 3 19, etc; Zeph 1 18, etc). The Amm. nāqol occurs in Dan 3 23; 6 14; 8 4, “yāhā, “to save,” in Jgs 9 31 AV, etc, ndlah, “let or cause to escape,” in Isa 46 2, “recover,” etc. In the NT ῥωμαι, “to rescue,” is most frequently fr deliver” in this sense (Mt 6 13 AV, “Deliver us from evil”); katapost, “to make useless” or “without effect” (Rom 7 6 RV, “discharged”). In the NT “save” takes largely the place of “deliver” in the OT, and the idea is raised to the spiritual and eternal.

(2) For “deliver” in the sense of “give over, up,” etc., the most frequent word is wāhan, the common word for “to give” (Gen 32 16; 40 13 AV; Ex 5 18). Other words are māghān (Hos 11 8, AV and ERv “How shall I deliver thee Israel?” i.e. “How shall I give thee up?” as in the first clause of the sentence, with the different word [nathan, “ARV “How shall I cast thee off?”]

In the NT paradidōmi, “to give over to,” is most frequent (Mt 6 25; 11 27, “All things have been delivered [given or made over] unto me of my Father,” Mt 7 13; Lk 1 2; 1 Tim 1 20, etc), “to grant as a favor” (Acts 25 11. 16 AV).
(3) Yădah, “to bring forth,” is also rendered “deliver” in the sense of childbirth (Gen 25:24; Ex 1 19, etc.). In the NT this sense is borne by ἀποκράτ. (Lk 1 57; 2 6; Rev 12 24), and γενεά, genêdô (Jn 16 21).

In RV there are many changes, such as, for “deliver” (Ex 15 10; Dt 24 13), for “delivered,” “defended” (1 Ch 11 14); for “cannot deliver thee,” “neither . . . turn thee aside” (Job 36 18); for “betray,” “betrayed” we have “deliver,” “delivered up,” etc (Mt 26 48; Mk 10 11; 14 50; Lk 21 16); for “delivered into hands,” “committed to put” (2 Pet 2 4, m “some ancient authorities read chains”; cf Wisd 17 17), “Deliver us from evil,” omitted in Lk 11 4, m “Many ancient authorities add but deliver us from the evil one (or, from evil),” W. DELOS, de'los (Δήλος, Delos): An island, now deserted, one of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea, about 8 miles long and 1 mile broad, with a rocky mountain (Cyntaces) of several hundred feet high in the center. In antiquity Delos enjoyed great prosperity. According to Gr legend the island once floated on the surface of the water, until Poseidon fastened it on four diamond pillars for the deity who, like Io, was pursued by the vengeful Hera. It was here that Apollo and Artemis were born; hence the island was sacred, and became one of the chief seats of worship of the two deities. Numerous temples embellished Delos. The most magnificent was that of Apollo, which contained a colossal statue of the god, a dedicatory offering of the Naxians. This temple was a sanctuary visited by all the Greeks, who came from far and near to worship at the deity's shrines. Delos was famous as the traditional location of the sanctuary of Apollo, the Delian temple in Delos from the beginning of the 4th cent. BC. To the N. was a remarkable altar composed entirely of ox-horns. The various Ionian cities sent sacred embassies (theoriai) with rich offerings. There was also a celebrated oracle in Delos which was accounted one of the most trustworthy in the world. Every five years the famous Delian festival was celebrated with prophecies, athletic contests and games of every kind. All the nations of Greece participated.

The earliest inhabitants of Delos were Carians; but about 1000 BC the island was occupied by Ionians. For a long time it enjoyed independence. In 478 Delos was chosen as the place for the convention of the representatives of the Gr states for deliberation about means for defence against Persia. The treasury of the Athenian Confederacy was kept here after 476. The island became independent of Athens in 454. During the 24d and 1st cent. BC it became one of the chief ports of the Aegean. This was partly due to its location, and partly to the fact that the Romans, after 190 BC, favored the island as a rival to the sea-power of Rhodes. In 166 Delos was given to Athens; the inhabitants fled to Achaia, and the island was colonized by Athenians, together with Romans.

The ruins of the city of Delos, which became a flourishing commercial port, are to the N. of the temple. It became the center of trade between Alexandria and the Black Sea, and was for a long time one of the chief slave markets of the Gr world. But Delos received a severe blow, from which it never recovered, in the war between Rome and Mithridates. The latter's general landed in 88 BC and massacred many, and sold the remainder of the defenceless people, and sacked and destroyed the city together with the temple and its countless treasures. At the conclusion of peace (84) Delos came into the possession of the Romans, who later gave it back to Athens. Under the Empire the island lost its importance entirely.

Delos was one of the states to which Rome addressed letters in behalf of the Jews (138-137 BC; see 1 Macr 15 16-23). Among those who came to Delos from the East must have been many of this nation. Jos cites in full a decree passed in Delos which confirmed the Jewish exemption from military service (Ant, XIV, x, 4).

The excavations of the French have laid bare 8 temples within the sacred inclosure (Apollo, Artemis, Dionysus). Numerous statues, dating from the earliest times of Gr art down to the latest, have been discovered; also 2,000 inscriptions, among which was an inventory of the temple treasures.

By the side of Delos, across a very narrow strait, lies Rheia, another island which was the burying-ground of Delos; for on the sacred isle neither births, deaths nor burials were permitted. In 426 BC Delos was “purified” by the Athenians—by the removal of the bodies that had been interred there previously.

The means described in Gen 6-9 by which the Lord destroyed, on account of their wickedness, all the members of the human race except Noah and his family. According to the Biblical account, Noah was warned of the approaching destruction, in which all the nations of the world would pass away except his own family (Gen 6:2; 1 Pet 3:20; 2 Pet 2:5). During all this time he is said to have been a "preacher of righteousness" "while the ark was a preparing," when we may well suppose (according to the theory to be presently presented) that the physical events leading up to the final catastrophe may have given point to his preaching. When the catastrophe came, the physical means employed were twofold, namely, the breaking up of the "fountains of the great deep" and the opening of "the windows of heaven" (Gen 7:11). But the rain is spoken of as continuing as a main cause only 40 days, while the waters continued to prevail for 150 days (ver 24), when (8 2 3) "the fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; and the waters returned from off the earth continually," so that after 10 months the ark rested upon "the mountains of Ararat" (not the peak of Mount Ararat, but the highlands of Armenia in the upper part of the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris; see ARARAT). Here it rested 40 days before the water subsided sufficiently to suggest disembarking, when a raven (which could easily find its food on the carcasses of the animals which had been destroyed) was sent forth, and did not return (ver 7); but a dove sent out at the same time found no rest and returned empty to the ark (ver 9). After 7 days, however, it was sent out again and returned with a fresh olive leaf (ver 11). After 7 days more the dove was sent forth again and did not return. After 56 days more of waiting Noah and his family departed from the ark. The following are the leading events:

It will thus be seen that there is no need of supposing any duplication and overlapping of accounts in the Bib. story. There is continual progress in the account from beginning to end, with only such repetitions for literary effect as we are familiar with in oriental writings. In Gen 6 5-7 13 the wickedness of the world is assigned as the reason which prevailed in the Divine counsels for bringing about the contemplated catastrophe. While emphasizing the righteousness of Noah which led to his preservation, 6:13-21 contains the direction for the making of the ark and of the preparations to bring into it a certain number of animals. This preparation having been made, the order was given (7:1-4) for the embarkation of them, a dove was sent out and returned. We are then told that Noah and his family, and beasts both clean and unclean, were shut up in the ark during the prevalence of the water and its final subidence. Altogether the account is marked by the picturesque and impressive style.

An Egyptian legend of the Deluge is referred to in Plato's Timaeus, where the gods are said to have purified the earth by a great flood of water from which only a few shepherds escaped by climbing to the summit of a high mountain. In the Nile, documents themselves, however, we find only that Ra' the creator, on account of the insolence of man, proceeded to exterminate him by a deluge of blood which flowed up to Helopolis, the home of the gods; but the heinousness of the deed so affected him that he repented and swore never more to destroy mankind.

In Indian mythology there is no reference to the Flood in the Rig Veda, but in the laws of Manu we are told that a fish said to Manu,

4. The Indian Tradition

"A deluge will sweep all creatures away. . . Build a vessel and worship me. When the waters rise enter the vessel and I will save thee."

When the Deluge came, he had entered the vessel ... Manu fastened the cable of the ship to the horn of the fish, by which means the latter made it pass over the mountains of the North. The fish said: I have saved thee; fasten the vessel to a tree that the water may not sweep it away while I rest. (Noah and manna)" (see S. Pamphile 8, Bishop's art. in Bib. Sac. [1906], 510-17, and Rev. Joseph B. Davidson in the author's Scientific Conformations of OT History, 180-84).

The Chinese tradition is embodied in sublune language in their book of Li-Ki: "And now the pillars of heaven were broken, the earth shook to its very foundation; the sun and the stars changed their motion; the earth fell to pieces, and the waters enclosed within its bosom burst forth with violence, and overflowed. Man having rebelled against heaven, the system of the universe was totally disordered, and the grand harmony of nature destroyed. All these evils arose from man's despising the supreme power of the universe. He fixed his looks upon terrestrial objects and praised them until finally he became transformed into the objects which he loved, and celestial reason entirely abandoned him."

The Greeks, according to Plutarch, had five different traditions of the Deluge, that of Deucalion being the most important. According to this, Prometheus warned his son Deucalion of the flood which Zeus had resolved to bring upon the earth by reason of its wickedness. According to Deucalion constructed an ark and took refuge in it, but with his vessel was stranded on Mount Parnassus in Thessaly, whereupon they disembarked and repopulated the earth by the fantastic process revealed to them by the goddess Themis of throwing stones about them, those which Deucalion threw becoming men and those which Pyrrha threw becoming women. Lucian's form of the legend, however, is less fantastic and more nearly in line with Sem tradition. In the Gr legend as in the Hebrew, there is no mention of the flood having two waves, and a second time, its feet being tinged with mud the second time, intimating the abatement of the flood. But neither Homer nor Hesiod have this tradition. Probably it was borrowed from the Semites or the Turco-Cimmerians (see W. H. Green, Unity of the Book of Genesis, 83 ff.).

In Britain there is a Druid legend that on account of the profligacy of mankind, the Supreme Being sent a flood upon the earth when "the waves of the sea lifted themselves on high round the border of Britain."

Tradition The rain poured down from heaven and the waters covered the earth." But the patriarch, distinguished for his integrity, had been shot up with a select company in a strong ship which bore them safely upon the summit of the waters (Ed. Davies in his Mythology and Rites of British Druids). From these the world was again repopulated. There are various forms of this legend but they all agree in substance.

Among the American Indians traditions of the Deluge were found by travelers to be widely disseminated. Mr. Catlin says, "Among the 120 different tribes which I visited in North, South, and Central America, no tribe exists that has not related to me distinct or vague traditions of such a calamity, in which one, or three, or eight persons were saved above the waters upon the top of a high mountain" (quoted by Wm. Restelle in Bib. Soc. January, 1907, 157). While many, perhaps most, of these traditions bear the stamp of...
Christian influence through the early missionaries, the Mexican legend bears evident marks of originality. According to it the 4th age was one of water, when all men were turned into fishes except Tezpi and his wife Hochiquetzal and their children, who with many animals took refuge in a ship which sailed safely over the tumultuous waters which overwhelmed the earth. When the flood subsided the ship stranded on Mount Cohucaan, whereupon he sent forth a vulture which did not return, and then a humming bird which returned with some leaves in its beak. The Peruvian story differs from this in many particulars. According to it a single man and woman took refuge in a box and floated hundreds of miles from Cuazo to an unknown land where they made clay images of all races, and animated them.

The Moravian missionary Cranz, in his History of Greenland, says that "the first missionaries among the Greenlanders found a tolerably distinct tradition of the Deluge" to the effect that "the earth was once tilted over and all men were drowned" except one "who smote afterward upon the ground with a stick and thereon came out a woman with whom he afterwards made the earth stand on end." The Greenlanders point to the remains of fishes and bones of a whale on high mountains where men never could have dwelt, as proof that the earth was once flooded. Among the North American Indians generally the Deluge is related in such a manner that they become extremely fantastic, but in many of them there are peculiarities which point unquestionably to a common origin of extreme antiquity.

The unprejudiced reader cannot rise from the study of the subject without agreeing in general with François Lenormant, who writes: "As the case now stands, we do not hesitate to declare that, far from being a myth, the Bible. Deluge is a real and historical fact, having, to say the least, left its impress on the ancestors of three races—Aryan, or Indo-European, Sem, or Syrio-Arabian, Chamitic, or Kushte—that is to say on the three great civilized races of the ancient world, those which constitute the higher humanity—before the ancestors of those races had as yet separated, and in the part of Asia together inhabited" (Contemporary Review, November, 1879).

The most instructive of these traditions are those which have come down to us from Babylonia, which is the one we are at present without a record through the Gr historian Berosus of the 4th cent. BC, who narrates that a Tradition-deluge happened at some indefinite time in the past during the reign of Xisuthrus, son of Ardistes. Xisuthrus was warned beforehand by the deity Cronos, and told to build a ship and take with him his friends and relations and all the different animals with all necessary food and trust himself fearlessly to the deep, whereupon he built the Deluge ship 500 cubits [833 ft.] long and 2 stadia [1,200 ft.] broad." After the flood subsided Xisuthrus, like Noah, sent out birds which returned to him again. After waiting some days and sending them out a second time, they returned with their feet tinged with mud. Upon the third trial they returned no more, whereupon they disembarked and Xisuthrus with his wife, daughter and pilot offered sacrifice to the gods and were translated to live with the gods. It was found that the place where they were was "the land of Armenia," but they were told to return to Babylon. Berosus concluded his account by saying that "the vessel being thus stranded in Armenia, some part of it yet remains in the Corycian mountains.

An earlier and far more interesting tradition was found inscribed on cuneiform tablets in Babylonia dating from 3000 BC. These were discovered by George Smith in 1870 and filled as many as 180 lines. The human hero of the account, corresponding to Noah of the Bible, was Xisuthrus of Borsus, a Babylonian hero, mesh, who lived in Shurippuk, a city full of violence, on the banks of the Euphrates. He was warned of an approaching flood and exhorted to pull down his house and build a ship and cause "seed of life of every sort to go up into it." The ship, he says, was to be "exact in its dimensions, equal in its breadth and its length. . . . Its sides were 140 cubits high, the border of its top equaled 140 cubits. . . . I constructed it in 6 stories, dividing it into 7 compartments. Its floors I divided into 9 chambers. . . . I chose a mast (or rudder pole), and supplied what was necessary. Six sars of bitumen I poured over the outside; three sars of bitumen over the inside." After embarking, the storm broke with fearful violence and the steering of the ship was handed over to Bezu-Del, the ship man. But amidst the roll of thunder and the march of mountain waves the helm was wrenched from the pilot's hands and the lightning flashes dismayed all hearts. "Like a battle charge upon mankind" the water rushed so that the gods even were dismayed at the flood and cowered like dogs, taking refuge in the heavens of Anu while Bezu-Del, like a man possessed, repented of her anger, resolved to save a few and "to give birth to my people" till like "the fry of fishes they fill the sea." The ship was therefore turned to the country of Nizir (Armenia).

It is wonderful how any tablet exhibits as much variety of style as does the Bib. account. Plain narrative and rhetorical prose are intermingled in both accounts, a fact which effectually exposes the critical theory which regards the Bib. account as a clumsy combination made in later times by piecing together two or more independent traditions. Evidently the piecing together, if there was any, had been accomplished early in Bab history. See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA.

On comparing the Bib. account with that of the cuneiform tablets, the following similarities and contrasts are brought to light:

(1) That the cuneiform inscription is from start to finish polytheistic (II. 5–17), whereas the narrative in Gen 7–9 given to us only through the Gr historian Berosus of Babylonian 4th cent. BC, who narrates that a deluge happened at some indefinite time in the past during the reign of Xisuthrus, son of Ardistes. Xisuthrus was warned beforehand by the deity Cronos, and told to build a ship and take with him his friends and relations and all the different animals with all necessary food and trust himself fearlessly to the deep, whereupon he built the Deluge ship 500 cubits [833 ft.] long and 2 stadia [1,200 ft.] broad." After the flood subsided Xisuthrus, like Noah, sent out birds which returned to him again. After waiting some days and sending them out a second time, they returned with their feet tinged with mud. Upon the third trial they returned no more, whereupon they disembarked and Xisuthrus with his wife, daughter and pilot offered sacrifice to the gods and were translated to live with the gods. It was found that the place where they were was "the land of Armenia," but they were told to return to Babylon. Berosus concluded his account by saying that "the vessel being thus stranded in Armenia, some part of it yet remains in the Corycian mountains.

(2) The cuneiform agrees with the Bib. narrative in making the Deluge a Divine punishment for the wickedness of the world (II. 5, 6).

(3) The names differ to a degree that is irreconcilable with our present knowledge.

(4) The dimensions of the ark as given in Gen (6 15) are reasonable, while those of Berosus and the cuneiform tablets are unreasonable. According to Gen, the ark was 500 cubits (562 ft.) long, 50 cubits (98 ft.) wide, and 3 stadia (540 ft.) high, which are the natural proportions for a ship of that size, being in fact very close to those of the great steamers which are now constructed to cross the Atlantic. The "Celtic" of the White Star line, built in 1901, is 870 ft. long, 75 ft. wide and 49 ft. deep. The dimensions of the "Great Eastern," built in 1858 (692 ft. long, 83 ft. broad, and 58 ft. deep), are still closer to those of the ark. The cuneiform tablets represent the length, width and depth each as 140 cubits (255 ft.), which are the dimensions of an entirely unseaworthy structure. According to Berosus, it was 5 stadia (3,000 ft.) and 2 stadia (1,200 ft.) broad; while Origen (Against Celcus, 4.41), represented it to be 135,000 ft. (25 miles) long, and 3,000 ft. (1 mile) wide.

(5) In the Bib. account, nothing is introduced conflicting with the sublime conception of holiness.
and the peculiar combination of justice and mercy ascribed to God throughout the Bible, and illustrated in the general scheme of providential government and in the history of nature and in history; while, in the cuneiform tablets, the Deluge is occasioned by a quarrel among the gods, and the few survivors escape, not by reason of a merciful plan, but by a mistake which aroused the anger of Bel (II 145-50).

6 In all the accounts, the ark is represented as floating up stream. According to Gen, it was not, as is usually thought, on "Mount Ararat" (8 4), but in the "mountains of Ararat," designating an indefinite region, and upon which the ark rested. According to the inscriptions, it was in Nizzir (II. 115-20), a region which is watered by the Zab and the Tornarud; while, according to Berosus, it was on the Coreopyrean Mountains, included in the same indefinite area. In all these cases, its resting-place is in the direction of the headwaters of the Euphrates valley, while the scene of the building is clearly laid in the lower part of the valley.

7 Again, in the Bib. narrative, the spread of the Deluge is represented to have been occasioned, not so much by the rain which fell, as by the breaking-up of "all the fountains of the great deep" (7 11), which very naturally describes phenomena connected with one of the extensive down-pours of water of the earth crust, with which geology has made us familiar. The sinking of the land below the level of the ocean is equivalent, in its effects, to the rising of the water above it, and is accurately expressed by the phrases used in the narrative. This appears, not only in the language concerning the breaking-up of the great deep which describes the coming-on of the Flood, but also in the description of its termination, in which it is said, that the "fountains also of the deep . . . were stopped . . . and the waters returned from off the earth continually" (8 2.3).

Nothing is said of this in the other accounts.

8 The cuneiform tablets agree in general with the two other accounts respecting the collecting of the animals for preservation, but differ from Gen in not mentioning the sevens of clean animals and in including others beside the builder of the ark.

9 The cuneiform inscription is peculiar in preserving the name with a mark, and putting it in charge of a pilot (II. 45, 70, 71).

10 The accounts differ decidedly in the duration of the Flood. According to the ordinary interpretation of the Bib. account, the Deluge continued a year and 17 days; whereas, according to the cuneiform tablets, it lasted only 14 days (II. 103-7, 117-22).

11 All accounts agree in sending out birds; but, according to Gen (8 5) a raven was first sent out, and then in succession two doves (8 8-12); while the cuneiform inscription mentions the dove and the raven in reverse order from Gen, and adds a swallow (II. 121-30).

12 All accounts agree in the building of an altar and offering a sacrifice after leaving the ark. But the cuneiform inscription is overlaid with a polytheistic coloring: "The gods like flies swarmed about the sacrifices" (II. 132-43).

13 According to the Bib. account, Noah survived the Flood for a long time; whereas Nôth-napiššum at his wife were at once delived and taken to heaven (II. 177-80).

14 Both accounts agree in saying that the human race is not again to be destroyed by a flood (Gen. 8 9 11; II. 102-8).

Close inspection of these peculiarities makes it evident that the narrative in Gen carries upon its face an appearance of reality not found in the other accounts. It is scarcely possible that the reasonable dimensions of the ark, its floating up stream, and the references to the breaking-up of the fountains of the great deep could be occasioned by accident. It is in the highest degree improbable that correct statements of such unfavourable facts should be due to the accident of legendary guesswork. At the same time, the duration of the Deluge, according to Gen, affords opportunity for a gradual progress of events which best accords with scientific conceptions of geological movements. If, as the most probable interpretation would imply, the water began to recede after 150 days from the commencement, it fell at the rate of 1 cubit in 74 days, that would only be 3/8 inches per day—a rate which would be imperceptible to an ordinary observer. Nor is it necessary to suppose that the entire flooded area was uncovered when Noah disembarked. The emergence of the land may have continued for an indefinite period, permitting the prevailing water to modify the climate of all western and central Asia for many centuries. Evidence that this was the case will be found in a later paragraph.

In considering the credibility of the Bib. story we encounter at the outset the question whether the narrative compels us to believe the Flood to have been universal. In the Flood Universal? answer, it is sufficient to suggest that the length of the Deluge and the number of the kinds of animals preserved show that the destruction of the human race, all the universality which it is necessary to infer from the language would be only such as was sufficient to accomplish that object. If man was at that time limited to the area through which the deluge spread, the number of that area would meet all the necessary conditions. Such a limitation is more easily accepted from the fact that general phrases like "Everybody knows," "The whole country was aroused," are never in literature literally interpreted. When it is said (Gen 41 54-57) that the famine was "in all lands," and over "all the face of the earth," and that "all countries came into Egypt . . . to buy grain," no one supposes that it is intended to imply that the irrigated plains of Babylon, from which the patriarchs had emigrated, were suffering from drought like Pal. (For other examples of the familiar use of this hyperbole, see Dt 2 25; Job 37 3; Acts 2 25; Rom. 1 8.)

As to the extent to which the human race was spread over the earth at the time of the Flood, two suppositions are possible. First, that of Hugh Miller (Testimony of the Rocks) that, owing to the shortness of the antediluvian chronology, and the violence and mortal corruption of the people, population had not spread beyond the boundary of western Asia. An insuperable objection to this theory is that the later discoveries have brought to light remains of prehistoric man from all over the northern hemisphere, showing that long before the time of the Flood he had become widely scattered.

Another theory, supported by much evidence, is that, in connection with the enormous physical changes in the earth's surface during the closing scenes of the Glacial epoch, man had perished from off the face of the earth except in the valley of the Euphrates, and that the Noahian Deluge is the final catastrophe in that series of destructive events (see Antediluvians). The facts concerning the Glacial epoch naturally lead up to this conclusion. For during the entire epoch, and for a time after, the climate, the conditions affecting the level of the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere were extremely abnormal, and continued so until some time after man had appeared on the earth.

The Glacial epoch followed immediately, and probably was a consequence of, an extensive elevation of all the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere at the close of the Tertiary period. This elevation was certainly as much as 2,000 ft. over the northern part of the United States, and over Canada and Northern Europe. Snow accumulated over this high ice formed a sheet of ice many miles thick, and some of the best authorities say 2, or even 3 miles. The surface over which this was spread amounted to 2,000,000 sq. miles in Europe and 4,000,000 in North America. The total amount of the accumulation would therefore be 6,000,000 cubic miles at the lowest calculation, or twice or three times that amount if the largest estimates are accepted. (For detailed evidence see Wright, Ice Age in North America, 5th ed.) But in either case the transference of so much weight from the ocean beds to the land surfaces of the northern hemisphere brings into the problem a physical force sufficient to produce incalculable effects. The weight of 6,000,000 cubic miles of ice would be twenty-four thousand million million (24,000,000,000,000,000) tons, which is equal to that of the entire North American continent above sea level. Furthermore this weight was first removed from the ocean beds, thus disturbing still more the forces which maintain the stability of the land. The geological evidence is abundant that in connection with the overloading of the land surfaces in the Northern Hemisphere, and probably by reason of it, the glaciated area and a considerable area outside of it was driven down until it was depressed far below the present level. The post-Glacial depression in North America was certainly 600 ft. below sea level at Montreal, and several hundred feet lower farther north. In Sweden and Finland there was a depression of the land 1,500 ft. below the sea.

The evidences of a long-continued post-Glacial subsidence of the Aral-Caspian basin and much of the surrounding area is equally conclusive. At Trebizond, on the Black Sea, there is an extensive recent sea beach clingning to the precipitous volcanic mountain back of the city 750 ft. above the present water level. The gravel in this beach is so fresh as to compel a belief in its recent origin, while it certainly has been deposited by a body of water standing at that elevation after the rock erosion of the region had been almost entirely effected. The deposit is about 100 ft. thick, and extends along the precipitous face of the mountain for a half-mile or more. So extensive is it that it furnishes an attractive place for a summer resort. When the water was high enough to build up this shore line, it would cover all the plains of southern Russia, of Western Siberia and of the Aral-Caspian depression in Turkestan. Similar terraces of corresponding height are reported by competent authorities on the south shore of the Crimea and at Baku, on the Caspian Sea.

Further and most interesting evidences of this post-Glacial land depression are found in the existence of Arctic seal 2,000 miles from the Arctic Ocean in bodies of water as widely separated as the Caspian Sea, the Aral Sea and Lake Baikal. Lake Baikal is now 1,500 ft. above sea level. It is evident, therefore, that there must have been a recent depression of the whole area to admit the migration of this species to that distant locality. There are also clear evidences of a smaller depression around the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where there are abandoned sea beaches from 200 to 300 ft. above present sea level, and many shells identical with those now living nearby.

These are found in Egypt, in the valley of the Red Sea, and in the vicinity of Joppa and Beirit. During their formation Asia and Africa must have been separated by a wide stretch of water connecting the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. The effect of such lingering wide expanses of water upon the climate of Western Asia must have been profound, and would naturally provide those conditions which would favor the early development of mankind. (For evidence of the elevation of the human race the reader is referred to page 825, where the elevation of 5,000 ft. the vine is indigenous), from which the second distribution of mankind is said to have taken place.

Furthermore there is indubitable evidence that the rainfall in central Asia was, at a comparatively recent time, immensely greater than it has been in the historic period, indicating that gradual passage from the conditions connected with the Deluge to those of the present time, at which we have arrived, has been a very slow one. The evaporation over the Aral Sea is so great that two rivers (the ancient Oxus and the Jaxartes), coming down from the heights of central Asia, each with a volume as great as that of Niagara, do not suffice to cause an overflow into the Caspian Sea. But the existence of such an overflow during the prehistoric period is so plain that it has been proposed to utilize its channel (which is a mile wide and as distinctly marked as that of any living stream) for a canal. Owing to the comparatively brief duration of the Noahian deluge, we properly, we are not at present in a position to find many positive indications of its occurrence. Nevertheless, Professor Prestwich (than whom there has been no higher geological authority in England during the present century), has adduced facts relating to Western Europe and the Mediterranean basin which cannot be ignored. (see Phil. Trans. of the Royal Soc. of Lond., CXXIV [1883], 903–84; SCOT, 288–82). Among these evidences one of the most convincing is to be found in the discovery of many bones of elephants at the base of the mountains surrounding the plain of Palermo in Sicily. In this cave there was found an immense mass of the bones of hippopotami of all ages down to the fetus, mingled with a few of the deer, ox and elephant. These were so fresh when discovered that they were cut into ornaments and polished and still retained a considerable amount of their nitrogenous matter. Twenty tons of these bones were shipped for commercial purposes in the first six months after their discovery. Evidently the animals furnishing these bones had taken refuge in this cave to escape the rising water which had driven them in from the surrounding plains and cooped them up in the amphitheatre of mountains and the gradual depression of the land. Similar collections of bones are found in various ossiferous fissures, in England and Western Europe, notably in the Rock of Gibraltar and at Santenay, a few miles S. of Chalons in central France, where there is an accumulation of bones in fissures 1,000 ft. above the sea, similar in many respects to that in the cave described at San Ciro, though the bones of hippopotami did not appear in these places; but the bones of wolves, bears, horses, and oxen, mingled with the bones of the elephant, were indiscriminately mingled as though swept in by all-pervading currents of water. Still further evidence is adduced in the deposits connected with what is called the rubble drift on both sides of the English Channel and on the Jersey Islands. Here in various localities, notably at Brighton, England, and near Calais, France, elephant bones and human implements occur beneath deep deposits of unassorted drift, which is not glacial nor the product of limited and local streams but has been deposited for only by general waves of translation produced when the land was being relevelled from beneath the water by a series of such sudden earthquake shocks as cause the tidal waves which are often so destructive.

Thus, while we cannot appeal to geology for a neat proof of the Noahian deluge, recent geological discoveries do show that such a catastrophe is perfectly credible from a scientific point of view; and the supposition that there was a universal deluge by inundation of the northern hemisphere at least, in connection with the floods accompanying the melting off of the glacial ice is supported by a great amount of evidence. There was certainly an extensive destruction of animal species associated with man during that period. In Europe the great Irish elk, the machairodus, the cave lion, the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus and the elephant disappeared with prehistoric man, amid the floods at the close of the Glacial epoch. In North America equally large felines, together with horses, tapirs, llamas, great mastodons and elephants and the huge megalonyx went to destruction in connection with the same floods that destroyed so large a part of the human race during the dramatic closing scenes of the period. It is, therefore, by no means difficult for an all-round geologist to believe in a final catastrophe such as is described in Gen. If we disbelieve in the Bib. Dehijje it is not because we know too much geology, but too little.

DELUSION, de-lu'shuhn: (1) Isa 66 4; "I also will choose their delusions" (RV "mockings"). Heb ta'ali'im, which occurs only here and Isa 3 4 (where AV "false visions"). Its meaning is somewhat ambiguous. The best tr seems to be "wantonness," "caprice." "Their wanton dealing, i.e. that inflicted on them" (BDB). Other trs suggested are "insults" (Skinner), "freaks of fortune" (Cheyne), "folly" (Whiston). LXX has empalasmas, "mockings," Vulg illusiones. (2) 2 These 2 11 AV, "God shall send them strong delusion" (RV "God sendeth them a working of error"). πάθω, πόνε, "is wandering," "is roaming about" in the NT "error," either of opinion or of conduct.

DEMAND, de-mand': The peremptory, imperative sense is absent from this word in its occurrences in AV, where it means no more than "ask," "inquire" (cf Fr. demander) one or the other of which RV substitutes in 2 S 11 7; Mt 2 4; Lk 3 14; 17 20; Acts 21 33. RV retains "demand" in Ex 5 14; Job 38 5; 40 7; 42 4; Dl 27 27; and inserts it (AV "require") in Neh 5 18.

DEMAS, de'mas (Δέμας, Dēmas, "popular"): According to Col 4 14; 2 Tim 4 10; Philm 24, one was a "deacon" (from Greek διακόνος) with Paul at Rome (Col, Philm), but at last, "having loved this present world," forsook the apostle and betook himself to Thessalonica (2 Tim). No other particulars are given concerning him. See Apostasy; Demetrius.

DEMETRIUS, de-mē-tri-us (Δημήτριος, Dēmētrios, "of" or "belonging to Demeter," an ordinary name in Greece in:

(1) Demetrius I, surnamed Sôrph, Sōrē ("savrour"), was the son of Seleucus IV (Philopator). He was sent as a boy to Rome, by his father, to serve as a hostage, and remained there quietly during his father's life. He was detained also during the reign of his uncle, Antiochus Epiaphnes (q.v.) from 175 to 164 BC; but when Antiochus died Demetrius, who was now a young man of 23 (Polyb. xxxi.12), chafed at a longer detention, particularly as his cousin, Antiochus Eupator, a boy of 9, succeeded to the kingdom with Lysias as his guardian. The Roman Senate, however, was willing to listen to his pleas for the restoration to Syria, because, as Polybius says, they felt surer of their power over Syria with a mere boy as king.

In the meantime, a quarrel had arisen between Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes Physkon (Livy Epit. 46; Diod. Sic. fr. xi), and Gnæus Octavius, who had been sent by the Romans to Syria, was languishing there in the northeast of the country. Demetrius, taking advantage of the troubled condition of affairs, consulted with his friend Polychius as to the advisability of attempting to seize the throne of Syria (op. cit. xxxii.19). The historian advises him not to stumble twice on the same stone, but to venture something worthy of a king, so after a second unsuccessful appeal to the Senate, Demetrius escaped to Tripolis, and from there advanced to Antioch where he was joined by Polychares king of Syracuse. His first act was to put to death young Antiochus, his cousin, and his minister Lysias (Appian, Syr., c. 47; Ant., XII, x, 1; 1 Mac. 7 1-4; 2 Mac. 14 1.2).

As soon as he was established in power, Demetrius made an attempt to place the Romans by sending them valuable gifts as well as the assassin of Gn. Octavius (Polyb. xxi.23); and he then tried to secure the Hellenizing party by sending his friend Bacchides (q.v.) to make the wicked Alcimus high priest. After violent struggle and much treachery on the part of Bacchides (Ant, XII, x, 2), the latter left the country, having charged all the people to obey Alcimus, who was protected by an army. The Jews under Judas resisted his presence, and Judas inflicted on him an absolute defeat. He then went over to Alcimus (1 Mac. 7 24). Alcimus, in fear, sent a message for aid to Demetrius, who sent to his assistance Nicana, the best disposed and most faithful of his friends, who had accompanied him in his flight from Rome (Ant., XII, x, 4). On his arrival in Judaea, he attempted to win by guile, but Judas saw through his treachery, and Nicana was forced to fight openly, suffering two signal defeats, the first at Capharsalama (1 Mac. 7 31-32), and the second (in which Nicana himself was killed) at Adasa (7 39 ff; 2 Mac. 15 26 ff).

In a short while, however, Demetrius, hearing of the death of Nicana, sent Bacchides and Alcimus into Judæa again (1 Mac. 9 1). Judas arose against them with an army of 3,000 men, but when saw that 20,000 opposed them, the greater part of them deserted, and Judas, with an army of 800, lost his life, like another Leonidas, on the field of battle (1 Mac. 9 4-6). Then Bacchides took the wicked messenger and made him prisoner (1 Mac. 9 25); while Jonathan, who was appointed successor to Judas, fled with his friends (1 Mac. 9 29 ff).

During the next seven years, Demetrius succeeded in alienating both the Romans (Polyb. xxxii.20) and his own people, and Alexander Balas (q.v.) was put forward as a claimant to the throne, his supporters maintaining that he was the son of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. 10 1-21; Ant, XIII, ii, 1-3). Both Alexander and Demetrius made bids for the support of the Jews, the former offering the high-priesthood and the title of King's Friend (1 Mac. 10 20), and the latter freedom from taxes, tributes and customs (10 28 ff). Alexander's bait proved more alluring, since the Jews "gave no credence" to the words of Demetrius, and with the aid of the Maccabees, he vied with Demetrius for the space of two years for the complete sovereignty of Syria. At the end of this time, a decisive battle took place, in which Demetrius was slain, and Alexander became king of Syria (150 BC) (10 48-50; Ant, XIII, ii, 4; Polyb. iii.5; see also Maccabees).

(2) Demetrius II, surnamed Nikētrōs, Nikītōr ("conqueror"), was the son of Demetrius Soter. When Balas, brother of Demetrius I, sent his son to a place of safety in Crete, three years after his father's death (147 BC), the unpopularity of Alexander gave the young man an opportunity DEMÆTRIUS, dé-mä’tri-us (Ἀθανάσιος, "Demetrius, "belonging to Ceres"): The name of two persons:

(1) A Christian disciple praised by St. John (3 Jn 12)

(2) A silversmith of Ephesus who manufactured the little silver shrines of the goddess Diana to sell to the visiting pilgrims (Acts 19:23). Because the teachings of Paul were injuring the trade of the silversmiths, there arose a riot in which Demetrius was the chief. Upon an inscription which Mr. Wood discovered among the ruins of the city, there appeared the name Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple for the year 57 AD, and some authors believe the temple warden to be identical with the ringleader of the rebellion. The name, however, has been most common among the Greeks of every age. Because of its frequent use it cannot be supposed that Demetrius, the disciple of 3 Jn ver 12, was the silversmith of Ephesus, nor that Demetrios of 2 Th 3:14, of the temple, has in a contracted form, may be identified with him.

DEMON, demon, DEMONIC, dé-mo’ni-ak, DEMONOLOGY, dé-mon-o-ló’ji, daimon, daimoníon, earlier form daimôn, daimónion, -παῦλον ἡ δαίμονα ἄρπας, ἐννέα ὄνομα, ἐννέα ὄνομα, ἐννέα ὄνομα: 1. Definition—The word daimon or daimonion seems originally to have had two closely related meanings; a deity, and a spirit, superhuman but not supernatural. In the former sense the term occurs in the LXX tr of Dt 32:17; Ps 106:37; Acts 17:18. In the second the term daimonion involves a general reference to vaguely conceived personal beings akin to men and yet belonging to the unseen realm, leads to the application of the term to the peculiar and restricted class of beings designated "demons" in the NT.

II. The Origin of Biblical Demonology.—An interesting scheme of development has been suggested (by Bauckeins and others) in which Bib. demonism is brought through polytheism into connection with primitive animism.

A simple criticism of this theory, which is now in the ascendant, will serve fittingly to introduce what should be said specifically concerning Biblical demonology. (1) Animism, which is one branch of that general primitive theory of the view of things which is designated animism, is the theory that all nature is alive (see Ladd, Phil. Rel., I, 89 f) and that all natural processes are due to the operation of living wills. (2) Polytheism is supposed to be the outcome of animism. The vaguely conceived spirits of the earlier conception are advanced to the position of deities with names, fixed characters and specific functions, organized into a pantheon. (3) Bib. demonstration is supposed to be due to the solvent of monotheism upon contemporary polytheism. The Hebrews were brought into contact with surrounding nations, esp. during the Pers, Bab and Gr periods, and monotheism made room for heathenism by reducing its deities to the dimension of demons. They are not denied all objective reality, but are denied the dignity and prerogatives of deity.

The objections to this ingenious theory are too many and too serious to be overcome. (1) The genetic connection between animism and polytheism is not clear. In fact, the specific religious character of animism is altogether problematical. It belongs to the category of primitive philosophy rather than of religion. It is difficult to return and seize the government. He landed in Cilicia with Cretan mercenaries and secured the support of all Syria with the exception of Judaea (1 Macc. 10:67). Apollonius, his general, the governor of Coele-Syria, who essayed the conquest of the Jews, was defeated at Azotus with great loss.

Polyeuctus Phedemarius, who was the wife of Alexander Balas, now entered into the struggle, and taking Cleopatra, his daughter, from Alexander, he gave her to Demetrius (11:12). He then joined Demetrius' army and the combined forces inflicted a defeat on Balas (146 BC), and from this time he received his name Nikator (Ant., XIII, iv, 8; 1 Macc. 11:14 ff).

Jonathan now concluded a favorable treaty with Demetrius, whereby three Samaritan provinces were added to Judaea and the whole country was made exempt from tax (1 Macc. 11:20-37; Ant., XIII, iv, 9). Demetrius then dismissed his army except the foreigners, thinking himself safe with the loyalty of the Jews assured. In the meantime, Tryphon, one of Balas' generals, set up the son of Alexander, Antiochus, as a king in the kingdom, and secured the assistance of the discarded army of Demetrius. Jonathan's aid was sought and he quelled the rebellion, on condition that the Syrian garrisons be removed from Jerus (1 Macc. 11:41-52; Ant., XIII, v, 9; 12:3).
The king, however, falsified all that he had said, and kept none of his promises, so the Jews, deserting him, took sides with Tryphon and supported the claims of the boy Antiochus (1 Macc. 11:53-59; Ant., XIII, v, 10-11). Demetrius' generals then entered Syria but were defeated by Jonathan at Hazor (1 Macc. 11:63-74), and by skilful generalship he made fittle a second attempt at invasion (12:14 ff).

Tryphon, who was now master of Syria, broke faith with Jonathan (12:40) and essayed the conquest of Judaea. Jonathan was killed by treachery, and Simon, his successor, made proposals of peace to Demetrius, who agreed to let bygones be bygones (1 Macc. 13:39-40; Ant., XIII, vi, 7). Demetrius then left Simon to carry on the war, and set out to Parthia, ostensibly to secure the assistance of the king, Mithridates, against Tryphon (1 Macc 14:1). Here he was captured and imprisoned (14:6; Ant., XIII, vi, 11; Jos., however, puts this event in 140 rather than 138 BC).

After an imprisonment of ten years, he was released and resumed the sovereignty 128 BC, but becoming involved in a quarrel with Poltemy Physeus, he was defeated near Gaza (1 Macc. 13:11). From this place, he fled to Tyre, where he was murdered in 125 BC, according to some, at the instigation of Cleopatra, his wife (Jos., Ant., XIII, ix, 3).

(3) Demetrius III, Maccæus, Bükanos ("the fortunate"), was the son of Antiochus Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius Nikator. When his father died, civil war arose, in which his two elder brothers lost their lives, while Philip, the third brother, secured part of Syria as his domain. Demetrius then took up his abode in Coele-Syria with Damascus as his capital (Ant., XIII, xiii, 4; BJ, I, iv, 4).

War now broke out in Judaea between Alexander Jannaeus and his Pharisæe subjects, who invited Demetrius to aid them. Thinking this a good opportunity to extend his realm, he joined the insurgents and together they defeated Jannaeus near Shechem (Ant., XIII, xiv, 1; BJ, I, iv, 5).

The Jews then deserted Demetrius, and he withdrew to Beroea, which was in the possession of his brother Philip. Demetrius besieged him, but the Parthians, who were in his assistance, the tables were turned, and Demetrius, besieged in his camp and starved into submission, was taken prisoner and sent to Arsaces, who held captive until his death (Ant., XIII, xiv, 3). The dates of his reign are not certain. ARTHUR J. KINSELLA

2. Objec-

tions to the Theory

The objections to this ingenious theory are too many and too serious to be overcome. (1) The genetic connection between animism and polytheism is not clear. In fact, the specific religious character of animism is altogether problematical. It belongs to the category of primitive philosophy rather than of religion. It is difficult to trace the process by which spirits unnamed and with characteristics of the vaguest become deities—esp. is it difficult to understand how certain spirits only are advanced to the standing of deities. More serious still, polytheism and animism have coexisted with Judaism in a process of amalgamation (see Sayce, Babylonia and Assyria, 232; Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 75 f) for a long course of history. It looks as if animism and polytheism had a different raison d'être, origin and development. It is, at least, unsafe to construct a theory on the basis of so insecure a connection. (2) The interpretation of heathen deities as demons by no means indicates that polytheism is the source of Bib. demonology. On general principles, it seems far more likely that the category of demons was already familiar, and that connection with polytheism brought about an extension of its application. A glance at the OT will show how comparatively slight and unimportant has been the bearing of heathen polytheism upon Bib. thought. The demonology of the OT is confined to the following passages: Lev 16 21.22; 17 7; Isa 13 21; 34 13; Dt 32 17; Ps 106 57 (elsewhere commented upon; see Commonion with Demons). Gesenius well says that 'that is not the numerous conjectures of interpreters' If the prevalent modern view is accepted we find in it an actual meeting-point of popular superstition and the religion of Jeh (see AAZZEEZ). According to Driver (UT 1) 'waterless places' or 'the red hot sand in the desert intended as a symbolical declaration that the land and the people are now purged from guilt, their sins being handed over to the evil spirit to whom they are held to belong, and whose home is in the desolate wilderness remote from human habitations (ver 22, into a land cut off)' A more striking instance could scarcely be sought of the way in which the religion of Jeh kept the popular spirituality at a safe distance. Lev 17 7 (see Commonion with Demons) refers to participation in the rites of heathen worship. The two passages—Isa 13 20.21; 34 13.14—are poetical and really imply nothing as to the writer's own belief. Creatures both seen and unseen supposed to inhabit places described as uninhabitable were usually used by them, to furnish the details for a vivid word-picture of uninhabited solitude. There is no direct evidence that the narrative of the Fall (Gen 3 1–19) has any connection with demonology (see HDB, 1, 508 f). Where the reference to the Devil's work of Adam and Eve does not occur, the mention of satyrs and night-monsters of current mythology with such creatures as jackals, etc., implies 'that demons were held to reside more or less in all these animal denizens of the ruined solitude is clearly fanciful. It is almost startling to find that all that can possibly be affirmed of demonology in the OT is confined to a small group of passages which are either legal or poetical and which all furnish examples of the inhibiting power of high religious conceptions upon the minds of a naturally superstitious and imaginative people. Even if we add all the passages in which a real existence seems to be granted to heathen deities (e.g. Nu 21 29; Isa 19 1, etc) and interpret them in the extreme sense, we are still compelled to affirm that evidence is lacking to prove the influence of polytheism in the formation of the Bib. doctrine of demons. (3) This theory breaks down in another still more vital particular. The demonology of the Bible is not of kin either in its habits, of those other Sem. demonism. In what follows we shall address ourselves to NT demonology—that of the OT being a negligible quantity.

III. NT Demonology.—The most marked and significant fact of NT demonology is that it provides no materials for a discussion of the nature and characteristics of demons. Whitehouse says (HDB, I, 593) that NT demonology "is in all its broad characteristic the demonology of the contemporary Judaism stripped of its cruder and exaggerated features." How much short of this statement was made later, but as it stands it defines the specific direction of inquiry into the NT treatment of demons; namely, to explain its freedom from the crude and exaggerated features of popular demonism. The presence among NT writers of an influence curbing curiosity and restraining the imagination is of all things the most important for us to discover and emphasize. In four of its most vital features the NT attitude on this subject differs from all popular conceptions: (a) in the absence of all imaginative details concerning demons; (b) in the emphasis placed upon the moral character of demons and their connection with the ethical disorders of the human race; (c) in the absence of confidence in magical methods of any kind in dealing with demons; (d) in its intense restrictions of the sphere of demoniacal operations.

A brief treatment under each of these heads will serve to present an ordered statement of the most important factors with the numerous conjectures of interpreters."

(a) In the NT we are told practically nothing about the origin, nature, characteristics or habits of demons. In a highly figurative passage (Mt 12 43) Our Lord speaks of demons as passing through 'waterless places.' In the story of the Gadarene demoniac (Lk 8 31) the 'abyss' is mentioned as the place of their ultimate detention. The method of their control over human beings is represented in two contrasted ways (cf Mk 1 28 ff; Lk 4 33 ff), indicating that there was no fixed mode of regarding it. With these three scant items our direct information ceases. We are compelled to infer from the effects given in the limited number of specific instances narrated. And it is worthy of more than passing mention that no theoretical discussion of demons occurs. The center of interest in the Gospels is the person of Jesus, the sufferers and the cures. Interest in the demons as such is absent. Certain passages seem to indicate that the demons were able to speak (see Mk 1 24–20.34; Lk 4 41, etc), but comparing these statements with others (cf Mk 1 23; Lk 8 28) it is seen that no distinction is drawn between the cries of the tormented in the paroxysms of their complaint and the cries attributed to the demons. Hence that the demons themselves are the authors of the representation is consistent. The demons belong to the unseen world, they are incapable of manifestation except in the disorders which they cause—there are no materializations, no grotesque narratives of appearances and disappearances, no morbid dealing with repulsive details, no license of speculation in the narratives. In contrast with this reticence is not merely the demonology of primitive people, but also that of the non-canonical Jewish books. In the Book of En demons are said to be fallen angels, while Jos holds that they are the spirits of the wicked dead. In the rabbinical writings speculation has run riot in discussing the origin, nature and habits of demons. They are represented as the offspring of Adam and Eve in conjunction with male and female spirits, as being themselves sexed and capable of reproduction as well as performing all other physical functions. Details are given of their numbers, haunts and habits, of their other Sem. demonism. In what follows we shall address ourselves to NT demonology—that of the OT being a negligible quantity.

Demon

Although a judgement to be noted is that while in its original application the term "daimonion" is morally indifferent, in NT usage the demon is invariably an ethically evil being. This differentiates the NT treatment from extra-canonical Jewish writings. In the NT demons belong to the kingdom of Satan whose power it is the mission of Christ to destroy. It deepens and intensifies its representations of the earnestness of human life and its moral issues by extending the sphere of moral struggle to the invisible world. It clearly teaches that the power of Christ extends to the world of evil spirits and that faith in Him is adequate protection against any evils to which men may be exposed. (For significance of this point see Plummer, St. Luke [ICC], 132-33.)

(c) The NT demonology differs from all others by its negation of the power of magic rites to deliver from the affliction. Magic which is clearly separable from religion at that specific point (see Gwatkin, Knowledge of God, I, 249) rests upon and is dependent upon spiritism. The ancient Bab incantation rites, supposed to have a supportive or curative effect in the extant documents, are addressed directly to the supposed activities and powers of demons. These beings, who are not trusted and prayed to in the sense in which deities are, command confidence and call forth prayer, are dealt with by magic rites and formulas (see Rogers, op. cit., 144). Even the Jewish non-canonical writings contain numerous forms of words and ceremonies for the expulsion of demons. In the NT there is no magic. The deliverance from a demon is a spiritual and ethical process (see Exorcism).

(d) In the NT the range of activities attributed to demons is greatly restricted. According to Bab ideas: "These demons were everywhere; they lurked in every corner, watching for their prey. The city streets knew their malevolent presence, the rivers, the seas, the tops of mountains; they appeared sometimes as serpents gliding noiselessly upon their victims, as birds harrying of men flying restlessly to and fro, or afflicting birds in human forms, grotesque, malformed, awe-inspiring through their hideousness. To these demons all sorts of misfortune were ascribed—a toothache, a headache, a broken bone, a raging fever, an outbreak of anger, or any of these physical diseases (Rogers, op. cit., 145). In the extra-canonical Jewish sources the same exuberance of fancy appears in attributing all kinds of ill of mind and body to innumerable, swarming hosts of demons lying in wait for men and besiegling them with attacks and ills of all descriptions. Of this affluence of morbid fancy there is no hint in the NT. A careful analysis of the instances will show the importance of this fact. There are, taking repetitions and all, about 50 references to demons in the NT. In 11 instances the distinction between demon-possession and diseases ordinarily caused is clearly made (Mt 4:24; 8:16; 10:8; Mk 1:32:34; 6:13; 16.17.18; Lk 4:40.41; 9:1; 13:22; Acts 15:12). The results of demon-possession are not exclusively mental or nervous (Mt 9:32.33; 13:22). They are distinctly and peculiarly mental in two instances only (Gadarene maniac, Mt 8:28 and parallels, and Acts 19:13f). Epilepsy is specified in one case only (Mt 17:15). There is distinction made between a demon and a disease of the brain (Satan and lunatic, Mt 4:24). There is distinction made between diseases caused by demons and the same disease not so caused (cf Mt 12:22; 16:30). In most of the instances no specific symptoms are mentioned. In an equally large proportion, however, there are occasional fits of mental excitement often due to the presence and teaching of Christ.

A summary of the entire material leads to the conclusion that, in the NT cases of demon-possession, the disease was frequently a symptom of fear or anxiety. The sufferer was agitated, unstable, and uncertain. Of course, these symptoms were often of the most general character, as by its accompaniments. The aura, so to say, which surrounded the patient, served to distinguish his symptoms and to point out the special cause to which his suffering was attributed. Another unique feature of NT demonology should be emphasized. While this group of disorders is attributed to demons, the victims are treated as sick folk and are healed. The whole atmosphere of the NT is such that the demonized patient is calm, lofty and pervaded with the spirit of Christ. When one remembers the manifold cruelties inspired by the unreasoning fear of demons, which make the annals of savage medicine a nightmare of unimaginable horrors, we cannot but feel the worldwide difference between the Bib. narratives and all others, both of ancient and modern times, with which we are acquainted. Every feature of the NT narratives points to the conclusion that in them we have trustworthy reports of actual cases. Thus it is more important for NT faith than any other conclusion could possibly be.

It is also evident that Jesus treated these cases of invaded personality, of bondage, of depression, or of helplessness as accounts of actual cases. This is more important for NT faith than any other conclusion could possibly be.

The most distinctive and important words we have upon this obscure and difficult subject, upon which we know far too little to speak with any assurance or authority as to the present time, are these: 'This is come out by nothing, save by prayer' (Mt 9:29).

LITERATURE.—(1) The most accessible statement of Baedeker's theory is in Whiston's De Demon. (2) For demonology see summary in Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 144 ff.

DEMONOPHON, de'mon-oph'ohn, Démonophon: A Syrian general in Pal under Antiochus V (Eupator) who continued to harass the Jews after covenants had been made between Lydia and Judas Maccabaeus (2 Macc 12:2).

DEN (דֹּנַם), m'd'n, m'd'n, m'd'n, 'habitation'; דֹּנַךְ, m'd'nak, and סְתָרָךְ, s'drak, splo'ion, 'cave'; סְתָרָה, m'd'rah [Isa 11:8], 'a light-hole,' fr תֹּנָךְ, 'or, light,' perhaps for m'd'rah; סְתֵּק, s'tek [Ps 10:9 AV], and סְתֵּק, s'tek, 'seeketh' (Job 38:40), 'a covert,' elsewhere 'booth'; סוּק, 'ereb'h (Job 37:8), ' covert,' as in RV; סוּק, s'ok, of Arab. jub'ah, 'pit' (Dan 6:7); סֹּק, s'ok, 'min'had'ir, 'fissure' or 'crack' (Jgs 6:2); In the limestone mountains of Pal, caves, large and small, are abundant, the calcium carbonate, of which the rock is mainly composed, being dissolved by the water as it trickles over them or through their crevices. Even on the plains, by a similar process, pits or 'lime sinks' are formed, which are sometimes used by the Arabs for storing straw or grain. Of this sort may have been the pit, בֹּר, into which Joseph was cast by his brethren (Gen 37:20). Caves and crevices and sometimes spaces among piles of stones demonized and poisoned and at the stream bed are used as dens by jacksals, wolves and other wild animals. Even the people, for longer or shorter periods, have lived as troglodytes. Cf Jgs 6:2: "Because of Midian the children of Israel made them the dens [min'had'ir] which are in the mountains, and the caves [m'd'n], and the strongholds "μετ' αὐτῶν." The precipitous sides of the valleys contain many caves converted by a little labor into human habitations. Notable instances are the valley of the Kidron near Mār-Sabba, and Wādī-ul-Ḥamām near the Sea of Tiberias. See CAVE.

DEARLY DAY

Alfred Ely Day

DENARIUS, dē-nā'ri-us (δηναριον, dēnarioν; A Rom silver coin, 25 of which went to the aureus, the standard gold coin of the empire in the time of Augustus, which was equal in value to about one guinea or $5.25; more exactly £1.0.6=$5.00, the £=$4.866. Hence the value of the denarius would be about 20 cents and this was the ordinary wage of a soldier and a day laborer. The word is uniformly rendered "penny" in the AV and "shilling" in the ARV, except in Mt 22 19; Mk 12 15 and Lk 20 24, where the Lat word is used, since in these passages it refers to the coin in which the tribute was paid to the Roman government. See MONEY.

DENOUNCE, dē-noun's. Occurs in Dt 30 18: "I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish." It is used here in the obsolete sense of "to declare," to make known in a solemn manner. It is not found in the Bible with the regular meaning of "to conspire," "arraign," etc.

DENY, dē-ni': This word is characteristic of the NT rather than the OT, although it translates three different Heb originals, viz. בַּדֵּד, badāḏ, "to lie," "disown" (Gen 18 15; Josh 24 27; Job 8 18; 31 28; Prov 30 9); פַּלְל, "mānâ", "to withhold, keep back" (1 K 20 7; Prov 30 7); פַּלְל, "shāḇāb, "to turn back," "to say no" (1 K 20 10). In the NT, ἀναγινώσκειν, ἀδικάζει is once trd "deny," in the case of the Sadducees who denied the resurrection (Lk 20 27 AV), and where it carries the sense of speaking against the doctrine. But the word commonly is ἀφαίρεσις, ἀρέσκει, with or without the preq. In the absence of the prex the sense is "to disown," but when it is added it means "to disown totally" or to the fullest extent. In the milder sense it is found in Mt 10 33; 26 70. 72; of Simon Peter, Mk 14 58.70 (Acts 3 13.14; 2 Tim 2 12.13; 2 Pet 2 1; 1 Jn 2 22.23; Jude ver 4; Rev 2 13; 3 8). But it is significant that the sternest meaning is associated with Mt 16 24 and its parallels, where Christ calls upon him who would be His disciple to deny himself and take up his cross and follow Him. See also Peter, Simon.

DEPOSIT, dē-poz'it (παραθετή, parathēkē, parathēkē, 1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 1 12.14 RVm, paraphrased in both AV and RV into "that which is committed" [see OXIMEN]): The noun was used in the classical Gr, just as its Eng. equivalents, for "that which is placed with another for safe keeping," a charge committed to another's hands, consisting often of money or property; cf Ex 22 7; Lev 6 2. This practice was common in the West when there were no banks. (1) In 1 Tim 6 20; also 2 Tim 1 14, the reference is to a deposit which God makes with man, and for which man is to give a reckoning. The context shows that this deposit is the Christian faith, "the pattern of sound words" (2 Tim 1 13), that which is contrasted with the "oppositions of the knowledge which is falsely called" (1 Tim 6 20). "Keep the treasure of the Christian faith safe and undiminished" (Vincentius Lirensis). (2) In 2 Tim 1 12, the deposit is one which man makes with God. The key to the meaning of this expression is found probably in Ps 31 5: "Take thy hand and summon my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me," i.e. "All that I am, with all my interests, have been intrusted to Thy safe keeping, and, therefore, I have no anxieties with respect to the future. The day of reckoning, 'that day,' will show how faithful are the hands that hold this trust." H. E. JACOBS

DEPUTY, dep'ti: This is the correct rendering of Δύνατος, ὀρθός, (Acts 14 20.21; 16 1; διάφανος, Derbē, Acts 20 4; ὀρθόστηι, Derbētē, Strabo, Cicerone). A city in the extreme S.E. corner of the Lyceonian plain is mentioned twice as having been visited by Paul (on his first and second missionary journeys respectively), and it may now be regarded as highly probable that he passed through on his third journey (to the churches of Galatia). The view that these churches were in South Galatia is now accepted by the majority of Engl. and Am. scholars, and a traveler passing through the Cilician Gates to Southern Galatia must have traversed the territory called Derbe. Derbe is first mentioned as the seat of Antipater, who entertained Cicero, the Rom orator and governor of Cilicia. When the kingdom 1. History of Amymnis passed, at his death in 25 BC, to the Roman emperor Augustus, he made Derbe a province and called Galatia (see GALATIA). This province included Laranda as well as Derbe on the extreme S.E., and for a time Laranda was the frontier city looking toward Cappadocia and Cilicia and Syria via the Cilician Gates. But between 37 and 41 AD Laranda was transferred to the "protected" kingdom of Antiochus, and Derbe became the frontier city. It was the last city on distinguishably Roman territory, on the road leading from Southern Galatia to the E.; it was here that commerce entering the province had to pay the customs dues. Strabo records this fact when he calls Derbe a limēn, or "customs station." It owed its importance (and consequently its visit from Paul on his first journey) to this fact, and to its position on a great Rom road leading from Antioch, the capital of Southern Galatia, to Iconium, Laranda, Haculseia-Cybiistra, and the Cilician Gates. Rom milestones have been found along the line of this road, one at a point 15 miles N.W. of Derbe. It was one of those Lyceonian cities honored with the title "Claudianus" by the emperor Claudius; its coin bears the legend "Claudio-Derbe." This implied considerable importance and prosperity as well as strong pro-Rom feeling; yet we do not find Derbe standing aloof, like the Rom coloniae Iconium and Lystra, from the Common Council of Lycaonian cities (Koinon Lykaoniás).

Derbe remained in the province Galatia till about 150 A.D. when, according to the jurisdicton of the three province Cilicia-Isauria-Lycia. It continued in this division till 295 A.D. and was then included in the newly formed province Isauria. This arrangement lasted till about 372 A.D. when Lycia, excluding Derbe, was formed into a province by itself. The statement of Stephanus of Byzantium that Derbe was “a fortress of Isauria” originated in the arrangement which existed from 295 to 372 A.D. Coins of the late period Heracl., Fortuna, and a winged Victory writing on a shield with the legend “Heracl.” and “victory” were usual on the coinage of Derbe. The latter is mentioned several times in the records of the church councils. A bishop, Daphnus of Derbe, was present at the Council of Chalcedon (451).

The site of Derbe was approximately fixed by the American explorer Sterrett, and more accurately by Sir W. M. Ramsay, who, after careful

2. Situation fully examining all the ruins in the neighborhood, placed it at Gudelisian. Up to 1911 all remains of architectural evidence fixing the site had not been found, but Ramsay’s identification meets all the conditions, and cannot be far wrong. On the E., Derbe was conterminous with Laranda, on the N.E. with Barata in the Kara Dagh. It bordered on the territory of Iconium on the N.W., and on the S. Isauria on the W. Its territory touched the foothills of Taurus on the S., and the site commands a fine view of the great mountain called Hadya Baba or the Pilgrim Father. The Greeks of the district say that the name is a reminiscence of St. Paul, “over whose travels” the mountain “stood as a silent witness.”

The remains are mostly of the late Rom and Byzantine periods, but pottery of an earlier date has been found on the site. An inscription of a village in the territory of Derbe records the erection of a building by two architects from Lystra. A line of boundary stones, separating the territory of Derbe from that of Barata, is still standing. It probably belongs to an early delimitation of the territory of the frontier town of Galatia (Ramsay).

In Acts 14 20, 21, it is narrated that Paul and Barnabas, after being driven out of Lystra, departed to Derbe, where they “preached 3. Paul at the gospel . . . and made many Derbe disciples.” But they did not go farther. Paul’s mission included only the centers of Greco-Rom civilization; it was no part of his plan to pass over the frontier of the province into non-Rom territory. This aspect of his purpose is illustrated by the reference to Derbe on his second journey (Acts 16 1). Paul started from Antioch, “through Parthia and Cilicia, confirming the churches” (16 41). “Then he came to Derbe and Lystra” (16 1 AV). The unwarned reader might forget that in going from Cilicia to Derbe, Paul must have passed through a considerable part of Antiochus’ territory, and visited the important cities of Heraclia-Cybistra and Laranda. But his work ends with the Rom Cilicia and begins again with the Rom Galatia; to him, the intervening country is a blank. Concentration of effort, and the fact that the most fully prepared material were the characteristics of Paul’s missionary journeys in Asia Minor. That Paul was successful in Derbe may be gathered (as Ramsay points out) from the fact that he does not mention Derbe among the places where he had suffered persecution (2 Tim 3 11). Gaius of Derbe (among others) accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, in charge of the donations of the churches to the poor in that city (Acts 20 4).

LITERATURE.—The only complete account of Derbe is that given in Sir W. M. Ramsay’s Cities of St. Paul, 380–404. Paul is said to have visited the town, see the same author’s St. Paul the Traveller and Rom Citizen, 119, 178. Many inscriptions are found there. For the latest on Rom Pera see the reports collected by J. W. Storrar, Wolfe Expedition to Asia Minor, Nos. 18–52. The principal ancient authorities, besides Acts, are Cicer Ad Fam. xiii, 73, Stрабo xxx, 569; Ptolemaeus, v, 6, 17; Steph. Byz., Hierocyl., 675; Notit. Episcop., i, 404, and the Acts Censorum.

DESCRIBE, de-skrib’; This vb., now obsolete, in the sense used in Josh 18 4 6 8 9 and Jgs 8 14, is a tr of יֶדֶת, kâthâb, usually rendered “to write” or “inscribe.” But in the above passages it has the OE meaning of dividing into parts or into lots, as for example: “Wal it the land, and describe it according to their inheritance” (Josh 18 4); that is, describe in writing the location and size of the several parcels of land thus portioned out. In Jgs 8 14 “described” should be tr “wrote down a list of.” “Describe” is used twice in the AV of the NT (Rom 4 6 10, 5); where λέγω, λέγô, and γραφô, γραφô, are both rendered “described,” RV corrects both, and substitutes “pronounced” in the first and “writeth” in the second passage.

DESCRIPTION.—1 (1 Esd 35 39).

DESCRY, de-skri’t: This word like “describe” came into the Eng. through the Fr. descrire (Lat describere); it occurs only in the AV of Jgs 1 23; and the house of Joseph sent to the desery Bethel. For’ere ciyâd’ (Ps 63 1; Isa 41 18) “a dry land” of γραφô, wild beasts of the desert” (Isa 13 8 13, 21), Tôhâ, variously rendered “without form” (Gen 1 2 AV), “empty space,” AV “empty place” (Job 26 7), “waste,” AV “nothing” (Job 6 18), “confusion,” RVm “wasteness” (Isa 24 10 ERV), may be compared with Arab. ُل،
“to go astray,” al-Tkh, “the desert of the wanderer,” In the NT we find erēmos and erēmía: “The child (John) ... was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel” (Lk 1:80); “Our fathers did eat manna in the desert” (Jn 6:31 AV).

In the Desert of Edom.

The desert as known to the Israelites was not a waste of sand, as those are apt to imagine who have in mind the pictures of the Sahara. Great expanses of sand, it is true, are found in Arabia, but the nearest one, an-Nafād, was several days' journey distant from the farthest southeast reached by the Israelites in their wanderings. Most of the desert of Sinai and of Pal is land that needs only water to make it fruitful. E. of the Jordan, the line between “the desert” and “the sowre” lies about along the line of the Hijāţa railway. To the W. there is barely enough water to support the crops of wheat; to the E. there is too little. Near the line of demarcation, the yield of wheat depends strictly upon the rainfall. A few inches more or less of rain in the year determines whether the grain can reach maturity or not. The latent fertility of the desert lands is demonstrated by the season of scant rains, when they become carpeted with herbage and flowers. It is marvelous, too, how the camels, sheep and goats, even in the dry season, will find something to crop where the traveler sees nothing but absolute barrenness. The long wandering of the Israelites in “the desert” was made possible by the existence of food for their flocks and herds. Cf Ps 65:11:

“Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; And thy paths drop fatness. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness, And the hills are girded with joy.”

and also Joel 2:22: “The pastures of the wilderness do spring.”

“The desert” or “the wilderness” (ha-midbhar) usually signifies the desert of the wandering, or the northern part of the Sinaitic Peninsula. Cf Ex 11 4 AV: “Moses ... led the flock [of Jethro] to the backside of the desert”; Ex 5 3 AV: “Let us go ... three days' journey into the desert”; Ex 19 1 AV: “They ... came to the desert of Sinai”; Ex 23:14 AV: “I will set thy bounds from the Red Sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river” (Euphrates). Other uncultivated or pasture regions are known as Wilderness of Heersheba (Gen 21:14), W. of Judah (Jgs 1 16), W. of En-gedi (1 S 24 1), W. of Gibon (2 S 2 24), W. of Moab (1 S 33 24), W. of Damascus; cf Arab. Badīyāt-ush-Shām (1 K 15 15), etc. Midbhar yām, “the wilderness of the sea” (Isa 21 1), may perhaps be that part of Arabia bordering upon the Pers Gulf.

Aside from the towns and fields, practically all the land was mūbdhār or “desert,” for this term included mountain, plain and valley. The terms, “desert of En-gedi,” “desert of Maon,” etc, do not indicate circumscribed areas, but are applied in a general way to the lands about these places. To obtain water, the shepherds with their flocks traverse long distances, springing up, apparently arranged to reach the water about the middle of the day and rest about it for an hour or so, taking shelter from the sun in the shadows of the rocks, perhaps under some overhanging ledge.

DESIRE, dē-zi'r: The vb. “to desire” in the Scriptures usually means “to long for,” “to ask for,” “to demand,” and may be used in a good or bad sense (cf Dt 7:25 AV). RV frequently renders the more literal meaning of the Heb. Cf Ezk 20, “delight”; Prov 21, “precious”; Ps 40 6, “delight”; aîthq, aîthō (except Col 1 9), and ἄρηα, ἀρηδό (except Lk 7:36) are rendered “to ask” and ἄρηα, ǎrēdō, “to seek” (cf Lk 9:9 et al.). The Heb כָּדַשׁ, kādāsh, lit. “to lose in value,” is trd (Zeph 2:1) by “hath no shame” (RVm “longing,” AV “not desired”). The literal tr “to lose in value,” “to degenerate,” would be more in harmony with the context than the translations offered. The Heb כְּמֹד, kōmād, “without being desired” means according to the Arab, “to praise,” “to give thanks.” The context brings in contrast the burial of the king Jehoram with that of his fathers. In the latter case there was “burning,” i.e. recognition and praise, but when Jehoram died, there was no kōmād, i.e. there was no praise for his services rendered to the kingdom. For “desire” in Eccl 12:5, see Capéberry. A. L. Beeslich

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS: This phrase occurs only in Hag 2:7 (AV, ERV “desirable things,” ARV “things desired”), and is commonly applied to the Messiah.

At the erection of the temple in Ezra's time, the older men who had seen the more magnificent house of Solomon were disappointed and distressed at the comparison. The prophet, therefore, is directed to encourage them by the assurance that Jeh is with them nevertheless, and in a little while will shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, the dry land and the nations, and “the desire of all nations” shall come, and the house shall be filled with glory, so that “the latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former.”

(1) Many expositors refer the prophecy to the first advent of Christ. The shaking of the heavens, the earth, the sea and the dry land is the figurative setting of the shaking of the nations, while this latter expression refers to those changes of earthly dominion coincident with the overthrow of the Persians by the Greeks, the Greeks by the Romans, and so on down to the beginning of our era. The house then in process of construction was filled with glory by the later presence of the Messiah, which glory was greater than that of Solomon's time. Objections are presented to this view as follows: First, there is the element of time. Five cents, more or less, elapsed between the building of Ezra's temple and the first advent of Christ, and the men of Ezra's time needed comfort for the present. Then there is the difficulty of associating the physical phenomena with any shaking of the nations occurring at the first advent. Furthermore, in what sense, it is asked, could Christ, when He came, be said to be the desire of all nations? And finally, what comfort would a Jew find in this magnifying of the Gentiles?

(2) These difficulties, though not insuperable, lead others to apply the prophecy to the second advent of Christ. The Jews are to be restored to Jerusalem, and another temple is to be built (Ezek 40, 48). The shaking of the nations and the physical phenomena find their fulfilment in the “Great Tribulation” so often spoken of in the OT and Rev, and which is followed by the coming of Christ in glory to set up His kingdom (Mal 3:1; Mt 24:29, 30 and other places). Some of the difficulties spoken of by those who are not all of them, while others are common to both interpretations. One such common difficulty is that Ezra’s temple can hardly be identified with that of the time of Herod and Christ, and certainly not with that of Ezekiel; which is met, however, by saying that all the temples, including Solomon’s, are treated as but one “house” — the house of the Lord, in the religious sense, at least, if not architecturally. Another such difficulty touches the question of time, which, whether it includes five centuries or twenty, is met by the principle that to the prophets, “ascending in heart to God and the eternity of God, all times and all things of this world are only a mere point. When the precise time of particular events is not revealed, they sometimes describe them as continuous, and sometimes blend two events together, having a near or partial, and also a remote or complete fulfilment. “They saw the future in space rather than in time, or the perspective rather than the actual distance.” It is noted that the Lord Jesus so blends together the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, AD 70, and the days of the anti-Christ at the end of this age, that it is difficult to separate them, and to say which belongs exclusively to either (Mt 24:8). That the words may have an ultimate fulfilment in the second advent of Christ receives strength from a comparison of vs 21 and 22 of the same chapter (ch 2) of Hag with He 12:26-27. The writer of that epistle could not have thought of the Messiah as a mere prophecy, and yet he could have had in mind the days of the anti-Christ, if Hag 2:6, 7 and 21, 22, implying that it was one and the same shaking, of which the former vs denote the beginning, and the latter the end. The shaking, in other words, began introductory to the first advent and will be finished at the second. Concerning the former, cf Mt 3:17; 27:51; 28:2; Acts 2:2, 4:31, and concerning the latter, Mt 24:7; Rev 16:20; 20:11. (Bengel, quoted by Canon Faussett).

(3) Other expositors seek to cut the Gordian knot by altogether denying a direct application to the Messiah, and translating “the desire of all nations” by “the beauty,” or “the desirable things of all nations,” i.e. their precious gifts (see Isa 60:5-11; 61:6). This application is defended in the following way: (a) The Heb phrase means the quality and not the thing desired; (b) the Messiah was not desired by all the nations when He came; (c) the vb. “shall come” is pl., which requires the noun to be understood in the pl., whereas if the Messiah be intended, the noun is singular; (d) “The silver is mine,” etc (Hag 2:8) accords with the tr “the desirable things of all nations”; (e) the agreement of the Sept and Syr VSS with such rendering. All these arguments, however, can be fairly met by counter-arguments, leaving the reader still in doubt. (a) An abstract noun is put for the concrete; (b) the result shows that while the Jews rejected Christ, the Gentiles received and hence desired Him; (c) where two nouns stand together after the manner of “the desire” and “nations,” the vb. agrees in number sometimes with the latter, even though the former be its nominative; (d) the 8th ver of the prophecy can be harmonized about as easily with one view as the other; (e) the AV is sustained by the Vulg and early Jewish rabbis. John M. Gray.

DESESOLATE, des‘ë-lāt (very frequently in the OT for έρέω, ἐρέων, and its derivatives; less frequently, ἀνερέω, ἀνερέω, and its derivatives, and other words. In the NT it stands for έρημος, έρημας [Mt 23:38; Acts 1:20; Gal 4:27], ἐρέων [Rev 17:16], and ἐρέων [1 Tim 5:5]): From Lat dés, intens., solus, alone. Several shades of meaning can be distinguished: (1) Its primary sense is “left lonely,” “forlorn,” e.g. Ps 25:10, “Have mercy upon me, for I am in distress.” (Heb ἀμώμω, “alone”; 1 Tim 5:5, “she that is a widow indeed, and desolate” (Gr ἄμομομένη, “left alone”). (2) In the sense of “laid waste,” “desolate of inhabitants,” e.g. Jer 7:7, “to make thy land desolate, that thy cities be laid waste, (3) With the meaning “comfortless,” “afflicted,” e.g. Ps 143, 4, “My heart within me is desolate.” (4) In the sense of “barren,” “childless,” “unfruitful,” e.g. Job 15:34; Isa 49:21 (Heb gāmā‘ah).

DESPAIR, dé-spar’: The subst. only in 2 Cor 4:8, “perplexed, but not in [RV ‘yet not unto’] despair,” lit. “being at a loss, but not utterly at a loss.” (5) “Unto despair” here conveys the force of the Gr πρὸς κακόν (utterly,” “out and out”). Desperate, in Job 6:20; Isa 17:11. In the Heb adj. is derived from a vb. “to be sick,” and the lit. rendering would be “incurable” (cf Job 34:6, “my wound is incurable”). Desperately in Jer 17:9 AV, where the heart is said to be “desperately [i.e. incurably] wicked” or “sick.”

DESSAU, des‘ō, des‘sō (Ἀσσαοῦ, Dessauō [2 Macc 14:16]): RV LESSAU (which see).

DESTINY, des‘tī-nī (ΜΕΝΗ): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Pleiades. See Astrology, 10; MENI.

DESTROYER, dé-strō-ër: In several passages the word designates a supernatural agent of destruction, or destroying angel, executing Divine judgment. (1) In Rev 12:23, of the “destroyer” who smote the first-born in Egypt, again referred to under the same title in He 11:28 RV (AV “the destroyer”). (2) In Job 33:22, “the destroyers” lit. “they that cause to die” = the angels of death that are ready to take away a man’s life during severe illness. No exact text is thus found in the OT. The nearest approach is the angel that destroyed the people” by pestilence (2 S 24:16-17 || 1 Ch 21:15-16); the angel that smote the Assyrians (2 K 19:35 = Isa 36:7 || 2 Ch 32:21); “angels of evil” (Ps 78:49). (3) In the Apoc, “the destroyer” is once referred to as “the minister of punishment” (RV, “him who was punishing”), who brought death into the world (Wisd 18:22-25). (4) In 1 Cor 10:10, “the destroyer” is the angelic agent whose instrumentality Paul attributes the plague of Nu 16:40—41. In later Jewish theology (the Tgs and Midr), the “destroyer” or “angel of death” appears under the name Sammael (i.e. the poison of God), who was once an archangel before the throne of God, and who caused the serpent to tempt Eve. According to Weber, he is not to be distinguished from Satan. The chief distinction between the two is that the Samson of later Judaism was the figure of a later time and the Samson of early Judaism was the figure of the early period. The Samson of early Judaism was the figure of the early period and the Samson of early Judaism was the figure of the early period and the Samson of early Judaism was the figure of the early period.

DESTRUCTION, dé-struk'shun: In AV this word translates over 50 Heb words in the OT, and 4 words in the NT. Of these the most interesting, as having a technical sense, is ἀβαδδών (from vb. ἀβαδθ, "to be lost," "to perish"). It is found 6 times in the Wisdom Literature, and nowhere else in the OT; cf Rev 9 11. See ABADDON.

DESTRUCTION, CITY OF (Isa 19 18; Heliopolis or City of the Sun). See Astronomy, 1, 2; IR-HA-HERES; On.

DETERMINATE, dě-tér'mi-nát (αἵρεσις, hōrίσμενος, "determined," "fixed"): Only in Acts 2 23, "by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," Gr hōrίσμενος, fr hōrìzō, "to set boundaries," "to determine," "to settle" (cf Eng. word "horizon"—a line which bounds the sky). It is remarkable that Peter in one and the same sentence speaks of the death of Christ from two quite distinct points of view. (1) From the historical standpoint, it was a crime perpetrated by men who were morally responsible for their deed ("but ye by the hand of lawless men did crucify and slay"). (2) From the standpoint of Divine teleology, it was part of an eternal plan ("by the determinate," etc.). No effort is made to demonstrate the logical consistency of these two ideas. They represent two aspects of the one fact. The same Gr word is used in Lk 22 22, where Christ speaks of His betrayal as taking place "as it was [RV 'hath been'] determined" (κατὰ τὸ ἡρίσμον). Cf Lk 24 26.

D. MIALL EDWARDS

DETERMINE, dě-tér'mi-n: (1) "To resolve," "decide." This is the primary meaning of the word and it is also the one that is most common. In the NT the Gr word σχένω, σχένθην and its derivatives have the same meaning. (Acts 20 16; 25 25; 1 Cor 2 3). The word occurs frequently in the OT with this meaning (see Ex 21 22; 1 Sam 7 9.33). (2) "To decree," "ordain," "mark out." The Gr word that is rendered "determine" with this meaning is hōrizein. See Determination, See Determined, See Determinate.

The Heb term הָאָרָג is trd "determine" with the above meaning; as "his days are determined" (Job 14 5); "a destruction is determined" (Isa 10 22); "desolations are determined" (Dnl 9 26); The Heb term מָשָׁר, which means "judgment" or "sentence," is trd "determination" in Zeph 3 8.

DETESTABLE, dě-tet'sa-b'l, THINGS (נָאשׁ, shākā; יָכִין, shekē; τόποθα, tō'êbith, "abomination," "abominable thing"): The tr of shāhâkīm in Jer 10 18; Ezek 6 11; 7 20; 11 18-21; 37 23; a term always applied to idol-worship or to objects connected with idolatry; often also trd "abomination," as in 1 K 11 5.7 (bes); Jer 4 1; Ezek 20 7.8-30. Shekē, trd "abomination," is applied in the Scriptures to that which is ceremonially unclean (Lev 7 21), creatures forbidden as food, as water animals without fins or scales (11 10-12), birds of prey and the like (ver 18), winged creeping things (vs 20.23), creeping vermin (vs 41.1). Cf also Isa 66 17. By partaking of the food of the animals in question one makes himself detestable (Lev 11 43; 20 25). Similarly the idolatrous ap-was no single historical event which brought together the NT books which were everywhere to be regarded as Scripture. These books reveal the fact that there was no uniform NT canon in the church during at least the first 3 centuries. The Ethiopian church, for example, had 35 books in its NT, while the Syrian church had only 22 books.

In Conybeare's early date the enumerations were practically agreed on those books which are sometimes designated as the protocanonical, and which Eusebius designated as the homologoumena. They differed, however, in regard to the 7 disputed books which form a part of the so-called deuter-canon, and which Eusebius designated as the antilegomena. They also differed in regard to other ecclesiastical writings, for there was no fixed line between canonical and non-canonical books. While there was perhaps no council of the church that had passed on the books and declared them canonical, it is undoubtedly true that before the close of the 2nd cent, all the books that are in our NT, with the exception of those under consideration, had become recognized as Scripture by the orthodox church.

The history of these seven books reveals the fact that although some of them were early used by the Fathers, they afterward fell into disfavor. That is es, true of He and Rev. Eusebius, who says it had been used by the 3 Pet, had been used by some of the Fathers. He was freely attested by Clement of Rome and Justin Martyr; Jas by Hermas and probably by Clem of Rome; 2 Jn, 3 Jn and Jude by the Muratorian Fragment; Rev by Hermas and Justin Martyr who names John as its author. See Canon of the NT.

Jerome, who prepared the Vulg in the closing years of the 4th cent., accepted all 7 of the doubtful books, yet he held that 2 Jn and 3 Jn were written by the Presbyter, and he insisted that 2 Pet and Jude were still rejected by some, and he said the Latin did not receive He among the canonical Scriptures, neither did the Gr churches receive Rev. Augustine, who was one of the great leaders during the 4th cent. It was at the First Council of Constantinople and the First Council of Ephesus, that the 3 Jn and Jude were finally admitted to the canon, and the 7th Council of Constantinople, held in 381, adopted the catalogue of Augustine. This catalogue contained the books both of the NT and the OT.

Since the Reformation.—The Canon of Augustine became the canon of the majority of the churches and the OT books which he accepted were added to the Vulg, but there were some who still held to the Canon of Jerome. The awakening of the Reformation inevitably led to a reinvestigation of the canon, since the Bible was made the source of authority, and some of the disputed books of the NT were again questioned by the Reformers. The position given the Bible by the Reformers led the Rom church to reaffirm its sanction and definitely to fix the books that should be accepted. Accordingly the Council of Trent, which convened in 1546, made the Canon of Augustine, which included the 7 apoc books of the OT, and the 7 disputed books of the NT, the Canon of the church, and it pronounced a curse upon those who did not receive these books. The first question of Rome and adopted those books which had long had the sanction of usage as their Bible. Gradually, however, the questioned books of the OT were separated from the others. That was true in Coverdale's tr, and in Matthew's Bible they were not only separated from the others but they were prefixed with the words, "the volume of the book called Hagiography." In Cranmer's Bible, Hagiography was changed into Apoc, and this passed through the succeeding ed into the AV.

LITERATURE

In Heb דָּבָר הַפָּרְשָׁא, דָּבָר חַד-דָּבָר, "these are the words"; in Gr, ἀνακοινώσεως, Deuteronomion, "second law"; whence the Lat deuteronomii, and the Eng. Deuteronomy. The Gr title is due to a mistranslation of the Sept of the clause in Dt 17 18 rendered, "and he shall write for himself this repetition of the law." The Heb really means, "he shall write out for himself a copy of this law." However, the error on which the Eng. title rests is not serious, as Dt is in a very true sense a repetition of the law. Dt is the book of the five books of the Pentateuch or "five-fifths of the Law." It possesses an individuality and impressiveness of its own. In Ex–Nu Jeh is represented as speaking unto Moses, whereas in Dt Moses is represented as speaking at Jeh's command to Israel (1 1–4; 5 1; 29 1).

It is a hortatory recapitulation of various addresses delivered at various times and places in the desert wanderings—a sort of homily on the constitution, the essence or gist of Moses' instructions to Israel during the forty years of their desert experience. It is "a Book of Reviews"; a tr of Israel's redemptive history into living principles; not so much a history as a commentary. There is much of retrospection in it, but its main outlook is forward. The author's interest is entirely moral. His one supreme purpose is to arouse Israel's loyalty to Jeh and to His revealed law. Taken as a whole the book is an exposition of the great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and love thy neighbor as thyself, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." It was from Dt Jesus summarized the whole of the Old Covenant in a single sentence (Mt 22 37; of Dt 6 5), and from it He drew His weapons with which to vanquish the tempter (Mt 4 7; of Dt 6 3; 6 16 13).

Dt is composed of three discourses, followed by three short appendices: (1) 1 1–4 43, historical; a review of God's dealings with Israel, and of the disposition of the despised wild tribes when delivered (1 1–5), recounting in broad oratorical outlines the chief events in the nation's experience from Horeb to Moab (1 6–3 29), on which the author bases an earnest appeal to the people to be faithful and obedient, and in particular to keep clear of all possible idolatry (4 1–10).

Appended to this first discourse is a brief note (vs 41–43) concerning Moses' appointment of three cities of refuge on the E. side of the Jordan (2 44–20 19), oratory and legal; introduced by a superscription (4 44–49), and consisting of a resumé of Israel's moral and civil statutes, testimonies and judgments. Analyzed in greater detail, this second discourse is composed of two main sections: (a) chs 5–11, an extended exposition of the Ten Commandments on which the theocracy was based;
The essential unity of the great kernel of Dt (chs 8-26) is recognized and is followed by nearly everyone (e.g. Kautzsch, Kuenen, Dillmann, Driver). Some would even defend the unity of the whole of chs 1-26 (Knobel, Graf, Kosters, Colenso, Kleinert).

5. Unity

The monothemism of Dt is very explicit.

Following from this, as a necessary corollary almost, is the other great teaching of the book, the unity of the sanctuary. The motto of the book might be said to be, "One God, one sanctuary.

(1) Jehovah, a unique god.—Jeh is the only God, "There is none else besides him" (4 35-39; 6 4; 32 39), "He is God of gods, and Lord of lords" (10 17), "the living God" (5 26), "the faithful God, who kept covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and sent his angel and his sword before your face" (10 10), and by these means, to save them that love him and keep his commandments (7 9), who abominates graven images and every species of idolatry (7 25-26; 12 31; 13 14; 18 12; 20 18; 27 15), to whom belong the heavens and the earth (10 14), who rules over all the nations (7 19), whose relation to Israel is near and personal (28 58), even that of a Father (32 6), whose being is spiritual (4 12-15), and whose name is "Rock" (32 4.15-18.30.31). Being such a God, He is jealous for Israel's name, and loves them "above all that is called by name" (18 17), and hence all temptations to idolatry must be utterly removed from the land, the Canaanites must be completely exterminated and all their altars, pillars, Asherim and images destroyed (7 1-5.16-19; 27 9; 29 1; 5 2.3). By means of it they became the heirs of all the promises given to their fathers the patriarchs (4 31; 7 12; 8 18; 29 13), all the blessings of which were poured out upon them (3 9)^d, but especially blessed of Jeh (7 6; 14 2.21; 26 18.19; 28 9; 4 37), disciplined, indeed, but for their own good (8 2.3.5.10), to be established as a people, as Jehovah's peculiar lot and inheritance (32 6.9; 4 7).

The relation between Jehovah and Israel a unique relationship of reciprocal and religious trust, hence Israel was expected not only to fear Jehovah but to love Him and cleave to Him (4 10; 5 29; 6 5; 10 12.20; 11 1.13.22; 13 3.4; 17 19; 19 9; 28 55; 30 6.16.20; 31 12.13). The highest privileges are theirs because they are the partakers of the covenant blessings; as strangers and foreigners, except they be admitted into Israel by special permission (23 1-8).

The literary style of Dt, says Driver, "is very marked and individual; in his command of a chaste, yet warm and persuasive, the book exhibits a union among the writers of the OT" (Dt, lxxvii, lxxxviii). Many striking expressions characterize the style of this wonderful book of oratory: e.g. "cause to inherit"; "Hear O Israel"; the oft-repeated roll of the seven word death and burial (ch 34) with a noble panegyricon on him as the greatest prophet Israel ever had. Thus closes this majestic and marvelously interesting and practical book. Its keyword is "possess"; its central thought is "Jeh has chosen Israel, let Israel choose Jehovah." The great central thought of Dt is the unique relation which Jehovah is as a unique God sustains to Israel as a unique people. "Hear O Israel; Jehovah our God is one Jehovah. The Ideas of Dt are very explicit.

6. Authorship

Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi. And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished [i.e. to the end], that Moses commanded the Levites, that bare the ark of the covenant of Jehovah, saying, Take this book of the law, and put it by the side of the ark of the covenant of Jehovah your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee. (Dt 31 9.24-27) This passage is of more than traditional value, and should not be ignored as is so often done (e.g. by Ryle, art. "Dt," HDB). It is not enough to say that Moses was the great fountain-head of Heb law, that he gave the oral but not written statutes or, that Moses was only the traditional source of these statutes. For it is distinctly and emphatically stated that "Moses wrote this law." And it is further declared (31 22) that "Moses wrote this song," contained in ch 32. Now, these statements are either true or false, and we are to decide which. The authorship of no other book in the OT is so explicitly emphasized. The present writer believes that Moses actually wrote the great body of Dt, and for the following general reasons:

(1) Dt as a whole is certainly not appropriate to what we know of Moses times. It closes most fittingly... the formative period of Israel's history. The historical situation from first to last is that of Moses. The references to foreign neighbors—Egypt, Canaan, Amalek, Ammon, Moab, Edom—are in every case to those who flourished in Moses' own times. As a law book its teaching is based upon the Ten Commandments, but after Moses gave the Ten Commandments, then surely he may have written the Book of Dt also. Besides, the Code of Hammurabi, which antedates Moses by at least 700 years, makes it possible certainly that Moses also left laws in collated or written form.

(2) Dt is represented as emanating from Moses.—The language is put into Moses' mouth. Nearly forty times his name occurs, and in the majority of instances as the authoritative author of the subject-matter. The first person is used predominatingly throughout: "I commanded Joshua at that time" (3 21); and "I charged your judges at that time" (1 16); "And I commanded you at that time" (ver 18); "I have led you forty years in the wilderness" (39 6). The language surely purports to come from Moses; even if it was not actually used by him, it is a most remarkable case of impersonation, if not of literary forgery, for the writer represents himself as reproducing, not what Moses might have said, but the exact words of Moses. (Zeh; The Antiquity of Heb Writing and Lit., 1911, 261).

(3) Dt is a military law book, a code of conquest, a book of exhortation.—It was intended primarily neither for Israel in the desert nor for Israel settled in Canaan, but for Israel on the borderland, eager for conquest. It is expressly stated that Moses taught Israel these statutes and judgments in order that they should obey them in the land which they were about to enter (4 5 14, 5 31). They must expect the battle, the wandering, and the conquest; but in their warfare they must observe certain laws in keeping with the theocracy (20 1—20; 23 9—14; 21 10—14; 31 6—7), and, when they have finally dispossessed their enemies, they must settle down to agricultural life and live no longer as nomads but as citizens of a civilized land (19 14; 22 8—10; 24 19—21). All these laws are regulations which should become binding in the future only (cf Kittel, His- tory of the Hebrews, 1 32). Coupled with them are prohibitions which could not be genuine, or even to have had their birth in Moses' soul. Indeed the great outstanding feature of Dt is its paternal or hortatory character. Its exhortations have not only a military ring as though written on the eve of battle, but also a parental line and a warning against allowing themselves to be conquered in religion through the seductions of idolatry. The book in short is the message of one who is interested in Israel's political and religious future. There is a paternal vein running throughout it which marks it with a genuine Mosaic, not a merely fictitious or artificial, stamp. It is these general features, so characteristic of the entire book, which compel one to believe in its Mosaic authorship.

Certain literary features exist in Dt which lead the present writer to think that the bulk of the book was spoken twice; once, to the first generation between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea in the 2nd year of the Exodus wandering, and a second time to the new generation, in the plains of Moab in the 40th year. Several considerations point in this direction:

(1) The names of the widely separated geographical places mentioned in the city "affairs" are the words which Moses spake unto all Israel beyond the Jordan in the wilderness, in the Arabah over against Saph, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Di-zahab"; to which is added, "It is eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea." If these statements have any relevance whatever to the contents of the book which they introduce, they point to a wide area, from Horeb to Moab, as the historical-geographical background of the book. In other words, Dt, in part at least, seems to have been spoken first on the way between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, and later again when Israel were encamped on the plains of Moab. And, indeed, what would be more natural than for Moses when marching northward from Horeb expecting to enter Canaan from the south, to exhort the Israel of that day in terms of chs 5—26? Being baffled, however, by the adverse report of the spies and the faithlessness of the people, and being forced to wait and wander for 38 years, what would be more natural than for Moses in Moab, when about to resign his position as leader, to repeat the exhortations of chs 5—26, adapting them to the needs of the new desert-trained generation and prefacing the whole by a historical introduction such as that found in chs 1—4?

(2) The double allusion to the cities of refuge (4 41—43; 19 1—13). On the supposition that chs 5—26 were spoken first between Horeb and Kadesh-barnea, in the 2nd year of the Exodus, it could not be expected that in this introduction of the three cities chosen E of the Jordan should be given, and in fact they are not (19 1—13); the territory of Sihon and Og had not yet been conquered and the cities of refuge, accordingly, had not yet been designated (of Nu 33 1—21). But in chs 4 41—43, the contrary, which forms a part of the historical introduction, which ex hypothesis was delivered just at the end of the 38 years' wanderings, after Sihon and Og had been subdued and their territory divided, the three cities situated E of the Jordan are actually named, just as might be expected.

(3) The section 4 14—49, which, in its original form, very probably introduced chs 5—26 before these chapters were adapted to the new situation in Moab.

(4) The phrase "began Moses to declare this law" (1 5), suggesting that the great lawyer found it necessary to expound what he had delivered at some previous time. The Heb word "declare" is found elsewhere in the OT only in Dt 27 8 and in Hab 2 12, and signifies "to make plain."

(5) The author's evident attempt to identify the new generation in Moab with the patriarchs.—"Jehovah hath not made this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, which are all of us together this day," i.e. with us who have survived the desert discipline (Dt 5 3). In view of these facts, we conclude that the book in its present form (barring the exceptions above mentioned) is the product of the whole 38 years of desert experience from Horeb on, adapted, however, to meet the exigencies of the Israelites as they stood between the victories already won on the E. of the Jordan and those anticipated on the W. The impression given throughout is that the great lawyer's work is done, and that a new era in the people's history is about to begin.

The influence of Dt began to be felt from the very beginning of Israel's career in Canaan. Though the references to Dt in Josh, Jgs, and R are comparatively few, yet they are sufficient to show that not only the principles of Dt were known and observed but that they were known in written form as codified statutes. For example, while Jerusalem was taken by Joshua and its spoil were "devoted" (Josh 6 17—18) in keeping with Dt 13 15 ff (cf Jos 10 40; 11 12—15 with Dt 7 2; 20 16 17). Achashmerep passed and he and his household were stoned, and afterward burned with fire (Josh 7 25; cf. Dt 13 10; 17 5). The fact that his sons and his daughters were put to death with him seems at first sight to contradict Dt 24 16, but there is no proof that they suffered for their father's sin (see Achian; Achior); besides the fact that Hadad, the son of Ahab, was held, even that of Rahab the harlot (Josh 6 17). Again when Ai was taken, "only the cattle and the spoil" did Israel take for a prey unto themselves (Josh 8 27), in keeping with Dt 20 14; also, the bodies of the slain of Ai were not burned before night-fall from the tree on which he had been hanged (Josh 8 29), which was in keeping with Dt 21 23 (cf. Josh 10 26 27). As in warfare, so in worship. For instance, Joshua built an altar on Mt. Ebal (Josh 8 30 31), "as Moses the servant of Jehovah commanded" (Dt 27 4 6), and he wrote on them a copy of the law (Josh 8 32), as Moses had also enjoined (Dt 27 3 8). Moreover, the elders and officers and judges stood on either side of the ark of the covenant between Ebal and Gerizim (Josh 8 33), as direct in Dt 11 29; 27 12 13, and Joshua read to all the congregation of Israel all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings (Josh 8 34 35), in strict accord with Dt 31 11 13. A scene of national importance is the story of the two and a half tribes who, on their return to their home on the E. side of the Jordan, erected a memorial at the Jordan, and, when accused by their fellow-tribemen of plurality of sanctuary, emphatically disavowed it (Josh 22 20; cf. Dt 12 5). Obviously, therefore, Dt was known in the days of Joshua. A very few instances in the history of the Judges point in the same direction: e.g. the utter destruction of Zephanah (Jgs 1 17; cf. Dt 7 2; 20 16); Gideon's elimination of the fearful and faint-hearted from his army (Jgs 7 1 7; cf. Dt 20 1 9); the author's studied concern to justify Gideon and Manoah for sacrificing at altars other than at Shiloh on the ground that they acted in obedience to Jehovah's direct commands (Jgs 6 25 27; 13 16); esp. the case of Micaiah, who congratulated himself that Jehovah would do him good seeing he had a Levite for a priest, is clear evidence that Dt was known in the days of the Judges (Jgs 1 3; 20 21); the rising of Zedekiah and the Babylonian model (2 K 25 13 14); 1 1 S 1 I 1 9 21 24 the pious Ekanah is pictured as going yearly to worship Jehovah at Shiloh, the central sanctuary at that time. After the destruction of Shiloh, when the ark of the covenant had been captured, Elkanah, son of Abimelech, dwelt at his town, Ramah and Betheluim (1 S 7 7 9 17; 16 5), but in doing so he only took advantage of the elasticity of the Deuteronomic law: "When... he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; then shall it come to pass that to the place which Jehovah your God shall choose, to cause his name to dwell there, thither shall ye bring all that I command you: your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices" (Dt 12 10 11). It was not until Solomon's time that Israel's enemies were all subdued, and even then Solomon did not observe strictly the teachings of Dt; "His wives turned away his heart," so that he did not faithfully keep Jehovah's "covenant and statutes" (1 K 11 3 11). Political disruption followed, and religion necessarily suffered. Yet Jehoiada the priest gave the youthful Josiah "the crown" and "the testimony" (2 K 11 12; cf. Dt 17 18). King Amaziah did not slay the children of the murderers who slew his father, in obedience to the law of Dt (2 K 15 6; cf. Dt 24 16). Later on, Hezekiah, the cultured king of Judah, reformed the cultus of his day by removing the high places, breaking down the pillars, cutting down the Asherabs, and even breaking in pieces the bronze serpent which Moses had made (2 K 18 4 22). Hezekiah's reforms were unquestionably carried through under the influence of Dt.

It is equally certain that the prophets of the 8th cent. were not ignorant of this book. For example, Hosea complains of Israel's sacrificing upon the hills and worshiping there, and warns Judah not to follow Israel's example in coming up to worship at Gilgal and Beth-aven (Hos 4 13 15). He also alludes to striving with priests (Hos 4 4; cf. Dt 17 12), removing landmarks (Hos 5 12), and eliminating on a large scale those who went to Egypt (Hos 8 13; 9 3; cf. Dt 28 68), and of Jehovah's tender dealing with Ephraim (Hos 11 3; cf. Dt 1 31; 32 10). The courage of Amos, the shepherd-prophet of Tekoa, can best be explained, also, on the basis of a written law such as that of Dt with which he was already more or less familiar (Am 3 2; cf. Dt 7 6; 4 7 8). He condemns Israel's inhumanity and adultery in the name of Jehovah, and complains of their retaining overnight pledges wrested from the poor, which was distinctly forbidden in Dt (Am 2 6 8; cf. Dt 24 12 15; 23 17). Likewise, in the prophecies of Isaiah there are conscious reflections of Dt's thought and teaching. Zion is constantly pictured as the center of the nation. Zion's king is the descendent of David (Jer 23 23; cf. Mic 1 2 3), and the Book of Jeremiah is the prophecies of the 4th cent. BC—Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea—ever recognized "high places" as legitimate centers of worship.

Over against the Bib. view, certain modern critics since De Wette (1805) advocate a late origin of Dt, claiming that it was first published in 621 BC, when Hilkiah found the "Book of the Law" in the temple in the reign of King Josiah (18th year of King Josiah (2 K 22 8 ff). The kernel of Dt and "the book of the law" discovered by Hilkiah are said to be identical. Thus, Dr. G. A. Smith claims that "a code like the Book of Dt was not brought forth at a stroke, but was the expression of the gradual results of the age-long working of the Spirit of the Living God in the hearts of His people" (Jerusalem, II, 115). According to Dr. Driver, "Dt may be described as the prophetic reformulation of the ancient text of an older legislation. It is probable that there was a tradition, if not a written record, of a final legislative address delivered by Moses in the steppes of Moab: the plan followed by the author would be to reproduce this text as closely as possible upon a traditional basis. But be that as it may, the bulk of the laws contained in Dt is undoubtedly far more ancient than the author himself. . . . What is essentially new in Dt is not the matter, but the form. . . . The new element in Dt, is thus not the laws, but their parenetic setting" (Dt, lxvi). This refined presentation of the matter would not be so very objectionable, were Drs. Smith and Driver's theory not linked up with certain other claims and allegations to the effect that Dt was composed in the 15th cent. BC could not possibly have promulgated such a lofty monotheism, that in theological teaching "the author of Dt is the spiritual heir of Hosea," that there are discrepancies between it and other parts of the Pent, that in the early history of Israel down to the 8th cent. plurality of sanctuaries was legally permissible, that there are no traces of the influence of the principal teachings of a written Dt discoverable in Heb. lit. until the time of Jeremiah, and that the book of Dt was originally composed as a program of reform, not by Moses but in the name of Moses as a forgery or pseudograph. For example, F. H. Woods says, although not a necessary result of accepting the later date, the majority of critics believe this book of the law to have been the result of a pious fraud.
promulgated by Hilkiah and Shaphan with the intention of deceiving Josiah into the belief that the reforms which they desired were the express command of God revealed to Moses” (HDB, II, 368). Some are unwilling to go so far. But in any case, it is claimed that the law book discovered and published by Hilkiah was used about the reformation by Josiah in 621 BC, was no other than some portion of the Book of Dt, and of Dt alone. But there are several considerations which are opposed to this theory: (1) Dt emphasizes centralization of worship at one sanctuary (12:5); Josiah’s reformation was to have been general (2 K 23:4 ff.). (2) In Dt 18:6–8, a Levite coming from the country to Jerusalem was allowed to minister and share in the priestly perquisites; but in 2 K 25:9, “the priests of the high places came not up to the altar of Jeh in Jerus, but they did eat unleavened bread among their brethren.” And according to the critical theory, “Levites” and “priests” are interchangeable terms. (3) The following passages in Ex indicate almost equally well a theory for Josiah’s reformation: 20:3; 22:18-20; 23:13.24.32-33; 34:13.14-17. (4) The law book discovered by Hilkiah was recognized at once as an ancient code which the fathers had disobeyed (2 K 25:13). Were there all these laws in Jer 11:3-4? “There were many persons in Judah who had powerful motives for exposing this forgery if it was one” (Raven, OT Introduction, 112). (5) One wonders why so many archaic and, in Josiah’s time, apparently obsolete laws are here. It is incorporated in a code whose express motive was to reform an otherwise hopeless age: e.g., the command to exterminate the Canaanites, who had long since ceased to exist (Dt 7:18-22), and to blot out Amalek (Dt 25:17-19). The last remnants of whom were completely destroyed in Hezekiah’s time (1 Ch 4:41-43). Esr. is true of the scope and more of laws peculiar to Dt, concerning building battlements on the roofs of houses (Dt 22:8), robbing birds’ nests (vs 6.7), the sexes exchanging garments (vs 5), going out to war (20:1 f), etc. (6) Esr. remarks that it is if Dt were written, as alleged, shortly before the reign of Josiah, there should be no anachronisms in it betraying a post-Mosaic origin. There were none alleged by the Examiners between Judah and Israel, no hint of Assyrian oppression through the exaction of tribute, nor any threats of Israel’s exile either to Assyria or Babylonia, but rather to Egypt (Dt 28:68). “Jerusalem” is never mentioned. From a literary point of view, it is psychologically and historically well-nigh impossible for a writer to conceal all traces of his age and circumstances. On the other hand, no Egyptologist has ever discovered any anachronisms in Dt touching Egypt matters. From first to last the author depicts the actual situation of the times of Moses. It is consequently hard to believe, as is alleged, that a later writer is studying to give “an imaginative revivification of the past.” (7) The chief argument in favor of Dt’s late origin is its alleged teaching concerning the unity of the sanctuary. Wellhausen lays special emphasis upon this point. Prior to Josiah’s reformation, it is claimed, plurality of sanctuaries was allowed. But in opposition to this, it is possible to point various passages in Josiah’s time (2 K 18:4, 22), as a movement in the direction of unity; and especially to Ex 20:24, which is so frequently misinterpreted as allowing a multiplicity of sanctuaries. This classical passage when correctly interpreted allows only that altars shall be erected in places commanded. The so-called “the Tabernacle was” (Mackay, Intro to OT, 110). This interpretation of this passage is confirmed and made practically certain, indeed, by the command in Ex 23:14-19 that Israel shall repair three times each year to the house of Jeh and there present their offering. On the other hand, Dt’s emphasis upon unity of sanctuary by later augen is that Dt requires the unity only after Israel’s enemies are all overcome (Dt 12:10.11). “When” Jeh gave them rest, “then” they shall repair for worship to the place which “God shall choose.” As Davidson remarks: “It is not a law that is to come into effect in their entry into the land; it is in the time that Jeh shall have given them rest from all their enemies round about; that is, from the times of David, or more particularly, Solomon; for only when the temple was built did that place become known which Jeh had chosen to place His name there” (OT Theology, 361). Besides, it should not be forgotten that in Dt itself the command is given to build an altar in Mt. Ebal (27:5-7). As a matter of fact, the unity of sanctuary follows as a necessary consequence of the monotheism, which has been taught at length. If, on the other hand, monotheism was first evolved by the prophets of the 8th cent., then, of course, unity of sanctuary was of 8th-cent. origin also. (8) Another argument advanced in favor of the later origin of Dt is the contradiction between the laws of Dt and those of Lev-Nu concerning the priests and Levites. In Nu 16:10.35-36, a sharp distinction is drawn, it is alleged, between the priests and common Levites, whereas in Dt 18:1-8, all priests are Levites and all Levites are priests. But as a matter of fact, the passage in Dt does not invest a Levite with priestly graces but with Levitical functions (18:1-8). Another argument is that all Levites receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. It goes without saying that if the Levite be a priest he shall serve and fare like his brethren the priests; if he be not a priest, he shall enjoy the privileges that belong to his brethren who are Levites, but not priests” (J. D. Davis, art. “Dt,” in DB, 117). The Book of Dt teaches not that all the tribe, but only the tribe of Levi may exercise priestly functions; the schism between the priests and priestly prerogatives to one and only one tribe. This was in perfect harmony with Lev-Nu and also in keeping with the style of popular discourse. (9) Recently Professor Ed. Naville, the Egyptologist, has proposed a interesting hypothesis, that “the Book of the Law” discovered by Hilkiah, which is not without some value. On the analogy of the Egyptian custom of burying texts of portions of “the Book of the Dead” at the foot of statues of gods and within foundations of temples, he concludes that Solomon, when he constructed the Temple, probably deposited this “Book of the Law” in the foundations, and that when Josiah’s workmen were about their tasks of repairing the edifice, the long-forgotten document came to light and was given to Hilkiah the priest. Hilkiah, however, upon examination of the document found it difficult to read, and so, calling for Shaphan the scribe, who was more expert in deciphering antique letters than himself, he gave in turn read it to both Hilkiah and the king. The MS may indeed have been written in cuneiform. Thus, according to Naville, “the Book of the Law,” which he identifies with Dt, must be pushed back as far as the age of Solomon at the very latest, at least to the view as to its date; “some time during the prosperous period of David and the United Monarchy” (Intro to the Heb Bible, 1909, 330).
But why not ascribe the book to the traditional author? Surely there can be no philosophical objection to doing so, in view of the now-known Code of Hammurabi, which antedates Moses by so many hundreds of years! No other age accounts for the position among great lawyers in history who claims to have written the bulk of it. And the history of the disintegration of the book only shows to what extremes a false method may lead; for example, Steuernagel separates the "Thou" and "Ye" sections from each other and assigns them to different authors of late date: Kennett, on the other hand, assigns the earliest strata to the period of the Exile (Jour. of Theol. Studies, 1904), on the whole, no theory is so satisfactory as that which, in keeping with Dt 31 22, ascribes to Moses the great bulk of the book. See also Curriculum; Pentateuch.

DEVOITED, dé-vóıt′èd. See DEMON; SATAN.

DEVOITION, dé-vó′shun. DEVOITIONS (orbānaha, sebhāmatu): For AV "your devotions" (Acts 17 23), RV has "the objects of your worship," which is probably the intended meaning of AV. RV reads "devotion" for AV "prayer" in Job 16 4 (RVm "meditation," Heb ešīḵōn).

DEVOUT, dé-vō′út (ešāḇāḏ, ešāḇāḏ, orôḇēḇāḏi, ešēḇāḏi, orôḇēḇi, ešēḇāni, "pious," "dutiful," "reverential"): The word is peculiar to St. Luke. Applied to Simeon (Lk 2 25), Cornelius (Acts 10 27), Ananias (22 12), "Devout proselytes" (15 43, AV "religious proselytes"), with possible reference to the proselytes of righteousness as distinguished from the proselytes of the gate (see PROSLEYTE). "Devout women of honorable estate" (15 50), proselytes to Judaism and wives of the men of the line of David (cf. 15, 6; 14 1; 14 2; 15 4, 5). "Devout Greeks" (17 4), probably, though not necessarily, proselytes of the gate, heathen by birth, who attended the synagogue services and worshipped God. "Devout persons" (ver 17), proselytes of the gate.

DEW, dū (דִּעְו, [al. ṣpārōs, ṣrōsōs]): Two things are necessary for the formation of dew, moisture and cold. In most countries there is less dew because the change in temperature between day and night is too small. In the deserts where the change in temperature between day and night is sometimes as much as 40° F, there is seldom dew because of lack of moisture in the atmosphere. Pal is fortunate in being in a region so that there is always a large percentage of water vapor in the air. The skies are clear, and hence there is rapid radiation beginning immediately after sunset, which cools the land and the air to dew points, and settles out the dew on objects. Air at a low temperature is not capable of holding as much water vapor in suspension as warm air. The ice pitcher furnishes an example of the formation of dew. Just as the drops of water form on the cool pitcher, so dew forms on rocks, grass and trees.

In Pal it does not rain from April to October, and were it not for the dew in summer all vegetation would perish. Dew and rain are equally important. If there is no rain, that the plants and trees are literally soaked with water at night, and they absorb sufficient moisture to more than supply the loss due to evaporation in the day. It is more surprising to one who has not seen it before than observed theoretically in the desert itself. Some of the small animals of the desert, such as the jerboa, seem to have no water supply except the dew. The dew forms most heavily on good conductors of heat, such as metals and stones, because they radiate their heat faster and cool the air around them. The wetting of Gideon's fleece (Jgs 6 38) is an indication of the amount of dew formed, and the same phenomenon might be observed any clear night in summer in Pal.

Dew was present necessity to the people of Israel as it is today to the people of the same lands, so Jeh says, "I will be as the dew unto Israel" (Hos 14 5). Dew and rain are of equal importance and are spoken of together in 1 K 17 1. It was esp. valued by the children of Israel in the desert, for it supplied the manna for their sustenance (Ex 16 13; Nu 11 9).

Isaac in blessing Jacob asks that the "dew of heaven" (Gen 27 28) may be granted to him that these things which make for fertility and prosperity may be his portion. Of Blessing "The remnant of Jacob shall be in the midst of many peoples as dew from Jeh" (Mic 5 7), as a means of blessing to the nations. "Blessed of Jehovah be. . . . dew" (Dt 33 13).
Dew is the means of refreshing and reinvigorating all vegetation. Many Scripture references carry out this idea. The song of Moses says, "My speech shall distil as the dew" (Dt 32:2). "A cloud of fresh meat" (Isa 13:14) refreshes the harvesters. "The hand is filled with dew" (Cant 5:2), "Like the dew of Hermon" (Ps 133:3), "Thou hast the dew of thy youth" (Ps 110:3). 'Thy dew is as the dew of herbs" (Isa 26:19). Job said of the time of his prosperity, "The dew lieth all night upon my branch" (Job 34:19).

Other figures of dew as the symbol of the shadow of God, of which we came unawares (2 S 17:12), and of constancy (Hos 6:4; 13:3). God's knowledge covers the whole realm of the phenomena of Nature which are mysteries to man (Job 38:26; Prov 3:20).

DIADEM, d'af-dem: There are seven Bible references to the diadem, four in the OT and three in the NT. The Heb words do not mark any clear distinctions.

1. דַּאָדֶם, cānī̂ph, דַּאָדֶם, cānī̂ph, דַּאָדֶם, cānī̂ph (all from דַּאָדֶם, cānāph, primarily "to wrap," "dress," "roll") mean a headdress in the nature of a turban or piece of cloth wrapped or twisted about the head.

2. דוד, diadēma, the Gr word in the NT for "diadem," means 'something bound about the head.' Found 23 times in Rev—"a white horse ... and upon his head are many diadems." See CROWN.

DIAL, d'af, OF AHAZ, a'haz, THE:

1. Hezekiah's sickness and the Sign
2. The "Dial" as a Miracle
3. Time of Day of the Miracle
4. Hezekiah's Choice of the Sign
5. Meaning of the Sign
6. The "Dial" Source of Degrees

One of the most striking instances recorded in Holy Scripture of the interruption, or rather reversal, of the working of a natural law is the going back of the shadow on the ladder of Ahaz at the time of Hezekiah's sickness and the sign of his illness recovered.

The record of the incident is as follows. Isaiah was sent to Hezekiah in his sickness, to say:

"Thus saith Jehovah, the God of David thy father. I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears: behold, I will heal thee; on the third day thou shalt go up unto the house of Jehovah, . . . And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, What shall be the sign that Jehovah will heal me, and that I shall go up unto the house of Jehovah the third day? And Isaiah said, This shall be the sign unto thee from Jehovah, that Jehovah will do the thing that he hath spoken: shall the shadow go forward ten steps, or shall it go back ten steps? And in Isa 38, 8, it is said, 'Behold, I will cause the shadow on the steps, which is gone down on the dial of Ahaz with the sun, to return back ten steps. So the sun returned ten steps on the dial whereon it was gone down.'

The first and essential point to be noted is that this was no ordinary astronomical phenomenon, nor was it the result of ordinary astrology.

2. The Sign

to that particular time; otherwise we should not hear in the ambassady of the princes of Babylon, who sent . . . to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Ch 32:31). It is impossible, therefore, to accept the suggestion that the dial of Ahaz may have been improperly constructed, so as to produce a reversal of the motion of the shadow on the diadem.

For such a maladjustment would have occasioned the repetition of the phenomenon every time the sun returned to the same position with respect to the dial. The narrative, in fact, informs us that the occurrence was not due to any natural law, known or unknown, since Hezekiah was given the choice and exercised it of his own free will, as to whether a shadow should move in a particular direction or in the opposite. But there are no alternative results in the working of a natural law. Every thing is repeated in every detail, it must lead to exactly the same consequences." The same natural law cannot indifferently produce one result, or its opposite. The movement of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz, therefore, is on the same logic and in the same sense of the term. It cannot be explained by the working of any astronomical law, known or unknown. We have no information as to the astronomical conditions at that time; we can only inquire into the setting of the miracle.

It is unfortunate that one important word in the narrative has been rendered in both AV and RV by a term which describes a recognized astronomical instrument. The "Dial" a word "dial" (mētēr, "mitre," "mitre.") staircase "degrees," "steps," or "stairs," and indeed is thus rendered in the same verse. There is no evidence that the structure referred to had been designed to serve as a dial or was anything other than a staircase, "the staircase of Ahaz." It was probably connected with that "covered way for the sabbath that they had built in the house, and the king's entry without," which Ahaz turned "round the house of Jeh, because of the king's house in Assyria" (2 K 18:30; 2 Rv 18:30). This staircase, called after Ahaz because the alteration was due to him, may have been substituted for David's "causeway that goeth up," which was "westward, by the gate of Shallecheth" (1 Ch 26:16), or more probably for an "a过得" (kāḇāḇ, "pass") which he went up unto the house of Jehovah" which so impressed the queen of Sheba (2 Ch 9:4). At certain times of the day the shadow of some object fell upon this staircase, and we learn that the sun also was going down.

The miracle therefore took place in the afternoon, when the sun moves on its downward course, and when all shadows are thrown in an easterly direction. We are not told what was the object that cast the shadow, but it must have stood to the west of the staircase, and the top of the staircase must have passed into the shadow first, and the foot of the staircase have remained longest in the light. The royal palace is understood to have been placed southeast of the Temple, and it is therefore probable that it was some part of the Temple buildings that had cast its shadow on the staircase and that it had reduced the residue of the shadow to the west of the dying king, as he lay in his chamber. If the afternoon were well advanced the sun would be moving rapidly in altitude, and but little in azimuth; or, in other words, the shadow would be advancing down the steps at its quickest rate, but be moving only slowly toward the left of those who were mounting them. It may well have been the case, therefore, that the time had come when the priests from Ophel, and the officials and courtiers from the palace brought up the chandeliers to the house of the Lord to be present at the evening sacrifice; passing from the bright sunshine at the foot of the stairs into the shadow that had already fallen upon the upper steps. The sun would be going straight down behind the buildings and the steps already in shadow. They would sink into deeper shadow, not to emerge again into the light until a new day's sun had arisen upon the earth.

We can therefore understand the nature of the choice of the sign that was offered by the prophet to the dying king. Would he choose that ten more steps should be straightway engulfed in the shadow, or that ten steps already shadowed should be brought back into the light? Either might serve as a sign that he should arise on the third day and go up in renewed life to the house of the Lord; but the one sign would be in accordance with the natural progress of events, and the other would be directly opposite it. It would be a light thing, as Hezekiah said, for the shadow to go forward ten steps; a bank of cloud rising behind the Temple would effect that change. But no disposition of cloud could bring the shadow back from that point where it had already passed into it, and restore it to the sunshine. The first change was, in human estimation, easily possible, "a light thing"; the second change seemed impossible. Hezekiah chose the seemingly impossible, and the Lord gave the sign and answered his prayer. We need not ask whether the king showed more or less faith in choosing the "impossible" rather than the "possible" sign. His father Ahaz had shown his want of faith by refusing to put the Lord to the test, by refusing to ask a sign, whether in the heaven above or in the earth beneath. The faith of Hezekiah was shown in asking a sign, which was at once in the heaven above and in the earth beneath, in accepting the choice offered to him, and so turning the Lord to the test. The sign chosen was most fitting. Hezekiah lay dying, whether of plague or of cancer we do not know, but his disease was mortal and beyond cure; he was already engaged in that long preparation for death. The word of the Lord was sure to him; on the "third day" he would rise and go up in new life to the house of God. But what of the sign? Should the shadow of death swallow him up; or should he be hidden until a new day should dawn, and the light of a new life, a life of resurrection, arise? ( Cf Jn 11 24) Or should the shadow be drawn back swiftly, and new years be added to his life before death could come upon him? Swift death was in the natural progress of events; restoration to health was of the impossible. He chose the restoration to health, and the Lord answered his faith and his prayer.

We are not able to go farther into particulars. The first temple, the royal palace, and the staircase of Ahaz were all destroyed in the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and we have no means of ascertaining the exact position of the staircase with respect to Temple or palace, or the number of the steps, or the length of the shadow. The steps, or the season of the year when the sign was given. It is possible that if we knew any or all of these, a yet greater significance, both spiritual and astronomical, might attach to the narrative.

Fifteen years were added to the life of Hezekiah. In the restoration of the second temple by Herod fifteen steps led from the Court of the Women to the Court of Israel, and on these steps the Levites during the Feast of Tabernacles were accustomed to stand in order to sing the fifteen songs of degrees (Ps 63). It is possible that these fifteen steps, as Hezekiah had asked for his fifteen years of added life. Five of them are ascribed to David or as written for Solomon, but the remaining ten bear no author's name. Their subjects are, however, most appropriate to the great crises and desires of Hezekiah's life. His greatness, his adoration, the worship of the Lord; the Assyrian invasion and the deliverance from it; Hezekiah's sickness unto death and his miraculous restoration to health; and the fact that at that time he would seem to have had no son to follow him on the throne—all these subjects seem to find fitting expression in the fifteen Psalms of the Steps. (Hosea 2:11)

DIAMOND, dial-mund. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

DIAINA, di-a-n'a (ARTEMIS) ("Αρτεμίς, Artemis, "prophet, "woman") A deity of Asia Minor; the mother-goddess of the earth, whose seat of worship was the temple in Ephesus, the capital of the Rom province of Asia. Diana is but the Latinized form of the Gr word Artemis, yet the Artemis of Ephesus should not be confused with the Gr goddess of that name. She may, however, be identified with the Cybele of the Phrygians whose name she also bore, and with several other deities who were worshipped under the great names in various parts of the Orient. In Cappadocia she was known as Mæ: to the Syrians as Atargatis or Myrrha; among the Phoenicians as Astarte, a name which appears among the Assyrians as Ishtar; the modern name Esther is derived from it. The same goddess seems to have been worshipped by the Hittites, for a female deity is sculptured on the rocks at Yazılı Kaya, near the Hittite city of Boghaz-Keui. It is probable that the various goddesses of Syria and Asia Minor all owe to their origin to the earlier Assyrian or Hittite goddess of love, whose chief attributes they possessed. The several forms and names under which she appears are due to the variation of form and diction in the different cultures.

Tradition says that Diana was born in the woods near Ephesus, where her temple was built, when her image of wood (possibly ebony; Pliny, NH, xvi. 40; Acts 19 35) fell from the sky (see also Astronom. I, 8 [2]). Also according to tradition the city which was later called Ephesus was founded by the Amazons, and Diana or Cybele was the deity of those half-mythical people. Later when Ephesus fell into the possession of the Greeks, Gr civilization partly supplanted the Asiatic, and in that city the two civilizations were blended together. The Gr name of Artemis was given to the Asiatic goddess, and many of the Gr colonists represented her on their coins as Greek. Her images and forms of worship remained more Asiatic than Gr. Her earthenware shrines were figures carved in wood. Later when she was represented in stone and metal, she bore upon her head a mural headdress, representing a fortified city wall; from it, drapery hung upon each side of her face to her shoulders. The upper part of her body was completely covered with rows of breasts to signify that she was the mother of all life. The lower arms were extended. The lower part of the body resembled a rough block, as if her legs had been wrapped up in cloth like those of an Egypt mummy. In later times her Gr followers represented her with stags or lions standing
At the head of her cult was a chief priest, originally a cunach who bore the name and later the title Megabyzus. Under him were priests known as Essenes, appointed, perhaps from the city officials, for but a single year; it was their duty to offer the sacrifices to the goddess in behalf of the city. Other subordinate classes of priests known as Kourites, Krobatai and Nitros performed duties which are now obscure. The priesthood was even more numerous, and, probably from their great numbers, they were called Melitaei or best; the Ephesian symbol therefore which appears commonly upon the coins struck in the city, is a bee. The Melitaei, which in the early times were all virgins, were of two classes; it is no longer known just what the special duties of each class were. The ritual of the temple services consisted of sacrifices and of ceremonial prostitution, a practice which was common to many of the religions of the ancient Orient, and which still exists among some of the obscure tribes of Asia Minor.

The temple of Diana was not properly the home of the goddess; it was but a shrine, the chief one, devoted to her service. She lived in Nature; she was everywhere wherever there was life, the mother of all living things; all offerings of every possible nature were therefore acceptable to her; hence the vast wealth which poured into her temple. Not only was she worshipped in her temple, but in the minute shrines or naos which were sometimes modulated after the temple. More frequently the shrines were exceedingly crude objects, either of silver or stone or wood or clay. They were made at Ephesus by dependents of the temple, and carried by the pilgrims throughout the world. Before them Diana might also be worshipped anywhere, just as now from the soil of the sacred Mesopotamian city of Kerbela, where the sons of Ali were martyred, little blocks are formed and are carried away by the Shi'ah Moslems that they may pray upon sacred ground wherever they may be. The makers of the shrines of Diana formed an exceedingly large class among whom, in Paul's time, was Demetrius (Acts 19 24). None of the silver shrines have been discovered, but those of marble and of clay have appeared among the ruins of Ephesus. They are exceedingly crude; in a little shell-like bit of clay, a crude clay female figure sits, sometimes with a tambourine in one hand and a cup in the other, or with a lion at her side or beneath her foot. Though the shrines were sold as sacred dwelling-places of the goddess, that the pilgrims who carried them to their distant homes, or buried them in the graves with their dead, might be assured of her constant presence, their real purpose was to increase the temple revenues by their sale at a price which was many times their cost. With the shrines of Diana may be compared the household gods of clay found in abundance among the ruins of the earlier Bab cities, esp. those cities in which temples to the goddess Ishtar stood.

DIASPORA, di-as-p'o-ra. See Dispersion.

DIBLEH, dib'la (דיבלה, diblah, "circle"); Διβλα, Diblāθa}: The name occurs only in Ezk 6 14 (AV "Diblah") and the place has not been identified. If the reading is correct it may possibly be represented by Διβλή, a village in Upper Galilee, S. of Tibnin. But more likely it is a scribal error for Riblah.

DIBLAIM, dib'la-im, dib-la'im (דיבלאים, diblā'īm, "two caves"): A native of Northern Israel and father of Gomer, the wife of Hosea (Hos 1 3).

DIBLATH, dib'lath. See Diblah.

DIBLATHAIM, dib-la-tha'im. See Almon-diblathaim.

DIBON, dib'on, DIBON-GAD (דיבון, dibbôn, "washing"); Διβόν, Dibôôn}: (1) A city of Moab captured by the Amorites (Nu 21 30), and held by them at the invasion by Israel. It was taken and given to the tribe of Gad, whence it is called Dibon-gad (Nu 32 34; 33 45). In Josh 13 17 it is reckoned to Reuben. Along with other cities in the territory N. of the Arnon, Dibon changed hands several times between Moab and Israel. Moab claims it (MS), and in Jer 48 18.22 it is placed among the cities of Moab. The form of the name, Dimon, in Isr 16 5, may have been given to make it resemble the Heb dâmôn, "blood," to support the play upon words in the verse (HDB, s.v.). It is represented by the modern Dhibbôn, about the limits of Moab (Ar'dân), on the line of the old Rom road. The ruins that stand over two adjacent knolls are of no importance: walls, a tower, cistern, etc. Near Dibon the famous Moabite Stone was found.

(2) A town in Judah, occupied after the exile (Neh 11 25). It may be the same as Dimonah (Jes 15 22); unidentified. W. EWING

DIBRI, dib'ri (דיברי, dibh'ri, "eloquent" [?]): A LeRITE, whose daughter Shelomith married an Egyptian. Their son was "cut off" (stoned) for blasphemy (Lev 24 11).

DICE-PLAYING. See Games.

DICTIONARIES, dik'shun-a-ri: A dictionary is a word-book or a list of words arranged in some fixed order, generally alphabetical, for ready reference, and usually with definitions or longer treatises. The vocabulary or glossary is a mere list of words, often without definitions; the Lexicon or dictionary of language (words or concepts) has bare definitions, and the alphabetical encyclopaedia or dictionary of knowledge or information (objects, things, subjects, topics, etc) has longer treatises, but they are all dictionaries: the alphabetical order being the main essential in modern use. There is, however, historically no good reason why the dictionary should not be logical or chronological. The earliest use of the term "dictionary" is recorded by Marcus Aurelius Celsus (first century B.C.), who used it to mean a collection of words. However, the tendency of the alphabet to group words together has been present throughout the history of dictionaries. The Encyclopædia Metropolitana, first published in 1796, was a dictionary in the historical sense. The earliest books usually quoted in the lists of Bib. dictionaries were also alphabetically classified or chronologically, and not alphabetical (Eusebius' Onomasticon; Jerome's De viris illustrribus). Classified word lists, syllabaries, etc., of pre-alphabetic times, as well as in Chinese and other non-alphabetic cultures of today, are of course also non-alphabetic, but strictly alphabetical.

In pre-alphabetic times the dictionaries include, besides the syllabaries of which there were many examples in ancient Egyptian, Babylonian, Cypriote, Egyptian, and the word lists proper, chronologically listed, lists of names and various classified lists of tribute, and of astronomical or other objects. They include, in short, all the many lists where the material is grouped according to the various categories of catchwords.

The alphabetical dictionary began with the alphabet itself, for this is a list of names of objects. The earliest alphabetical dictionaries were sometimes called syllabaries. In a sense the alphabetical arrangement of words is a historical critic's, and Ps 119, where considerable material is grouped under each letter of the alphabet, comes rather close to the dictionary idea.

So long as the quantity of literary material remained small, there was very little need for the development of the alphabetical dictionary, and the examples are rather few, the Lexicon of Suidas being perhaps the most noteworthy. With the immense increase in literary material there was a rapidly growing appreciation of the advantage of alphabetical arrangement, over the chronological or the systematic, in all cases where the object is to refer to a specific topic, rather than to read a book through or survey many topics in one dictionary. The number of alphabetical dictionaries of knowledge increased rapidly with the growth of learning from the 13th cent., now it has become legion and there are few subjects so narrow that they cannot boast their dictionary of information.

The earliest Bible dictionary is usually counted the Onom of Eusebius, a geographical encyclopaedia; then came Jerome's De nominibus hierarchiarum et huius De viris illustrbus Dictionaries (chronological). The more noteworthy steps in the history of Bible dictionaries are represented by the names of Alsted, Calmet, Winer, Kittel, William Smith, Fairbairn, Schenkel. The best recent dictionaries among the larger works are the Encyclopaedia Biblica, standing for the extreme higher critical wing; Hastings, representing the slightly less radical; and this present International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, which represents a growing distrust of the extreme positions of the 19th cent. higher critics. All of these are on a large scale and stand for the latest and best scholarship, and the same quality is reflected in at least two of the recent single-volume dictionaries, A Standard Bible Dictionary (M. W. Jacobson), and Hastings Dictionary of the Bible (F. E. Crisfield).

Both of these in tendency stand between Cheyne's Encyclopaedia Biblica and this dictionary, Hastings facing rather toward Cheyne, and Jacobus toward this present work.

The John Crerar Library list of encyclopaedias forms an excellent guide to the lit. of general encl. of 19th c., and includes chiefly technology and physical and social sciences, but includes among its reference books very admirably chosen first-reference dictionaries to language, history, fine arts, and even philosophy and religion.

Following is a list of previous dictionaries:

Guthrie, H., Kursus Bibelwörterbuch. 1903.

Hamburger, Jacob, Reineencyclopdie für Bibel und Talmud. New ed. 1896–97, 2 vols. and 4 suppl. (Jewish point of view).

Hamburger, J. Biblieisch-talmudisches Wörterbuch, Strasbourg, 1866.

Hoffmann, A. C., Allgemeines Wort-Bibellexikon. Leipzig, 1842.
Dictionaries

Oliver, P. Scripture Lexicon. Boston, 1874; London, 1843.

Schinkel, I. Bibel Lexikon, 1669-75, 5 vols.

Other recent one-vol. dictionaries are: Angius (1907), Beye (1900), Gauthier (1906), Ewing (1910), Hyamson (1907), Piercy (1908).

Next in importance for Bible students to the Bible dictionaries are the general dictionaries of religious knowledge. Many of the more recent of these, such as the Hauck ed. of RE, the Clavis Ecclesiastica, and the Kirchenlexikon, give much more of the smaller recent ones have arts. of real importance for Bible study, often better than some of the specific Bible dictionaries.

3. General Religious

Catholic Encyclopedia, and in general Encyclopedia all the larger and some of the smaller recent ones have arts. of real importance for Bible study, often better than some of the specific Bible dictionaries.

4. Dictionaries of Comparative Religion

Tubingum, 1861; 3d ed., 1868, together with an Encyclopedia of Living Divines, etc.

Vacant and Suttie. Dictionaire de théologie catholique. Paris, 1893-.

The monumental dictionary in this class superseding all others is Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, but Forlong has served a useful purpose and some of the special dictionaries. Buck also are quite in the same class with Hastings.

Religion

The admirable Jewish and Catholic encyclopaedias mentioned above, like the Methodist M'Clymont and Strong, belong rather to the denominations, the former than to the latter, for they are denominational dictionaries. Those of Addis and of Thiébaut are denominational in the same sense as those of the Episcopal, Lutheran, etc., churches, mentioned below, among which perhaps the best executed example is the Lutheran Encyclopædia of Jacobus.

Dictionaries of Denominations

Jewish Encyclopedia. See General Theological Encyclopaedias.

Special Dictionaries: Ancient and Mediaeval History

Topo-tablo, Montbéliard, 1894-93, 2 vols.

Stadler and Heinicke, Heidel. Lexikon, 1858—82, 5 vols.

What has been said of general religious encyclopaedias applies equally almost to all Jewish articles in the good general encyclopaedias.

6. Universal Encyclopaedias

Among these the Encyclopædia Britannica, of which a new ed appeared in 1911, is easily first, and has main-ly maintained its many ed a high standard. The previous ed was edited by Professor Robertson Smith, who gave a peculiarly high quality of scholarship to its Bib. articles, while at the same time rather tingling them with extreme views. Among the British encyclopaedias, Chambers' is still kept up to a high standard. The recent American ed include the New International, the Nelson, perhaps, contributing most on Bible matters. The annual supplement to the International gives a useful résumé of the progress of Bib. archaeology during each year.

Universal Encyclopaedias

America and England

Knight, English Cyclopædia. London, 1854-73, 27 vols, 4 suppl.

Smelley (Cobriugt). Encyclopædia Metropolitana. 1815-45, 30 vols (classed with some alphabetical sections).

Germany

Brockhaus. Konversationslexikon. 14th ed, 1901, (B. and Meyer are the standard German encyclopaedias).

Ehrich and Gericke. Allgemeine Encyclopädie. 1813-90, 99 vols and 4 suppl. volumes (scholarly and exhaustive; many arts are complete treatises).

Ferder. Konversationslexikon. Freiburg, 1835-57, 5 vols; 3d ed, 1901-08, 8 vols (Roman Catholic; high grade).

Köster and Roos. [Encyc.] Frankfurt, 1778-1785, 23 vols (stopes of about 200 pages; very readable; still useful)

Ludwig, Y. D. von. Gersch, vollständiges, UniversalLexikon. Leipzig, 1731-54, 68 vols ("Zedler," which was published under this name; the most considerable and still useful, on account of the vast number of topics it often covers when all other sources fail).

Pierer. Universal Lexikon. 7th ed, 1898-93, 12 vols.
8. Dictionaries of Art and Music

ART

MUSIC

Many of these dictionaries are occasionally or indirectly on Bib. topics.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

9. Dictionaries of Social Sciences

SOCIAL SCIENCE

Bliss, William Dwight. Porter.

The modern gazetteers are indispensable for identifications.
The great modern biographical dictionaries, although of little use for Scripture names, are of much value to the Bib. student for the writings on books, subjects, and in the case of ancient biography, of much value for contemporaries in other lands.

MODERN BIOGRAPHY

The lexicons of the Bibs. languages and versions are treated under the head of the respective languages. The chief dictionaries in English are the great Murray and the aries of the encyclopedia Century. The best one-volume dictionaries are perhaps the Standard and the last ed of Webster.

Dictionaries of Language

DIDACHE, did’a-kè. See Literature, Sub-Apostolic.

DIDRACHMA, di-drak’ma. Two drachmas. See Drachma, Dram.

DIDYMUS, did’i-mus (Διδύμως, Didúmos, i.e. “twin”): The surname of Thomas (q.v.).

DIE (ד, mah, י, gâšî; ʿatón+h-int, apo-thaón, ta-latun, te-latun): “To die,” etc., is of very frequent occurrence, and in the OT is generally the tr of mah, meaning perhaps originally, “to be stretched out” or “prostrate.” “To die,” should be the consequence of eating the forbidden fruit (Gen 2 17; cf 20 7; 2 K 1 4.6). “Die” is commonly used of natural death (Gen 5 8; 25 8). It is used also of violent death (Gen 26 9.11; Ex 21 20); punishment (Ex 19 12; 21 12.14; 29 44; Nu 4 15; Ezek 3 18). “To end life,” also occurs several times (Mt 15 4; 16). “To die, the death of the righteous” is something to be desired (Nu 23 10). In the NT the word for “to die,” etc., is generally apóthn, “to die off or away,” used of dying in all forms, of natural death (Mt 22 24); of violent death (Jn 11 50.51; 19 7; Acts 25 11); of the death of Christ (Jn 12 33); of death as the consequence of sin (Jn 8 21.24; Rom 8 15); to terminate, “to end life,” also occurs several times (Mt 15 4; 16). “To die,” occurs once (Jn 11 21), and apóllumi, “to destroy” (Jn 18 14); and in Acts 25 16 (1R) we have eis apólló, “to destruction.” The figurative use of “to die” as not very frequent, if it ever occurs, it is in 1 S 25 37 it may be equivalent to “faint,” “His heart died Figurative within him, and he became as a stone,” Use but this may be meant literally. In Am 7 13 it is said that Moab “shall die,” i.e. perish as a nation. Paul describes the condition of the apostles of Christ as “dying, and behold, we live” (2 Cor 6 9), and says, “I die daily” (1 Cor 15 51), but the references may be to exposure to death. When Rom 7: 9 he says, “When the commandment came — I died,” he does not mean that it rendered him liable to death. In Rom 6 2 we have “we who died to sin,” i.e. in Christ, and in our acceptance of His death as representing ours; similarly we read in 2 Cor 5 14, “One died for all, therefore all died” (RV), i.e. representedly, and in Col 2 20 “if ye died with Christ”; 3 3, “for ye died,” RV (in Christ). Cf 2 Tim 2 11; 1 Pet 2 24.

Of the changes in RV may be mentioned “abode” for “died” (Gen 23 18, in “or settled, Heb fell”; “he that is to die,” “worthy of death” (Dt 17 6); “died” for “are dead” (Jn 8 49.50, and RV § 52.53); “though he die” for “were dead” (Jn 11 23); “many died” for “were dead” (Rom 5 15); “died for naught” for “in vain” (Gal 2 21); “when his end was nigh” for “died” (He 11 22). Of special importance are the changes from “he, are, were dead” in Rom 6 2.7.8; 2 Cor 5 14; Col 2 20; 3 3; 2 Tim 2 11. and “having died” for “being dead” in 1 Pet 2 24, as bringing out the truth that in the sight of God all men died in Christ. See also Death. W. L. Walker.

DIET, d’it (נָקַח, ἀθροῦ, “prescribed”): A daily allowance or portion of food, as that given by King Evil-merodach to Jehoiachin, king of Judah (Jer 52 34 AV; cf 2 K 25 30).
DIG (נִגָּה, נָגָה, “to dig”; נָגָיָה, נָגָיָה, “dug”; נָגָא, נָגָא, “dug through”): “I have digged and drunk strange waters” (2 K 19:24). In his campaigns on foreign soil, where the enemy had stepped up the watersprings, Sennacherib would at once dig fresh wells for his armies, or dig through houses” (Job 24:16; cf Mt 6:19.20). Walls of eastern houses are often made of mud or clay, and frequently have no windows; and as the threshold of a Syrian house is sacred, the thief breaks in through the wall (see Trumbull, The Threshold Coevert.

M. O. EVANS

DIGNITIES, dig’ni-tiz. DIGNITY, dig’ni-ti (Heb mārān, s’ēth, ḣāḏaḥ): Rank or position, not nobility or austerity of personal character or bearing, is denoted by this word in its OT occurrence (Gen 49:3; Est 6:3; Eccl 10:6; Hab 1:7). In 2 Pet 2:10; Jude verse, “dignities” (sēēma, dozāt) are angels, lofty spiritual beings, possible objects of blasphemy; of the context in both passages.

DIKLAH, dik’lāh (דִּכְלָה, dīlān, “place of palms”): One of the “sons” of Joktan (Gen 10:27; 1 Ch 1:21). Perhaps a south-Arabian tribal or place-name connected with a palm-bearing district.

DILEAN, dil’e-an (דִּילֶן, dil’en, “cucumber”): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Migdal-gad and Mizpeh (Josh 15:38, ERV “Dilan”), which lay probably on the N. of Lachish and Eglon. It has not been identified.

DILIGENCE, dil’i-jens. DILIGENT, dil’i-geist. This word is used in various senses in our Eng. Bible.

In Ezr 5:8, “with diligence” means “with care”;
In Ezr 6:12; 7:17, “with speed,” “speedily”;
In Prov 4:23 “watchfulness;” in Dt 4:1.
9:1 5:17; 19:18, Ps 77:6; Prov 27:26; 26:23; Isa 56:2; Mic 7:3, “with care,”

The Amer. revision has rendered “diligence” for various words in AV, e.g. for “business” in Rom 12:11; “giving diligence” for the “endeavoring” (Eph 4:3); “give diligence” for “study” (2 Tim 3:15), for “labor” (He 4:11); “diligently” for “carefully” (Phil 2:28; He 12:17); “be diligent in” for “meditate upon” (1 Tim 4:15). It is well also to remember that the Old Eng. meaning of “diligence” is with “love,” from diligo, “to love.”

G. H. GEBEERING

DILL. See ANISE.

DIMINISH, di-min’ish: RV has retained nearly all passages of AV where “to diminish” is used. Some of these uses have become obsolete: Dt 4:2, “neither shall ye diminish from it.” “Diminish” generally means “to reduce,” “to lessen.” In this sense it is employed in Ezr 5:11 from the Heb 7:3, gāḇā, lit. “to shear.” The picture of shearing the beard, expressing degradation and loss of manhood, may underlie this passage.

DIMINAH, dim’nāh (דַּמְנָה, “dung”; דַּמֶּנָה, Dammān): A city of the Merarite Levites in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 21:36). The name is probably a clerical error for Rimmon.

DIONYSIA, d’i-nis’t-a, Di-ONISIA, Di-ONYsia, “festivals of Dionysus” [Bacchus]): The rural (vintage) Dionysia were celebrated in the month of Poseideon (19th day), which is roughly the beginning of our December.

The celebration consisted of feasts, proces- sions, songs and (sometimes) scenic performances. The Ascleia formed one of the most prominent features. After sacrificing a goat to the god, they filled the wine-skin with wine, made it slippery on the outside, and then tried to hop on it with one leg. Whoever fell down furnished great sport for the spectators, but if anyone succeeded in maintaining an upright position to the end, he was declared victor. The demarch conducted the festival, the expenses of which were paid by the deme.

The Lenaeia were celebrated on the 12th of Gae- melion (January) in Athens, and later in Ionia in Asia Minor. At this festival also the new wine was tasted. A procession was formed and they marched through the city, indulging in all sorts of esting and buffoonery, to attend the pantomimic performances.

The Anthestheria (Flower-Feast) came in the month of Anthesterion (February), when the first flowers began to bloom. This festival celebrated somewhat what our Christmas. On the first day (11th of the month) the wine-cask was opened; on the second was the feast of pitchers. Wine was drunk, and contests in trumpet-playing were held. At the drinking contest everybody was permitted to make as much merriment as he pleased. There was also a mystic marriage of the king archon's wife to Dionysus (compare the marriage of the Doges of Venice to the sea). On the third day they offered pots filled with vegetables to Hérines, Conductor of the Dead. This day was sacred to the gods of the nether world and to the spirits of the departed (All Souls' Day); and the people celebrated Persephone's resurrection and reunion with the god.

The Greater Dionysia of Athens were held in Elaphebolion (March) as a spring festival. This is the most important of all the Dionysia (for us), since practically all the great tragedies of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides were performed in conjunction with this festival. All the demes took part. They accompanied the ancient image of Dionysus Eleutherios (from Eleuthere in Boeotia, one of the first places in which the worship of the god was established in Greece), as it was carried in a procession (from the sea temple in Athens to the Dyonisian shrine in the Ceramicus in the northwestern part of the city, while choruses of men and boys sang the didrakmos (the ancient hymn to Dionysus). Crowned with a wreath of bays the ancient deities, they greeted the god with loud shouts of joy.

The festival was revived with great pomp by the Eleutheriadai. In the theater of Dionysus all the people beheld an impressive display of great achievements. Even the poorest and humblest were given an opportunity to see and hear the contests between the professional rhapsodists, who recited Homer; between choruses specially trained to sing the dithyrambs, and between poets, whose great dramatic productions were presented for the first time. The state set aside a special fund for the purchase of tickets for those who were too poor to buy for themselves. Comedies, tragedies and satyr plays were presented after elaborate preparation and at a great expenditure of money. The prize, a bronze tripod, was erected with an appropriate inscription before the tripod. The judging of poets to the victors concluded the festival.

The quadrennial festival at Brauron in Attica was also a great and solemn religious observance. The city of Athens sent delegates regularly to attend the festival. There were also Dionysiac clubs in Athens at the time of the Peloponnesian War. They had similar doctrines and observances. They had their foundation in Orphic mysticism. The members refrained from eating the flesh of animals. They possessed holy scriptures and had peculiar profane rites. The Dionysiac religious observance continued as a state cult down to 366 AD. See BACCHUS.

DIONYSIUS, di-ô-nis'us (Diasorhis, Dionisius), surnamed "the Areopagite." One of the few Athenians converted by Paul (Acts 17 34). We know nothing further about him (see AREOPAGUS). According to one account he was the first bishop of the church at Athens; according to another he suffered martyrdom in that city under Domitian. We are even told that he migrated to Rome and was sent to Paris, where he was beheaded on Montmartre (Mount of the Martyr). The patron saint of France is St. Denys; of the French "Dinys d’Halle in 1769" ("Dionysus") The Latin and Greek mythological writings which were circulated in the Middle Ages and are still extant, are pronounced by the best authorities to be forgeries, and date from a period not earlier than the 5th cent.

DIONYSUS, di-ô-nis'us (BACCHUS) (Diasorhis, Dionysus): The youngest of the Gr gods. In Homer he is not associated with the vine. In later Gr legend he is represented as coming from India, as traversing Asia in a triumphal march, accompanied by woodland beings, with pointed ears, stubbly noses and long tails, called satyrs. The vine was cultivated among European-Aryans first in Thrace, and here Dionysus is said to have established his worship first in Europe. Then the cult of Dionysus passed down through the Balkan peninsula to Thrace; and in the localized form of the myth the deity was born here—son of Zeus and Semele.

"Offspring of Zeus on high Thou that carest for all
In the call
And in Deo's sheltered plain
Of Eleusinian gods renown:
Whiter worshippers repair!
O Bacchus that dwellst in Thebes,
On whose broad and fertile glebe
Pierced warriors from the dragon's teeth rose,
Where Semele softly lay:
The city that Semele bare!"
—Sophocles. Antigone.

Among all the Gr deities none appealed more vividly to the imagination than Dionysus. Gr tragedy is a form of worship, the ritual cult of the god of wine, who makes the initiate wise and the ungodly mad. Dionysus speaks most strongly to the sense and to the spirit at the same time. There is nothing monotonous in the Dionysiac legend; it is replete with both joy and sorrow—in some aspects it is a "passion," in others a triumph. All the passion plays of the world (even the Oberammergau Passion Play) are a worship of the ancient spirit. One Dionysus after another has been substituted, but from the first there has been a desire on the part of the devotee to realise his god vividly with thrilling nearness, to partake of his joys and sorrows and triumphs in his manifold adventures. In the early myths Dionysus was one of the lesser gods; he is mentioned only twice in the Iliad and twice in the Odyssey; but he is always represented as being more nearly akin to man than the great August deities of Olympus. He is a man-god, or god-man. To the inhabitants of the vine-club slopes of Attica, to which his cult had been brought from Phrygia through Thracian Boeotia, he was particularly dear. At their vintage feast last year's cask of wine was opened; and when the new wine brought life back to the bountiful god was greeted with songs of joyful praise. The burial of the wine in the dark tomb of the jars through the winter, and the opening of these jars at the spring festival symbolized the great awakening of man himself, the resurrection of the god's worshippers to a fuller and more joyous life. The vine was not the only manifestation of the god—oil and wheat were also his; he was the god of estya, the giver of physical joy and excitement, the god of life, the father of certain laws of Nature, germination and extinction, the external coming into being and the dying away of all things that are, fructification in its widest aspect whether in the bursting of the seed-grain that lies inrestressed in the earth, or in the generation of living creatures. Hence the prominence given to the phallos in the solemn processes in the Gr religious life.

Nicanor (2 Mac 14 33) and Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac 6 7) thought that the cult of Dionysus would not be objectionable to the Jews. Polyneus Philopator branded the Jews with an ivy-leaf (3 Mac 2 29), which was sacred to Dionysus. See also BACCHUS.

DIOCOSRINTHUS, di-oös-kor-thi-us: A certain (unidentified) month (2 Mac 11 21). See CALENDAR; TIME.
DIOSCURI, di-ösk'ə-rē (Διόσκοροι, Dioskouroi; in Acts 28:11, AV Castor and Pollux, RV THE TWIN BROTHERS; in m, "Dioscuri"): The sign of the ship on which Paul sailed from Melita to Syracuse and Rhegium. The Dioscuri (i.e. sons of Zeus), Castor and Pollux, are the two chief stars in the constellation of the Twins. Some 4,000 years BC they served as pointers to mark the beginning of the new year by setting together with the first new moon of springtime. The constellation of the Twins was supposed to be esp. favorable to sailors, hence ships were often placed under the protection of the twin gods.

E. W. MAUNDER

DIOTREPHES, di-ot′rē-fēz (Διότρηφης, Diotrephēs): A person mentioned in 3 Jn vs 9-10 as contentiously resisting the writer's authority and forbidding others from exercising the Christian hospitality which he himself refused to show. The words "who loveth to have the preeminence, among them" may indicate that he was a church official, abusing his position.

DIP: Priests when offering a sin offering were required to dip a finger into the blood of the sacrificed bullock and "to sprinkle of the blood seven times" (Lev 4:17). See also the law referring to the cleansing of infected houses (Lev 14:1-51) and the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14:16). In all such cases "to dip" is "to moisten," "to besprinkle," "to dip in," the Heb נָשַׁךְ, tābhal, or the Gr χύσκον, bēpō. See also ASHER. In Ps 148:8, "dipping" is not τεταρτάζω from the Heb, but merely employed for a better understanding of the passage: "Thou mayest crush them, dipping thy foot in blood." (AV "that thy foot may be dipped in the blood"). Rev 19:13 is a very doubtful passage. AV reads: "a vesture dipped in blood" (from βάπτω, "to dip"); RV following another reading (either χύσκω, or χυστίζω, both "to sprinkle") translates "a garment sprinkled with blood." RVG gives "dipped in." See also SOR.

DIPHATH, di-fath (דִּפַּח, diphat): A son of Gomer, son of Japheth, son of Noah (1 Ch 4:6), called Raphath (q.v.) in the corresponding genealogy in Gen 10:3.

DISALLOW, dis-a-lou': "To disallow" as used in the Scriptures means either "to oppose," "not permit" (Heb נ.toLocaleText(" כיון", Nu 30:5.8.11), or "to reject" (Gr ἀποκαθιστάω, lit. "to consider useless," 1 Pet 2:4.7 AV, RV "rejected").

DISANNUL, dis-a-ool'. See ANNUL.

DISAPPONT, dis-a-point': "To disappoint" may be used transitively or intransitively. In the former case it naturally has a more forceful meaning. Therefore RV changes the tr of AV wherever "disappend" is used with an object: Job 5:12, "frustrate"; Ps 17:13, "confront him," RVm "forestall"; Jth 16:6, "brought them to nought"; but RV retains "disappointed" where the person who disappoints is not expressed. Cf Prov 14:22.

DISCERN, di-zurn': Five Heb words are thus tr: בִּין, yāḏaḥa, nāḵar, rā'āh and šāmāh. It may simply mean "observe" (ḥâmah), "I discerned among the youths" (Prov 7:7); or discriminating knowingly, "discern the art of divining time and judgment" (Eccl 8:5, yāḏaḥa); "He discerned him not, because his hands," etc (Gen 27:23, nakkar); "Then shall ye return and discern between the righteous and the wicked" (Mal 3:18, rā'āh); "So is my lord the king to discern good," etc (2 S 14:17, šāmāh).

DISCERNINGS, di-zurm'īngz, OF SPIRITS (Σαράντα πνεύματαν, diakriseis pneumaōn, "judicial estimation," "through judgment or separation"): Occurs in 1 Cor 12:10 as being one of the gifts of the Spirit. The Gr word occurs in He 5:14; and Rom 14:1: "But him that is weak in faith receive ye, yet not for decision of scruples." This tr scarcely expresses the meaning, which Thayer has freely rendered, "not for the purpose of passing judgment on opinions, as to which one is to be preferred as the more correct." Taking these three passages together it is evident that the Gr term which is rendered "discerning" means a distinguishing or discriminating between things that are under consideration; hence the one who possessed the gift of "discernments of spirits" would distinctly distinguish between the one who spoke by the Spirit of God and the one who was moved by a false spirit. This gift seems to have been exercised chiefly upon those who assumed the rôle of teachers, and it was esp. important in those days, when there were many false teachers abroad (see 2 Jn vs 7; Acts 20:29.30). See also SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

DISCIPLE, di-sip'əl (1) Usually a subst. (μαθητής, mabhētēs, "a learner," from μαθάνω, "to learn"); Lat discipulus, "a scholar": The word is found in the Bible only in the Gospels and Acts. But it is good Greek, in use from Herodotus down, and always means the pupil of someone, in contrast to the master or teacher (διδάσκαλος, didaskalos). See Mt 10:24; Lk 6:40. In all cases it implies that the person not only accepts the views of the teacher, but that he is also in practice an adherent. The word has several applications: (a) to the widest sense of him who accepts the teachings of anyone, not only in belief but in life. Thus the disciples of John the Baptist (Mt 9:14; Lk 7:18; Jn 3:25); also of the Pharisees (Mt 22:16; Mk 2:18; Lk 6:35); of Moses (Jn 9:28). But it has its own force and distinction to designate the adherents of Jesus. (a) In the widest sense (Mt 10:42; Lk 6:17; Jn 6:66, and often). It is the only name for Christ's followers in the Gospels. But (b) esp. the Twelve Apostles, even when they are called simply the disciples (Mt 10:1; 11:12; 12:1, et al.). In the Acts, after the death and ascension of Jesus, disciples are those who confess Him as the Messiah, Christians (Acts 6:1.2.7; 9:39 [or, matthētēs]; 11:26, "The disciples were called Christians"). Even half-instructed believers who had been baptized only with the baptism of John are disciples (Acts 19:1-4).

(2) We have also the vb. μαθήτευσαι, matheīō, "Jesus' disciple" (lit. "was discipled to Jesus," Mt 27:57); "Make disciples of all the nations" (AV "teach," Mt 28:19); "had made many disciples" (AV "taught many," Acts 14:21); "every scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven" (AV "instructed," Mt 13:52). The disciple of Christianity may be one of Gentiles of Farrar, as "one who believes His doctrines, rests upon His sacrifice, imbibes His spirit, and imitates His example."

The OT has neither the term nor the exact idea, though there is a difference between teacher and scholar among David's singers (1 Ch 25:8), and among the prophetic guides the distinction between the rank and file and the leader (1 S 19 20; 2 K 6 5).

G. H. TREVER

DISCIPLINE, dis’iplin (παιδεία, μάθησις): In AV only in Job 36 10, where it refers to moral discipline, the strenuous cultivation of the righteous life; RV “instruction.” RV in 2 Tim 1 7 has “discipline” for a Gr word (sōphronismos) meaning “sobering”; in 2 Tim 3 16 m, for Gr paidēia, “instruction.” In classic Gr paidēia means “education,” mental culture. Through the influence of the LXX, which translates the Heb mēmah by paidēia, the meaning of “chastisement” accompanies paidēia in the NT. Cf He 12 5.7.8.11. See CHASTISEMENT; and for ecclesiastical discipline see CHURCH.

DISCOMFIT, dis-kum’fit, DISCOMFITURE, dis-kum’fit-ūr (σφοδρός, ἱσόμερος, μνήματι): These words are now obsolete or at least obsolete and are confined in Bib. lit. wholly to the OT. The meaning in general is “to annoy,” “harsas,” “confuse,” “rouse” and “destroy.” The most common usage is the moral meaning, “to trouble” or “annoy,” sometimes to the point of destruction (Josh 10 10; Jgs 4 15; 1 S 7 10; 2 S 22 15).

The AV errs in the tr in Isa 31 8, where the rendering is “to become subject to task-work” or “to place a burden upon one.” There seems also to be an unwarranted use of the word in Nu 14 45, where it means rather “to bruise” or “strike.” The purest use is perhaps in 1 S 14 20, where the statement is made that “every man’s sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture.”

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

DISCOURSE, dis-körs’:: In RV of Acts 20 7,9, the tr of Gr dialektomai (AV “preach”), elsewhere rendered, according to the implications of the context, “reason” or “dispute,” as Acts 17 2; 19 9 (AV “disputing,” RV “reasoning”); Jude ver 9.

DISCOVER, dis-kuv’ér: In modern usage the word “discover” signifies “to get first sight or knowledge of,” “to ascertain,” or “to explore.” Such usage appears in 1 S 22 6 of the discovery of David’s hiding-place, where the Heb uses סָתָן, tāthā. In AV the word “discover” often occurs in a sense now archaic or even obsolete. (Note in the cases cited below the Heb word is צאן, gālāh, except Jer 13 26 [צאת, hásharph, “to make bare”] and Hab 3 15 [צאת, ‘ārar, “to make naked!”])

1) “To exhibit,” “uncover” (or “betray”), in which examples ERV also reads with AV “discover.” ARV “uncover” (Ex 20 26; Job 12 22; Isa 57 7 “discovered thyself” AV and ERV; Jer 13 26; Lam 2 14; Hos 7 1; Nah 3 5). (2) “To cause to be no longer a covering,” “to lay bare” (2 S 22 16 AV). (3) “To bring to light,” “discovered” (1 S 14 8.11 [ERV with AV “discover”]).

4) “To unmask” or “reveal oneself” (Prov 18 2 AV). (5) “To take away the covering of” (Isa 22 8 AV). (6) “To lay bare” (Hab 3 13). In Ps 29 9, AV reads: “The voice of the Lord . . . discovereth the forests,” where RV reads, “stripeth the forests bare,” i.e., “stripeth the forests of their leaveth” (Pervane, The Psalms, 1848); “stripeth bare the forests” (Briggs, Psalms, 1, 251, 253).

In the NT (AV), the word “discover” occurs as a tr of the Gr anaphθάνεται in Acts 21 3, and for kathēdoum in Acts 27 39, where RV reads in the first instance “had come in sight of,” and in the latter case “perceived.”

DISCREPANCIES, dis-krep’an-siz, BIBLICAL, bib’li-kal: By this term should be understood substantial disagreements in the statements of Bib. writers. Such disagreements might subsist between the statements of different writers or between the several statements of a single writer. Contradictions of Bib. views from extra-Bib. sources as history, natural science, philosophy, do not fall within the scope of our subject.

Observe Bib. readers in every age have noted, with various degrees of insight, that the Scriptures exhibit manifold interior differences.

2. Criticism and contrasts. Differences of literary form and method have ever seemed, of inerrancy except to those who maintained a mechanical theory of inspiration, wholly natural and fitting. Moreover, that there was progress in the Bib. revelation, esp. that the NT of Jesus Christ signifies a vastly richer revelation of God than the OT, has been universally recognized. In fulfilling the law and the prophets Christ put a marked distance between Himself and them, yet He certainly affirmed rather than denied them. The Christian church has ever held to the essential unity of the word of the library of the Holy Scriptures. Moreover, the evangelical churches have recognized the Bible as “the only and sufficient rule of both faith and practice.” Indeed, in the generation following the Reformation, the strictest and most literal theory of inspiration and inerrancy found general acceptance. Over against such a body of presuppositions, criticism, some generations later, began to allege certain errors and discrepancies in the Bible. Of course the orthodox sought to repel all these claims; for they felt that the Bible, whatever the appearances might seem to indicate, must be free from error, else it could not be the word of God. So there came with criticism a long period of sturdy defence of the strictest doctrine of Bib. inerrancy. Criticism, however, kept on its way. It has forced the church to find a deeper and surer ground of confidence in the authority of the Bible as the witness to God’s self-revelation to man.

In our day the church has for the most part overcome the notion that the certainty of the inspiration of God in Christ stands or falls with the absolute inerrancy of each statement contained in the Bible. Still there remains, and doubtless ever must remain, a need of a clear understanding of the issue involved in this allegation—also whether other “human limitations”—of Bib. discrepancies.

Alleged discrepancies pertain (1) to statements of specific, concrete facts, and (2) to the utterance of principles and doctrines. Under the second head fall disagreements respecting moral and religious truths, the “superhistorical” realities and values. Our inquiry resolves itself into three parts: (1) to determine whether there be discrepancies, of either or both sorts, in the Bible; (2) to obtain at least a general understanding of the conditions and causes that may have given rise to the discrepancies, real or apparent; (3) to determine their significance for faith.

As to the first point, it should be observed that apparent inconsistencies may not be real ones; as the often in (1) the positions that the discovery of further data may resolve many an apparent contradiction. On the other hand, the affirmation a priori that there can be and are real discrepancies in the Bible is not only an outrage upon the human understanding, but it stands also in contradiction to the spirit of freedom that is of faith. Besides, it should not be overlooked that the discoveries of modern historical and archaeological research, which have tended to confirm so many Bib\- lical statements, seem just as surely to undermine the literal sense of the

4. Alleged Discrepancies taining to Facts do this with fearless confidence in “the God of things as they are.” But are there real discrepancies in the Bible? It is no part of the present plan to attempt the impossible and at all events useless task of exhibiting definite statistics of all the alleged discrepancies, or even of all the principal ones. Passing by the childish folly that would find a “discrepancy” in mere rhetorical antitheses, such as that in Prov 26:4.5 (“\"Answer not a fool according to his folly\", or ‘instances of merely formal contrariety of expression, where the things intended are manifestly congruous (e.g. Mt 12:30; Lk 11:23 contrasted with Mt 9:40; Lk 9:50: ‘He that is not with me is against me,’ \"He that is not against us is for us\"),’ it will serve our purpose to notice a few representative examples of real or apparent discrepancy. The chronologies of K and Ch are inconsistent with each other. The genealogies in Gen 46; Nu 26; 1Ch 2-7 show considerable variations. The two lists of exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2; Neh 7:6 ff) show many discrepancies, including a marked difference in the enumeration. The account of the creation in Gen 1 and 2 (cf CREATION)—to take an example dependent upon the results of modern criticism—are mutually independent and in important particulars diverse. But the center of interest in our inquiry is the gospel history. Since Tatian and his Diatessaron in the 2nd cent., the variations and contrasts in the Gospels have not only been noted and felt, but many have striven to \"harmonize\" them. After all, however, there remain some irreducible differences. The Gospels, generally speaking, do not give us τιπαίσσειν τοιαύτη προβολήν τοῦ Ιησοῦ; in reporting His discourses they show many variations. In so far as the essential meaning is the same in all, no one speaks of discrepancies; but when there is a clear misstatement of meaning (e.g. Mt 12:39-40 and Lk 11:29-30), one may say that at least a technical discrepancy exists. In recording sayings or events the evangelists manifestly do not always observe the same chronological order; Lk tends to place different events in the narrative (cf GENEALOGY). We may even note that Pilate’s superscription over the cross of Jesus is given in four distinct forms. Here, however, the discrepancy is not real except in the most technical sense, and is worth mentioning only to show that the evangelists’ interest does not lie in a mere objective accuracy. That a perfect agreement as to the significance of an event exists where there are undeniable discrepancies in external details may be illustrated by the two accounts of the healing of the centurion’s servant (Mt 8:5 ff; Lk 7:1 ff). Of enormous greater interest are the various accounts of the appearances of the risen Christ. If a complete certainty as to the form and order of these events is necessary to faith, the case is not a happy one for the harmonists to handle, inasmuch as they cannot render a perfect account of these matters (cf Jesus Christ; RESURRECTION). Turning from the Gospels to apostolic history, we meet some real problems, e.g. how to relate Paul’s autobiographical notes in Gal 1 with the accounts in Acts.

5. Alleged Discrepancies Per- taining to Doctrine prophets and that of the priestly class stand in a relative (not absolute) opposition to each other (cf. e.g. Jsa 1:11; Mic 6:8 with the ritual law, cf. Jer 2:17 in contrast with Gal 2:16 and many other passages in Paul). But particular interest attaches to the problem of Christ’s attitude toward the OT law. His “but I say unto you” (Mt 5:22 and passim) has been interpreted by many as a distinct contradiction of the OT. Another question of acute interest is the agreement of the Johannine picture of Jesus with that of the Synoptists.

It can scarcely require proof that some of these alleged discrepancies are not such at all. For example, Jesus’ attitude toward the OT was one of profound reverence and adherence. The general feeling is that the OT, some would assert—among them Luther—that James stands in opposition to Paul in respect to faith and works (cf Jas 2:17 in contrast with Gal 2:16 and many other passages in Paul). But particular interest attaches to the problem of Christ’s attitude toward the OT law.

The discrepancies thus far noted pertain to historical matters, and not one of them involves the contradiction of a fact in which faith is interested. But there are also real or apparent discrepancies in matters of doctrine. For instance, that the ideal of the prophets and that of the priestly class stand in a relative (not absolute) opposition to each other (cf. e.g. Jsa 1:11; Mic 6:8 with the ritual law, cf. Jer 2:17 in contrast with Gal 2:16 and many other passages in Paul). But particular interest attaches to the problem of Christ’s attitude toward the OT law.

The cases of the Synoptists.

6. Causes of Discrepancies lifts them out of the normal relations of human intelligence, so far as matters of history or science are concerned; not of the human mind, but from the human understanding of the particular facts. Faith, however, has no interest in explaining the human limitations in God’s chosen witnesses. It is God’s way to place the heavenly “treasure in earthen vessels” (2Cor 4:7). It seems that God has purposely led the church to see, through the necessity of recognizing the human limitations of the Bible, just where her faith is grounded. God has made Himself known through His Son. The Scripture at the NT, and of the OT in preparation for Him, give us a clear and sufficient testimony to the Christ of God. The cleanliness and persuasive power of that testimony makes all questions of verbal and other formal agreement essentially irrelevant. The certainty that God has spoken unto us in His Son and that we have this knowledge through the Scripture testimony lifts us above all anxious concern for the possible errors of the witnesses in matters evidently nonessential.

DISCUS, δίσκος, diskos, "the summons of the discus," 2 Mac 4 14 m., "to the game of the discus," AV "the game of discus": The discus was a round stone slab or metal plate of considerable weight (a kind of quoit), the contest of throwing which to the greatest distance was one of the exercises in the Gr gymnasia, being included in the pentathlon. It was introduced into Ierous by Jason the high priest in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-164 BC, in the Palaestra he had formed there in imitation of the Gr games. His conduct led to his being described in 2 Mac 4 13-14 as that "ungodly man" through whom even the priests forsook their duties to play at the discus. A statue of a discobolus (discus-thrower) is in the British Museum. From discus we have the words "disc," "dish," "desk." See Games.

DISEASE, δισθανόν, DISEASES, δισθάνειν (דִּשַּׁנ), halāḥ, חָלָה; hōlī, ḫōrēs, ḫōron): Palestine, from its position and physical conditions, ought to be a healthy country. That it is not so depends upon the unsanitary conditions in which the people live and the absence of any attempts to check the introduction or development of zymotic diseases. The number of marshes or pools is fairly small, and the use of active measures to destroy the larvae of mosquitoes might easily diminish or abolish the malarial fevers which now prevail all over the country. The freeing of Jerusalem and the country by Port Said from these pests is an object-lesson in sanitation. When one examines the conditions of life in towns and villages all over the country, the evidences of the ravages of these fevers and their sequellae appear on every hand as they affect all ages from infancy to middle age, and one meets but few individuals of extreme old age. The absence of any adequate system of drainage and the pollution of the water supplies are also factors of great importance in preserving the health of the country.

In ancient times it was regarded as healthier than Egypt, as it well might be, hence the disease of Egypt are referred to as being worse than those of Pal (Dt 7 15; 28 60; Am 4 10). The sanitary regulations and restrictions of the PC would doubtless have raised the standard of public health, but it is unlikely that these were ever observed over any large area.

The types of disease which are referred to in the Bible are those that still prevail. Fever of several kinds, dysentery, leprosy, intestinal worms, plague, nervous diseases such as paralysis and epilepsy, insanity, ophthalmia and skin diseases are among the commonest and will be described under their several names. Malaria, leprosy, and several others are described under Medicine. Physician. The word "disease" or "diseases" in AV is changed to "sickness" in RV in 2 K 1 2; 8 8; Mt 9 35, and left out in Jn 5 4; while in Mt 8 17 "sicknesses" is replaced by "diseases." RV also changes "infirmity" in Lk 7 21 to "diseases," and in Ps 38 7 "a loathsome disease" is changed to "burning."

DISH: The rendering in RV in some connections of three Heb and one Gr word. The כְּרָדָה (Ex 25 29; 37 16; Nu 4 7) was apparently a kind of salver, in this case of gold, for holding the loaves of the "presence bread." The same word represents the silver "platters" (Nu 7 13 ff) brought by the princes as a dedication gift. The σφήλα of Jgs 5 25 was a large bowl, so τρυπίōn in Jgs 6 38. "Lordly dish" is lit. "bowl of [fit for] nobles." The calophath of 2 K 21 13; Prov 19 24; 26 15 (last two AV "bosom" after LXX) refers probably to the wide, deep dish in which the principal part of the meal was served. Of somewhat similar form may have been the τρυπίōn (LXX for כְּרָדָה) mentioned in connection with the Passover meal (Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20). BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

DISHAN, d'ishan, DISHON, d'shon (דִּשְׁנ, דִּשְׁנָ; דִּשְׁנָה, דִּשְׁנָה, "antelepe; "pygargy"): A Horite clan, mentioned as the youngest "son" and elsewhere as the "grandson" of Seir. The form Dishon occurs several times in the list of Horite clans, together with many other totem names (Gen 36 passim; 1 Ch 1 38 41). See Gray, HPN, 89.

DISHONESTY, dis-on'es-es: Only in 2 Cor 4 2, the AV rendering of Gr αἰσχρόν; AV elsewhere and RV uniformly, "shame."

DISOBEDIENCE, dis-ō-bē'di-ens, DISOBEDIENT (דִּשָּׁב, mārāh; ἀνεπιθέτο, ἀπετίθε, ἀπαράκτω, ἀπαρακτῶ),: The word used chiefly in the NT has the general meaning of a lack of regard for authority or rulership. The stronger meaning of actual stubbornness or violence is perhaps conveyed in the OT (1 K 13 26; Neh 9 26; cf 1 K 13 21).

In the NT there seem to be two rather clearly defined uses of the word, one objective and practical, the other ethical and psychological. The first refers more to conduct, the second to belief and one's mental attitude toward the object of disobedience. To the first belong such passages as refer to the overt act of disobedience to one's parents (Rom 1 30; 2 Tim 3 2). Illustrating this more fully, the τατοποίημα to according to the AV of 1 Tim 1 9 is given as "unruly" in the RV. By far the greater emphasis, however, is placed upon the distinctly ethical quality in which disobedience is really an attitude of the mind and finds its essence in a heart of unbelief and unfaithfulness (1 Pet 3 7 8; Eph 2 2 4; Col 3 6). In the latter three references "children [sons] of disobedience" are mentioned, as if one should become the very offspring of such an unhappy and unholy state of mind. The classic phrase of NT lit. (Acts 26:10) contains both the practical and the ethical aspects. Paul's convictions were changed by the vision and his conduct was made to conform immediately to it.

DISORDERLY, dis-or’d-er-ly (άραξτος, diatokos): The word is found four times in the Epp. to the Thess (1 Thess 5:14; 2 Thess 3:6.7.11), "Withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh d." "We beheld not ourselves; I; We hear of some that walk among you d." The word is a military term and has reference to the soldier who does not keep the ranks (inordinatus, Liv.). Then it refers to people who refuse to obey the civil laws, and thus it gets its meaning, "disorderly." It points to members in the early church, who, by their lives, became a reproach to the gospel of Christ (cf. 1 Thess 4:11.12).

HENRY E. DOSKER

DISPATCH, dis-pash': Occurs Tob 7:8 in the sense of dispatch of business, "Let this business be dispatched" (RV "finished"); 2 Macc 12:18, "before he had dispatched anything" (RV "without accomplishing"); Wis 11:19 [20] in the sense of finishing, destroying, "dispatch them at once" (RV "complete'") (2 Macc 4:3). The word is also used in Neh 6:14 in a different sense, "dispatched" (katanéin), which may mean "finish it quickly." RV spells "dispatch."

DISPENSATION, dis-pen’sa’shun: The Gr word (oikonomia) so transliterated or translated primarily, a stewardship, the management or disposition of affairs intrusted to one. Thus 1 Cor 9:17, AV "A dispensation of the gospel is committed unto me," RV "I have a stewardship intrusted to me." The idea is similar in Eph 3:2 Col 1:25 (RVm "stewardship"). In Eph 1:10 God's own working is spoken of as a "dispensation.

The Dispersion is the comprehensive designation applied to Jews living outside of Pal and maintaining their religious observances and customs among the Gentiles. They were called the Golah (Arama. Galáshôa), Diaspora, the captivity—an expression describing them in relation to their own land; and the Diaspora, an expression describing them in relation to the nations among whom they were scattered. On a notable occasion Jesus said, "Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me; and where I am, ye cannot come." Whither will this man go that we shall not find him? Will he go unto the Dispersion among the Greeks, and teach the Greeks?" (Jn 7:34-35).

In 2 Macc certain priests of Jerusalem are represented as praying to God: "Gather together our Dispersion, set at liberty them that are in bondage among the heathen" (2 Macc of the 1:27; cf 2 Esd 2:7; Jas 1:1; 1 Pet 2:12). Dispersion 1:1). The thought of such a Dispersion as a punishment for the disobedience of the people finds frequent expression in the Prophets: Hosea (9:3), Jeremiah (8:3; 15:15, etc.), Ezekiel (4:13), and Zechariah (10:9). And it appears also in the Deuteronomic Law (Dt 28:47-49). And the benefit of the Gentiles is a conception to which expression is given in utterances of psalmists and prophets (Ps 67; Mic 5:7, etc.). It is found also in the Apoc Bar, a work belonging to the 1st cent. AD: "I will scatter this people among the Gentiles, that they may do good to the Gentiles" (1:7).

The causes of the Dispersion most obvious to the student of OT history were the Assyrian and Babylonic captivities, when the king of Assyria carried Israel away from its land and placed them in Halah, and in the Dispersion Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (2 K 17:5 ff.); and when in the reign of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, Jerusalem and its inhabitants were carried into captivity (2 K 24:14). See Captivity. But there were other captivities which helped to scatter the children of Abraham. Pottery I of Egypt (322-285 BC) by his expeditions to Pal and his capture of Jerusalem added largely to the Jewish population of Alexandria. Antiochus the Great of Syria (223-187 BC) removed from the Jewish communities in Mesopotamia and Babylon 2,000 families and settled them in Phrygia and Lydia (Jos, Antiq, XII, iii, 4). Ptolemy after his capture of Jerusalem in 31 BC carried off hundreds of Jews to Rome, where they were sold as slaves, but, afterward, many of them obtained their freedom and civic rights.

There was, besides, a voluntary emigration of Jewish settlers for purposes of trade and commerce into the neighboring countries, and the Dispersion esp. into the chief cities of the civilized world. The successors of Alexander, and their successors in turn, encouraged their immigration into that part of the world and mingling of nationalities. They needed colonists for the settlements and cities which they established, and with the offer of citizenship and facilities for trade and commerce they attracted many of the Jewish people.

"In this way," says Philo, "Jerus became the capital, not only of Judea, but of many other lands, on account of the colonies which it sent out from time to time into the bordering districts of Egypt, Phoenicia, Syria, Cœle-

Syria, and into the more distant regions of Pampylia, Cilicia, the greater part of Asia Minor as far as Bithynia, and the remotest corners of Pontus. And in like manner into Europe: into Thrasyllus, and Boeotia, and Macedonia, and Aetolia, and Attica, and Argo, and Corinth, and into the most fertile and fairest parts of the Peloponnesus. And not only to the continent, but also to the most important islands, such as Eubea, Cyprus, and Crete. I say nothing of the countries beyond the Euphrates. All of them except a very small portion of Babylonia, and all the satrapies which contain fruitful land, have Jewish inhabitants" (Philo, Leg ad Caesarum, 36).

About the middle of the 2d cent. BC the Sibylline Oracles could say of the Jewish people: "Every land and every sea is full of thee" (3:271). About the same period the Roman Senate, being anxious to extend protection to the Jews, applied a circular letter written in their favor to the kings of Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Cappadocia and Parthia, and to a great number of provinces, cities and islands of the Mediterranean, where presumably there was a larger or smaller number of Jews (1 Macc 15:15 ff.). It is no surprise, therefore, to read that for the Feast of Pentecost at Jerusalem, there were present after the ascension of Jesus: "Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Paphlagonia, and in Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, in Cilicia and Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians" (Acts 2 9–12).

The Eastern Dispersion, caused by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, seems to have increased and multiplied, and to have enjoyed a considerable measure of liberty, and Eastern prosperity. When the return from Dispersion the captivity took place under Zerubbabel, it was only a small proportion of the exiles who sought a home again in the land of their fathers. Nor did the numbers who accompanied Ezra from Babylon greatly diminish the exiles who remained behind. In the time of Christ, Jos could speak of the Jews in Babylonia by "of the innumerable myriads" (Ant., XI, v, 2). He also tells us of the 2,000 Jewish families whom Antiochus transferred from Babylonia and Mesopotamia to Phrygia and Syria. Of the peculiarities of the Jews as a people in Babylon, and contrasting their own customs and arousing the ill-will of the neighbors, we have a glimpse in the Pers period in the Book of Est (3 8). Babylonia remained a focus of eastern Judaism for centuries, and from the rabbinical period, the temple at the Talm of Jerus in the 5th cent. of our era, and the Talm of Babylon a cent. later. The two chief centers of Mesopotamian Judaism were Nehardea, a town on the Euphrates, and Nisibis on the Mygdonius, an affluent of the Chaboras, which were also centers of Syrian Christianity.

The Egyptian Dispersion is of special interest and importance, and recent discoveries have thrown unexpected light upon it. As far back as the days of Sheshenq, one could speak of the Jews in Babylonia by "of the affluent Pharaohs", and of the learned priest Haniu, who were called the Talm of Jerus in the 5th cent. of our era, and the Talm of Babylon a cent. later. The two chief centers of Mesopotamian Judaism were Nehardea, a town on the Euphrates, and Nisibis on the Mygdonius, an affluent of the Chaboras, which were also centers of Syrian Christianity.

6. The Egyptian founder of the 23rd Dynasty, the Shi Dispersion shak of I K 14 25 f; 2 Ch 12 21, who invaded Pal in the 10th cent. BC, and engraved on the walls of the great temple of Karnak the names of many districts and cities he had captured, was war and hostage may have been carried off to Egypt by the conqueror. At a later time Jewish mercenaries are said to have fought in the Persian army of Psammetichus II against Ethiopia, to which expedition belong the famous inscriptions of Abu Simbel (594–589 BC). So we learn from the well-known Letter of Aristeas. But the clearest and best-known example of a settlement of Jews in Egypt is that connected with the prophet Jeremiah. When Gedaliah, the governor of Judaea, after the destruction of Jerus in 586 BC, had been treacherously murdered, the depressed and dispirited remnant under Johanan, the son of Kareah, resolved to take flight into Egypt, against the counsel of Jeremiah. A host of fugitives, including Jeremiah and his friend Baruch, accordingly set out thither, and settled at Migdol and Tahpanies and Noph (Memphis), and in the country of Puthros in Egypt (Jer 44). It was in Egypt with these fugitives that Jeremiah ended his life. Many of the fugitives were taken prisoners by Nebuchadrezzar on one of his latest expeditions to the west, and were transported to Babylonia (Jos, Ant., X, ix, 7; 2 Esdr, 3 8). Of this colony of Jews it is natural to see a strong confirmation in the recent discovery of Aram, papiri at Assouan, the Syene of the ancients. The papiri were the contents of a deed box of a member of a Jewish colony in upper Egypt, and the names refer to house-palaces in which Jews were concerned. Here then at Assouan, about 470 BC is a colony of Jews who have been bankers and money lenders, within a cent. of the death of Jeremiah. In the papiri there is evidence of the existence of a tribunal in which cases could be decided, as fully recognized by law as any of the other courts. Egypt or Pers, for Egypt, "the capital of kingdoms,"Pers is called "the land of the Persians," yet Pers is never recognized as a regular court and Pers is never a regular court. The most significant of all, Jeh is acknowledged as the God of their fathers. These facts are rendered still more striking when we regard them as a fulfillment of the prophecy: "In that day there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts: one shall be called the city of destruction. In that day shall Jehovah strike with the sword in Egypt; and with Jehovah in the midst of the land of Egypt, and with a pillar at the boundary thereof to Jehovah" (Isa 19 18, 19). These papiri give information similar to that which the clay tablets discovered at Nippur give regarding the house of Marduk son of the Gth Kingdom. It is suggested the time when Ezra was setting out from Babylonia to restore at Jerus the worship of the temple which Zerubbabel had rebuilt, and the cities and towns that Jerus had gone down to Egypt that we have the first of the southern most of Egypt—Nancy great-grandfathers, of the persons concerned whom he had accompanied thither so much against his will.

7. Testimony of the Dispersion to the Gth Kingdom. At the time of the Persian period, the temple at Elephantine or Yeh, an island in the Nile Temple on the frontier also. One of these papiri contains the petition of a Jewish colony in Elephantine addressed to Bagohi, the Persian governor of the province "Elephantine" (called Pers governor of Judah, about 408 BC). They ask for assistance to enable them to rebuild the temple of Jeh in Elephantine. The temple had been desecrated by the Talm of Jerus in the 5th cent. of our era, and the Talm of Babylon a cent. later. The two chief centers of Mesopotamian Judaism were Nehardea, a town on the Euphrates, and Nisibis on the Mygdonius, an affluent of the Chaboras, which were also centers of Syrian Christianity.

9. Theories of the Dispersion of the Jews. It is suggested that they had come into Egypt with the Pers army under Cambyses from their adopted homes in Assyria and the cities of the Medes and had obtained possessions in the land of Egypt, the sons of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria. That this was Nebuchadnezzar's later, for he lived nearly a cent. earlier. But the association with descendants of his, himself Samartians, gives a similar appearance to the position of the Elephantine temple. The existence of this temple with its priesthood, its altar of sacrifice, and its priests, in the years BC, is an important fact in the history of the Dispersions. It was meant to keep those Jewish exiles true to the religion of their fathers, and to present a counter to the spread of Christianity, with their brethren in Pal. For a like purpose the Temple of Onias at Ptolemais was established. In the years of the Maccabean struggle, Onias did flee to Jerus with a number of priests and Levites, and for the foundation and the worship of the temple. It was destroyed by Ptolemy III Euergetes in 280 BC, but Onias had received a gift of land upon which he built a
The great monument of Hellenistic Judaism, which had its chief seat in Alexandria, is the LXX tr of the OT parata paralogica, and is the Bible of parata evangelica, and was the Bible of the Apostles and the chief handbook of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. It is inscribed in the Letter of Aristeas to the interest of the ptolemy II philopator (285-247 b.C.) to secure a copy of the Jewish Law in an accessible tr for the famous royal Library. It is more likely than the sephardic version that the hel lenic tongue in their new surroundings, the need of an intelligible version of the Law to be used, it was expeditious to act to work it out. In course of time the rest followed, but from the tradition of its being the work of 70 or 72 translators it is known as the LXX.

The question has been raised whether too much has not been made of a Jewish community in Alexandria so early, and it has been asserted that no such a Jewish community at a comparatively early period. A remarkable inscription has been found by this expedition in the Jewish quarter of Alexandria, with a poem to the temple of Alexandria of 133 BC. The Jewish community in Alexandria had been founded by the Jews of Syria who had come to live showing that at Scethis, 20 miles from Alexandria, there existed a Jewish community which had built a synagogue and dedicated it to the honor of Ptolemy III. The Jews of Alexandria had been friendly to the Macedonian conquest, and in the new city the Jews received the rights of citizenship and two quarters were set aside for them. That the Jews were not persecuted and had full national liberty, the principal synagogue of the city was on a scale of great magnificence. In the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (180-146 BC) they were allowed to set up the temple at Leontopolis, and as we have already noticed, in the time of Philo the Jewish colony in Egypt was considered to number a million.

In Alexandria the Jews first came so powerfully under the influence of Hellenism, and here that the peculiar Graeco-Jewish philosophy sprang up as the most notable representative. The same soil was eminently favorable to early Christianity which had from the end of the 2nd cent. onward its greatest teachers and their learned catechetical school. See Alexandria.

14. The Septuagint.

The great monument of Hellenistic Judaism, which had its chief seat in Alexandria, is the LXX tr. of the OT parata paralogica, and is the Bible of parata evangelica, and was the Bible of the Apostles and the chief handbook of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. 15. Early Evidence of Dispersion anywhere before the Maecan-Jewish life in the period of the second half of the Community.

The evidence as we have seen points to the existence of Jewish communities continuously from the days of the Maccabees. Papiyr proved the presence of Jews in Egypt, not only in the towns but in some districts from a comparatively early period. A remarkable inscription has been found by this expedition in the Jewish quarter of Alexandria, with a poem to the temple of Alexandria of 133 BC. The Jewish community in Alexandria had been friendly to the Macedonian conquest, and in the new city the Jews received the rights of citizenship and two quarters were set aside for them. 16. Dispersion—It is the country which has had the sion in Syria largest percentage of Jewish inhabitants, and at Antioch among the Jews of Syria had the predominence. In Damascus, which seems to have had a Jewish quarter or Jewish quarter in the days of Ahab (1 K 20 34 and Burnye's note ad loc.), the Jewish population was numbered by thousands. In the region of the Hauran, Judas Maccabaeus and his brother Jonathan brought bodies of Jews, who were settlers among a pagan population, for safety to Judaean (1 Mace 5).

Even in Arabia Judaism had considerable footing. Edward Gaster has also prosecuted with care and success researches in Arabia (see Hiflarch's hints, Researches in the Biblical City, p. 163). He has come to the conclusion that the Himyartic inscriptions of the 4th and 5th cents. of our era which are now Christian and therefore Jewish, but there is still uncertainty as to this. In the beginning of the 4th cent. a Jewish king actually reigned in Arabia, and because of his persecution of the Christians he was attacked and overthrown by the Christian king of Abyssinia.

Of the widespread distribution of the Dispersion in Asia Minor there is abundant testimony, not only in the texts of the apostles, but also in classical and early Christian literature, and in the epigraphic literature, which has been accumulating for the last 30 years. At Pergamum, in Lydia, in Karia, at Magnesia, at Trales, at Miletum, in Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Pontus, considerable Jewish communities existed at the beginning of the Christian era. At Smyrna the Jews played a prominent role in the early history of the city, and in the 155 AD, being esp. zealous in preaching up fagots on the fire that consumed the martyr. In his Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia Sir William Ramsay mentions numerous indications found on inscriptions of Jewish settlers, and his chapter "The Jews in Phrygia" focuses the results of his inquiries.
Jews, and there was present among his listeners a large body of Jews interested in the case. When Pompey had captured Jeros in 63 BC, and held that the Jewish captives. They were sold as slaves, but many of them received their freedom and rights to citizenship. When Julius Caesar, who was a great patron and protector of the Jews, died, the people wept over him for nights on end.

22. Jews and the First Caesars

Augustus protected and encouraged them. Tiberius, however, adopted repressive measures toward them, and Jews in the Roman Empire were severely persecuted for their faith and worship. The Jews fled to Judaea and other places

23. Influence of the Roman Empire

The Jews were influenced by the Roman Empire in their religion and culture. The Jewish exodus to Rome continued, and the Dispersion of Jews was significant in the development of the Roman Empire.

24. Jews in Italy, Gaul, Spain and North Africa

The Dispersion reached Italy, Gaul, Spain, and North Africa. The Jews in these areas established communities and maintained their culture and religion.

25. Number of Jews in the Dispersion Empire

The exact number of Jews in the Dispersion Empire is unknown. However, it is estimated that there were millions of Jews scattered throughout the empire.

26. Jewish Proselytism

Judaism continued to spread and attract converts. However, the proselytism was not always accepted by the Jewish community. The question of proselytism has been a topic of debate in Jewish history.

In recent excavations, which have laid bare much of subterranean Rome, many Jewish tombs have been examined and have yielded much additional knowledge of the conditions of Jewish life in the capital of the Caesars. Probably Jews grading Pompey's triumph after his Syrian campaign, 61 BC, made the first Rom catacombs similar to those on Jewish hillsides and esp. round Jerusalem; and in these Jewish catacombs pagans and Christians were never laid.

In Italy, apart from Rom and Southern Italy, where they were widely spread, the number of Jews at the beginning of our era was not so large as in Gaul; they were numerous and in Spain they were numerous and powerful. In North Africa there were Jewish communities in many centers, and Cyrene was the home of a large and flourishing Jewish population.

It is not easy to form a trustworthy estimate of the Jewish population of the world in the times of Christ. Harnack reckons up four or four and a half millions (Expansion of the Christianity, I, 10) within the Roman Dispersion Empire: The Judaism of the Dispersion would at least be several times more numerous than the Judaism of Pal.

The question has been discussed how far the Jews of the Dispersion recruited their ranks by proselytism. That they should maintain a propaganda on behalf of their ancestral Proselytism faith would only be in keeping with the ancient faith in the Law as a religion of revelation. Although they might have abstracted the phrase "the hedge of the Law" to protect them against the corruptions and idolatries of the Gentiles.
there was nevertheless at the heart of Judaism a missionary purpose, as we see from the universalism of the Psalms and the Prophets. Judaism was burdened with a message which concerned all men, to the effect that there was one God, of whom and spiritually the Creator of heaven and earth, who had committed to the family of Abraham in trust for the world His Law. To witness for the Living God, and to proclaim His Law, was the chief element of the Jewish propaganda in the Roman empire, and their system of proselytism enabled them to gain adherents in numbers. In this the OT Scriptures and the observance of the Sabbath were important factors, and enabled them to win the adherence of intelligent and educated people.

That the Jews of the Dispersion had an internal organization with courts of their own, having considerable jurisdiction, not only in spiritual but in civil affairs, there is no doubt. This would only be in accordance with the analogy of their constitution as seen in the NT, and of their commercial organization in many lands to this day. In all the lands of their Dispersion the Jews never lost touch with their land, their kindred, or Jerusalem, the city of the Great King. The bond of unity was maintained by the pilgrimages they made from all the countries where they were scattered to their great national feast; by the payment of the half-shekel toward the services of the Temple as long as it stood; and by their voluntary submission, so long as they had a national polity, to the decrees of the great Sanhedrin.

That Judaism was influenced in its Dispersion by contact of the larger world of life and thought in which the Jews had their place outside of Palestine we can see by the example of Alexandria. It was there that it first and most powerfully the penetrating and pervasive influence of Greek thought, and the influence of the larger world of life and thought in which the Jews had their place outside of Palestine. The Alexandrian Jew was in reality both a Jew and a Greek; he held the faith of Jeh and sincerely worshipped the God of his fathers, but he spoke the Greek language, had received a Greek education, and had contracted many Greek ideas and habits. Still those in his position were Jews first, and Greeks afterward, and on all the fundamentals 'were in thorough sympathy with their Palestinian brethren' (Fairweather, From the Exile to the Advent, 109 f).

The Jewish people thus widely distributed over the Roman world in their monotheism, with their Scriptures, and with their Messianic hopes, did much to prepare the way for the advent of the Redeemer who was to be the fulfilment of Jewish expectation and hope. It was due to the strange and unique influence of Judaism and to the circulation of the glowing visions of Israel's prophets among the nations, that there was so widespread an expectation, mentioned by Tacitus, by Suetonius and by Jos., that from Judaea would arise a Ruler whose dominion would be over all. It is now believed that Virgil's conception of the Better Age which was to be inaugurated by the birth of a child was derived from Isaiah's prophecies. And not only did the Jewish Dispersion thus prepare the way for the world's Redeemer in the fulness of the time, but when He had come and suffered and died and risen and ascended, it furnished a valuable auxiliary to the proclamation of the gospel. Wherever the apostles and the first preachers traveled with the good news, they found Jewish communities to whom they offered first the great salvation. The synagogue services lent themselves most effectively to the ministry of St. Paul and his colleagues, and it was to the synagogues that they first reported to the city they visited. Even to this day this preservation of "the dispersed of Israel" is one of the marvels of the Divine government of the world, proving the truth of what the holy prophets said: "I will set the house of Israel among all the nations, like as grain is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least kernel fall upon the earth" (Am 9:9).

DISPERSION OF NATIONS. See BABEL; DISPERSION; TABLE OF NATIONS.

DISPOSITION, dis-posit-sion (διαστασις, diastasis): Only in Acts 7:53, "received the law by the disposition of angels," where it bears the meaning of "administration"; RV "as it was ordained by angels."

DISPUTATION, dis-part-ay-shun (διαστηματισς, disputatio): In Acts 16:2, RV reads "questioning" for AV "disputation" (Gr suskellai). In Rom 14:1, AV "doubtful disputations" becomes in RV "division of scruples." (Gr discussionis doubletis). The Gr in neither case implies what the word "dispute" has come to mean in modern Eng., but rather "to discuss" or "argue."

DISTAFF, dis-taff (://, pelakh): This word occurs twice in Prov 31:19: "spindle" is found in the same passage. In RV the meanings of the two words have been exchanged. See SPINNING.

DISTIL, dis-till: Only found twice in the Eng. Bible (Dt 32:2; Job 36:27), in both cases in its original meaning of "to fall in drops," as dew or rain (derived through Fr. from Lat de, "down," stillo, "to drop"). It does not occur in its later technical sense, for the process we call distillation was not known in ancient times.

DISTINCTLY, dis-tink-tlv: Only Neh 8:8, "They read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly." Probably the better rendering in RV "with an interpretation," i.e. translating into Aram. The Heb word is a part of vb. pwrkath=to make distinct. The corresponding Aram. word occurs in Ezr 4:18 ="plainly" AV and RV, better "translated" RV.

DITCH, dic: The word is used indiscriminately in AV to represent at least three different ideas: a conduit or trench (2 K 3:16); a reservoir or cistern; or simply a pit or hole in the ground. In RV this distinction is observed more carefully. Cf Job 9:31; 12:5, "reservoir" ("reservoir"), the former meaning a pit or any similar place of destruction or corruption; the latter a reservoir or cistern of water. The NT usage (Mt 15:14 AV) corresponds somewhat with the former. See also 2 K 3:16 ("trenches").

DIVERS, dvorz. DIVERSE, di-vorr': DIVERSITIES, di-vorr-iss-tiz: "Divers" meaning "various," "different in kind" is now obsolete and used only as a synonym of "several," i.e. more than one. The distinction between "divers" and "diverse" in AV seems to be that the former is the
the future, etc, and to utter oracles embodying what he sees. Among the Romans artificial divination prevailed almost exclusively, the other having vogue largely among the Greeks, and changes in the "diviners" nearly everywhere, except where it has the meaning "several." Cf Mt 24 7; Lk 21 11; He 9 10, et al. It is hard to understand why RV retains "divers" as a tr of παράσης, παράσης, in Mt 4 24; Mk 1 24; Lk 5 30, because παράσης certainly cannot have the meaning "several!" but "different in kind," and the idea expressed in these passages is not that of the many people having different diseases but that different people had different kinds of diseases. The same is true in He 13 9 where "disease" does not refer to number but to various kinds of teaching. He 2 4 and Jas 1 2 rightly change the reading of AV "divers" to "manifold."

In other passages RV changes "divers" to "diverse," and thus renders the idea of the original text "different in kind." Cf Dt 25 13 f; Prov 20 10.23. Other passages are changed the better to render the original text: Dt 22 9, "two kinds of seed"; Jgs 5 30, "dyed"; 2 Ch 30 11, "certain men," RV "diverse." Acts 19 9, AV "divers" in all these passages "divers." RV changes AV He 1 1 "at sundry times and in divers manners," an expression often found in Old Eng, to "by divers portions and in divers manners."

"Divers" is found twice as tr of διαφορά, διαφορά, lit. "distribution," (1 Cor 12 4 f), but RV changes AV, 1 Cor 12 28, "diversities to "divers kinds," as tr of γένι, γένι, "kinds." A. L. BRESLICH

Dives, divi-vēs.See Lazarus.

DVIDE, di-vīdē: It is difficult to decide whether פָּדָה, פָּדָה (Job 26 12; Isa 51 15; Jer 31 35) should be rendered "to stir up" or "to still." The Heb has both meanings. Some render "He causes the sea to tremble." RV reads "to stir in text and "to still" in margin, while AV has "to divide" in all three cases. 2 Ch 35 13, "carried them quickly" (AV "divided them speedily"). Since פָּדָה, פָּדָה, may mean either "to distribute" or "to be smooth," Hos 10 2 reads "their heart is divided in the text, but our "smooth" in margin, (AV "divided"). The Gr διαφορά, orthotonōμαι, means "to cut straight," hence the more lit. tr of 2 Tim 1 2, "handling aright the word of truth" (note "holding a straight course in the way of truth" or "rightly dividing the word of truth;" AV "rightly dividing").

Definitions

Divination is the act of obtaining secret knowledge, esp. that which relates to the future, by means within the reach almost exclusively of special classes of men.

1. Definition

Of this there are two main species: (1) artificial, (2) inspirational, or, as it was called in ancient times (Cicero, Lord Bacon, etc), natural divination. Artificial divination depends on the skill of the agent in reading and in interpreting certain signs or omens. See also (3) artificial. Inspirational or natural divination the agent is professedly under the immediate influence of some spirit or god who enables the diviner to see the future, etc.

3. Fundamenta Knowledge desired by men, and that, under certain conditions, they are willing to impart to the gods.

Divination

(1) The word "divination" itself, from deus, "god," or dòvus, "pertaining to god," carries with it the notion that the information obtained comes from deity. Sinaitic, including Cicero himself who gives it. "Divination," Cicero makes him say (op. cit. ii.63 ff), is "a power in man which foresees and explains those signs which the gods throw in his way." The Greeks were, on the other hand, much more imaginative. They knew that man, and with them inspirational divination held much the larger place. The Gr mánis (μάνις) bears a close resemblance to the OT prophet, for both claimed to be inspired from without and to superhuman inspiration. The Gr term for divination (hê) mantikê (μαντική) technically has reference to the work of the mánis, and it hardly ever means divination of the lower sort—that by means of signs.

Underlying all methods of divination there lay the belief that certain superhuman spiritual beings (gods, spirits) possess the secret knowledge desired by men, and that, under certain conditions, they are willing to impart it to the gods.

4. Legitimate and Illegitimate Divination

Divination

(1) It can be proved that among the ancient peoples (Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc) the view prevailed that not only oracles but also omens of all kinds are given to men by the gods and express the minds of these gods.

Among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks and Romans the diviner stood in the service of the state and was officially consulted before wars and other great enterprises were undertaken. But among these nations certain classes of diviners were prohibited by the government from exercising their calling, probably because they were supposed to be
The species of divination spoken of in the Bible may be arranged under two heads: (1) those apparently sanctioned, and (2) those condemned in the Bible.

6. Modes of Divination

(1) Methods of divination tacitly or expressly sanctioned in the Bible.—(a) The use of Baal has already been cited. He was a Moabite and therefore a heathen soothsayer. His word of blessing or of curse is so potent that whether he blesses or curses his word secures its own realization. So far is his vocation from being cursed that it is actually called into the service of Yahweh (see Nu 22-24).

(b) To dreams the Bible assigns an important place as a legitimate means of revealing the future.

Such dreams are of two kinds:

(i) Involuntary or such as come unsought. Even these are regarded as sent for guidance in human affairs. The bulk of the dreams spoken of in the Bible belong to this class: see Gen 20 3.6 (Abimelech); 28 2 f.; 31 10-14 (Jacob); 37 5-9 (Joseph; see ASTRONOMY, ii, 6). Nu 21- Pf. Pharaoh’s butler (baker); 41 T. Y. (Pharaoh’s) baker, 7 14-9 (Gideon and an unnamed man); Dn 1 17 (Daniel had understanding of dreams); Dn 2 1-49 (Nebuchadnezzar’s dream and its interpretation by Daniel); Mt 1 20; 2 13 f. (Joseph, husband of Mary, the virgin); 27 19 (two visions of Thomas in Jerusalem); 23 25 f., where the lawfulness of prophetic dreams is assumed (cf ver 32, where “lying dreams” imply genuine ones). In the document usually ascribed by modern critics to the Elohist (E), dreams bulk largely as divinities serve to show. Among the Babylonians belief in the significance of dreams gave rise to a science (omensomancy) so elaborate that only special interpreters called seers (sing. bara) were considered able to explain them (see LENORMANT, op. cit., 143, for examples).

(ii) The other species of dreams consists of such as are induced by what is called “incubation,” i.e. by sleeping in a sacred place where the god of the place is believed to reveal his secrets to the sleeper. Herodotus (iv 172) says that the Nasamonnians, an Egyptian tribe, used to practise divination by sleeping in the graves of their ancestors. The dreams which then came to them were understood to be revelations of their dead ancestors. See also (b), above. These would be “incubation dreams” in Nineveh. We have a reference to this custom in Isa 65 4 (“that sit among the graves”), where Yahweh enters into judgment with the Jews for their sin in yielding to this superstition. Solomon’s dream (1 K 3 5-15) came to him at the high place of Gideon. See also DREAM, DREAMER.

(b) But the Bible appears in some places to give its approval to some kinds of artificial or (as it may be called) omens. See (c) Sortilege or divination by lot. The use of the lot as a means of ascertaining the will of Deity is referred to at least without expressed censure, and, as the present writer thinks, with tacit approval, in many parts of the Bible. It was by lot that Aaron decided which of the two goats was to be for Yahweh and which for Azazel (Lev 16 7-10). It was by lot that the land of Cannan was divided after the conquest (Nu 26 56 f.; Josh 18 19). For other Bible instances see Jos 18 1 f.; Judg 17 11 f.; 1 Ch 6 54 f.; 24 5 f.; 25 8 f.; 26 13 f.; Est 3 7 (“They cast Pur, that is, the lot”); see Century Bible in loc.); Neh 10 34; 11 1; Jon 1 7 (“The lot fell upon Jonah”); Mt 27 35; Acts 1 26; in the Urim and Thummim (q.v.), as explained by learned scholars, the methods applied for these two words, though etymologically still obscure, stand for two objects (pebbles), one denoting yes or its equivalent, and the other no. Whenever the high priest took from his ephod was believed, and an answer was given as asked. In all cases it is taken for granted that the lot cast was an expression and indication of the Divine will. See AUGURY, IV, 3.

(6) Hydromancy, or divination by water. In Genesis 2, Joseph is referred to as practising this kind of divination and not a word of disapproval is expressed. See AUGURY, IV, 2.

(7) We read in the OT of other signs or omens which are implicitly approved of, thus Jgs 6 36-40 (Gideon's casting down of the altar), and when Jonathan decides whether or not he is to attack the Philistines by the words which he may happen to hear them speak.

(2) Modes of divination condemned.—The following methods of divination are explicitly or implicitly condemned in the OT.

(a) Astro-mancy (=Astrology). See ASTROLOGY.

(b) Rhadomancy, or the use of the divining rod, referred to apparently in Hos 4 12 (which may be paraphrased: ‘My people ask counsel of a bit of wood, and the rod made thereof answers their questions’); Ezek 8 17 (‘They put a rod [AV “the branch”] to their nose’).

(c) By an examination of the liver of animals; see Ezek 21 21. This mode of divining, heptasopy, is seen even as late as the middle of the 19th century among the Babylonians, Greeks, Romans, etc., of the ancient world, and it is still in vogue in Bornoe, Burmah and Uganda. We have no evidence that it was practised among the Israelites, for in the ancient Assyro-Babylonian “Sacred annals” of the king of BABYLON (Nebuchadnezzar) who is said to have “looked in the liver.”

Opinions differ as to how the state of the liver could act as an omen. Jastrow says the liver was considered to be the seat of life, and that where the liver of the animal sacrificed (generally a sheep) was accepted, it took on the character of the deity to whom it was offered. The soul of the animal as seen in the liver became then a reflector of the soul of the god (see B.B. XX, 102 f). On the other hand, Alfred Jeremias says that in the view of the ancient Babylonians the lines and forms of the sheep’s liver were regarded as reflecting the universe and its history (The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, I, 61). Neither of these explanations is made probable by its advocates.

(d) By teraphim (of Teraphim); see 1 S 16 23; 21 21; 1 S 10 2.

(e) Necromancy, or consulting the dead; see Lev 19 31; 20 6; Dt 18 11; Is 8 19; 19 3; see above.

(f) Divination through the sacrifice of children by burning (see Dt 18 10). The context makes it almost certain that the words of Jeremiah, “that maketh his own son or his daughter to pass through the fire” (Ezek), and read “that burneth his son or his daughter in the fire” (see Dt 18 10) refers to a mode of obtaining an oracle (cf 2 K 3 27). The Phoenicians and Carthaginians sacrificed their children to Kronos in times of grave national danger or calamity (Porphyry Apud Euseb. Praep. Ev. I, 64, 4; Diod. Sic. XX, 14).

These are examined in detail in T. Witton Davies’ Magic, Divination, and Demonology among the Hebrews and Their Neighbors. See also 7. Terms. The art ‘Divination’ in EB by the Used in the present article. The following brief notes the OT in most sufficient here.

Connection (1) רטפ, ṭemānāh, generally rendered “divination,” is a general term for divination in all kinds. In Ezek 21 21-26 it stands for divination by arrows while in 1 S 28 it is used of divination through the medium of an ’ābāh (‘familiar spirit’). On the derivation of the word see EB, art. “Magic,” § 3.

(7) דנין, mē’timānāh, probably from a Sem. root (cf Arab. ‘annā) which denotes to emit a hoarse nasal sound such as was customary in reciting the prescribed formula (see CHARM). For ‘touch of the mē’timānāh’ see AUGUS’ O.A. 3. Some say the word means one who smites with the evil eye,” making the term a denominative from qurān, “eye.” The usual rendering in AV is pl. “observers of times” and in RV “them that practised augury” (Dt 18 10-14).

(3) The vb יָטַּת, nietānāh, of which רטפ, lāḥānāh, is but a variant, is probably a denominative from לָהֵס, nāḥās, “a serpent!” (and n interchange in Heb), denoting “to hiss,” “to whisper” (like a serpent), then “to utter divinatory formulae. As it is used for so many kinds of divination, W. R. Smith concludes that it came to be a general term for the divine. Part of the this vb. is tr’ enchanter” in Dt 18 10, the cognate vb., “to use enchantments” in Lev 19 26; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6, and the corresponding noun “enchantment” in Nu 23 23; 24 1.

(4) גסָרִת, gāsārīn, lit. “cutters,” i.e. such as kill (in Arab. the cognate vb. = “to slaughter”) for the purpose of examining the liver or entrails as omens. Perhaps the etymology implies “sacrifice,” animals being sacrificed as an offering to the god, and the word occurs only in Dnl (2 27; 4 7 4; 5 7 11). The word tr’ “soothsayers.” Some think they were “astrologers,” the etymology in that case referring to the dividing of the heavens with a view, by casting the horoscope, to forecasting the future.

(5) נָשַע, našaḥaḏ (AV “astrologer,” RV “enchanter”), occurs only in Dnl in the Heb (1 20; 2 2) and in the Aram. (2 10; 4 4 71, etc) parts of the book. The term is probably taken from the Bab and designates a magician and esp. an exorcist rather than a diviner.

(6) מְרָכַת מֹרַכַת, moraḥaṯ, the same word as the Gr Chaldaioi (Xαλδάιοι) (EV “Chaldeans”), denotes in Dnl (1 4, etc) where alone it occurs, not the people so designated but a class of astrologers. This usage (common in classical writers) arose after the fall of the Bab empire, when the only Chaldaic known were astrologers and soothsayers. See further, MAGIC. For “spirit of divination” (Acts 16 10) see PYTHON; PHILIPP.

Inspirational divination and OT prophecy have much in common. Both imply the following conditions: (1) the primitive instinct that craves for secret knowledge; (2) the belief that knowledge is possessed by certain spiritual beings who are willing on certain terms to impart it; (3) such secret knowledge is imparted generally to special classes of men (rarely women) called diviners or (Bab) seers and prophets.

Many anthropologists (Tylor, Frazer, etc) and OT scholars (Wellhausen, W. Robertson Smith, etc) consider prophecy to be but an outgrowth and higher form of divination. The older theologians almost to a man, and a goodly number of moderns, take precisely the opposite view, that divination is a corruption of prophecy. Probably neither view is strictly true. Sometimes in human life we find evidences of progress from lower to higher. Sometimes the process is the very reverse. It is important to take notice of the differences as well as the resemblances between the diviner and the prophet.

(1) The OT prophet believes in a personal God whose spoke or wrote it was because he was, at least professedly, inspired and informed by Yahweh. “Thus says Yahweh,” was the usual formula with which he introduced his oracles. The Gr and Rom manifests, on the other hand, worked himself up to the necessary ecstatic state by music, drugs (intoxicating smoke), and incantations. Sometimes it has been thought a sufficient means of divine inspiration to yield the vital portions of birds and beasts of omen. It was believed that by eating the hearts of crows, or moles, or of hawks, men looked into their bodies the predicting soul of the creature (Frazer, Golden Bough, II, 355).

(2) The manticus practiced his art as a remunerative occupation, charging high fees and refusing in most cases to ply his calling without adequate remuneration.
The local oracle shrines (Delphi, Delaunay, Camerarius) etc, were worked for personal and political ends. The OT prophet, on the other hand, claimed to speak as he was willed by his God. It was with him a matter of conviction as to what living men ought to live, what state of heart they should cultivate. So far from furthering his own material interests, as he could by saying what kings and other dignitaries wished to hear, he boldly denounced the sins of the time, even when, as often, he had to commend the conduct of kings and the policies of governments. Look, for example, at Isaiah's fearless condemnation of the conduct of Ahaz in summoning the aid of Assyria (Isa 7:1), and at the scathing words with which Jeremiah censured the doings of the nation's leaders in his day (Jer 2:28). But both OT and NT, prophets suffered severely for their courage, esp.
Jero-miah, who stands out as perhaps the finest recorded example of what, in the face of formidable opposition, the religious teacher ought to be. Of Moriah, King
Ahab of Israel said, "I hate him; for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil." What reward did this prophet have for his fidelity to his conscience and his God?
(1) 2 K 22:1-35). Had he pleased the king by predicting a happy, prosperous future that was never to be, he would have been clothed in gorgeous robes and lodged in a very cal-ch 5 15-16 AV, but RV rightly substitutes "the watercourses of Reuben"; in Job 30 17 the same word is rendered "rivers"; (c) of the (late) organization of priests and Levites into classes or families who ministered in the temple in rotation. The regular courses generally, and always in RV (1 Ch 24 1; 36 12; Neh 11; cf Ch 35 5). Much provision is given by the Chronicler to the 24 classes of priests, singers, and doorkeepers, who served in turns in the temple (cf Lk 1 5-8).

(2) Separation, distinction: "I will put a division [RV
"strifes, tumults"] between my people and thy people" (Ex 8:23). The Heb word here is pedahth = "rancor," "reproach," "disputation" (cf Ps 119 9), but the reading is doubtful.
AV and RV follow LXX, Syr, and Vulg, which render "set a distinction," perhaps on the basis of a different reading from that of our Heb text.

(3) In the NT, dissension, discord, schism (Lk 12 51;
Rom 16 17; 1 Cor 3 3 AV, omitted in RV; 1 Cor 10 16; 11 18; Gal 5 20).

D. MIALL EDDARDS

DIVORCE, di-vörss, IN OT: Women, among the Hebrews, as among most nations of antiquity, occupied a subordinate position. From the very beginning the Heb wife and mother was treated with much more consideration than her sister woman, in other Sem countries, her position nevertheless was one of inferiority and subjection.

The marriage relation from the standpoint of Heb legislation was looked upon very largely as a business affair, a mere question of property. A wife, nevertheless, was, indeed, in most homes in Israel,
the husband's valuable personal property.
while this is true, the husband was unconditionally and unreservedly the head of the family in all domestic relations. His rights and prerogatives were manifest on every side. Nowhere is this more evident than in the double standard of morality in matters pertaining to the sexes is, at least, as old as Moses (see Ex 21 7-11).

The OT law concerning divorce, apparently quite clear, is recorded most fully in Dt 24 1-4. A wife was never to be prevailed on to condemn the husband. She was to be unreservedly, convince anyone that Divorce: there are difficulties of interpretation.
Dt 24:1-4 The careful reader will notice that the wordings of the AV and RV differ materially. AV reads in the second part of ver 1:
"then let him write a bill," etc, RV has "that he shall write," etc, while the Heb original has neither "then" nor "that," but the simple conjunction "and."
There is certainly no evidence of divorce in the world of Moses, but, on the other hand, a clear purpose to render the proceeding more difficult in the case of the husband. Moses' aim was "to regulate and thus to mitigate an evil which he could not extirpate." The text matter of divorce, as far as possible, to favor the wife, and to protect her life and her unceremonious expulsion from her home and children.

As already suggested, marriage among the Hebrews, as among most Orientals, was more a legal contract than that of love or marriage affection. It would be, however, a Legal great mistake to assume that deep love contract was not often present, for at all times the domestic relations of the Heb married couple have compared most favorably with those of any other people, ancient or modern.
In its last analysis it was, nevertheless, a business transaction. The husband or his family had, as a rule, to pay a certain dowry to the parents or guardians of the betrothed before the marriage was consummated. A wife thus acquired could easily be regarded as a piece of property, which, without great difficulty, could be disposed of in case the husband, for any reason, were disposed to rid himself of an uncongenial companion and willing to forfeit the mohar which he had paid for his wife. The advantage was always with the husband, and yet a wife was not utterly helpless, for she, too, though practically without legal rights, could make herself so unbearably burdensome and hateful to the husband that almost any husband would gladly avail himself of his prerogatives and write her a bill of divorce. Thus, though a wife could not divorce her husband, she could force him to divorce her.

The following words of Professor Israel Abrahams, Cambridge, England, before "the Divorce Com-
Divorce in OT

4. Divorce Applicable Only to Wives

The common term used in the Bible for divorce is נַעַרְב (ne'arab), which means "to send away a wife." The term is derived from נָעַר (navor), meaning "to abandon." The sending away of a wife is considered a serious act, and the husband is required to give her a bill of divorcement,

The Mosaic law, which was given to Israel at Mount Sinai, specified the conditions under which a man could divorce his wife. This law is contained in the book of Deuteronomy, chapter 24, verses 1-4. The law states that a man could divorce his wife if she was not pleasing to him, if she had been unfaithful to him, or if she had refused to come to him. The husband had to give her a bill of divorcement, which was a legal document that formally ended the marriage.

5. Process ceremomionally and capriciously dismisses his wife without the semblance of a trial. In case he became dissatisfied with his wife, (1) he had to write her a bill of divorcement (q.v.) drawn up by some consti-tuted legal authority and in due legal form. In the very nature of the case, such a tribunal would use moral suasion to induce an adjustment; and, failing in this, would see to it that the law in the case, as stated above, would be upheld. (2) Such a bill or decree must be placed in the hand of the divorced wife. (3) She must be forced to leave the premises of her former husband. Divorce was denied two classes of husbands: (1) The man who had falsely accused his wife of adultery (Dt 22:13ff), and (2) a person who had seduced a virgin (Dt 22:28ff). In addition, a heavy penalty had to be paid to the father of such damsel.

It is probable that a divorced woman who had not contracted a second marriage or had been guilty of adultery might be reunited to her husband. But in case she had married the second time she was forever barred from returning to her first husband, even if the second husband had divorced her or had died (Dt 24:3f). Such a law would serve as an obstacle to hasty divorces.

6. Grounds of Divorce were common among the Hebrews. All rabbis agree that a separation, though not desirable, was quite lawful. The only source of dispute among them was as to what constituted a valid reason or just cause.

The language in Dt 24:1ff has always been in dispute. The Heb words, נַעַרְב, נַעַרְבָּה, נַעַרְבּ, "erewoth dabbhār, on which a correct interpretation is doubtful.

meaning of pass over them quite flippantly. The Dv 24:1 phrase troubled the Jewish rabbis of olden times, as it does Jewish and Christian commentators and translators in our day. AV renders the words, "some uncleanness," and in the margin, "matter of nakedness." The latter, though a literal tr of the Heb, is quite unintelligible. RV and ARV both have: "some unseemly thing." Professor Driver translates the same words "some indecency." The Ger. RV (Kautzsch) has "etwas Widerwertiges" ("something repulsive"). We know of no modern version which makes "erewoth dabbhār the equivalent of fornication or adultery. And, indeed, in the very nature of the case, we are forced to make the words apply to a minor fault or crime, for, by the Mosaic law, the fornication for adultery was death (Dt 22:20ff). It is, however, possible that this was the case. The penalty was never enforced. It is well known that, and some time before, the time of our Saviour, there were two schools among the Jewish rabbis, that of Shammai and that of Hillel. Shammai and his followers maintained that "erewoth dabbhār signified nothing less than uncleanness or adultery, and argued that only this crime justified a man in divorcing his wife. Hillel and his followers maintained that "erewoth dabbhār signified nothing less than uncleanness or adultery, and argued that only this crime justified a man in divorcing his wife. They placed great stress upon the words, "if she find no favor in his eyes" immediately preceding "erewoth dabbhār (Dt 24:1), and contended that divorce should be granted for the flimsiest reason: as such as the finding of a dish of unclean food or careless seasoning. Some of the rabbis boldly taught that a man had a perfect right to dismiss his wife, if he found another woman whom he liked better, or who was more beautiful (Mish. Gittin, 14.10). Hence is some other text taken from the same book: "The following women may be divorced: She who violates the Law of Moses, e.g. causes her husband to eat food which has not been tithed. . . . She who vows, but does not keep her vow. . . . She who goes out in the street with her hair loose, or spins in the street, or converses [flirts] with any man, or is a noisy woman. What is a noisy woman? It is one who speaks in her own house so loud that the neighbors may hear her." It would be easy to extend this theory, and to find Mish and rabbinic writings are full of such laws.

From what has been said, it is clear that adultery was not the only valid reason for divorce. Besides, the word adultery had a peculiar significance in Jewish law, since it was recognized as one of the most serious crimes. The marriage, according to religious custom, was the equivalent of legitimate marriage. Thus a Hebrew might have two or more wives or concubines, and might have intercourse with a slave or bondwoman, even if he was married, without being guilty of adultery (Lev 18:9). For adultery, according to Jewish law, was possible only when a man dishonored the "free wife" of a Hebrew (20:10ff).

Divorce, Bill of: This expression, found in Dt 24:1-3; Is 50:1; Jer 3:8 is the tr of the Heb כְּדַבָּר (kedabbār), which is not a "divorce." The Heb term is rendered by the LXX βλαστον αφαίρεσιν, εκβίαν ἁπαθησιαν, Book of "divorcing," or equivalently, "divorce." The NT (Mc 10.4). Mt 5:31 has "writing of divorcement" in RV, but Mt 19:7 AV has "writing," while RV and ARV have "bill." The certificate of divorce is called מִלה, מִלְתָּן, מִלְתָּן, סִיבָן, in the Talm. There is an entire chapter devoted to the subjects in the Mish. It is not disposed of, and is not known when their marriage was dissolved. The force of the bills of divorcement commenced, but there are references to such documents in the earliest centuries of the Christian era. The fact that Joseph had in mind the putting away of his espoused wife, Mary, without the formality of a bill or at least of a proper procedure renders the above statement not regarded as absolutely necessary (Mt 1:19). The following was a common solution of the problem:

"On the . . . day of the week . . . in the month . . . in the year . . . from the beginning of the world, according to the common computation in the province of . . . I the son of . . . by whatever name I may be known, of the town of . . . with the entire consent of mind, and without any constraint, have divorced, dismissed and expelled thee . . . daughter of . . . by whatever name thou art called, of the town . . . who hast been my wife hitherto; But now I have dismissed thee . . . daughter of . . . by whatever name thou art called, of the town of . . . so as to be free at thy own disposal, to marry whomsoe'er thou pleasest, without hindrance from anyone, from this day on for ever and ever. Let this be thine bill of divorcement from me, a writing of separation and expulsion, according to the law of Moses and Israel. . . . the son of . . . witness . . . witness . . . witness . . . witness . . .

Spiritual application. The Heb phrases regarded the Jews not only as the father and king of the choose people, and thus entitled to perfect obedience and loyalty on their part, but they conceived of Him as a husband married to Israel. Isaiah, speaking to the thirsty Maker is thy husband; Jehovah of hosts is his name" (Is 5:5), doing the other extreme too makes use of similar language in the following: "Return, O backsliding children, saith Jehovah; for I am a husband unto you" (3:14). It is perflectly natural that NT writers should have regarded Christ's relation to His church under the same figure. Paul in 2 Cor says: "I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy: for I espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a pure virgin to Christ" (11 2); see also Mt 9 15; Jn 3 29; Rev 19 7. Any unfaithfulness or sin on the part of the Israel was regarded as spiritual adultery, which necessarily broke off the spiritual ties, and divorced the nation from God (Isa 1 21; Ezek 18 22; Rev 2 22). DIVORCE IN NT (τῇ ἀποστάσει, τῇ αποστασίᾳ): The Scripture doctrine of divorce is very simple. It is contained in Mt 19 3-12.

We are not called upon to treat of divorce in the Mosaic legislation (Dt 24 1-4.). That was passed upon by Jesus in the above discussion and by Him ruled out of existence in His system of religion. After Jesus had spoken as above, the Mosaic permission of divorce became a dead letter. There could not be practice under it among His disciples. So such OT divorce is now a mere matter of anti-quarian curiosity.

It may be of interest in passing to note that the drift of the Mosaic legislation was restrictive of a freedom of divorce that had been exercised before its enactment. It put in legal proceedings to bar the personal will of one of the parties. It recognised marriage as a social institution which could not be disrupted without reference to the rights of society. In this respect the law "the lad become our tutor to bring us unto Christ!" (Gal 3 24). But here, in numerous other instances, Christ went behind the enactments to primitive original principles whose recognition would make the law of none effect, because no practice was to be permitted under it. Thus the OT is disposed of.

Of course what Jesus said will dominate the New. In fact, Jesus is the only author in the NT who has treated of divorce. It has been thought that Paul had the subject in hand, but we shall find on examination, farther along, that he did not. We need then look nowhere but to this 19th ch of Mt for the Scripture doctrine of divorce.

True, we have other reports of what Jesus said (Mk 10 2-12. But in Mt 19 3-12. we have the fullest report, containing everything that is reported elsewhere and one or two important observations that the other writers have not included. Lk has but one verse where Mt has ten. Lk's verse is in no necessary connection with context. It seems to be a mere memorandum among others of the spiritual or ethical teachings of Christ. Luke however caught the gist of the whole teaching about divorce in recording the prohibition to put away one wife and marry another. The records in Mt 19 and Mk 10 cover one and the same occasion. But there is nothing in Mk that is not in Mt: and the latter contains nearly a third more of text than the former. There is nothing, however, in Mt that is not in Mk, save the clause "except for fornication." That exception will be dealt with along. We have no longer to be justified then in saying that the total doctrine of the Scripture pertaining to divorce is contained in Mt 19 3-12.

Attention must be called to the fact that, in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7; 27-32), Jesus treated of divorce, and that in every essential particular it agrees with the elaboration in ch 19. Jesus there as plainly as in the argument with the Pharisees put Moses' permission of divorce under the law. He plainly thereFeat removed the putting away of one partner to marry another person to be adultery. He may go on to argue that the exception to the absolute indissolubility in the text of the Sermon on the Mount.

We have then a summary of the NT doctrine of divorce stated by Christ Himself as follows: "Whoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, committed adultery" (Mt 19 9). This puts Him in line with the ideal of the monogamic, indissoluble family which pervades the whole of the OT.

It may be well here to treat of the exception which Christ made to the law of divorce and polygamy: marriage. It is very widely maintained in the Christian church that there should be no divorce for any cause whatever. This position is in plain contradiction to Christ's teaching in Mt 5 and 19. One of the grounds adduced for this denial of divorce in case a partner is guilty of adultery is that Lk and Mk do not record the exception. It is a difficult matter to invade the psychology of writers who lived nearly two thousand years ago and tell why they did not include something in text under which someone else did in his. Neither Luke nor Mark were personal disciples of the Lord. They wrote at second hand. Matthew was a personal disciple of Christ and has twice recorded the exception. It will be a new position in regard to judgment on human evidence when we put the silence of absentees in rank above the twice expressed report of one in all probability present—one known to be a close personal attendant.

This may be said: Matthew's record stands in ancient MS authority, Greek and also the Versions. And on this point let it be noted that the testimony of the MSS was up before the English and American revisers, and they have deliberately restrained the text of 1611 and given us the exception in Christ's rule in each place (Mt 5 32; 19 9). This makes the matter as nearly ἴδια ἀποδεικτικά as can be done by human wisdom.

Let us consider the rationality of the exception. That feature has had scant attention from theologians and publicists, yet it will bear the closest scrutiny. In fact it is a key to much that is explanatory of the basic principle of the family. To begin with, the exception is not on its face an act of thought of some transcriber, but was called out by the very terms of the question of the Pharisees: "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" This plainly called for a specification from Jesus of exceptions which he would allow in the rule against divorce. It is fortunate that the Pharisees asked the question in the form they did, for that put on Jesus the necessity of enumerating such exceptions as he would allow. He mentioned one, and but one: adultery. That puts the matter of exceptions under the rule in logic: Ex professo unus exclusio alterius. All other pretences for divorce were deliberately swept aside by Christ—a fact that should be remembered when other causes are sought to be foisted in alongside this one allowed by Christ. The question may come up, Whose insight is likely to be truest?

Why, then, will reason stand by this exception? Because adultery is per se destructive of monogamic family life. Christ, however, was guildless of the family has taken another person into family relation. Children may be born to that relation—are born to it. Not to allow divorce in such case is to force an innocent party in marriage to live in a polygamous state. There is the issue stated so plainly that "the wayfaring man need not err therein," and "he who runs may read," and "thee who reads may run.

It is the hand of an unerring Master that has made fornication a ground for divorce from the bond of matrimony and limited divorce to that single cause. Whichever view we take, the Saviour's direction we land in polygamy. The society that allows by its statutes divorce for any other cause than the one that breaks the monogamic bond, is simply acting in aid of polygamy, consecutively if not categorically.

above view as “the ecclesiastical.” That is an attempt to use the argument ad invidiam. The church of Christ held and holds its views, not because taught it, but because Christ taught it, and that in His teaching we have a statement out of the righteousness, wisdom, insight and rationality of the all-wise God.

Paul is the only other NT author besides Christ who has been supposed to treat of divorce. But a careful examination of Paul’s writing will disclose the fact that he has nowhere discussed the question—for what cause or causes a man might put away his wife. If Paul had held a similar view as has been suggested, he would have made the right of marriage to another person. If Paul has treated of divorce at all it is in 1 Cor. 7. But even a careless reading of that chapter will disclose the fact that Paul is not discussing the question for what causes marriage might be disrupted, but the question of manners and morals in the relation. Paul has not modified Christ in any respect. It has been supposed that in v. 15 Paul has allowed divorce to a believing partner who has been deserted by one of the parties to the marriage, but he has not so far as the records show, gone beyond the teaching that divorce is acceptable under certain conditions. Paul has allowed divorce in the case of desertion. But Paul has not said in that verse or anywhere else that a Christian partner deserted by a heathen mate might allow divorce. There are many instances where marriage was not dissolved but the relation was suspended and remarriage took place. In the case of desertion Paul would have held a different view than that which he has expressed in his writing.

Many reasons might be given why Paul could not have given liberty of remarriage, besides the one mentioned in his text; but attention should be called to the fact that such an assumption of authority in divorce would soon have brought him into conflict with the Roman government. Paul’s claim that he was a Rom. citizen was of some value to himself. Would not some Roman citizens have claimed to scrutinize pretty closely Paul’s right to issue a decree of divorce against him because he had “departed” from a wife who had become a Christian? There would be two sides to such divorces. Would not Paul, careful, shrewd, polite as he was, have known that, and have avoid an open rupture with a government that did not tolerate much interference with its laws? That neither Paul nor anyone living by such construction upon his language, is evidenced by the fact that there is no record in history of a single case where it was attempted for 400 years after Paul was in his grave, and the Roman Empire had for a century been Christian.

There were about 400 years more before we find the suggestion repeated. That no use was ever made of such construction of Paul in the whole era of the adjustment of Christianity with heathenism is good evidence that it was never there to begin with.

We shall pass Paul as having in no respect modified the doctrine of divorce laid down by Christ in Mt. 19.

In all civilized countries the machinery of legislation and law can always be open for removal or relief of troubles in marriage without proceeding to its annulment. If a father is cruel to his children, we do not abolish the parental right, but punish the wrongdoer. If a man deserts his children, we need not assist him to rear other children whom he can desert in turn, but we can punish him for his desertion. What can be done by law in case of parent and child and can be done in case of husband and wife. By putting in absolute divorce (frequently for guilty and innocent alike) we invite the very evils we seek to cure. We make it the interest of a dissatisfied party to create a conflict over marriage. We may regard as intolerable, and so he or she may go free.

Then by affording an easy way out of the troubles of married life we are inviting carelessness about entering marriage. We say by divorce statutes to a young woman: “If your husband deserts you, you may have another.” If he is cruel, you may have another. If he fails to support you, you may have another. If he is drunk, you may have another. If he is incompatible or makes you unhappy, you may have another— and yet others beyond these. When an easy road is thus made out of marriage, will there be proper caution about entering into marriage? By just as much as a crevice for relief of the miseries of married life is opened by divorce, there can be, by not opening it, a relief from miseries. The more solemnly society is impressed that the door of marriage does not swing outward as well as inward the more of happiness and blessing will it find in the institution. See Fam. 1, 2.

DI-ZAHAB, d’z-a-hab, diz’a-hab (27167, dt-zäh-hab; LXX ἱδράρχης, Katakhristos, lit. “abounding in gold”): The name occurs in a list apparently intended to fix definitely the situation of the camp of Israel in the plains of Moab (Dt 1 1). No place in the region has been found with a name suggesting this; and there is no other clue to its identifications. Some names in the list are like those of stations earlier in the wanderings. Thinking that one of these may be intended Burekhardt suggested Mina ezd-Dhahab, a boat harbor between Ras Mohammad and ‘Agaba. Cheyne gets over the difficulty by accepting a suggestion of Sayce that Di-zahab corresponds to Me-zahab (Gen 36 39); but this latter he believes to exist in Moab and identifies it with the North Arabian Muger (EB s.v.). The changes, however, seem greater than can be justified.

DOCTOR, dok’tér: In Lk 2 46 (σπάρκαλος, ἰδράρχης) “doctor” is equivalent to “teacher,” which latter is the tr of RV. So in Lk 5 17; Acts 5 34, AV and RV “doctors,” “doctor,” of the law (nomadidaskalos). See EDUCATION; RABBI; SCHOLAR.

DOCTRINE, dok’trın: Lat doctrina, from doceo, “to teach,” denotes both the act of teaching and that which is taught; now used exclusively in the latter sense.

(1) In the OT for (a) lehāb “what is received,” hence “the matter taught” (Dt 33 2; Job 11 4; Prov 4 2; Isa 29 24, ARV “instruction”); (b) eḥ_SUPPORTED=""min";" "";eḥ SUPPORTED=""māt";" "";eḥ ""māt, “what is heard” (Isa 29 5, RV “message,” RVa “report”); (c) nāṣar, “discipline” (Jer 10 8 m. “the stock is a doctrine [RV “instruction”] of vanities,” i.e. “The discipline of unreal gods is wood (like themselves, destitute of true moral force)” (DBB).

(2) In the NT for (i) ἰδράρχης, ἰδράρχης (a) “the act of teaching” (1 Tim 4 3, 16; 2 Tim 1 17; 2 Tim 2 1); all in RV “teaching”; (b) “what is taught” (Mt 15 9; 2 Tim 4 3). In some passages the meaning is ambiguous as between (a) and (b). (ii)
discip lé, always tr. "teaching" in RV, except in Rom 16:17, where "doctrine" is retained in the text and "teaching" inserted in m. = (a) the act of teaching (Mt 4:2; Acts 2:42, AV "doctrine"); (b) what is taught (Jn 7:10, 17; Rev 2:14,15,24, AV "doctrine"). In some places the meaning is ambiguous as between (a) and (b) and in Mt 7:28; Mk 1:22; Acts 13:12, the manner, rather than the act or matter of teaching is denoted, namely, with authority and power.

The meaning of these words in the NT varied as the church developed the content of its experience into a system of thought, and came to regard such a system as an integral part of saving faith (cf. the development of the meaning of the term "faith"): (1) The doctrines of the Pharisees were a fairly compact and definite body of teaching, a fixed tradition handed down from one generation of teachers to another (Mt 16:12, AV "doctrine", of Mt 16:9; Mt 7:7). (2) In contrast with the Pharisaic system, the teaching of Jesus was unconventional and occasional, discursive and unsystematic; it derived its power from His personality, character, and works, more than from His words, so that His contemporaries were as yet not convinced of its truth and recognized it as a new teaching (Mt 7:28; 22:33; Mk 1:22, 27; Lk 4:32). So we find it in the Synoptic Gospels, and the more systematic form given to it in the Johannine discourses is undoubtedly the work of the evangelist who wrote rather to interpret Christ than to record His "spissam viserba" (Jn 20:31).

The earliest teaching of the apostles consisted essentially of three propositions: (a) that Jesus was the Christ (Acts 3:16); (b) that He was Messiah (Acts 2:22, 24:32); and (c) that salvation was by faith in His name (Acts 2:23; 3:16). While proclaiming these truths, it was necessary to coordinate them with Heb faith, as based upon OT revelation. The method of the earliest reconstruction may be gathered from the speeches of Peter and Stephen (Acts 2:14-36; 5:29-32; 7:2-53). A more thorough reconstruction of the coordination of the Christian facts, not only with Heb history but with universal history, and within the view of the world as a whole, was undertaken by Paul. Both types of doctrine are found in his speeches in Acts, the former type in that delivered at Antioch (13:16-41), and the latter in the speeches delivered in Lystra (14:15-17) and at Athens (17:22-31). The ideas given in outline in these speeches are more fully developed into a doctrinal system, with its center removed from the resurrection to the death of Christ, in the epistles, esp. in Gal, Rom, Eph, Phil, and Col. But as yet it is the theological system of one teacher, and there is no sign of any attempt to impose it by authority on the church as a whole. As a matter of fact the Pauline system never was generally accepted by the church.

Of James and the Apostolic Fathers.

In the Pastoral and General Epistles a new state of things appears. The repeated emphasis on "sound" or "healthy doctrine" (1 Tim 4:6) implies that a body of teaching had now emerged which was generally accepted, and which should serve as a standard of orthodoxy. The faith has become a body of truth "once for all delivered unto the saints" (1 Tim 4:6). The meaning of this "sound doctrine" is nowhere formally given, but it is a probable inference that it corresponded very nearly to the Rom formula that became known as the Apostles' Creed. See Dogma. DOG (דּוֹג, keleb; [cf Arab. kelb, "dog"]; κύων, κύων; and dimin. κυνάπαν, κυνάριον): References to the dog, both in the NT and in the LXX, are usually of a contemptuous character. A dog, and esp. a dead dog, is used as a figure of insignificance. Go-lith says to David (1 S 17:43): "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" David says to Saul (1 S 24:14): "After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog, after a flea." Mephiboseth says to David (2 S 20:8): "Thou art thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?" The same figure is found in the words of Hazael to Elisha (2 K 8:13). The meaning, which is obscure in AV, is brought out well in RV: "But what is thy servant, who is but a dog, that he should do Pariah Dog at Belzat.
this great thing?" The characteristically oriental interrogative form of these expressions should be noted.

Other passages express by inference the low esteem in which dogs are held. Nothing worse could happen to a man than that his body should be devoured by dogs (I K 14:11; 16:4; 21:19,23, etc.). Job 30 1 says of the youth who deride him that he disdained to set their fathers with the dogs of his flock. In Phil 3 2 and Rev 22 15, dogs are condemned, as makers of havoc, sorcerers. In Mt 7 6 we read: "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before the swine."

Job 30 1 (cited above) refers to the use of dogs to guard flocks; and the comparison of inefficient watchmen with dumb dogs (Isa 56 10) implies that at least some dogs are useful. In the apocryphal Book of Tob, Tobiah’s dog is his companion on his travels (Tob 5 16; 11:4; on this see Expos T, XI, 255; HDB, IV, 989; Geiger, Civilization of E. Iranitas, I, 85 ff.).

There is further reference to the greyhound (Prov 30:17; also Ecclus 32:2). Thus four things are "stately in their going." But the rendering, greyhound," rests solely upon a single word in the LXX and Vulg, which have respectively alektos and gallos, i.e. "cock. A V "horse." The Heb has zavur mothayim, which is called gir in the Qdale, and the Gr ἐρετήριον "horse," "well girt [or, well kilt] in the loins." In support of the rendering, "girt," for gir, there is the word zirk, which, with zavur, is assigned to the obs root ziraz, and the Arab. aruz, "button," from zarr, "to button." Further, to render zavur by "cock" logically requires a change in the text, for mothayim, "they are," which is the present participle of mothah, "to be fair," "holy," "to have virtue." The LXX Vulg render mothah "holiness." The Pers greyhound would in that case be understood. A hairy race, which, according to the Royal Natural History, is less fleet than the Eng. breed, and is used in coursing gazelles and in hunting the wild ass, and which according to Doughty (Arabia Deserta) is kept by the Bedawin. "These dogs are said to be sometimes girded by their owning to prevent them from over-eating and becoming fat" (L. Fletcher, British Museum [Natural History]).

Domestic dogs have probably been derived from various species of wolves and jackals. In this connection, it is noteworthy that the dogs of certain regions greatly resemble the wolves of those regions. The pariah dogs of Syria and Pal resemble the jackals, and are found in the same habitat and in the same manner as the jackals. Each quarter of the city has its own pack of dogs, which vigorously resents any invasion of its territory. A dog which for any reason finds itself in foreign territory gets home as quickly as possible, and if it does not have to run the gauntlet of a pack of vicious foes. The pariah dog is sometimes brought up to be a sheep dog, but the best shepherd dogs are great wolfsknight creatures, which are usually obtained from Kurdistan.

Dogma.

Dogma, dogma (δόγμα, dógma, from σκέδοσ, dokhô, "that which seems," "an opinion," particularly the opinion of a philosopher): In 1. As Law the decedent period of Gr philosophy, and in common, the name given the master or head of a philosophical school came to be quoted as authoritative truth; also, the opinion of a sovereign imposed as law upon his subjects: a decree or ordinance of the civil authority. The word never appears in Ev, although it is used 5 t in the Gr NT, but with the one exception of Acts 16 4, in a sense widely different from that which ecclesiastical usage has given to it from the 2d cent. downward. "Dogma" is used in the NT, (1) of Rom laws: "a decree" [Gr dogma] from Caesarius Augustus (Lk 2 1); "the decrees of Caesar" (Acts 17 7) - the whole body of Rom law; (2) of ordinances of religious law: "the law of commandments contained in ordinances" (Eph 2 15); "the bond written in ordinances" (Col 2 14) = the Mosaic ordinances as expressing the moral law which condemned the sinner, and whose enmity Christ abolished by His death. It is a significant revelation of the spirit of Gr theology that all the Gr commentators understood by ordinances in these two places, the gospel as a body of dogmas which had removed the commandment or bond that was against us (see Lightfoot, Col. ad loc.); (3) of the decrees of the Council of Jerus (Acts 15 20), which Paul and his companions delivered to the gentile churches (Acts 16 4). Here we have one element that entered into the later ecclesiastical meaning of the word. These dogmas were decisions on religious matters, adopted by a more or less authoritative council of the church as a condition of admission to its membership.

There is however one important difference. These decrees relate to moral and ceremonial matters, but the AV and RV of dogma means esp. a theological doctrine.

2. Formulated Teaching

In Gr theology "doctrine" and "dogma" meant the same thing. Each had its origin in the opinion of some great teacher; each was given superlative and authoritative standing by its author, each meant an exposition of a particular truth of the gospel, and of the whole Christian truth, which the church adopted as the only right exposition. Each word might be used for the teaching of a distinctive dogma, or of a special dogma; but, for the latter, "heresy" became the regular term.

On the one side stood the doctrines or dogmas of the majority or the "Catholic" church, and on the other side, those of the heretics. So long as the "Catholic" ideal of orthodoxy and uniformity of belief held the field, there was no room for the distinction now made between "doctrine," as a scientific and systematic expression of the truth of the Christian religion, and "dogma," as those truths "authoritatively" ratified as essential of the church. This distinction could only arise when men began to think that various expressions of Christian truth could coexist in the church, and that the church was not infallible in its teaching, and that heresy became the regular term.

Literature.-Harnack, History of Dogma, 1, ch 1; Drummond, Studies in Christian Doctrine, 1-7.

DOK, Dôh (Δόχων, Dôh, Δαχύν, Dôghon): A small fortress, "little stronghold" (near Jericho, 1 K 15), built by Ptolemy, son of Abubus, where he entertained and murdered his father-in-law Simon Maccabaeus and his two sons. Jos (Ant, XIII, vii, 1; BJ, I, 5, 3) calls the place Dagon and places it above Jericho. The name passed to Dora Dug, with its copious springs of excellent water, about 4 miles N.W. of Jericho. Some ancient foundations in the neighborhood are possibly those of Ptolemy’s fortress, but more probably of a Templars’ station which is known to have stood there as late as the end of the 13th cent. For its importance in earlier Jewish history, see Smith, JGGH, 250, 251.

Doleful, dôfôfôl (יווה, oo, "howling"): The "doleful creatures" referred to in Isa 13 21 are probably "jackals," although some have suggested...
"leopard," or "hyaena." The older EV gives "great owls." The word rendered "doofel lamentation" in Mic 2:4 (nih'yah) is simply a form of the word ordinarily tr4 "wailing" (othā'). Cf AVm.

DOLPHIN, dol'fin. See BADGER.

DOMINION, dom-min'yon: In Eph 1:21; Col 1:16 the word so tr3 (κυριαρχία, kuriake) appears to denote a rank or order of angels. The same word is probably to be so interpreted in Jude ver 8 (AV and RV "dominion"), and in 2 Pet 2:10 (AV "government," RV "dominion"). See Angel.

DOOM, dom: Occurs only once in AV (2 Eed 7:48), "the day of doom shall be the end of this time" (RV "the day of judgement") but; RV gives it as the rendering of rî, הָעַט,

DOOR

DOORKEEPER, dôr'kèp-ér (ךְלַחַד, sî̂l'hād): The gates of an oriental city and of the temple courts so closely resembled the gates of a house that the same Hebrew word was used for doorkeeper and gatekeeper. It is often trd by the less definite word "porter" (q.v.).

In the preexilic writings (2 Sm 18:26; 2 K 7:10; 11) reference is made to porters at the gates of the cities Mahanaim and Samaria. In these early writings there is also mention of a small number of "keepers of the threshold" of the temple, whose duties included the gathering of money from the people for temple purposes, and the care of the sacred vessels (2 K 12:9; 23:4). They held an honorable position (2 K 25:18), and occupied chambers in the temple (Jer 36:4). The same term is used to describe officers in the household of the king of Persia (Est 2:21; 6:2).

Differing from these "keepers of the threshold" in some respects are the doorkeepers or porters mentioned in Ch, Ezr and Neh. These formed a numerous sacred order (1 Ch 9:22; 23:5) from the time of David. Their duties and the words describing them in two passages, "keepers of the thresholds" (1 Ch 9:19) and "porters of the thresholds" (2 Ch 23:4), connect them in some measure with the "keeper of the threshold" referred to above. They guarded the gates of the house of Jeh (1 Ch 9:23), closing and opening them at the proper times (ver 27) and preventing the unclean from entering the sacred inclosure (2 Ch 23:19); they had charge of the sacred vessels and of the free-will offerings (2 Ch 31:14), and dwelt in the chambers about the temple (1 Ch 9:27). They were Levites, and came in traditional order resulting therefrom (cf "Deemster" of Isle of Man and Jersey). Generally, but not always, an unfavorable judgment is implied. Cf Dryden, Coronation of Charles II, i, 127:

"Two kingdoms wait your doom, and, as you choose, This must receive a crown, or that be low."

DOORPOST

DOORPOST, dôr'pôt. See HOUSE.

DOPHKAH, dôf'ka (דֹּפְכָּה, dophkah, "drover"): A desert camp of the Israelites, the first after leaving the wilderness of Sin (Nu 33:12,13). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

DOR, dôr, DORA, dô'ra (נהר, nê'ar, dôr; habitation; circle; דֹּר, Dôr; Jos, דֹּרָה, Dôrah; mod. Tan'tarah): The modern Tan'tarah, capital of Palearctic archaeology, of the Canaanite or Samaritan structure, the custom of fastening to the doorposts small cases containing a parchment inscribed with the words of Dt 6:4-9; 11:13-21, is its origin in the command there given. See also GATE; HOUSE.

Figurative: (1) Christ is "the door into the gospel ministry" (Jn 10:12,7); ministers must receive their authority from Him, and exercise it in His spirit. (2) Through faith in Him also both shepherds and sheep enter into the kingdom of God (vs 9), and find all their spiritual needs supplied.

(3) The fig. in Rev 2:20 is expressive of Christ's patient, persistent and affectionate appeal to men. (4) Elsewhere also of opportunity (Mt 26:10; Acts 14:27; 1 Cor 16:9; 2 Cor 2:12; Rev 3:8). (5) Of freedom and power (Col 4:8). See also ACHOR; SHEPHERD, BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

DOORKEEPER, dôr'kèp-ér (ךְלַחַד, sî̂l'hād): The gates of an oriental city and of the temple courts so closely resembled the gates of a house that the same Hebrew word was used for doorkeeper and gatekeeper. It is often trd by the less definite word "porter" (q.v.).

In the preexilic writings (2 Sm 18:26; 2 K 7:10; 11) reference is made to porters at the gates of the cities Mahanaim and Samaria. In these early Phoen towns and it would seem that the Sidonians seized it to obtain its rich supplies of shell-fish, and this probably caused the war of retaliation waged by Tyre against the Sidonians. Sidon was besieged by arms, and the inhabitants were compelled to flee to Tyre. Dor seems to have been occupied by Solomon since he placed one of his purveyors in the town (1 K 4 11), and Tiglath-pileser III reduced it and set a governor over it (Rawl., Phoen., 84). Here Tryphon was besieged by Antiochus, but escaped to Apamea (1 Mac 16 11.13.25; Ant, XIII, vii, 2). It was made free by Pompey, and joined to the province of Syria (XIV, iv. 4). The youths of the place set up a statue of Tiberius in the Jewish synagogue, an outrage that was reported to Publius Petronius by Agrippa, and reparation was made (XIX, vi, 3). It does not seem to have been of much importance in later times, though the fortifications still remaining on the ruined site, from the period of the Middle Ages, show that it was then occupied. It is now only a miserable village nestled in the ruins.

DORCAS, dōr'kas (Αυρώπα, Dorbás, the Gr equivalent of Aram. tabitha, “a gazelle”): The name was borne by a Christian woman of Joppa. She is called a disciple (mathētria: Acts 9 36), the only place in the NT where the fem. form is used. She seems to have had some means and also to have been a leader in the Christian community. Dorcas was beloved for the manner in which she used her position and means, for she “was full of good works, and almsdeeds which she did.” Among her charitable works was the clothing of the poor with garments she herself made (ver 39), and by following her example, numerous “Dorcas societies” in the Christian church perpetuate her memory. There is a local memorial in the “Tabitha School” in Jaffa devoted to the care and education of poor girls.

Her restoration to life by Peter is recorded. At the time of her death Peter was in Lydda where he had healed Aeneas. Being sent for, he went to Joppa, and, by the exercise of the supernatural powers granted to him, “he presented her alive” to the mourning community. In consequence of this miracle “many believed on the Lord” (ver 42).

DORYMENES, dō-rim'e-nes (Αυρωπήτης, Do-rımēnēs): Father of Ptolemy Macron (1 Mac 3 38; 2 Mac 4 45); probably the same man who fought against Antiochus the Great (Polymb. v 61).

DOSITHEUS, dō-sith'e-us (Αυρωπηθευς, Dou-sthēōs): A captain of Judas Macabeaeus (2 Mac 12 19-25); along with Sospater he captured Timotheus after the battle of Carnion, but granted him his life and freedom on the representation that “he had in his power the parents of many of them and the brethren of some,” if, they who put him to death, should “be disregarded.”

(2) A soldier in the army of Judas Macabeaeus (2 Mac 12 35); he made a special attack upon Gorgias, governor of Idumea, the opposing general, and would have taken the “accursed man” prisoner but for the interference of a Thracian horseman.

(3) A Jew, son of Drimylos (3 Mac 1 3) who rescued Ptolemy Philopator from a plot of Theodotus. He afterward proved an apostate from Judaism.

(4) A Levite priest who “in the 4th year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra” carried the tr of the Book of Est to Alexandria (Ad Est 11 1).

DOΤΕ, dō'te: “To dote” means either “to be weak-minded” or “to be foolishly fond.” In the latter sense it is employed in Ezk 23 5 ff; in the former, in Jer 50 36 AV (RV “shall become fools”): AV Sir 25 2 (RV “lacking understanding”), and AV 1 Tim 6 4 (RvM “to be sick”); AVm “a fool”).

DOTHAIM, dō-thā-im: Mentioned in Jth 4 6 and frequently in connection with the invasion of Holofernes. See next art.

DOTHAN, dō-than (דֹּתוֹח, dōthayin, דותן, dōthān, “two wells,” “double feast”); Δότθαιμ, Dōthéim): A place to the N. of Shechem whither Jacob's sons went for pasture for the flocks; where Joseph who followed them was sold to the Ishmaelites, after having been imprisoned in a “pit” (Gen 37 17 ff).

Here in later days the eyes of Elisha's servant were opened to see the mountain “full of horses and chariots of fire,” guarding his master from the encircling Syrians (2 K 6 13 ff). This is certainly to be identified with Tell Dōthān, which lies on the E. of the ancient road leading from Gilead across Edomelon to the seacoast, and thence to Egypt. It is about 5 miles to the S.W. of Jotin. There are some traces of old buildings, two cisterns—Dōthayin or Dōthayim—“two cisterns” or “pits”—and one copious spring. Excellent pasture is found in the surrounding plain, and on the adjoining slopes.

DOUBLE, dub'le (דַּבָּעל, shānah, “to repeat,” as in counting; דובעל, kōkal, “to fold over,” or “double,” as a cloth): A word used quite frequently in the OT. Jacob ordered his sons to take double money in their hands, i.e. twice the necessary amount (Gen 43 12.15). If a thief be caught with a living animal he was to restore double (Ex 22 4); if property be stolen out of the house of one to whom it is intrusted he was to restore double (Ex 22 7.9). The firstborn was to receive a double portion of the inheritance (Lev 26 34). Likewise the beautiful symbol Elisha asked for a double portion of Elijah's spirit to fall upon him (2 K 2 9). Degrees of punishment or sufferings were also expressed by the idea of a doubling (lsa 61 7; Jer 16 18; 17 18; Zec 9 12). The use of the second, Heb form in Job 11 6 and 41 3 seems quite confusing in its tr. AV translates it simply “double,” but RV gives it its expanded and derived meaning, “manifold in understanding,” and “who shall come within his jaws,” respectively, “manifold” in the first instance meaning multiplied, and “jaws” doubtless meaning the double row of teeth. The classic phrases in the NT are those used by James to represent instability and a wavering disposition, διπλάσιον, diplosion, lit. “doubled-handed” (Jas 1 8; 4 8).

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

DOUBT, doubt: This word, found only a score of times in the Bible, translates nevertheless about half as many different Heb and Gr originals with a corresponding variety of meanings.

In Gen 37 33 “without doubt” is to be taken in the common sense of “certainly”; in Job 12 2 in the sarcastic sense of “indeed?” In Dnl 5 12.16, it is used as a difficult problem or mystery to be explained, and these are the only cases of its employment in the OT.

In the NT it is about equally used to translate ἡγοῦσα, διαπόρη, and ἄγον, δίακρινον, and these apparently haunts them in their absence. In the first-century "utterly at a loss," and in Mark 11:22, 23, James 4:11, 17; 5:13, 15, and 2 Corinthians 2:14, 15. The last-named is deserving of particular attention. "He that doubteth is condemned [AV 'damned'] if he eat," means that in a case of uncertainty as to one's Christian liberty, it was better to err on the side of restraint. In Lev 26:29, "to be a Double mind" (severitates, metéorité, lit. "to suspend"), vide Thayer, s.v., means "to be driven by gusts," or "to fluctuate in mid-air."

Here, as in Mt 14:31, "doubt" does not indicate a lack of faith, but rather "a state of qualified faith": its weakness, but not its absence. In Jn 10:24 "doubt" translates ἀσθίων, πυταχόν, ἀτρόχυ, psuchên, which lit. means "to lift up the soul," or "to keep one in suspense"; so RV. See also Disputation.

DOUGH, dô. See Bread.

DOVES, dôv, דּוֹו, חַר, γαφ, γονᾶ; πτηντα, περιστερί; Lat. Zenota, columba; the bird of the family columbidae. Doves and pigeons are so closely related as to be spoken and written of as synonymous, yet there is a distinction recognized from the beginning of time. It was esp. marked in Pal, because doves migrated, but pigeons remained in their chosen haunt all the year. Yet doves were the wild birds and were only confined singly or in pairs as caged pets, or in order to be available for sacrifice. Pigeons, without question, were the first domesticated birds, the record of their conquest by man extending if anything farther back than ducks, geese and swans. These two were the best known and the most loved of all the myriads of birds of Pal. Doves were given preference because they remained wild and were more elusive. The thing that is usually a little more attractive than the thing we have. Their loving natures had been noted, their sleek beautiful plumage, their plump bodies. They were the most precious of anything offered for sacrifice. Their use is always specified in preference to pigeons, the first mentioned in the sacrifice. And in describing the dove, the first is mentioned at greater length because they were the most loved by the people, and therefore chosen as most suitable to offer as sacrifice (Gen 15:9). In Lev 1:14 f., doves are mentioned as sacrifice: "And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and ytron food it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar." In Lev 5:7 the proper preparation of the sacrifice is prescribed. For method of handling sacrifice see vs 8-9.10. In Lev 14:4-8 the message for the sacrifice for a leper is given, and ver 8 of same ch provides that if she be too poor to offer a lamb, doves or pigeons will suffice. In Lev 14:4-8 the reference for the sacrifice of a leper is merely to "birds," because it is understood that they are pigeons and doves, and it contains the specification that if the victim is too poor to afford so elaborate a sacrifice, a smaller one will suffice. The birds are named in ver 22: "Two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and shall be offered to the Lord an olive oil-burner." (cf Lev 15:14; Nu 6:10). When David prayed for the destruction of the treacherous, he used the dove in comparison, and because he says he would "lodge in the wilderness" he indicates that he was thinking of the palm turtle.

"And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove! Then would I fly away, and be at rest." (Ps 55:6).

In chanting a song of triumph, David used an exquisite thought.

"When ye lie among the sheepfolds, It is as the wings of a dove covered with silver, And her pinions with yellow gold." (Ps 68:15).

He referred to the rock dove because the metallic luster on its neck would gleam like gold in sunshine, and the soft grayish-white feathers beneath the wings as he would see the bird above him in flight would appear silver-like. By this quotation David meant that the groans of a people languishing at home among their folds, their life was as rich with love and as free in peace as the silver wing of the dove that had the gold feathers and was un molested among the inaccessible caves and cliffs. In Ps 74:19 the term "turtle-dove" is used in a similar context, and the Almighty is implored to protect: "Oh deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the wild beast: forget not the life of thy poor for ever."

Solomon uses the dove repeatedly in comparison or as a term of endearment. In Cant 1 15; 4 1; 8 12, he compares the eyes of his bride full, tender, beautiful, with those of a dove. In 2 12 he uses the voice of the dove as an indication of spring. In 2 14 he addresses the bride as a rock dove. In 5 2 is another term of endearment, this time used in the dream of the bride (cf 9 9). Isa 38 14 has reference to the waiting, mournful dove note from which the commonest species take the name "mourning dove." The reference in Isa 60 8 proves that the prophet was not so good an observer, or so correct in his natural history as David, who may have learned from the open. As a boy, David guarded the flocks of his father and watched the creatures around him. When exulting over the glory of the church in the numerous accessions of Gentiles, Isaiah cried, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" This proves that he confounded pigeons and doves. Doves were wild, mostly migratory, and had no "windows." But the clay cotes of pigeons molded in squares so that one large cote sheltered many pairs in separate homes had the appearance of latticed windows and were used as a basis in estimating a man's wealth. This reference should be changed to read, "as pigeons to their windows." In Jer 8 7 the fact is pointed out that doves were migratory; and in 48 28 people are advised to go live in solitarie places and be peaceable, loving and faithful, like the rock doves. See also Ezek 17: "But those of them that escape shall escape, and shall be on the mountains like doves of the valley, all of them mourning, every one in his iniquity." This merely means that people should be driven to hide among the caves and valleys where the rock doves lived, and that the sound of their mourning would resemble the cry of the birds. It does not mean, however, that the doves were mourning, for when doves coo and moan and to our ears grow most pitiful in their cries, they are the happiest in the mating season. The veneration cherished for doves in these days is inborn, and no bird is so loved and protected as the dove—hence it is unusually secure and happy and its mournful cry is the product of our imagination only. The dove is the happiest of birds.

NT references will be found in a description of the baptism of Jesus (Mt 3 16). People are admonished to be "harmless as doves" (10 16). "And Jesus entered into the temple of God, and cast out all them that sold and bought in the temple, and overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold the doves" (Mt 21 12). This proves that these birds were a common article of commerce, probably the most used for caged pets, and those customarily employed for sacrifice.

Dove's Dung (כנף ידוקית, hârî yônîm, Ketibh for כנף ידוקית, dibbôynîm): 2 K 6 25: "And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a kab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." This seems so repulsive that some commentators have tried to prove the name applied to the edible root of a plant, but the history of sieges records other cases where matter quite as offensive was used to sustain life. The text is probably correct as it stands.

DOREY, dô'ri: In all Heb. marriages, the dowry held an important place. The dowry sealed the betrothal. It took several forms. The bridegroom presented gifts to the bride. There was the מֹהֶר, mohar, "dowry" as distinguished from קָנָה, mātān, "gifts to the members of the family" (cf Gen 24 22:53; Gen 34 12). The price paid to the father or brothers of the bride was probably a survival of the early custom of purchasing a wife (Gen 34 12; Ex 22 17; 1 S 18 25; cf Ruth 4 10; Hos 3 2). There was frequently much negotiation and bargaining as to size of dowry (Gen 34 12). The dowry would generally be accepted by the weight and standing of the bride (cf 1 S 18 23). It might consist of money, jewelry or other valuable effects; sometimes, of service rendered, as in the case of Jacob (Gen 29 18); deeds of valor might be accepted in place of dowry (Josh 15 16; 1 S 18 15; Jgs 1 11). Occasionally a bride received a dowry from her father; sometimes in the shape of land (Jgs 1 15), and of cities (1 K 9 16). In later Jewish history a written marriage contract definitely arranged for the nature and size of the dowry.

DOXOLOGY, dok-sol'a-jii (σάλογια, δοξολογία, "a praising," "giving glory"): A hymn or liturgical formula expressive of praise to God, as the Gloria in Excelsis (an expansion of Lk 2 14), sometimes called the Greater Doxology, and the Gloria Patri ("Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end, Amen") also known as the Lesser Doxology.

The clause, "as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was probably added to the original simple formula to emphasize the church's dissent from the Arian conception of Christ.

The term is applied in particular to the concluding paragraph of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 13 m., "For thine is the kingdom," etc; of 1 Ch 29 11, and see LORD'S PRAYER).

To the same general class belong Ps 41 13; 72 18 f.; 89 52; Rom 16 27; Eph 2 20; 1 Tim 1 17; Jude ver 25; Rev 5 13; 19 1-3, and the modern stanza beginning "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

DRACHMA, drak'ma, DRAM (δραχμή, drachmê): The word is used in the LXX as the rendering of "bekah," "half-shekel," which must refer to the light standard for the shekel, as its weight was about 62 grains. In the NT the word occurs only in Lk 15:8.9, where it is rendered "a piece of silver" (m "drahma"). It was commonly taken as equivalent to the Roman denarius, though not strictly so.

DRAGON, dragon (τάννης, tannīn, pl. τάννηδα, tannīdēa, τάννηδος, tannīdōs; ἀπκατέφον, drēkōn):

Tannīn and the pl. tannīndōs occur 14 t. and in EV are variously rendered "dragon," "whale," "serpent" or "sea-monster," the AV "sea-monster," AV "sea-tannin," RV "Jackals." Tannīn occurs 12 t. and is rendered "dragons," RV "Jackals," except in Ezk 29:3, where AV has "whale" and ErV and RV have "dragon." Tannīn occurs once, in Mal 1:3, where it is rendered "dragons," RV "Jackals.

Drēkōn occurs 12 t. in Rev 15, 17, 15, 30, where it is uniformly rendered "dragon." Ar.x. Arab. ṭanūḥ, the constellation Draco.) Tannūḥ (I.XX, bēnārāa bēnāmā, "dwellings") is a fem. pl. form as if from tannīn, but it suits the context to give it the same meaning as tannīn.

In Ex 9:10-13, tannīn is the name of the serpents which were produced from Aaron's rod and the rods of the Egyptian magicians, whereas in Ex 4:3 and 7:15, for the serpent's skin, in Hāb. 1:10, and nakūd, the ordinary word for serpent. In two passages we find "whale." RV "sea-monster": Gen 1:21: "And God created the great sea-monsters, and every living creature that moveth:"

Job 7:12: "Am I a sea, or a sea-monster, that I watch over the deeps?"

Other passages (ERV and AV) are Dt 32:33: "Their wine is the poison of dragons [AV, "serpents"], and the cruel venom of asps."

Jer 4:18: "I will give thee as a tannīn, and thou shalt dwell in the midst of the sea:"

Ps 48:10: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the serpent [AV, "dragon"] shalt thou trample under foot:"

Ps 100:3: "Let the sea give up the creatures thereof, and thou shalt trample upon the dragon [AV, "monsters"], and the sea-monster, that is the great dragon." The word, which appears in the prayers in Ps 148:7, 149:1, 150:6, is always rendered "dragon" or "sea-monster," and never "whale." In Ezekiel, the tannīn is mentioned in connection with the sea-monster, "sea-devil," "sea-whale," "sea-dragon," "sea-monster," "sea-creature," "sea-beast," "sea-serpent," and "sea-monster," and in the Book of Revelation, where it occurs in the plural, it is rendered "dragons," "sea-beasts," or "sea-monsters." In the NT, the word occurs in the plural only in Rev 12:9; 17:3, 8; 18:2; 20:2, and in the singular only in Rev 17:3; 20:2. In all these passages, "jackal," "seal," or "sea-monster" is rendered "sea-monster," "sea-beast," or "sea-slug." Tannīn is found in Lxx 4:13: "If the flood pass over thee, thou shalt be as the tannīn, and the sea will pass over thee." Tannīn means "a large sea-beast," "a sea-monster," "a sea-slug," or "a sea-slug." It is used in the sense of "a large sea-beast," "a sea-monster," "a sea-slug," or "a sea-slug." Tannīn is found in Lxx 4:3: "Even the jackals draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones." AV has "sea-monster," AVm "sea calves." A mammal is indicated, and RV is apparently an error for tannīn. Two other passages are in Ezk 32:2 and 32:2, where EV renders tannīnāy by "dragon," since in these two passages "jackal" obviously will not suit. See Jackal.

On the constellation of the dragons or snakes, see ASTRONOMY, II, 1-5.

DRAUGHT, draught (δραγχή, ἀπδραγχήν). Mt 15:17; Mk 7:19): "Closet," "sink" or "privy" (Rheims), lit. "place for sitting apart" (of 2 K 10:27, "draught-house," and Mish "water-house"). According to the Mish Jehu turned the temple of Baal in Samaria into public latrines, "water-houses." Mk adds here (7:19) that by this saying Jesus cleansed all articles of food, i.e., declared them to be clean.

DRAWER, drō'er, OF WATER (דָּר, drā, shō'ēb magan, from דָּר, shō'ēb, "to draw up" water): In Syria and Pal, outside of Mt. Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon, the use of water is scarce and the inhabitants of these less favored places have always depended upon wells and cisterns for their water supply. This necessitates some device for drawing the water. In the ease of a cistern or shallow well, an earthenware water jar or bucket made of tanned goats' skin is lowered into the water by a rope and then raised by pulling up the rope hand over hand (probably the ancient method), or by running the rope over a crude pulley fixed directly over the cistern wall. In the case of deep wells, the rope, attached to a larger bucket, is run over a pulley so that the water may be raised by the drawers walking away from the well as they pull the rope. Frequently animals are hitched to the rope to do the pulling.
In some districts where the water level is not too deep, a flight of steps leading down to the water's edge is constructed in addition to the opening vertically above the water. Such a well is pointed out near Haman in Mesopotamia as the one from which Rebekah drew water for Abraham's servant. In Gen 24:16 we read that Rebekah "went down to the fountain, and filled her pitcher, and came up."

The deep grooves in their curbs, worn by the ropes as the water was being raised, attest to the antiquity of many of the wells of Pal and Syria. Any one of the hundreds of grooves around a single well was many years in being formed. The fact that the present method of drawing water from these wells is not making these grooves, shows that they are the work of former times.

The drawing of water was considered the work of women or of men with a service (Gen 24:11.13.43; 1 S 9:11; Jn 4:7). In Syria, today, a girl servant willingly goes to draw the daily supply of water, but seldom is it possible to persuade a boy or man to perform this service. When the well or fountain is at a distance, or much water is needed, tanned skins or earthen jars are filled and transported on the backs of men or donkeys.

Water drawing was usually done at evening time (Gen 24:11), and this custom has remained unchanged. There is no sight more interesting than the daily concourse at a Syrian water source. It is bound to remind one of the Bible stories where the setting is a wellsides (Gen 24; Jn 4).

The service of water drawing was associated, in early times, with that of the herder of wood (Dt 29:11). Joshua made the Gibeonites hewers of wood and drawers of water in exchange for their lives (Josh 9:21.23.27). The inhabitants of Nineveh were exhorted to draw water and fill the cisterns of their fortresses in preparation for a siege (Nah 3:14).

Figurative: Water drawing is mentioned in the metaphor of Is 12:3, "Ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." —James A. Patch DREAM, drēm, DREAMER, drē'mér (בֹּלֶם, הָbol̄em, בַּטְלָה, balâm, בַּטְלָה, bêtēlah; דָּעַף, ḏō'aph, ḏō'ār): In all time dreams and their interpretation have been the occasion of much curious and speculative inquiry. Because of the mystery by which they have been enshrouded, and growing out of a natural curiosity to know the future, much significance has been attached to them by people esp. of the lower stages of culture. Even the cultured are not without a superstitious awe and dread of dreams, attaching to them different interpretations according to local color and custom.

Naturally enough, as with all other normal and natural phenomena for which men could assign no scientific and rational explanation, they would be looked upon with a certain degree of superstitious fear.

"Dreams, which are the children of an idle brain, Begot of nothing but vast fantasy, Which is as thin as substance in the air And more inconstant than the wind." —Shakespeare.

While a fully satisfactory theory of dreams has not yet been established and while it is hardly possible that there can ever be a satisfactory explanation for each individual dream, yet through the rapid discoveries of physiological psychology in the recent decade or more, much new light is thrown on the subject.

With the contribution of ideas, knowledge of the association of ideas through the connected relation of certain cortical centers and areas, it has come to be pretty well established that the excitation of certain bodily organs or surfaces will stimulate the brain area and only the stimulation of certain cortical areas will produce a response in certain bodily regions over which these centers or areas preside. Connecting thought processes are therefore dependent upon the proper correlation of ideas through what are known physiologically as the association centers. If it then comes to pass that, as occurs in dreams, only fragmentary ideas or loosely connected trains of thought occur, and if, as frequently happens, there is momentary connection, but the tie connection with normal waking experience, it will easily be seen that the excitation of certain centers will awaken certain trains of thought which are but poorly related to the balance of one's thinking processes. Much is being said about the dissociation of ideas and the disturbance of personality of which dreams are one of several forms. Others are hallucinations, trances, visions, etc. Dreams are abnormal and sometimes pathological. Sleep is a normal experience. Perfect and natural sleep should be without dreams of any conscious occurrence. Perhaps psychologically there can be no such thing as perfectly dreamless sleep. Such a condition would probably be death itself. Nature double, or even, or she has her silent vigil, keeping watch in the chambers of the soul during the deepest sleep. The only difference is that they do not come to the threshold of consciousness. Thus, dreams are to the sleeping state what visions and hallucinations are to the waking state, and like them may be due to a distorted image-making function. While the source of the materials and the excitant may not be the same in each case, yet functionally they are the same.

The stimuli of dreams may be of two kinds. First, they may be physical and objective, or they may be due to suggestions and the association of ideas. They may be due to some physical disorder, such as imperfect digestion or circulation, improper ventilation or heating, or an uncomfortable position. Hence by the very nature of the cause dreams do not occur in a conscious state, the real cause cannot easily be discoverable and then only after the subject is entirely awakened through the effects of it. They may also be due to the association of ideas. Suggestion plays a large part. The vividness and recency of a conscious impression during the waking state may be thrown up from the subconscious region during the sleeping hours. The usual distorted aspect of dreams is doubtless due to the uncoupling of groups of ideas through the uncoupling of the cortical association areas, so that they are less susceptible than others to the existing stimulus.

The materials of dreams need not be recent; they may have been furnished by the conscious processes a long time before, but are brought to the threshold only by means of some train of ideas during a semi-conscious state. It is interesting to note that while time and space seem quite real in dreams, the amount covered in a single dream may occupy but a moment of time for the dreamer.

Dreams have always played an important part in the lit. and religion of all peoples. They have supplied the sources of systems of necro-mancy; they have become the working material of the prophet both Bib. and pagan. Mediaeval civilization is not without its lasting effects of dreams, and modern civilization still clings with something of reverence to the unsolved mystery of certain dreams. While we have almost emerged from anything like a slavish adherence to a superstitious belief in dreams, we must still admit the possibility of the profound significance of dreams in the impressions they make upon the subject.

The Bible, contrary to a notion perhaps too commonly held, attaches relatively little religious significance to dreams. Occasionally, however, reference is made to communications from God through dreams (Gen 20 6; 1 K 3 5; Mt 1 20; 2 12.13.19.22). It recognizes their human relations more frequently. In the lit. dreams play but little part except in the books of Gen and Dan, in which there are abundant records of dreams. For their moral bearings the most important ones perhaps are those referred to in Gen 37 5–10. An uncritical attitude will give to them a lifeless and mechanical interpretation. A sympathetic and rational one gives them beauty, naturalness and significance. Joseph was the youngest and most beloved son of Jacob. He was just in the prime of adolescence, the very period of daydreaming. He was perhaps inordinately ambitious. This was doubtless heightened by the attentions of a doting father. The most natural dream would be that suggested by his usual waking state, which was one of ambition and perhaps unhealthy rivalry (see Astronomy, II. 6). The source of Pharaoh's dream (Gen 41 5–13) is not stated, but it is reasonable to suppose that he interpreted it as a communication from God. The significance of it was given by Joseph.

Another illustration of the psychological explanation of dreams is the dream of Solomon (1 K 3 5. 11–15). In this narrative, after Solomon had done what pleased Jeh and had offered a most humble prayer on an occasion which to him was a great crisis and at the same time a moment of great ecstasy in his life, he doubtless experiences a feeling of sweet peace in consequence of it. His sleep would naturally be somewhat disturbed by the excitement of the day. The dream was suggested by the associations and naturally enough was the approving voice of Jeh.

Dreaming and the prophetic function seem to have been closely associated (Dt 13 1.3.5). Whether from a coldly mechanical and superstitious, a miraculous, or a perfectly natural point of view, this relation is consistent. The prophet must be seen, a man of visions and ideals. As such he would be subject, as in his waking states, to extraordinary experiences. The remarkable dreams of Nebuchadnezzar, who stands out as an exceptional example, afford an illustration of what may be styled a God given personal prophecy (Dnl 2 3–46; 4 5–19). The effort made by the magicians, the enchanters, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers, according to the best skill of the Orientals, was unavailing. Daniel, whether by extraordinary intellectual insight or by Divine communication, was able by his interpretation and its moral to set before the king a powerful lesson.

The NT gives still less place and importance to dreams than the OT. There are only six references and one citation to dreams or dreamers. It is significant that all these references are by Mt, and still more significant that Jesus nowhere refers to dreams, evidently attaching little if any importance to them. The references in Mt are confined entirely to warnings and announcements (Mt 1 20; 2 12. 13.19.22; 27 19). Once in citation (Acts 2 29), as used for illustrative purposes (cf Joel 2 28). See also AUGURY, IV, 5; DIVINATION, VI, 1, (b); MAGIC; REVELATION.

Whether God communicates directly or indirectly by dreams is still unsettled. With our present knowledge of spirit communication it would not seem unreasonable to assume that He may reveal Himself directly; and yet on the other hand the safest and perhaps surest explanation for our own day and experience is that in dreams the mind is more impressionable and responsive to natural causes through which God speaks and operates. That dreams have been and are valuable means of shaping men's thoughts and careers cannot be denied, and an explanation of dreams both in the social and moral life of individuals and of society. A valuable modern illustration of this is the dream of Adoniram Judson Gordon (see How Christ Came to Church), through the influence of which his entire religious life and that of his church were completely transformed.

WALTER G. CLIFFINGER

DREDGE, drøj: A mixture of oats and barley (Job 24 6 AVm; AV "corn"; RV "proverb").

The Heb word is וּבַּלָע b'lu', usually "mixed grain," ESDMG, XLVIII, 236: "grain not ground and boiled in water. Cf Job 6 5; Isa 30 24.

DREGS, drëgs: The "sediments," "lees," "grounds of liquor"; only in pl. In AV it stands for (1) Heb שׁם'רָדָה sh'm'radah, "bowl," "chalice," found only in Isa 61 17.22: "the dregs of the cup of trembling;" (2) the dregs of the cup of my fury. RV correctly changes "dregs" into "bowl." (2) Heb שׁמָדָר sh'madar, "sediments" or "dregs," esp. less of wine. "The dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall drink" (JARV "the dregs of the cup, and drink them") (Ps 75 8), i.e. God gives to the wicked the cup of wrathful judgment, which they must drink to the last drop.

DRESS: In the Heb and Gr there is a wonderful wealth of terminology having to do with the general subject of dress among the ancient Orientals. This is reflected in the numerous synonyms for "dress" to be found in RV, "apparel," "array," "clothes," "garments," etc. But the words used in the original are often greatly obscured through the inconsistent variations of the translators. Besides there are few indications even in the original Heb or Gr of the exact shape or specific materials of the various articles of dress named, and so their identification is made doubly difficult. In dealing with the subject, therefore, the most reliable sources of information, apart from the meaning of the terms used in characterization, are certain well-known facts about the costumes and dress-customs of the orthodox Jews, and others about the forms of dress worn today by the people of simple life and primitive habits in modern Pal. Thanks to the ultra-conservatism and unchanging usages of the nearer East, this is no mean help. In the endeavor to discover, distinguish and deal with the various oriental garments, then, we will consider: 1. The Meaning of Terms; 2. The Materials; 3. The Outer Garments; 4. The Inner Garments; 5. The Headdress; 6. The Foot-gear; 7. The Dress of Jesus and His Disciples.

There was originally a sharp distinction between classical and oriental costume, but this was palpably lessened under the cosmopolitanism of the Rom Empire. This of course had its effect both in the modification of the fashions of the day and upon the words used for articles of clothing in the NT. (1) The terms most used for clothes in general were, in the OT, šadhin, simlah, salmād, and in the NT himation (Mt 21 7; 24 18; 26 65; Lk 8 27) and enduma (Mt 22 11; cf 7 15), pl., though the oldest and most widely distributed article of human apparel was probably the “loin-cloth” (Heb ᵃṙᵒʳ), entirely different from “girdle” (Gr zōē). Bib. references for clothes are nearly all to the costume of the males, owing doubtless to the fact that the garments ordinarily used indoors were worn alike by men and women. (2) The three normal body garments, the ones most mentioned in the Scriptures, are šadhin, a rather long “under-garment” provided with sleeves; šethaneth (Gr χήθανθη), a long-sleeved tunic worn over the šadhin, likewise a shirt with sleeves (see Masterman, DCG, art. “Dress”); and simlah (Gr himation), the cloak of AV and RV, used in the pl. for “garments” in general; and the “girdle” (Gr zōē; Arab зunnar). The “headdress” (two types are now in use, the “turban” and the “kuşhēk”) is never definitely named in the Bible, though we know it was the universal custom among ancient Orientals to cover the head. (3) The simlah (Gr himation) signifies an “outer garments” (see below), a “mantle,” or “coat” (see lexicons). A kindred word in the Gr himationes, (ttr “raiment” in Lk 9 29, “garments” in Mt 27 35, and “vesture” in Jn 19 24) stands in antithesis to himation. The Gr chiton, Heb χίτθανθη, the “under-garment,” is tr “coat” in Mt 5 40, “clothes” in Mk 14 63. The Heb word ᶳʾם, Gr stôδ, Lat stola, stands for a variety of garment used only by men of rank or of the priestly order, rendered RV “robe.” It stands for the long garments of the scribes rendered “long robes” (Mk 12 38; Lk 20 40) and “best robe” in the story of the Prodigal Son (Lk 15 22). (For difference between ᶢʾם and simlah, see Kennedy, one-vol HDB, 107.) Oriental influences led to the adoption of the long tunic in Rome, and in Cicero’s time it was a mark of effeminacy. It came to be known in its white form as tunica alba, or “white tunic,” afterward in English “alb.” Other NT terms are πορφυρα, porphyrān, the “purple” (Lk 16 19); the purple robe of Jesus is called himation in Jn 19 2; leōntion, “the towel” with which Jesus girded himself (13 4 5); then ὀθιδνίων, “linen cloth” (Lk 24 13; Jn 19 40); simlah, “linen cloth” (Mt 27 59); and βύσσος, “fine linen” (Lk 16 19).

The primitive “aprons” of Gen 3 7, made of “sewed fig-leaves,” were quite different from the “aprons” brought to the apostles in Acts 19 12. The latter were of a species known among the Romans as semicinctium, a short “waist-cloth” worn esp. by slaves (Rich, Dict. of Rom and Gr Antiq.). Anthropology, Scripture and archaeology all witness to the use by primitive man of skins of animals as dress material (Gen 3 21, “coats of skin”; cf He 11 37, “went about Materials in sheepskins, in goatskins”).

Even today the traveler will occasionally see in Pal a shepherd clad in “a coat of skin.” Then, as now, goat’s hair and camel’s hair supplied the materials for the coarser fabrics of the poor. John the Baptist had his ruimt, enduma, of camel’s hair (lit. “of camel’s hairs,” Mt 3 4). This was a coarse cloth made by weaving camel’s hairs. There is no evidence that coats of camel’s skin, like those made of goat’s skin or sheep’s skin have ever been worn in the East, as imagined by painters (see Meyer, Bleek, Weiss and Broadus; but cf HDB, art. “Camel”). The favorite materials, however, in Pal, as throughout the Orient, in ancient times, were wool (see Prov 27 26, “the lambs are for thy clothing”) and flax (see Prov 31

Dress

13, where it is said of the ideal woman of King Lemuel, "She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands"). The finest quality of ancient "linen" seems to have been the product of Egypt (see Linen). The "silk" of Prov 31 22 AV is really "fine linen," as in RV. The first certain mention of "silk" in the Bible, it is now conceded, is in Rev 18 12, as the word rendered "silk" in Ezek 16 10.13 is of doubtful meaning.

(1) We may well begin here with the familiar saying of Jesus for a basal distinction: "If any man would go to law with thee, and take away thy coat (Gr. chitouna), let him have thy cloak (himation) also" (Mt 5 40).

Garments Here the "coat" (Heb k'dhônath) was the ordinary "inner garment" worn by the Jew of the day, in which he did the work of the day (see Mt 24 18; Mk 13 16). It resembled the Roman "tunic," corresponding most nearly to our "long shirt," reaching below the knees always, and, in case it was designed for dress occasions, reaching almost to the ground. Sometimes "two coats" were worn (Lk 3 11; cf Mt 10 10; Mk 6 9), but in general only one. It was this garment of Jesus that is said by John (19 23) to have been "without seam, woven from the top throughout."

(2) The word himation, here rendered "cloak," denotes the well-known "outer garment" of the Jews (see Mt 9 20.21; 14 36; 21 7-8; but cf also 9 16; 17 2; 24 18; 26 65; 27 31.35). It appears in some cases to have been a loose robe, but in most others, certainly, it was a large square piece of cloth, like a modern shawl, which could be wrapped around the person, with more or less taste and comfort. Now these two, with the "girdle" (a necessary and almost universal article of oriental dress), were commonly all the garments worn by the ordinary man of the Orient. The "outer garment" was frequently used by the poor and by the traveler as his only covering at night, just as shawls are used among us now.

(3) The common Heb name for this "outer garment" in the OT is as above, simlah or salmah. In most cases it was of "wool," though sometimes of "linen," and was as a rule certainly the counterpart of the himation of the Gr (this is its name throughout the NT). It answered, too, to the pallium of the Romans. It belonged, like them, not to the endamata, or garments "put on," but to the peribénta, or garments "wrapped around" the body. It was concerning this "cloak" that the Law of Moses provided that, if it were taken in pawn, it should be returned before sunset—"for that is his only covering, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? . . . for I am gracious" (Ex 22 27). The Jewish tribunals would naturally, therefore, allow the "inner garment" to be taken by legal process, rather than the outer one (Mt 5 40; Lk 6 20); but Jesus virtually teaches that rather than have difficulty or indulge animosity one would better yield one’s rights in this, as in other matters; of 1 Cor 6 7.

Some identify the simlah of the ancient Hebrews with modern aba, the coarse blanket or overcoat worn today by the Syrian peasant (Nowack, Benzinger, Mackie in HDB); but the distinction between these two garments of the Jews, so clearly made in the NT, seems not to confirm the conclusion otherwise reached, that this Jewish "outer garment" closely resembled, if it was not identical with, the himation of the Greeks (see Jew Enc, art. "Cloke" and 1-vol HDB, "Dress," 197; but of Masterman, DCG, art. "Dress," 499, and Dearmer, DCG, art. "Cloke"). In no respect has the variety of renderings in our EV done more to conceal from Eng. readers the meaning of the original than in the case of this word simlah. For instance it is the "garment" with which Noah’s nakedness was covered (Gen 9 23); the "clothes" in which the Hebrews bound up their kneading-troughs (Ex 12 34); the "garment" of Gideon in Jgs 8 25; the "raiment" of Ruth 3 3; just as the himation of the NT is the "cloak" of Mt 5 40, the "clothes" of Mt 24 18 AV (RV "cloak"), the "garment" (Mk 13 16 AV, RV "cloak").

(1) In considering the under garments, contrary to the impression made by EV, we must begin with the "loin-cloth" (Heb tsofót), which

4. The unlike the "girdle" (see Girdle), was Under always worn next to the skin. The Garments figurative use made of it in Is 11 5, and Jer 13 11, e.g. will be lost unless this is remembered. Often it was the only "undergarment," as with certain of the prophets (Elijah, 2 K 1 8; cf John the Baptist, Mt 3 4; Isaiah, 20 2, and Jeremiah, 13 1 ff). In later times it was displaced among the Hebrews by the "shirt" or

!Image of a woman's headdress and veil.
“tunic” (see Tunic). The universal “sign of mourning” was the girding of the waist with an ‘ezor or “hair-cloth” (EV “sack-cloth”). A “linen” of “linen” was worn by the priests of early times and bore the special name of Ephodh (1 S 21: 26; cf 2 S 6 14 ff.)

(2) The ordinary “under garment,” later worn by all classes—certain special occasions and individuals being exceptions—was the “shirt” (Heb kethônah) which, as we have seen, reappears as chiton in Gr and tunica in Lat. It is uniformly rendered “coat” in EV, except that RVm has “tunic” in Jn 19 23. The well-known piece of Assyrian sculpture, representing the siege and capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, shows the Jewish captives, male and female, dressed in a moderately tight garment, fitting close to the neck (cf Job 30 18) and reaching almost to the ankles; which must represent the kethônah, or kuttôneth of the period, as worn in towns at least. Probably the kuttôneth of the peasantry was both looser and shorter, resembling more the modern kamis of the Syrian jelah (cf Lat camisia, and Eng. “chemise”).

(3) As regards sleeves, they are not expressly mentioned in the OT, but the Lachish tunics mentioned above have short sleeves, reaching half-way to the elbows. This probably represents the prevailing type of sleeve among the Hebrews of the earlier period. An early Egypt picture of a group of Sem traders (c 2000 BC) shows a colored tunic without sleeves, which fastened on the left shoulder, left the right bare. Another variety of sleeves, restricted to the upper and wealthy classes, had long and wide sleeves reaching to the ground. This was the tunic worn by Tamar, the royal princess (2 S 13 18, “A garment of divers colors upon her; for with such robes were the king’s daughters that were virgins apparelled”), “the tunic of [i.e. reaching to] palms and soles” worn by Joseph, familiarly known as the “coat of many colors” (Gen 37 3), a rendering which represents now an abandoned tradition (cf Kennedy, HDB). The long white linen tunic, which was the chief garment of the ordinary Jewish priest of the later period, had sleeves, which, for special reasons, were tied to the arms (cf Jos, Ant. Ill, vii, 2).

(4) Ultimately it became usual, even with the people of the lower ranks, to wear an under “tunic,” or “real shirt” (Jos, Ant. XVII, vii, 7; Mish, passim, where it is called halvit). In this case the upper tunic, the kithon, was properly worn removed at night (cf Cant 5 3, “I have put off my garment”).

The material for the tunic might be either (1) woven on the loom in two pieces, and afterward put together without cutting (cf Dict. of Rom and Gr Antiq., art. “Tunica”), or (2) the garment might be woven whole on a special loom, “without seam,” i.e. so as to require no sewing, as we know from the description given in Jn 19 23, and from other sources, was the chiton worn by Our Lord just before His crucifixion. The garments intended by the Heb (Dnl 3 21–27), rendered “coats” AV, have not been certainly made out. The AVm has “mantles,” the ERV “hosen,” ARV “breeches” (see Hosue). For “coat of mail” (1 S 17 5) see Amnon.

When the Hebrews first emerged into view, they seem to have had no covering for the head except on special demand, as in case of war, 5. The when a leather-helmet was worn (see Headress Ahrmos). Ordinarily, as with the fellah of Pal today, a rope or cord served as a fillet (cf 1 K 20 32, and Virgil, Aeneid [Dryden], vi.213: “A golden fillet binds his awful brows!”). Such “fillets” may be seen surviving in the representation of Syrians on the monuments of Egypt. Naturally, in the course of time, exposure to the Syrian sun in the tropical summer time would compel recourse to some such covering as the modern kufiyeh, which lets in the breeze, but protects in a graceful, easy way, the head, the neck and the shoulders. The head-gear of Ben-hadad’s tribute-carriers (see above) resembles the Phrygian cap.

Modern Druze Headress.

The head covering, however, which is best attested, at least for the upper ranks of both sexes, is the turban (Heb qamîph, from a root meaning “wind round”). It is the ladies’ “hood” of Isa 3 23, RV “turban,” the “royal diadem” of Isa 62 3, and the “mitre” of Zec 3 5, RVm “turban” or “diadem.” Ezekiel’s description of a lady’s head-dress: “I bound thee with attire of fine linen” (Ezk 16 10 m), points to a turban. For the egg-shaped turban of the priests see Bonnet (RV “head-tires”). The hats of Dnl 3 21 (RV “mantles”) are thought by some to have been the conical Bab headdress seen on the monuments. According to 2 Macc 4 12 RV the young Jewish nobles were compelled by Antiochus Epiphanes to wear the pátasso, the low, broad-brimmed hat associated with Hermes. Other forms of headdres are in use in NT times, as we learn from the Mish, as well as from the NT, e.g. the sudár (sudárion) from Lat sudárion (a cloth for wiping off perspiration, sudór) which is probably the “napkin” of Jn 11 44; 20 7, although there it appears as a kerchief, or covering, for the head. The female captives from Lachish (see above) wear over their tunics an upper garment, which covers the forehead and falls down over the shoulders to the ankles. Whether this is the garment intended by the Heb in Ruth 3 15, rendered “vail” by AV and “mantle” by RV, and “kerchiefs for the head” (Ezk 13 18 RV), we cannot say. The “veil” with which Rebekah and Tamar “covered themselves” (Gen 24 65; 35 15) was most likely a large "mantle" in which the whole body could be wrapped, like the ṣāḏān (see above). But it is impossible to draw a clear distinction between "mantle" and "veil" in the OT (Kennedy). The case of Moses (Ex 34 33) gives us the only explicit mention of a "face-veil." The ancient Hebrews, like Orientals in general, went barefoot within doors. Out of doors they usually wore sandals, less frequently latched of Mk 1 7, etc. In the obelisk of Shalmanezer, however, Jehu's attendants are distinguished by shoes completely covering the feet, from the Assyrians, who are represented as wearing sandals fitted with a heel-cap. Ladies of Ezekiel's day wore shoes of "sealskin" (Ezk 16 10 RV). The solders' "laced boot" may be intended in Isa 9 5 (RVms). Then, as now, on entering the house of a friend, or a sacred precinct (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15), or in case of mourning (2 S 15 30), the sandals, or shoes, were removed. The priests performed their offices in the Temple in bare feet (cf the modern requirement on entering a mosque).

In general we may say that the clothes worn by Christ and His disciples were of the simplest and least sumptuous kinds. A special interest must attach even to the clothes that Jesus wore. These consisted, it seems quite certain, not of just five separate articles (see Edersheim, or NT, but of six. In His day it had become customary to wear a linen shirt (ḥālāt) beneath the tunic (see above). That Our Lord wore such a "shirt" seems clear from the mention of the laying aside of the upper garments (himṣāta, pl.), i.e. the "mantle" and the "tunic," before washing His disciples' feet (Jn 13 4). The tunic proper worn by Him, as we have seen, was "woven without seam" throughout, and was of the kind, therefore, that fitted closely about the neck, and had short sleeves. Above the tunic would naturally be the linen girdle, wound several times about the waist. On His feet were leather sandals (Mt 3 11). His upper garment was of the customary sort and shape, probably of white woolen cloth, as is suggested by the details of the account of the Transfiguration (Mt 9 3), with the four prescribed "tassels" at the corners. As to His head-dress, we have no description of it, but we may see it down as certain that no Jewish teacher of that day would appear in public with the head uncovered. He probably wore the customary white linen "napkin" (sudarium), wound round the head as a turban, with the ends of it falling down over the neck. The dress of His disciples was, probably, not materially different.

In conclusion it may be said that, although the dress of even orthodox Jews today is as various as their lands of residence and their languages, yet there are two garments worn by them the world over, the tālīṯ and the 'arba' kavphôth (see DCG, art. "Dress," col. 1). Jews who affect special sanctity, esp. those living in the Holy Land, still wear the tālīṯ all day, as was the common custom in Christ's times. As the earlier name "arba' kavphôth" is in 1350 AD, it is clear that it cannot have existed in NT times.

DRINK OFFERING. See Sacrifice in OT and NT.

DRINK, STRONG (ἕως, shékḥār; ṣēḳās, sī-kēra; from ἕος, shēkḥār, "to be or become drunk"); probably from the same root as sugar, saccharine). With the exception of Nu 28 7 (wine), the term always coupled with "wine." The two terms are commonly used as mutually exclusive, and as together exhaustive of all kinds of intoxicants.

Originally shékḥār seems to have been a general term for intoxicating drinks of all kinds, without reference to the material out of which they were made; and in that sense, it would include wine. Reminiscences of this older usage may be found in Nu 6 3, Ps 40 7, where it is used equivalent to wine, as may be seen by comparing it with v 14, and also Ex 24 9, where mention is made of the drink offering is expressly designated "wine." When the Hebrews were living a nomadic life, before their settlement in Canaan, the grape-wine was practically unknown to them, and there would be no need of a special term to describe it. But when they settled down to an agricultural life, and came to cultivate the vine, it would become necessary to distinguish it from the older kinds of intoxicants; hence the borrowed word yayin ("wine") was applied to the former, while the latter would be classed together under the old term shékḥār, which would then come to mean all intoxicating beverages other than wine (Lev 10 9; Nu 6 3; Dt 14 26; Prov 20 1; Isa 24 9). The exact nature of these drinks is not clearly indicated in the Bible itself. The only fermented beverage other than grape-wine, specifically named is pomegranate-wine (Cant 8 2: "the juice of my pomegranate," RVm "sweet wine of my pomegranate"); but we may infer that other kinds of shékḥār besides that obtained from pomegranates were in use, such as drinks made from dates, honey, raisins, barley, apples, etc. Probably Jerome (c 400 AD) was near the mark when he wrote, "Sīkēra in the Heb tongue means every kind of drink which can intoxicate, whether made from grain or from the juice of apples, or when honey-combs are boiled down into a sweet and strong drink, or the fruit of palm pressed into liquor, and when water is coloured and thickened from boiled herbs" (Ep. ad Neposimianum). Thus shékḥār is a comprehensive term for all kinds of fermented drinks, excluding wine.

Probably the most common sort of shékḥār used in Bib. times was palm- or date-wine. This is not actually mentioned in the Bible, and we do not meet with its Heb name in the presuppositions of the Talmudic period. But it is frequently referred to in the Assyrian and Babylonian texts (see 'arba' kavphôth), from which we infer that it was very well known among the ancient Sem peoples. Moreover, it is known that the palm tree flourished abundantly in Bib. lands, and the presumption is therefore very strong that wine made from the palm dates was a common beverage. It must not be supposed, however, that the term ἀθάνατος ἕλασμα (Gen 9:21), ἀθάνατος ἕλασμα (Isa 29:9; Jer 25:27, etc.), of the word for drunkard (使之κός), and for drunkenness (使之κότως ἐποίησε) from the same root; (2) from descriptions of its effects: e.g. Isaiah graphically describes the stupefying effect of ἀθάνατος ἕλασμα on those who drink it excessively (22:6-8). Hannah defended herself against the charge of being drunk by saying, “I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink,” i.e. neither wine nor any other intoxicating liquor (1 S 15). The attempt made to prove that it was simply the unfermented juice of certain fruits is quite without foundation. Its immediate use is strongly condemned (Isa 5:11,12; Prov 20:1; see Drunkennesses). It was forbidden to ministers and Lev Nazirites (Num 6:3; Joel 2:13,14; Acts 15:15; 1 Tim 3:3), and was used in the sacrificial meal as drink offering (Num 28:7), and could be bought with the tithe-money and consumed by the worshipper in the temple (Ecclus 21:26). It is to the weak and devouring as a means of deadening their pain; but not to princes, lest it might lead them to pervert justice (Prov 31:6-7).

DROP, DROPPING: “To drop” expresses a “distilling” or “dripping” of a fluid (Isa 5:4; Prov 3:20; Cant 5:13; Joel 3:18; Amos 3:13; Isa 14:26, “the honey dropped” [in “a stream of honey”]); Job 29:22 and Isa 45:8 read “distill” (AV “drop”). The continuous “droppings” of rain through a leaking roof (roofs were usually made of clay in Pal, and always liable to cracks and leakage) on a “very rainy day” is compared to a contentious wife (Prov 19:13; 27:15); “What is described is the irritating, unceasing, sound of the fall, drop after drop, of water through the chinks in the roof” (Plumptre loc. cit.); also AV Eccl 10:18 (RV “leaketh”).

DROPSY, drop‘i (δροπήσις, ἄδροπος, “a man afflicted with ἄδροπος or dropisy”): Both forms of this disease occur in Pal, that in which the limbs and body are distended with water called _anasarca_, depending generally on cardiac or renal disease, and the form confined to the abdomen, usually the result of liver affection. The latter is the commoner, as liver disease is a frequent result of recurrent attacks of malarial fever. The man was evidently able to move about, as he had entered into the Pharisees’ house (Luke 14:2).

DROSS, dros (Ροπήν, ἀποκρήνον, “a man afflicted with ἀποκρήνον”) Both forms of this disease occur in Pal, that in which the limbs and body are distended with water called_ anasarca_, depending generally on cardiac or renal disease, and the form confined to the abdomen, usually the result of liver affection. The latter is the commoner, as liver disease is a frequent result of recurrent attacks of malarial fever. The man was evidently able to move about, as he had entered into the Pharisees’ house (Luke 14:2).

drum (trum, trumpan): This was the Heb _tōph_, “tabret” or “timbrel,” a hand-drum, consisting of a ring of wood or metal covered with a tightly drawn skin, with small pieces of metal hung around the rim, like a tambourine. It was raised in the one hand and struck with the other, usually by women, but sometimes also by men, at festivities and on occasions of rejoicing. See 1 Macc 9:39, RV “timbrel.”

DRUNKENNESS, drunk’n-n-nes (πεπεμμένος, ráwhe, πεπεμμένος, πεπρομένος, προμένος, méthet): I. Its Prevalence. The Bible affords ample proof that excessive drinking of intoxicants was a common vice among the Jews and many other ancient peoples. This is evident not only from individual cases of intoxication, as Noah (Gen 9:21), Lot (Gen 19:33), Nabal (1 S 25:30), Uriah made drunk by David (2 S 11:13), Ananias (2 S 13:28), Elah, king of Israel (1 K 15:9), Benhadad, king of Syria, and his confederates (1 K 20:16), Holofernes (Jdt 13:2), etc., but also from frequent references to drunkenness as a great social evil. Thus, Amos proclaims judgment on the voluptuous and dissolute rulers of Samaria “that drink in large bowls” (Am 6:6), and the wealthy ladies who press their husbands to join them in a carousing (4:1); he also complains that this form of self-indulgence was practised even at the expense of the poor and under the guise of religion, at the sacrement (Luke 11:38; see also Isa 5:11,12,22; 28:1-8; 56:11f). Its prevalence is also reflected in many passages in the NT (e.g. Mt 24:49; Lk 21:34; Acts 2:13,15; Eph 5:18; 1 Thess 5:7). Paul complains that at Corinth even the love-feast of the Christian church which immediately preceded the celebration of the Eucharist, was sometimes the scene of excessive drinking (1 Cor 11:21). It must, however, be noted that it is almost invariably the well-to-do who are charged with this vice in the Bible. There is no evidence to prove that it prevailed to any considerable extent among the common people. Intoxicants were then an expensive luxury, beyond the reach of the poorer classes. See Drink, Strong.

II. Its Symptoms and Effects. These are most vividly portrayed: (1) some of its physical symptoms (Job 12:25; Ps 107:27; Prov 23:29; Isa 19:14; 28:5; 29:9; Jer 25:16); (2) its mental effects (Ps 38:12,14; Prov 23:29-35); (3) its social effects (Ps 35:17; Ecclus 11:17,19; Prov 23:21; cf. 21:17; Ecclus 11:17): hence wine is called a “molder” degenerating the universe (Prov 20:1); (4) its moral and spiritual effects. It leads to a maladministration of justice (Ps 51:5; Isa 5:25), provokes anger and a contentious, brawling spirit (Prov 20:1; 23:29; 1 Esdr 3:22; Ecclus 31:26,29f), and conduces to a profligate life (Eph 5:18; Proverbs 31:3); (5) “riot,” lit. “profligacy.” It is allied with gambling and licentiousness (Job 3:5), and indecency (Gen 9:21). Above all, it deadens the spiritual sensibilities, produces a callous indifference to religious influences and destroys all serious thought (Isa 5:12).

III. Attitude of the Bible to the Drink Question. Intemperance is condemned in uncompromising terms by the OT and the NT, as well as by the semi-canonical writings. While total abstinence is not prescribed, a formal and universal rule, broad principles are laid down, esp. in the NT, which point in that direction.

In the OT, intemperance is most repugnant to the stern ethical rigorism of the prophets, as well as to the more utilitarian principles of prophecy.

1. In the OT it was evidently a national sin, but gradually quickened to the evil of immediate drinking. In the narratives of primitive times, excessive indulgence, or at least indulgence to the point of excess, was mentioned without censure as a natural thing, esp. on festive occasions (as in Gen 43:34 RVm). But a conscience more sensitive to the sinfulness of overindulgence was gradually developed, and is reflected in the denunciations of the prophets and the warning of the wise men (cf references under 1 and II, esp. Isa 5 11 f. 22; 25 1–8; Prov 23 29–35). Nowhere is the principle of total abstinence indicated as a rule applicable to all. In particular cases it was recognized as a duty. Priests while on duty in the sanctuary were to abstain from wine and strong drink (Lev 10 9; cf Ezek 44 21). Nazirites were to abstain from all intoxicants during the period of their vows (Nu 6 3 f; cf Amos 2 12), yet not on account of the intoxicating qualities of wine, but because they represented the simplicity of the older pastoral life, as against the Canaanite civilization which the vine symbolized (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 84 ff.). So also the Rechabites abstained from wine (Jer 35 6.8.14) and social conveniences, because they regarded the nomadic life as more conducive to Jeh-worship than agricultural and town life, with its temptations to Baal-worship. In Daniel and his comrades we have another instance of voluntary abstinence (Dan 1 8–16). These, however, are isolated instances. Throughout the OT the use of wine appears as practically universal, and it is recognized as a heart-cheering beverage (Deut 9 9; Ps 104 15; Prov 31 6). Nazirites and the sick to forget their pains (Prov 31 6). Moderation, however, is strongly inculcated and there are frequent warnings against the temptation and peril of the cup.

In Apoc, we have the attitude of prudence and common sense, but the prophetic note of stern denunciation is wanting. The path of Deutero-Canonicians is as good as life to men, if thou drink and make use of wine is measure; but wine drunk in season and to satisfy is joy of heart, and gladness of soul: wine drunk largely is bitterness of soul, with provocation and conflict” (Eccles 31 27–30 RV). A vivid picture of the effects of wine-drinking is given in 1 Esd 3 18–24. Stronger teaching on the subject is given in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The use of wine is permitted to him who can use it temperately, but when abstinence is enjoined as the wiser course (U II P. 16 3).

In the NT, intemperance is treated as a grave sin. Only once, indeed, does Our Lord explicitly condemn drunkenness (Lk 21 34), though it is implicitly condemned in his parables (Mt 24 49; Lk 12 43). The meagerness of the references in Our Lord’s teaching is probably due to the fact already mentioned, that it was chiefly prevalent among the wealthy, and not among the poorer classes to whom Our Lord mainly ministered. The references in Paul’s writings are very numerous (Gal 5 21; Eph 5 18, et al.). Temperance and sobriety in all things are everywhere insisted on (e.g. Acts 24 25; Gal 5 23; 2 Pet 1 6). A bishop and those holding honorable offices in the church would not be addicted to wine (1 Tim 3 2 f; Tit 1 7 f; 2 2 f). Yet Jesus and His apostles were not asecetics, and the NT gives no rough-and-ready prohibition of strong drink on principle. In contrast with John the Baptist, who was a Nazirite from birth (Lk 1 15), Jesus was called by His enemies a “wine-bibber” (Mt 11 19). He took part in festivities in which wine was drunk (Jn 2 10). There are indications that He regarded wine as a source of innocent enjoyment (Lk 7 35; Jn 5 1 f) by a distinction between intoxicating and unfermented wine is a case of unjustifiable special pleading. It must be borne in mind that the drink question is far more complex and acute in modern than in biblical times, and that the conditions of the modern world have given rise to problems which were not within the horizon of NT writers. The habit of excessive drinking has spread enormously among the common people, owing largely to the cheapening of alcoholic drinks. The fact that the evil exists today in its greatest proportion of total abstinence is indifferent and a special crusade. But rather than defend total abstinence by a false or forced egesis, it was better to admit that the principle is not formally laid down in the NT, while maintaining that there are broad principles exemplified, which in view of modern conditions should lead to voluntary abstinence from all intoxicants. Such principles may be found, e.g. in Our Lord’s teaching in Mt 16 24 f; Mk 9 42 f, and in the great Pauline passages—Rom 13 13–14; 1 Cor 8–13.

IV. Drunkenness. Metaphor.—Drunkenness very frequently supplies Bib. writers with striking metaphors and similes. Thus, it symbolizes intellectual or spiritual perplexity (Job 12 25; Isa 19 14; Jer 33 9), bewilderment and helplessness under calamity (Jer 13 13; Ezek 23 33) and is alluded to in a figure for the movements of sailors on board ship in a storm (Ps 107 27), and for the convulsions of the earth on the day of Jeh (Isa 24 20). Jeh’s “cup of staggering” is a symbol of anxiety, the fury of the wine drunk by the Tyrians and Sidonians (Isa 51 17–23; cf Isa 63 6; Jer 25 15 ff; Ezek 23 33; Ps 76 8). The sword and the arrow are said to be soaked with drink like a drunkard with wine (Dt 22 42; Jer 45 10). In the Apocalypse, Babylon (i.e. Rome) is portrayed under the figure of a “great harlot” who makes kings “drunk with the wine of her fornication”; and who is herself “drunk with the blood of the saints, and . . . of the martyrs of Jesus” (Rev 17 2 f).

DRUSILLA, drū-sil’a (Ἀδρούσσιλα, Droussia, or Αδροουσσιλα, Droussila): Wife of Felix, a Jewess, who along with her husband ‘heard [Paul] concerning the faith in Christ Jesus’ during Paul’s detention in Caesarea (Acts 24 24). B text gives the rendering “Drusilla, the wife of Felix, a Jewess, asked to see Paul and to hear the word.” The fact that Drusilla was a Jewess explains her curiosity, but Paul, who was probably well known in the past history of her and Felix, refused to satisfy their request in the way they desired, and preached to them instead concerning righteousness and self-restraint and the final judgment. At this “Felix was very uneasy” (Acts 24 25). Drusilla’s being left in bonds on the retirement of Felix was due to the desire of the latter to please Drusilla (cf Acts 24 27). Probably this explanation, besides that of the accepted text, was true also, as Drusilla, who was a member of the ruling house, saw in Paul an enemy of its power, and hated him for his condemnation of her own private sins.

The chief other source of information regarding Drusilla is Jos. Drusilla was the youngest of the three daughters of Agrippa I, her sisters being Berenice and Mariamne. She was married about 36 AD and was married when 14 years old to Azizus, king of Emesa. Shortly afterward she was induced to desert her husband by Felix, who employed a Cyprian sorcerer, Simon by name, to carry out his purpose. She was also influenced to take this step by the cruelty of Azizus and the hatred of Bernice who was jealous of her beauty. Her marriage with Felix took place about 54 AD and by him she had one son, Agrippa, who perished under Titus in an eruption of Vesuvius. The name of the “woman who perished along with Agrippa (Ant, XX, vii, 2) refers probably not to his mother Drusilla but to his wife. C. M. KERREn

DUKE, duk: The rendering in AV in Gen 36:15 ff; Ex 15 15, and 1 Ch 1 51 ff of יָדָע (Y'dāʿ), "duke" (ARV and ERV "chief"), and in Josh 13:21 of נְכָלָד (Nēḵālād) "duke," "king," "prince." It occurs also, as the rendering of στρατηγός (Stratēgos), in 1 Cor 15:28 ("captain"). Elsewhere נְכָלָד is τρή "prince" or "principal men." The fact that with two exceptions the term is applied in RV only to the chiefs of Edom has led to the impression that in the family of Esau the chiefs bore a special and hereditary title. But נְכָלָד was a general term for tribal chief or prince (cf Zec 9:7; 12:5,6; RV "chieftains," AV "governors").

Moreover, at the time the AV was made the word "duke" was not used as a title in England: the term had the same general force as duk, the word employed in the Vulg., 7 Sir T. Elyot (d. 1546) speaks of "Hannibal, duke of Carthage" (The Generous, II, 253); Shakespeare, Henry V, III, 20, "Be merciful, great duke, to men of mould" (cf Midsummer Night's Dream, I, 1, 21); Sylvester (1951) - DU DURRAY: "The great duke, thy father" (in the old saw) Upon Mt. Horeb learn'd "the eternal law." In a still earlier age Webster uses the word of the Messiah (Mt 2:6); and in Select Works, III, 137, "Jesus Christ, duke of our hotel." Yet in all probability the Heb word was more specific than "chief" or "duke" in the broad sense. For if נְכָלָד is derived from כָּל (kāl), "thousand," "army," the term may mean the leader of a clan, a "chieftain" (cf LXX, Zec 9:7; 12:5,6). ARV has eliminated the word "duke." See CHEFF.

DULCIMER, dul'si-mer. See Music under Nöbel and Symphonia.

DUMAH, du'ma (דֻּמָה, dumah, "silence"): This word occurs in the OT with the following significations: (1) the land of silence or death, the grave (Ps 94:17; 115:17); (2) a town in the highlands of Judah between Hebron and Beer sheba, now ed-Dawna (Josh 16:52); (3) an emblematical designation of Edom in the obscure oracle (Isa 21:11,12); (4) an Ishmaelite tribe in Arabia (Gen 25:14; 1 Ch 1:30). According to the Arab, geographers this son of Ishmael founded the tribe of Dumat-al-Jandal, the stone-built Duma, so called to distinguish it from another D. near the Euphrates. The former now bears the name of the Jawf ("belly"), being a depression situated half-way between the head of the Persian Gulf and the head of the gulf of Akaba. Its people in the time of Mohammed were Christians of the tribe of Kelb. It contained a great well from which the palms and crops were irrigated. It has often been visited by European travelers in recent times. See Jour. Royal Geog. Soc., XXIV (1854), 138-58; W. G. Palgrave, Central and Eastern Arabia, ch ii. It is possible that the oracle in Isa (no. 3 above) concerns this place.

THOMAS HUNTER WIEK

DUMB, dum (דָּמַע, Dāmāʿ, דָּמַע, Dāmāʿ, "tired, lit. "tied in the tongue"); קָפָה, Qāpāḥ: Used either as expressing the physical condition of speechlessness, generally associated with deafness, or figuratively as meaning the silence produced by the weight of God's judgments (Ps 35:2-9; Dn 10:15) or the oppression of nations (Ps 18:12,14). As an adj. it is used to characterize inefficient teachers destitute of spirituality ("dumb dogs," Isa 56:10). The speechlessness of Saul's companions (Acts 9:7) was due to fright; that of the man without the word (Mark 9:27) because he had no excuse to give (Mt 22:12). Idols are called dumb, because helpless and voiceless (Hab 2:18,19; 1 Cor 12:2). The dumbness of the sheep before the shearer is a token of submission (Isa 55:7; Acts 8:32).

Temporary dumbness was indicted as a sign upon Ezekiel (3:26; 24:27; 35:22) and as a punishment for unbelief upon Zacharias (Lk 1:22). There are several cases recorded of Our Lord's healing the dumb (Mt 15:30; Mk 7:37; Lk 11:14, etc). Dumbness is often associated with imbecility and was therefore regarded as due to demoniac possession (Mt 9:32; 12:22). The evangelists therefore describe the healing of these as effected by the casting out of demons. This is esp. noted in the case of the epileptic boy (Mk 9:17). The deaf man with the impediment in his speech (Mk 7:32) is said to have been cured by loosening the string of his tongue. This does not necessarily mean that he was tongue-tied, which is a condition causing lisping, not stammering; he was probably one of these deaf persons who produce babbling, incoherent and meaningless sounds. I saw in the asylum in Jerusalem a child born blind and deaf, who though dumb, produced inarticulate noises.

In an old 14th-cent. psalter "dumb" is used as a vb. in Ps 39:1 "I dumbmed and maked and was full stille." ALEX. MACALISTER

DUNG, dung, DUNG GATE (דִּינָה, Dînāh, "ashpōth, Ḳ, dōmen, Ḳ, pereṣh, Ḳ, pehḅalōv, skakābalōn, etc): Nine different words occurring in the Heb have been transliterated as "dung" in the AV. The word used to designate one of the gates of Jerusalem (ashpōth, Neh 2:13; 14) is more general than the others and may mean any kind of refuse. The gate was probably so named because outside it was the general dump heap of the city. Visitors in recent years riding outside the city walls of Jerusalem, on their way to the Mt. of Olives or Jericho, may have witnessed such a dump against the wall, which has existed for generations.

The first mention made of dung is in connection with sacrificial rites. The sacred law required that the dung, along with what parts of the animal were not burned on the altar, should be burned outside the camp (Ex 29:14; Lev 4:11; 8:17; 16:27; Nu 19:5).

The fertilizing value of dung was appreciated by the cultivator, as is indicated by Lk 13:8 and possibly Ps 83:10 and Isa 25:10.

Dung was also used as a fuel. Ezek 4:12,15 will be understood when it is known that the dung of animals is a common fuel throughout Pal and Syria, where other fuel is scarce. During the summer, villagers gather the manure of their cattle, horses or camels, mix it with straw, make it into cakes and dry it for use as fuel for cooking. As fuel it is usually made when wood or charcoal or straw are not procurable. It burns slowly like peat and meets the needs of the kitchen. In Mesopotamia the writer saw it being used with forced draft to fire a steam boiler. There was no idea of uncleanness in Ezekiel's mind, associated with the use of animal dung as fuel (Ezek 4:15).

Figuratively: Dung was frequently used figuratively to express the idea (a) of worthlessness, esp. a periphrastic article for which no one cares (1 K 14:10; 2 K 6:25; 9:37; Job 20:7; Ps 83:10; Jer 8:2; 9:22; 16:4; 25:33; Zeph 1:17; Phil 3:8 [ARV "refuse"]). Dunghill was used in the same way (1 S 2:8; Ex 6:11; Ps 113:7; Isa 35:10; Dn 2:5; 3:20; Lk 14:35; Lam 4:5); (b) as an expression of disgust (2 K 18:27; Ls 36:12); (c) of rebuke (Mal 2:3).

DURA, dû'ra (נֵבִיעַ, dûrâ'): The name of the plain on which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, set up the great golden image which all his subjects were ordered to worship (Dan 3 1). Opposed place it to the S.E. of Babylon, near a small river and mounds bearing the name of Dourat or Dourar, where also, was what seemed to be the base of a great statue (Exzplá, scientifique en Méropoiatique, I, 238 f). Others have believed that name to indicate a portion of the actual site of Babylon within the great wall (dûru) of the city—perhaps the rampart designated dûr Šu-anna, "the rampart [of the city] Lofty-defense," a name of Babylon. The fact that the plain was within the city of Babylon precludes an identification with the city Dûru, which seems to have lain in the neighborhood of Erech (Hommel, Grundriiss, 264, n. 5). It is noteworthy that the LXX substitutes Dnôqâ, Deôrâ, for Dura, suggesting that the Gr translators identified it with the Bab Dûru, a city which apparently lay toward the Elamite border. It seems to have been called also Dûr-li, "god's rampart." That it was at some distance from the city is proved by the Mic. 17: 17; Rev. 18: 19, where Dûru, Tutul, and Gudwa (Cuthah), intervene between Dûru or Dûr-li and Timûrû (Babylon). "The plain of the dûr" or "rampart" within Babylon would therefore seem to be the best rendering. T. G. Pinches DURE, dûr (πρόσκαιρος, próskaírōs): Used for "endure" (q.v.) AV Mt 13 21 (RV "endureth").

DUST, dust (Σμύξος, th'apóhér, konómetric, χόρος, chôros): Small particles of earth. The word has several figurative and symbolic meanings: (1) Dust being the material out of which God is said to have formed man (Gen 2 7), it became a symbol of man's frailty (Ps 103 14, "For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust"); cf Gen 18 27; Job 4 19, etc., and of his mortality (Gen 3 19, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return"); cf Job 34 15; Ps 104 29; Eccl 3 20; 12 7, etc.) Hence it is used figuratively for the grave (Ps 22 15 22, etc.); Dust is sometimes used as if to lie in the dust, to lick the dust, to sprinkle dust on the head, are symbols expressive of deep humiliation, abasement or lamentation (e.g. Job 12; 42 6, Ps 72 9; Isa 2 10; 47 1; 49 23; Lam 1 10; 30 17; Jer 31 37; 10 15); Hence such expressions as "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust," i.e. out of their state of lowliness (1 S 2 8; Ps 113 7). (3) Throwing dust was an act expressive of exclamation. Thus Shimeii "cursed David and "threw stones at him, and cast dust," lit. "dusted [him] with dust" (2 S 16 13). So the crowd which Paul addressed at Jerusalem manifested their wrath against him by tossing about his garments and casting dust into the air (Acts 22 23). (4) Shaking the dust off one's feet against anyone (Mt 10 14; Mk 6 11; Lk 9 5; 10 11; Acts 13 51) is symbolic of renunciation, as we would say "washing one's hands of him," an intimation that all further intercourse was at an end. It was practised by the Pharisees on passing from gentile to Jewish soil; it being a rabbinical doctrine that the dust of a heathen land defiles. (5) It is also used fig. for an innumerable multitude (e.g. Gen 13 16; 28 14; Job 27 16; Ps 78 27). (6) The expression "Jeh will make the rain of thy land powder and dust" (Jo 23 24) means the dust in consequence of the drought shall fall down instead of rain on the dry ground. In Judaea and vicinity during a sirocco, the air becomes filled with sand and dust, which are blown down by the wind with great vio- lence.

DUTY, dû'ti (דָּבָר, dûbâr; ὀφείλω, ophelô): The word d. occurs only three times in the OT and twice in the NT. In the OT it is the tř of dûbâr, which, meaning originally "speech," or "word," came to denote any particular "matter" that had to be attended to. In the two places where it is rendered "duty" (2 Ch 8 14; Ezr 3 4) the reference is to the performance of the Temple services—praise and sacrifice—and it is probably from these passages that the phrase "taking duty" in church services is derived. In other passages we have different words employed to denote the priests' duties: AV Lev 10 13 14, hôk ("statutory portion"); Dt 18 3, mishpât ("judgment"). In Prov 3 27, we have a reference to d. in the moral sense, "Withhold not good from the wise, nor forsake the d. words . . . (i.e. as in AVm, "from the owners thereof"). In Ex 21 10 we have the "duty of marriage" (lônâh), that which was due to the wife.

In the NT d. "duty" is expressed by opheîlô, "to owe," "to be due." In Lk 17 10, we have "Say, . . . we have done that which it was our duty to do," and in Rom 15 27 AV, it is said of the Gentiles with reference to the Jewish Christians, "Their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things," ARV "they render unto the Gentiles,, the service due," i.e. as in AVm, "from the owners thereof." DWARF, dârâf: The rendering in EV of Heb פִּלָּפָר, dôl, "thin," "small," in Lev 21 20, where a list is given of physical failings which forbade a man of the seed of Aaron to officiate at the altar, though he might partake of the sacrificial gifts. The precise meaning of the Heb word here is uncertain; elsewhere it is used of the lean kine (Gen 41 3) and blasted ears (ver 23) of Pharaoh's dream; of the grains of man (Ex 16 14), of the still-born (1 K 19 12), of dust (Isa 29 5), etc. LXX and Vulg suggest defective eyes; but "withered" would perhaps best express the meaning. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Dwell, dwell: (1) In the OT "dwell" tř 9 words, of which by far the most frequent is דָּבַּר, yâshâbôh, "to sit down," trd "dwell" over 400 times (Gen 4 20; Josph 20 4; 1 Ch 17 4 5, etc); also very frequently "sit," and, sometimes, "rest" (Rev 17 18). Another word often rendered "dwell" is תֵּאָט, tê'âth, shâkhân or shâkhân ("to settle down"), from which is derived the rabbinic word תֵּאַת, tê'âth (lit. "that which dwells"), the light on the mercy-seat which symbolized the Divine presence (Ex 25 8, etc). In order to avoid appearing to localize the Divine Being, wherever God is said to "dwell" in a place, the Tg renders that He "causes His Shekinah to dwell" there. (2) In the NT "dwell" most frequently stands for οἰκεῖα, oikeô, or one of its compounds; also κατέφυλα, kathên, and (chiefly in the Johannine writings) μένω, menô, which, however, is always trd "abide" in RV, and generally in AV. Mention may be made of the mystical significance of the word in some NT passages, of the indwelling of the Father or of the Godhead in Christ (Jn 14 17; 17 19), of the Godhead in Christ (Jn 15 16 26) and in God (1 Jn 4 15 AV; cf Ps 80 1; 91 1), and of the Holy Spirit or God in the believer (Jn 14 17; AV 1 Jn 3 24; 4 15 f).

DYE, dy, dyeing, dî'ing (אַלְפָּה, mē'oddâm, הָעָד, hâ'âd; הָעָה, hâ'âh; כַּהַּ, kâhâh): Four different Heb words have been trd "dyed": AV (a) ne'oddôn, found in Ex 25 5; 26 14; 35 7; 36 19; 39 34; (b) hâmîn (RVm "crimsoned") (Isa 63 1); (c) t'bâhâl (Ezk 23 15). T'bâhâl is probably more correctly rendered "flowing turban" as in the RV of Ex 25 5, but in Job 1 12 the "red" is so called in ARV of Jgs 5 30 (HDÌ); cf Arab. sabâgh.

The above references and other color words mentioned elsewhere (see Colors) indicate that the Israelites were acquainted with dyed stuffs, even if they themselves did not do the dyeing. An analysis of the various Bib. references shows that four colors which were produced on cloth by dyeing, namely, purple, blue (violet), crimson and scarlet. These, and purple is the best known because of the many historical references to it. It was the symbol of royalty and luxury. Because of its high price, due to the expensive method of obtaining it, only royalty and the rich could afford purple attire. One writer tells us that the dyestuff was worth its weight in silver. Probably it was because of its scarcity, and because it was one of the very limited number of dyes known, rather than for any remarkable beauty of color, that the purple was so much sought after.

If Pliny's estimate is to be accredited, then "in the dyeing of the purple the color itself was harsh, of a greenish hue and strongly resembling that of the sea when in a tempestuous state."

The purple and blue dyes were extracted from shellfish. The exact process used by the ancients is not known. In the attempt to obtain Tyrian purple:

1. Purple and Blue dyestuffs were further named the suppliers of these colors, hence the name "Tyrian purple." The inhabitants of these cities were at first simply dyers in purple (Ezk 27 7-24), but they afterward became the manufacturers, as the heirs of the emptied shells of the Murex trunculus, which still exist in the vicinity of these cities, testify. The pigment was secreted by a gland in the lining of the stomach. The shell was punctured and the fish removed in order to secure the dye. The juice, at first whitish, changed on exposure to yellowish or greenish and finally to red, amethyst or purple, according to the treatment. A modified color was obtained by first dipping the textile in a cochineal bath and then in the purple. Tyrian purple was considered most valuable when it was "exactly the color of clotted blood and of a blackish hue" (Pliny). So also Livy (17.33.4). Beside the shell, above mentioned, several other species are noted by different writers, namely, Murex branderii, Murex erinaceus, Murex buccinum (purpura haemastoma). This latter species is still used by the dwellers on the shores of the Adriatic for the extraction of various species of the murex are found today at Haifa (Syria), about the Gr isles and on the N. coast of Africa. The purple color has been produced from them by modern chemists, but it is of historical interest only, in the light of the discovery of modern artificial dyes with which it could not compete commercially.

Two words have been used in the Heb Bible to describe the colors from shellfish: (a) argâdôn (Gen 31 19); this has been translated "purple"; (b) t'bâlôth which was probably a shade of violet, but has been translated "blue" in both AV and RV.

As indicated elsewhere (see Colors), three Heb words have been rendered crimson or scarlet: (a) karîl (cf Arab. kirmiz and Eng. "carmin") (b) tâlá, and (c) shânî. We know nothing further about the method of producing these colors than that they were both obtained from the kermes insect which feeds on a species of live oak growing in Spain (see Tanger). The modern dyer can obtain several shades from the cochineal insect by varying the mordants or assistants used with the dye. Pliny mentions the same fact as being known by the ancient Egyptians. Some of the Syrian dyers still use the kermes, commonly called dâd ("worms"), although most of them have resorted to the "foreign dyes" which are indiscreetly called dâd franny ("foreign worms"). The "rams' skins dyed red" mentioned in Ex 25 are still made in Syria. After the ram's skin has been tanned in sumac, it is laid out on a table and a solution of the dye, made by boiling dâd in water, is rubbed on. After the dye is dry, the skin is rubbed with oil and finally polished. No native product is more characteristic of the country than the slippers, Beduin shoes, and other leather articles made from "rams' skins dyed red" (see Tannery). Other dyes probably known were:

(a) Madder.—In Jgs 10 1, we read that "after Abimelech there arose to save Israel Tola, the son of Puah." These were probably names of clanship. In the Heb they are also Dyes Probable words. Tâlâ is the scarlet dye-ably Known and pâ'âl̄îh, if, as is probable, it is the same as the Arab. fawâwâh, means "madder." This would add another dye-stuff. Until the discovery of the madder, the growing of fawâwâh was one of the industries of Cyprus and Syria. It was exported to Europe and was also locally produced for "Turkey red" on cotton and for dyeing dull red on wool for Piano (see Tutanther). It was the custom near Damascus for a father to plant a new madder field for each son that was born. The field began to yield in time to support the boy and later become his inheritance. Madder is mentioned in the Talm. and by early Let writers. A Saracen helmet and a shield of similar origin, in the possession of the writer, are lined with madder-dyed cotton.

(2) Indigo.—Another dye has been discovered among the Egypt mummy clothes, namely, indigo. Indigo blue was used in weaving to form the borders of the clothes. This pigment was probably imported from India.

(3) Yellows and browns of doubtful origin have also been found in the Egypt tombs.

The Jews acquired from the Phoenicians the secret of dyeing, and later held the monopoly in this trade in some districts. A Jewish guild of purple dyers is mentioned on a tombstone in Hieropolis. In the 17th cent. AD, the Laws were still being written by the glass-blowers at Tyr. Akhisar, a Jewish stronghold in Asia Minor, was famous as a dyeing city. See also Attire, Dyed.

DYSENTERY, dis'en-ter-i (συνεντερία, duensenteri): In Acts 28 8 RV uses this word in place of the phrase "bloody flux" of AV to describe the disease by which the father of Publius was affected in Malta at the time of St. Paul's shipwreck. The acute form of this disease is often attended with a high temperature, hence Luke speaks of it as "fever and dysenteric" (puroiakos kat dysenteria). It is a parasitic disease, caused by the Bacillus dysenteriae. In 2 Ch 21 19 there is reference to a similar disease in the days of Jehoram. The malady, as predicted by Elijah, attacked the king and assumed a chronic form in the course of which portions of the intestine sloughed. This condition sometimes occurs in the amoebic form of dysentery, cases of which sometimes last over two years.

EAGLE, אֵבָל (אֵבָל, nešer; αἰαῖ, αέτος; Lat aquila): A bird of the genus aquila of the family falcomidae. The Heb nešer, meaning “to tear with the beak,” is almost invariably tr’ "eagle," throughout the Bible; yet many of the most important references compel the admission that the bird to which they applied was a vulture. There were many large birds and carrion eaters flocking over Pal, attracted by the offal from animals slaughtered for tribal feasts and continuous sacrifice. The eagle family could not be separated from the vultures by their habit of feeding, for they ate the offal from slaughter as well as the vultures. One distinction always holds good. Eagles never flock. They select the tallest trees of the forest, the topmost crag of the mountain, and pairs live in solitude, hunting and feeding singly, whenever possible carrying their prey to the nest so that the young may gain strength and experience by tearing at it and feeding themselves. The vultures are friendly, and collect and feed in flocks. So wherever it is recorded that a "flock came down on a carcase," there may have been an eagle or two in it, but the body of it were vultures. Because they came in such close contact with birds of prey, the natives came nearer dividing them into families than any birds. Of perhaps a half-dozen, they recognized three eagles, they knew three vultures, four or five falcons, and several kites; but almost every Bib. reference is tr’ "eagle" no matter how evident the text makes it that the bird was a vulture. For example, Mic 1:16: "Make thee bald, and cut off thy hair for the children of thy delight: enlarge thy baldness as the eagle [in "vulture"]; for they are gone into captivity from thee." This is a reference to the custom of shaving the head when in mourning, but as Pal knew no bald eagle, the text could refer only to the bare head and neck of the griffon vulture. The eagles were, when hunger-driven, birds of prey; the vultures, carrion feeders only. There was a golden eagle (the ouprey of AV), not very common, distinguished by its tan-colored head; the imperial eagle, more numerous and easily identified by a dark head and white shoulders; a spotted eagle; a tawny eagle, much more common and readily distinguished by its plumage; and the short-toed eagle, less common of all and especially a bird of prey, as also a small hooded eagle so similar to a vulture that it was easily mistaken for one, save that it was very bold about taking its own food.

The first Bib. reference to the eagle referred to the right bird. Ex 19:4: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself." This "bare you on eagles' wings" must not be interpreted to mean that an eagle ever carried anything on its back. It merely means that by strength of powerful wing it could carry quite a load with its feet and frequently was seen doing this. Vultures never carried anything; they feasted and regurgitated what they had eaten to their young. The second reference is found in Lev 11:13 and repeated in Dt 14:12, the lists of abominations. It would seem peculiar that Moses would find it necessary to include eagles in this list until it is known that Arab mountaineers were eating these birds at that time. The next falls in Dt 28:49: "Jehovah will bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand." This also refers to the true eagle and points out that its power of sustained flight and the speed it could attain when hastening to its hunger-clamoring young, had been observed. The next reference is in Dt 32:11:

"As an eagle that stirreth up her nest, That fluttereth over her young, He spread abroad his wings, he took them, He bare them on his pinions."

This is good natural history at last. Former VSS made these lines read as if the eagle carried its young on its wings, a thing wholly incompatible with flight in any bird. Samuel's record of the lamentation of David over Saul and Jonathan is a wonderful poetic outburst and contains reference to this homing flight of the eagle (2 S 1:23). In Job 9:26 the arrow-like downward plunge of the hunger-driven eagle is used in comparison with the flight of time. In Job 39, which contains more good natural history than any other chapter of the Bible, will be found everything concerning the eagle anyone need know:

"Is it at thy command that the eagle mounteth up, And maketh her nest on high? On the cliff she dwelleth, and maketh her home, Upon the point of the cliff, and the stronghold, From thence she spitteth out the prey, Her eyes behold it afar off, Upon her young she also suck up blood: And where the slain are, there is she" (vs 27-30).

Ps 103:5 is a reference to the long life of the eagle. The bird has been known to live to an astonishing age in captivity; under natural conditions, the age it attains can only be guessed.

"Who satisfieth thy desire with good things, So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle." Prov 33:25 compares the flight of wealth with that of an eagle; 30:17 touches on the fact that the eye of prey is the first place attacked in eating, probably because it is the most vulnerable point and so is frequently fed to the young.

Ver 19: "The way of an eagle in the air: The way of a serpent upon a rock; The way of a ship in the midst of the sea; And the way of a man with a maiden."
This reference to the eagle is to that wonderful power of flight that enables a bird to hang as if motionless in the sky, for long periods, appearing to our sight immovable, or to sail and soar directly into the eye of the sun, seeming to rejoice in its strength of flight and to exult in the security and freedom of the upper air.

The word "way" is here improperly translated. To this eagle may be added a road, a path. In this instance it should be translated:

The characteristics of an eagle in the air:

(1) The habit of a serpent upon a rock;

(2) It may climb to the midst of the sea;

And the manner of a man with a maid.

Each of these lines stood a separate marvel to Agur, and had no connection with the others (but cf. Wisd. 5:10.11, and see Way).

Isa 40:31 is another flight reference. Jer 49:16 refers to the inaccessible heights at which the eagle loves to build and rear its young. Ver 22 refers to the eagle's power of flight. Ezek 1:10 recounts a vision of the prophet in which strange creatures had faces resembling eagles. The same book (17:3) contains the parable of the eagle: "Thus saith the Lord Jeh: A great eagle with great wings and long pinions, full of feathers, which had divers colors, came and sat on the top of the cedar." Hos 8:1 is another flight reference. Ob 4:9 is almost identical with Jer 49:16. The next reference is that of Micah, and really refers to the griffon vulture (Mic 1:6). In Hab 1:8 the reference is to swift flight. Mt 24:28 undoubtedly refers to vultures. In Rev 4:7 the eagle is used as a symbol of strength. In Rev 18:13 the bird is represented as speaking: "And I saw, and I heard an eagle[A] AV "angel" flying in mid heaven, saying with a great voice: Woe, woe, woe, for they that dwell on the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, who are yet to sound." The eagle makes its last appearance in the vision of the woman and the dragon (Rev 12:14).

Eanes, 8άνας (I Esd 9:21): RV MANES (q.v.), RVm "Haran."

Ear, ēr (γόνον, ὄρας, ὄρυξ, ὄλων, the latter word [lit. "carlet"] in all the Gospels only used of the ear of the high priest's servant, which was cut off by St. Peter: Mt 26:51; Mk 14:47; Lk 22:51 [not 22:50]; Jn 18:10.26):

(1) The physical organ of hearing which was considered of importance as an organ of chief importance by man which receives information and commands. For this reason the ear of the priest had to be specially sanctified, the tip of the right ear being touched with sacrificial blood at the consecration (Lev 8:23). Similarly the ear of the cleansed leper had to be redeclined to the service of God by blood and oil (Lev 14:14.17.25.28).

The ear-lobe of a servant, who preferred to remain with the family of his master rather than become free in the seventh year, was to be publicly bored or pierced with an awl in token of perpetual servitude (Ex 21:6). It has been suggested that Ps 40:6 should be interpreted in this sense, but this is not probable (see below). The cutting off of the ears and noses of captives was an atrocious custom of war frequently alluded to in oriental lit. (Ezk 23:25).

The phrase "to open the ear," which originally means the uncovering of the ear by partially removing the turban, so as to permit a clearer hearing, in used in the sense of revolting against or of giving important (private) information (1 S 9:15; 20:2.12.13; 2 S 7:27; 1 Ch 17:25; also Ps 40:6), and the NT promises similarly that "things which eye saw not, and ear heard not" are to be revealed by the reconciled God to the heart that in gladsome surrender has come to Him to be taught by His spirit (1 Cor 2:9).

(2) The inner ear, the organ of spiritual perception. If the ear listens, the heart willingly submits, but often the spiritual ear is "hardened" (Isa 6:10; Zec 7:11; Mt 13:15; Acts 28:27), or "heavy" (Isa 6:10; also Da 29:4), either by self-seeking obstinacy or by the judgment of an insulted God. Such unwilling hearers are compared to the "deaf adder ... which hearkeneth not to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely" (Ps 46:5; cf. also Prov 30:13; 28:9; Acts 24:5). The expression "He that hath ears to hear let him hear" is frequent in the Synoptic Gospels, occurring 7 or 8 times: Mt 11:15; 13:43; Mk 4:23 (7:16 RV omits); Lk 8:8; 14:35, and while not found in the Fourth Gospel, it occurs seven times in Rev 2 and 3.

"Itching ears," on the other hand, are those that have become tired of the sound of oft-repeated truth and that long for new though deceitful teaching (2 Tim 4:3). Ears may "tingle" at startling news, esp. of disaster (1 P 3:11; 2 K 21:12; Jer 19:3).

(3) God's ears are often mentioned in the anthropopoistic style of Scripture, signifying the ability of God to receive the petitions of His people, for He that pleadeth in the ear shall be answered in the ear (Ps 94:9; also Ps 10:17; 34:15; 130:2; Isa 59:1; 1 Pet 3:12). But God also hears the murmuring of the wicked against Him (Nu 11:1; 2 K 19:28; Wisd 1:10; Jas 6:4); still it lies in His power to refuse to hear (Ezk 8:18; Lam 3:8) or of else ver. 50.

H. E. LUKENS

Earing, 3'ring (זְרִימָה, hêrahâh): The Heb word is twice tr. "earing" in AV (Gen 45:6; Ex 34:21). The RV rendering is "plowing" or "there shall be neither plowing nor harvest." See also Dt 21:4; 1 S 8:12; Isa 30:24.

EARLY, 3'ri (זְרִיחַ, 'érâhâ; 2 'érâhâ; 3 'érâhâ; 4 'érâhâ; 5 'érâhâ): The word generally refers to the day, and means the hour of dawn or soon after (Gen 19:2; 2 Ch 36:15; Hos 6:4; Lk 24:22). Sometimes it refers to the beginning of the season, e.g. the early rain (Ps 84:6; Jps 8:7; see Rain). It may also have the sense of "wakening" (Mio 4:5).

The early morning is frequently commended as the hour for prayer. See examples of Jesus (Mk 1:35; Lk 21:38; Jn 8:2); also Abraham (Gen 17:27) Jacob (Gen 28:18), Gideon (Jgs 6:38), Samuel (1 S 15:16), David (1 S 17:28) G. H. GERBERING

EARNEST, 3'rnest (אְפֶלָבָה, əpeləḇâh): Found three times in the NT: The "earnest of the inheritance" (Eph 1:14); "the earnest of our inheritance" (2 Cor 1:22; 5:5); It has an equivalent in Heb ἀρέβαθν (found in Gen 38:17.18.20), in Lat præbō, Fr. arêve and the OE ærēs. The term is mercantile and comes originally from the Phoenicians. Its general meaning is that of a pledge or token given as the assurance of the fulfillment of a bargain or promise. It also carries with it the idea of forfeit, such as is now common in land deals, only from the obverse side. In other words, the one promising to convey property, wages or blessing binds the promise with an advance of a pledge partaking of the quality of the benefit to be bestowed. If the agreement be about wages, then a part of the wages is advanced; if it be about land, then a clod given to the purchaser or beneficiary may stand as the pledge of return and complete conveyance of the property.

Figurative: In the spiritual sense, as used in the passages above named, the reference is to the work of the Spirit of God in our hearts being a token and pledge of a perfect redemption and a heavenly inheritance. There is more than the idea of security in the word as used, for it clearly implies the continuity and identity of the blessing.

EARRING, ēr'ring: An ornamental pendant of some kind hanging from the ears has been worn by both sexes in oriental lands from the earliest times. Among the Greeks and Romans, as with western peoples in general, its use was confined to females. The ears in the statue of the Medecine Venus are pierced and probably were originally ornamented with earrings. It is clear, however, that among the Hebrews and related oriental peoples earrings were worn by both sexes. Abraham's servant "put the earring upon [Rebekah's] face, and the bracelets upon her hands" (Gen 24 47 AV), in accordance with custom, evidently, but it is implied that it was customary for men also to wear earrings, in that the relatives and friends of Job "every one [gave him] an earring of gold" (Job 41 11 AV). Such ornaments were usually made of gold, finely wrought, and often set with precious stones, as archaeology has shown. Such jewels were worn in ancient times for decorative as well as for protective purposes. RV renders "amuleta" for AV "earrings" in Isa 3 20, the Heb word (Pāḥaš̱im) being elsewhere associated with serpentine; but the earrings of Gen 35 4, also, were more likely "earrings" or "ornaments," so that the form and RV may both be right in their renderings here (Kennedy). The influence of Egypt, where amulets of various kinds were worn by men and gods, by the living and the dead, is shown by recent excavations at Gezer, Tunnach and Megiddo. See AMULET; ORNAMENT.

EARTH, ērth (W?r, 'ādāmāh, ṣērēg, 'ēr, 'ērār; gh, gā'ēṣōnāyām, oikōsōmenē): In a hilly limestone country like Pal, the small amount of iron oxide in the rocks tends to be oxidized, and thereby to give a prevailing reddish color to the soil. This is esp. the case on relatively barren hills where there is little organic matter present to prevent reddening and give a more blackish tinge.

'Ādāmāh (cf 'ādām, "a man," and Adam) is from 'ādām, "to be red," and is used in the senses: "earth" (Ex 20 24), "land" (Ps 105 35), a "land" or country (Isa 14 2), "ground" (Gen 4 11), the "earth" (Gen 4 11): "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."

'Āphār and its root word and derivatives are closely paralleled in the Arab., and refer mainly to "dust" or "dry earth" (of Arab. 'āfr, "to be of the color of dust"; 'āfar, "dust"; yāfār, "a gazelle"; Heb 'āphēr, "a gazelle"). Cf Gen 2 7: "Jeovah God formed man of the dust of the ground;" Job 2 12: "... sprinkled dust upon their heads;" Ps 104 29: "... they die, and return to their dust;" Gen 18 27: "dust and ashes."

In the LXX and NT, ghē is used in nearly all cases, oikōsōmenē being used a few times for the "habitableable" (Acts 6 21 AV). See further ANTHROPOLOGY; ASTRONOMY; EVOLUTION; WORLD.

EARTH, CIRCLE OF THE. See ASTRONOMY, III, 1, 3.

EARTH, CORNERS OF THE: The "corners" or "ends" of the earth are its "wings" (kān-phā'dāb hā-dā'ārēq, i.e. its borders or extremities. The word in general means a wing, because the wing of a bird is used as a covering for its young, and from this meaning it acquires that of the extremity of anything stretched out. It is thus used in Dt 25 12: "Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the edges of thy robe, wherewith thou courest thou thyself." It thus also means the coasts or boundaries of the land surface of the earth; its extremities. It is thus "corners" in Isa 11 12; "ends" in Job 37 3 and 38 13. The "four corners of the earth" (Isa 11 12) or "land" (Ezk 7 2) are therefore simply the extremities of the land in the four cardinal directions. See also ASTRONOMY, III, 3.

EARTH, ENDS OF THE. See EARTH, CORNERS OF THE.

EARTH, PILLARS OF THE. See ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

EARTH, THE NEW. See ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT, IX; HEAVENS (NEW).

EARTH, VAULT, vōl't, of THE: In one passage God is said to have "founded his vault [âghuddāh] upon the earth" (Am 9 6). It is not quite certain whether this "vault or vault: [âghuddāh]," or itself, or to the heavens arched above it. The latter is the usual interpretation, but in either case the reference is rather to the strength of the structure than to its form; the word implying something that is firmly bound together and hence an arch or dome because of its stability. See also ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

EARTHEN, ērth'ēn, VESSELS (w?ēm, ērēm, 'ērēm; ṣērēg, orāphā'ēnos, oικόσωμενον): These vessels were heat-resisting and were used for cooking and for boiling clothes (Lev 6 28; 11 33; 14 5 50). They were probably non-porous and took the place of the kidri or maq'ām used in Syria today. A traveler in the interior of Pal may still meet with the hospitality showed to David (2 S 17 28). The generous natives brought not only gifts of food but the necessary vessels in which to cook it. An earthen vessel was used to preserve a section on the four borders, the word implying something that is firmly bound together and hence an arch or dome because of its stability. See also ASTRONOMY, III, 2.

EARTHLY, ērth'ēl, VESSELS (w?ēm, ṣērēg, orāphā'ēnos): Of or pertaining to the earth, or to the present state of existence. The word epieios is not found in LXX, but occurs in classical Gr from Plato down. In Plutarch Mor. 566 D, it occurs in the remarkable phrase, "that which is earthly of the soul. Its meaning is primarily merely local ("being on the earth"). The word ἐπιέος ("earth";) has not in itself an ethical significance, and does not carry a suggestion of moral taint, such as the word κόσμος ("world") has, esp. in the Johannine writings, and ἀνά ("flesh"), esp. in Paul. It does, however, suggest a certain limitation or frailty; and in some passages, the context gives the adj. ἐπιέος an ethical color, though in the NT the purely local meaning is never lost sight of. It is ς ρ έ ς "earthly" in the following passages: (1) Jn 3 13: "If I tell thee earthly things, they are realized on earth, things within the circle of human observation, truths of subjective experience (e.g. the new birth); in contrast to "heavenly things," the objective truths which, as not directly realizable in human experience, must be revealed from above (the mysteries of the Divine purpose and plans. Clearly “earthly” here implies no moral contrast to the heavenly or spiritual. (2) Cor 2 16 “the heavenly house of God tabernacles,” i.e. the body with which we are clothed on earth, in contrast to the spiritual resurrection-body, “which is from heaven” (ver 2). Here again the word has a merely local, not an ethical, significance. (3) Phil 3 10, “whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things,” i.e. whose thoughts rest on earth, on the pleasures of life here below. (4) Jas 3 15, “This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly,” i.e. it is on the plane of life here below, merely human, incapable of ascending to the level of Divine wisdom. In the last two passages, the literal local meaning is still evident, but the word shades off into the moral and suggests that which is opposed to the spiritual in character. The same word is used “terrestrial” in 1 Cor 15 40, and “things in [RV ‘on’] earth” in Phil 2 10. AV has “earthly” in Jn 3 31, where it translates ἐκ τῆς γῆς—lit. “out of the earth,” the reference being to the character and mission of the Baptist as a representative of the limited part of his earthly (human) origin, in contrast to the Messiah “that cometh from heaven.” The AV rendering is somewhat misleading, for it introduces a confusion with the “earthly” of ver 15 (vide Westcott in loc.). RV rightly renders “of the earth.”

“Earthly” is to be distinguished from “earthly” = made of earth or clay (choibós, from chois, “earth dug out,” I Cor 16 47 ff). D. MIAH EDWARDS EARTHQUAKE, ūrāḥkēwak (شعب), ra’ash; vav-pās, seaṁmōs): The last earthquake which worked any damage in Pal and Syria occurred in 1837, and destroyed the village of Safed, near Mt. Hermon, and was felt in Hebron. Since that time a few feeble shocks have been felt but no damage was done. The region is just on the edge of the great earthquake circle whose center is in Armenia, and is liable to earthquakes. The large number of references in the Bible to earthquakes, and the evident fear in the minds of the people of those times, would seem to indicate that they were more frequent in Bible times than recently.

There are three main causes of earthquakes:

1. Earthquakes in Palestine

(1) Earth-quake. —In the slow process of cooling, the crust of the earth tends to break as it contracts. This causes a stress to be set up in the strata of the earth, and they come after a time a break or fault. The fault is caused by the breaking, which is usually several miles below the surface of the earth, and it spreads in the form of earth waves from the break as center. Seismographs in all parts of the world are now adjusted to receive the waves even though the origin is on the opposite side of the earth.

(2) Explosion of steam or gases under the surface. —Some earthquakes, especially those underneath the sea, are thought to be caused by water seeping through the soil and rocks and finding its way to the heated masses below. Steam is formed and if there is no escape for it, an explosion may occur. Such forces lie in the surface of the earth.

(3) Volcanic.—As earthquakes are of common occurrence in volcanic regions it seems likely that there is some connection between the two, but the relation has not been fully traced. It may be that the second cause is the origin of the idea of the volcano and earthquake. See further, DELUGE OF NOAH.

Many destructive earthquakes have been recorded in the history of Syria, but they have been mostly in the north, in the region of Aleppo. Jesus himself had seldom been affected by earthquakes. The Hauran valley in Jordan which is covered with volcanic remains and signs of violent shocks, and the cities on the coast have suffered much, but Jesus on the higher ground between has usually escaped with little destruction.

A number of earthquakes are mentioned in the Scriptures: (1) At Mount Sinai (Ex 19 18); (2) Korah and companions destroyed in a fissure and sinking ground (Nu 16 31); 4. Earthquakes in Scripture in the days of Saul (1 Sa 14 15); (4) after the flight of Elijah (1 K 19 11); (5) in the reign of Uzziah, between 790 and 740 BC (Am 1 1); Zec 14 5 probably refers to the same (Am, IX, x, 4); (6) at Christ’s death (Mt 27 51–54); (7) at Christ’s resurrection (Mt 28 2); (8) at Philippi when Paul and Silas were freed from prison (Acts 16 26). Most of these shocks seem to have been slight and caused little loss of life. Jos mentions one in the reign of Herod, “such as had not happened at any other time, which was very instructing to men of all nations and to all classes, and to one’s moral or religious interests. The prophet Jeremiah used the phrase as an indication of national or tribal indifference: “Moab hath been at e. from his youth” (Jer 46 11); “I am very sore displeased with the inhabitants of Moab” (49 27). The frequent allusions are made also by various prophets to individuals or groups of individuals, as “Woe to them that are e. in Zion” (Am 6 1); “Rise up, ye women that are at e.” (Isa 32 9), and “Tremble, ye women that are at e.” (Isa 29 6); also as a sign of Christ’s “coming, and of the end of the world” (Mt 24 3–7). See also Rev 11 13; 19 18.

EASE, ē, (נָעַשׁ, shal’ānān, שִׁלְעַנָּן, chiefly, “at ease”): Used 19 t in the OT and once in the NT, most frequently meaning tranquillity, security or comfort of mind; in an ethical sense, indicating contentment or indifference with reference to one’s moral or religious interests. The prophet Jeremiah used the phrase as an indication of national or tribal indifference: “Moab hath been at e. from his youth” (Jer 46 11); “I am very sore displeased with the inhabitants of Moab” (49 27). The frequent allusions are made also by various prophets to individuals or groups of individuals, as “Woe to them that are at e. in Zion” (Am 6 1); “Rise up, ye women that are at e.” (Isa 32 9), and “Tremble, ye women that are at e.” (Isa 29 6); also as a sign of Christ’s “coming, and of the end of the world” (Mt 24 3–7). See also Rev 11 13; 19 18.

The single instance of its use in the NT is illustrative of its figurative but most common usage in the OT, where it refers to moral indifference in the parable of the Rich Fool (Luke 16:11). “Take thine e., eat, drink, be merry” (Luke 16:11).

EAST, ē, CHILDREN OF THE (נֵבְיָה, mīrāh, kids, kēdhem, kētedem, kētedhem, and other derivatives of the same root; ἀνατολή, anatolē), Mèrdān is the equivalent of the Arab. mèsrkh, “the orient” or “place of sunrise.” In the same way mā’drāb, “west,” corresponds to the Arab. nūhdhem, and both mīrāh and mā’drāb occur in Ps 103 12: “As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.” Kaddham, “to precede” (wherein kddhem, “east,” and its derivatives correspond closely to the Arab. kaddhem, except that the Arab. derivatives do not include the signification “east.” In the majority of cases “east” and other words of direction require no explanation, but the expressions “the children of the east” (ןֵבְיָה}
"the land of the children of the east" (ereq b'ned kehem), and "the east country" (ereq kehem), belong to a different category. In the story of Gildeon (Jgs 6 33; 7 12; 8 10), we find several times the expression "the children of the east," and the Amalekites are described as the children of the east." In Jer 8 24 it is said of the same host: "For they had golden earrings, because they were Ishmaelites.", "Then commemorates 10), different Ch. poetical The The The the not belong b'ne way son Abraham and his son, as Abraham gave gifts; and he sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country."

Now Ishmael is the son of Abraham and Hagar, Midian of Abraham and Keturah, Kedar the son of Ishmael, and Amalek the grandson of Esau, dwelling in Edom. It is evident that we have to do with the Syrian desert and in a general way with Arabia, esp. its northern part, and with peoples like the modern Bedawin who kept camels and dwelt in tents, "houses of hair" (buyût sh'ar), as they are called by the Arabs of today.

A striking passage is Gen 29 1: "Then Jacob went on his journey, and came to the land of the east." He came through the country E. of the Jordan he traverses first a region of towns and villages with fields of grain, and then the wide desert where the Bedawin wander with their herds. The line is a sharp one. Within a very few hours he passes from the settled part where the rain, though scanty, is sufficient to bring the grain to maturity, to the bare desert.

Job was "the greatest of all the children of the east" (Job 1 5). These desert peoples had a name for wisdom, as we see from 1 Cor 4 30. "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east, and all the wisdom of Egypt"; and from Mt 2 1: "Now when Jesus was born . . . Wise-men from the east came.

EAST COUNTRY, kun'tri (נַעְרָיָ֑יִן, 'ereq misra'ı̂y): Lit. "country of the sunrise" over against the "country of the sunset" (Zec 8 7). The two together form a poetical expression indicating the whole earth.

EASTER, 'ēš'tār (אֶשְׂרָאֵל, pāshech, fr Aram. نَشَّة, pēqāh, and Heb נְשָׁת, pēqāh, the Passover festival): The Eng. word comes from the AS Eastre or Easter, a Teutonic goddess to whom sacrifice was offered in April, so the name was transferred to the paschal feast. The word does not properly occur in Scripture, although AV has it in Acts 12 4 where it stands for Paschaw, as it is rightly rendered in RV.

There is no trace of Easter celebration in the NT, though some would see an intimation of it in 1 Cor 5 7. The Jewish Christians in the early church continued to celebrate the Passover, regarding Christ as the true paschal lamb, and this naturally passed over into a commemoration of the death and resurrection of Our Lord, or an Easter feast. This was preceded by a fast, which was considered by one party as ending at the hour of the crucifixion, i.e., at 3 o'clock on Friday, by another as continuing until the hour of the resurrection before dawn on Easter morning. Differences arose as to the time of the Easter celebration, the Jewish Christians naturally fixing it at the time of the Passover feast which was regulated by the paschal moon. According to this reckoning it began on the evening of the 14th day of the moon of the month of Nisan without regard to the day of the week, while the gentile Christians identified it with the first day of the week, i.e. the Sunday of the resurrection. "the day of the month of Nisan," The latter practice finally prevailed in the church, and those who followed the other reckoning were stigmatized as heretics.

But differences arose as to the proper Sunday for the Easter celebration which led to long and bitter controversies. The Council of Nicea (325 AD, decreed that it should be on Sunday, but did not fix the particular Sunday. It was left to the bishop of Alexandria to determine, since that city was regarded as the authority in astronomical matters and he was to communicate the result of his determination to the other bishops. But this was not satisfactory, esp. to the western churches, and a definite rule for the determination of Easter was needed. By some it was kept as early as March 21, and by others as late as April 25, and others followed dates between. The rule was finally adopted, in the 7th cent., to celebrate Easter on the Sunday following the 14th day of the calendar moon which comes on, or after, the vernal equinox which was fixed for March 21. It is the astronomical moon, but near enough for practical purposes, and is determined without astronomical calculation by certain intricate rules adopted by ecclesiastical authority. These rules involve the Julian and the Gregorian (or the Dominiical) letter, the Epacts, the first being the numbers from 1 to 19, the cycle of the moon when its phases recur on the same days of the year, the first of the cycle being that in which the new moon falls on January 1. The Epacts indicate the moon's age at the beginning of each year. Easter was thus fixed by these rules, but another difficulty arose when the Gregorian calendar was adopted in 1582, the difference between it and the Julian being then 10 days. This of course affected the determination of Easter, and its celebration by the Gregorian church. It was never admitted the Gregorian calendar, occurs usually at a different time from that followed by the western churches. This difference may be as much as five weeks and it may occur as late as April 50, while in the West it cannot occur later than April 25 nor earlier than March 22. Occasionally the two come together but this is rare, since the difference between the two calendars is now 13 days. The Easter feast has been and still is regarded as the greatest in the Christian church, since it commemorates the most important event in the life of its Founder.

EBAL, 'ē-bal (אֶבַל, 'ēbbal, "bare") or OBAL (אֵבָל, 'ēbbal):

(1) A people and region of Joktanite, Arabia. See Dillmann, Das, and Glaser, Stein 11426. The latter form of the name is that given in Gen 10 28, the former in 1 Ch 1 22 and in the Sam text of Gen 10 28.

(2) A son of Shobal, son of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 23; 1 Ch 1 40).

EBAL, 'ē-bal, MOUNT (גַּבֵּיד, .Parameter 'ēbbal; Γαύβαλ, Gàubál): Rises N. of the vale of Shechem, over against Mt. Gerizim on the S. The mountain (Arab. el-Islamiyeh) reaches a height of 1,402 ft. above the floor of the valley, and 3,077 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean. The Samaritans feign that Gerizim is the higher; but it is more than 200
ft. lower than Ebal. These two mountains overhang the pass through which runs the main artery of intercourse between E. and W., the city of Nablus lying in the throat of the valley to the W. The ancient Shechem probably stood farther to the E. The lower slopes of Ebal as one ascends from Nablus are covered with gardens and orchards, the copious streams from the fountains under Gerizim washing its foot, and spreading fertility and beauty. The vine, the fig and the olive grow luxuriantly. Higher up we scramble over rough rocky terraces, where grow only the ubiquitous thistles and prickly shrubs.

From the broad summit a view of surpassing interest and beauty rewards the climber's toil. Westward beyond the hills and the plain of Sharon with its coast line of yellow sand running from Jaffa to Carmel, stretch the blue waters of the Mediterranean. From Carmel to Gilboa, Little Hermon and Tabor, roll the fruitful breadths of Esraielon: the uplands of Galilee, with Nazareth showing on the brow above the plain, rise away to the buttresses of Lebanon in the N. From the snowy peak of Hermon the eye ranges over the Jaulan and Mount Gilead to the Mountain of Bashan in the E., with the steep eastern wall of the Jordan valley in the foreground. The land of Moab is visible beyond the Dead Sea; and the heights around Jerus close the view on the S.

Round this splendid mountain, seen from afar on all sides, religious associations have gathered from old time. The Moeslem Weley on the top—the usual white-domed sanctuary—where it is said the head of the Baptist is buried, is doubtless the modern representative of some ancient seat of worship. The ruins of a church show that Christians also came under the spell of the hill.

The slopes of Ebal toward Gerizim played their part in that memorable scene, when, having conquered the central region of Pal, Joshua led the people to select an altar of hewn stones, and wrote upon the stones—either engraving on the stone itself, or impressing on plaster placed there for the purpose—a copy of the law, and then, as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded, placed half the tribes on the slope of Gerizim, and half on those of Ebal, and the ark with the priests and Levites in the center. Then with dramatic responses from the two divisions of the people, the blessings and the cursings of the law were read (Josh 8 30 ff; cf Dt 27 11 ff). In all the future, therefore, this mountain, towering aloft in the very heart of the land, would remind beholders far and near of their people's covenant with God. It has sometimes been questioned if the reading of the law could be heard by the people in the way described. The formation of the sides of the valley at the narrowest part, and the acoustics, which have been tested more than once, leave no reasonable doubt as to the possibility.

The importance of the mountain from a military point of view is illustrated by the ruins of a massive fortress found on the summit. W. Ewing

(2) A companion of Ezra in his return (Ezr 8 6 = Obeth (1 Esd 8 32).

EBED-MELECH, e-bed-mâ'lek, ob-ed-mâ'lek (Ezr 2 60, 61; Neh 7 60)

'ebed-melech, 'servant of the king' or 'of [god] Melek': An Ethiopian eunuch in the service of King Zedekiah, who interceded with the king for the prophet Jeremiah and rescued him from the dungeon into which he had been cast to die (Jer 39 7-13). For this, the word of Jeh through Jeremiah promised Ebed-melech that his life should be spared in the fall of Jerus (Jer 39 15-18).

(1) Here Israel was defeated by the Philistines, 4,000 men falling in the battle (1 Sm 4 1 ff). It appears also to have been the scene of the disaster when the ark of God was captured (vs 3 ff). The place is not identified. It was over against Apehek, but this site is also unknown (of Josh 12 18). Onom places it between Jerus and Ascalon, in the neighborhood of Beth-shemesh. Conder suggests Deir Aban, fully 3 miles E of 'Ain Shems (PEF, III, 24).
(2) A stone set up by Samuel to perpetuate the memory of the signal victory granted to Israel over the Philistines in answer to his prayer (1 Sm 7 12). It stood between Mizpeh and Shen. The latter is probably identical with 'Ain Sinta, N. of Bethel. This defines the district in which it may be found; but no identification is yet possible. W. Ewing

The Ebionites were a sect of heretics frequently mentioned by the early Fathers. In regard to their opinions, as in regard to those of most early heretical sects, there is the difficulty that to a large extent we are dependent for our information on their opponents. These opponents were not generally very careful to apprehend exactly the views of those whose opinions they undertook to refute. It adds to the difficulty in the present case that there is a dubiety as to the persons designated by the title.

Sometimes, it is admitted, the name was used to designate all Jewish Christians irrespective of their opinions; at other times it denotes a sect akin to the Christians, described as a purely human origin to Our Lord. There are, however, certain works, the Clementine writings, which from statements of the Fathers may be assumed to represent the views of this sect, but as these represent views to some extent divergent, it is difficult to decide which is the truly Ebionitic. There are also certain apocryphal books which present affinities with Ebionism. The quotations from the Gospel according to the Hebrews—the only gospel the Ebionites received—likewise afford means of appreciating their views. This gospel has come down to us only in isolated quotations, for the accuracy of which we have no guaranties. Finally, it has to be borne in mind that no sect can persist through centuries of changing circumstances, and not in turn undergo change.

1. Origin of the Name.—Tertullian and Epiphanius assume the sect to have received its name from a certain Ebion or Hebion. Others use language which seems to imply the belief in a person called Ebion. This, however, is generally now regarded as a mistake.

No trace of the existence of such a person is to be found. The sect in question seems to have assumed the name Ebionites, "the poor ones," from the first Beatitude (Mt 5:3), claiming to be the continuation into the new dispensation of the "poor and needy" of the Ps, e.g. 69 33; 70 5; 74 21.

It has been mooted that the sect may have had a leader who assumed the title "the poor man." Besides that we have no trace of his existence, the title would almost certainly have been treated as an Aram. word and put in the status emaxmus as Ebions, which in Gr would have second Ebion.

The ordinary view of the origin of the name has the advantage of analogy in its favor. The pre-Reformation Protestants of the 12th and 13th cents. in France called themselves "the poor men" (of Lyons). The fact that the apostle James in his address to the dispersion assumes the title of Ebion (15:27), claiming to be the continuation of the "poor" of the Ps, e.g. 69 33; 70 5; 74 21.

Some have been inclined to press unduly a play on the name, as if the Father of the Ebionites was connected with the Samaritans, the Essenes, the Essenians and Carpocratians, yet desired to be regarded as

II. Authorities for the Opinions of the Ebionites.—As indicated above, the main authorities for these are Irenaeus, Tertullian and

1. Irenaeus, Hippolytus.

Tertullian The characteristics of the Ebionites and noted by them were, first, the negative view of the consubstantiality of the Father and Son, and, secondly, the negative view of the divine power of Christ at His baptism—the reward of His perfect holiness. According to one form of the theory, the Holy Ghost was the eternal Son of God. Another view was that the power which depended upon Him was the Divine wisdom, the Logos. Another view of the influence of this Divine power He performed miracles and taught with superhuman wisdom. But this Divine influence deserted Jesus on the Cross, hence the cry of bystanders (Mt 27:46). The Divine power, however, raised Him from the dead and caused Him to ascend on high. Hippolytus brings the Ebionites into close connection with the Essenes and with a certain Alchabades, whose views he had to combat in Rome. The last claim to have found his views on a work of Eksesai.

From two other sources we derive further information: Origen and Jerome both notify the fact that the Ebionites retained "young and Homoiousian" (it is rendered "homoiousian" by us in and Jerome our AV and RV). This, so far as the mere word is concerned, is indubitably correct. There is another point in which both afford us information. The first says (Contra Celsum, v.51) that there are two classes of Ebionites, one of which denies the miraculous conception and birth of Our Lord, the other of which affirms it. Jerome, in his letter to Augustine, not only asserts the same thing but calls the one class, those affirming the miraculous birth, Nazareans, the other class, the Ebionites. Origen in his second book against Celsum speaks as if the only distinction between the Ebionites and other Christians was their obedience to the Mosaic law, and by their example rebuts the position that the Jews in the Old Testament deserted the law of their fathers. Another feature of Ebionism presented to us by Jerome (In Jes. 24) is their chiliastic view—the personal reign of Our Lord for 1,000 years as the Jewish Messiah.

The writer who gives the most voluminous account of the Ebionites—"Ebionaeus" as he calls them—is Epiphanius. With him it is at once heresy and babes in Christ. He called heresy No. XXI. But as he, so far as the level of his mind permits, always treated the Ebionites as heresy No. XXIX. He had already in a more compendious way considered a similarly named sect, mentioning it in No. XVIII. It, however, is Jewish while this is Christian. The Jewish sect is distinguished by their profane animal food and offering no sacrifice. They have thus an affinity with the Essenes. They have a peculiarity that, while they honored the patriarchs, they rejected the Pentateuch which related their history. These Nazareans dwelt E. of the Jordan in Gill. and Eusebius, H. of the Christian Nazareans. This name had been applied at first to a group of Jews, as the Christians. Epiphanius identifies them with the Essenes and declares that they distinguished the tincture of circumcision and the ceremonial law. They allowed the Gospel of St. but without the genealogies. As H. No. XXX he proceeds to consider the Ebionites. Epiphanius assumes that he had been a man of mark, and calls him a "homoiousian," a type of Ebionite, who was connected with the Samaritans, the Essenes, the Essenians and Carpocratians, yet desired to be regarded a Christian. The heresy originated after the flight of the church to Pella. They denied the miraculous birth of Christ, maintained that the Divine influence came down upon Him at His baptism. This Divine wisdom had inspired, and in a sense dwelt, in all the patriarchs and sages. The doctrine of Jesus was regarded as that of Adam revived. This body was crucified and rose again, and there are records of the Gospel of St. Paul by the Ebionites. It is exceedingly difficult to form a clear, self-consistent view of the Ebionites from the statements of Epiphanus, yet there are points in which his information is of value.

Though Justin Martyr does not name the Ebionites in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew (47), he mentions two classes of Jewish Christians: (a) those who not only themselves observe the law but would compel the gentle believers also to be circumcised and keep the whole law, and will hold no communion with those who refuse to become Jews; (b) those who, observing the Mosaic law themselves, enter into communion with uncircumcised gentle believers. The former appear to be an ingenious device. It is well noted that Justin does not ascribe to them any doctrinal divergence from the orthodox views. In the following he mentions some that denied the divinity of Our Lord, but these were Gentiles (hémétérōn Íōnuos) "offspring of the faithful.

III. Literature of the Ebionites.—One thing of importance we do owe to Epiphanus—the indication of the lit. produced by the Ebionites, from which we may get their views at first hand. This includes the Dialogues of the Ebionites, the Clementines (Homilies and Recognitions); to which we would add the Ascension of Isaiah and the Odes of Solomon. It may be remarked that this lit. appears to represent the opinion of different classes of the Ebionites; only completely, nor were the bearing these works have on the Ebionites.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews we know only through quotations. We can have no certainty that these quotations are accurate. The quotations may have been interpolated, and the further the book from which the quotations have been made has probably passed through several recensions. The discussion of the question of the relation of this book to the canonical Gospel of Mt is considered elsewhere (see Apostles' Gospels). One must draw at least two recensions of this gospel, one nearer and the other farther from the Gospel; the former, the Nazarenes, differed only by omitting the genealogy from the First Gospel of the Canon. The other was more strictly Ebionite and omitted all mention of the miraculous birth. The Ebionite recension began, as Epiphanus tells us, already with the Gospel of the Apostles. The assertion of Epiphanus that the Ebionites rejected the prophets is supported by a quotation from the Gospel according to the Ebionites given by Jerome (Adh. Pelag., ill.2): "In the prophets, after they were anointed by the Spirit, was found the word of God, which genealogy [lit., "cakes of honey and oil"]; cf Ex 16 31; Nu 11 8) in the account of the food of John may be due to the fact that the animal food contributed to the sect. One passage, which appears to be a denunciation of wealth in itself, is an addition of a second rich man to the account (Luke 16:19) and was originally a singular verse, quoted from this gospel both by Origin and Jerome, deserves special notice for several reasons: "My mother, the Holy Ghost, took me by one of my hairs and bore me to the great mountain Tabor." The designation of the Holy Ghost as my mother may be a reminiscence of the Holy Spirit. It implies a mathematic view of the doctrine of the Trinity after the form of a human family. It is a note of geography, for Galilee rising up to 4,000 ft. high and behind it the mountains of the hill country of Galilee rising up to 2,000 ft. high, leaving a clear, level plain of about 10,000 ft. It is difficult to understand how anyone residing near these mountains could have been a witness of this mount. Rising from the plain of Esdraelon it is prominent, but with the higher mountains behind it, it could not have been seen by anyone, even those near to it. It was, however, the top of Hermon, 10,000 ft. It is difficult to understand how anyone residing near these mountains could have been a witness of this mountain. It is in the Ascension of Isaiah prominent, but with the higher mountains behind it, it could not have been seen by anyone, even those near to it. It was, however, the top of Hermon, 10,000 ft.

The Clementine lit. attributed by Epiphanus to the Ebionites is a more important source of information for their opinions. It has come down to us complete in three or four hundred pages, the Homilies, the Recognitions, and two Epitomes which, however, differ less than the two larger works. They all seem to be recensions of an earlier work which has disappeared. The foundation of all of these is a species of religious novel on which are grafted sermons of Peter and James and visions of Simon Magus. Clement, a young Roman orphan of rank in search of a religion, meets Barnabas, who tells him of Christ, describing Him as the "Son of God," and says that He had appeared in Judaea. To learn more about Jesus, Clement proceeds to Caesarea, where he meets Peter. He thereaccompany Peter to the various places whither the apostle pursues Simon Magus, and in course of his journeys he meets and recognizes his father, his brother and his mother; hence the title Recognitions. It is in the discourses of Peter that the Ebionites appears. Its theology is fundamentally Jewish and Esseni. That it is Judaizing is evidenced by the covert hostility to the apostle Paul. There are elements that are not those of orthodox Judaism. The Messiah is coeal, and nearly so, with the devil; in other words, the position is a modification of Parseesim (Hom., Ill, 5). If the discourse of Barnabas is excluded, our Lord is always called the "Teacher." (Hom., Ill, 60). The phrase implies an opposition to some who not only did not sanction, but forbade, marriage (Hom., Ill, 26).

If the ignoring of the work and apostleship of St. Paul be regarded as the criterion of the Judaizers, that is to say, the Ebionites, then in the earliest of these two books to be recovered in any form is from the first century. The writer refers to the martyrdom of Peter in Rome, in his discussion of the Pauline (IV, 3). The description of elders and shepherds hating one another (III, 29), "lawless elders and unjust shepherds who will ravage their sheep" (III, 24), seems a view of the church's state as it appeared to a Judaizer when the Pauline view
IV. History of Ebionism.—All authorities combine in asserting a close connection between the Essenes and the Ebionites. At first sight there are serious points of difference; principally these, the Ebionites believe in the Divinity of Our Lord, the,params: they held, that the organization in the Church was only provisional, of the ceremonial law, holding that believers of gentil or more distinctly could be received into the church only if they were first circumcised. The keen dialectic of Paul forced them from this position. The abrogation of the law was closely connected in Paul’s reasoning with the Divinity of Our Lord; consequently some of them may have felt that they could maintain their views more easily by denying His supreme Divinity and the reality of the incarnation. The phenomena of His life rendered it impossible for anyone to declare Him to be merely man. Hence the complex notion of a Divine influence—an aeon, coming down upon Him. If, however, His birth were miraculous, then the supreme greatness of Messiahship was so great that consequently they were led to deny the virgin birth.

Not till Theodotus appeared was the purely humanitarian view of Our Lord’s person maintained. All the Heb Christians, however, did not pursue the above course. A large section remained at each general stage, and to the end one portion, the Nazarenes, maintained their orthodox doctrinal position, and at the same time obeyed the requirements of the law. The dualism which is found in the Clementines is an endeavor to explain the power of evil in the word, and the function of Satan. The Nazarenes, in fact, were held to be the residence of the Sinister Divinity. In the earlier days the Ebionites and the Nazarenes distrusted above all others the artificial construction of the Christology of the letter, which made the very nature of our Divinity the point of contention. This was a point of great weakness, and consequently the Ebionites always stood as立场 adversus, by citing this argument to the whole process. However, when they were put on the trial, they could not answer the question, was Jesus of Nazareth a Divine person, the Divine Logos made flesh by miraculous conception and birth. The abstract and general character of the theory of Ebionism is not denied, but we do say that evidence we have in the direction. There are several points identical with Ebionism: the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Divine Logos, the Divine Manifestations. The Ebionites, however, are not stated in the same way, the Ebionites of the Clementines, further to this that is the simple position occupied by the Nazarenes.

The Jewish Christians appear to have formed an organization of their own, separate from the church as a whole. If the Ebionites with the Nazarenes the Ebionites would have been only the sect from which later sects have developed. The Ebionites, however, must not be thought of as forming a complete ecclesiastical system for themselves. We, however, must not think that every variation of faith had a separate organization for itself. Strict Jewish ceremonial allowed no Jew to eat with any other not a Jew. The "love-feasts" of the early church fulfilled this eating in common. If gentle Christians were present the Ebionites could not join, hence the need of a separate church. All Jewish Christians who reverence the law could meet together and partake of the "love-feasts". This was the origin of the church. In short, Ebionism was a thing of individuals, whose opinion ran through the whole gamut of faith, from the Nazarenes, who differed from the orthodox simply in remaining Jews, to those whose Judaism alone prevented them from following Theodotus of Byzantium, and who therefore sank back into pure Judaism.

V. Evidence from Ebionism for the Doctrine of the Primitive Church.—In dealing with this branch of our subject we have to consider that the tendency of those who in the early days wrote against heresy was to exaggerate the difference between the Church and the orthodox. On the other hand we have to consider the psychological difficulty involved in a person recognizing that anyone whom he daily met, whom he could eat and sleeping like other men, was more than man, was Divine. This difficulty, great to all, was doubly great to the Jew. If we consider what the origin of Christian theology was, it was an attempt to give a reasoned and systematic explanation of the phenomenon of Jesus Christ. Christ’s character, His deeds and His claims had to be explained. The orthodox explanation which gradually became more definite as time rolled on was that He was the second person of the Trinity became incarnate, and the purpose of this incarnation that He might save many from their sins. This purpose He accomplished by dying on the cross and rising again. The primitive Church owed its theology to Paul and John. Repugnant as much of this was to the Jews, yet the Ebionites, earnest, prejudiced Jews as they were, could not affirm in the presence of the facts of His career that Jesus was merely a man. They had to imagine a Divine influence coming down upon Him at His baptism, setting Him apart from all others. We have no trace of this at all: it stands at the end of a process of degradation. The ideal concerning the person of Christ, it was only when the Church had somewhat faded that men began to doubt His Divinity. The division of the personality seems to emerge at the same time. The earlier Ebionites, like the rest of the 1st-cent. believers, regarded Christ as one person only: in the Ebionites there is a notion of a heavenly aeon separate from Jesus. The Ebionites seem to have held under varying forms a doctrine of the Trinity, and their holding it is an evidence that the church at large held it, not of course in that definiteness it assumed later, but essentially. To some extent the same may be said in regard to the Pauline doctrine of redemption. It is to be observed that both writers, he of the Homilies as well as the writer of the Recognitions, dislike and ignore Paul, even if they do not attempt to pillory him under the image of Simon Magus, as many have thought that they do. What, however, is also to be observed, is that they do not venture to denounce him by name. Paul and his teachings must have been, in the early part of the 2d cent., held in such deep reverence that no one could hope to destroy them by direct assault; the only hope was a flank attack. This reverence for Paul implies the reception of all he taught. All the specially Pauline doctrines of original sin, of the sacrificial death of Christ, and all the cognate ideas must have been held strongly by the early church or the Ebionites would have denounced Paul in the Clementines by name. Schwegler would argue that Justin Martyr was an Ebionite, and that the Ebionites had not mentioned nor quotes Paul. To this it may be answered that as the emperors to whom he addressed his apologies were heathens, and Trypho, with whom he had his dialogue, was a Jew, he naturally did not name one whose authority would be valueless to those he was addressing. He is equally silent as to Peter, James and John. If he does not quote Paul there are several indubitable echoes of his phrases and his thoughts.

In the face of the recent discoveries made in Egypt one cannot despair of MSS turning up which may throw needed light on this heresy. Were the Gospel according to the Hebrews to be found, or a MS of Hegesippus, we should be in a better position to decide a number of questions.

Literature.—Contemporary writers on Ebionites: Ireneaus; Tertullian; Hippolytus; Origen; Eusebius, III, 27; Epiphanius; Jerome; Justin Martyr (Trypho, 47, 48) refers to the Ebionites without naming them.

Ebionite writings: Clementine Homilies; Clementine Recognitions through the epistomes: Asc. Ixx; Odes of Solomon.

EBONY, ebó’ni (ἐβόνιον, kōhbinon [pl. only], vocalization uncertain; cf Arab. ḏbūná): Mentioned (Ezk 27 15) along with ivory as merchandise of Tyre brought by the men of Dedan. This is the heavy, black, heart-wood of various species of Diospyros, natives of Southern India and Ceylon; the best kind is obtained from D. ebenum. The sap-wood, being white and valueless, is cut away, but the trunk was sufficiently large to leave blocks of heart-wood 2 ft. in diameter and 10 or more ft. long. Ebony was used by the ancient Egyptians, Greeks and Romans, as well as the Phoenicians, for ivory purposes; it was frequently inlaid with ivory. In Europe it has been a favorite for cabinet-making down to recent times.

ECCE HOMO, ek’sē hō’mō (Ἰδοὺ ὁ ἀνθρώπος, ἰδὸν ὁ ἀνθρώπος, “Behold, the man!” In 19 5): Pilate’s statement regarding Jesus during His trial. While the significance of this statement is somewhat debatable, yet there is little doubt, as judged from his attitude and statement immediately following, that Pilate was endeavoring to appeal to the accusers’ sympathies and to point out to them the so called humanity of Jesus. The ordinary punctuation which places an exclamation point after “Behold” and a period after “the man” is evidently incorrect if the grammatical structure in the Gr is to be observed, which gives to the second and third words the nominative form, and which therefore admits of a mild exclamation, and therefore of the emphasis upon “the man.” Some, however, hold the contrary view and maintain that the utterance was made in a spirit of contempt and ridicule, as much as to say, “Behold here a mere man.” See esp. on this view Marcus Dods in Expositor’s Gr Test. It would seem, however, that the former of the two views would be sustained by the chief facts in the case.

LITERATURE
Reading this book one soon becomes aware that it is a discussion of certain difficult problems of life. It begins with a title 1. Structure (1 1), followed by a preface (vs 2–11). of the Book It has a formal conclusion (13 8–13).

Between the preface and the conclusion, the body of the book is made up of materials of two kinds—first a series of "I" sections, sections uttered in the 1st per. sing., a record of a personal experience; and second, an alternating series of gnomic sections, sections made up of proverbs (say 4 5.9–9.12; 5 1–12; 7 1–3.10; 10 1–8; 9 7–10; 8 1–8). Throughout the "thou" sections, as most of them have the pronoun of the 2d per. sing. The idea of the vanity of all things characterizes the record of experience, but it also appears in the "thou" sections (e.g. 9 9). On the other hand the proverb element is not wholly lacking in the "I" sections (e.g. 4 1–3).

In the preface the speaker lays down the proposition that all things are real, and that the results of human effort are illusive (1 2.3). Human generations, day and night, Contents The wind, the streams, are alike the repetition of an unending round (vs 4–7).

The same holds in regard to all human study and thinking (vs 8–11). The speaker shows familiarity with the phenomena which we think of as those of natural law, and insists on the illusion of the imagination, but he thinks of them in the main as monotonously limiting human experience. Nothing is new. All effort of Nature or of man is the doing again of something which has already been done.

After the preface the speaker introduces himself, and recounts his experiences. At the outset he had a noble ambition for wisdom and discipline, but all he attained to was unreality and perplexity of mind (vs 12–18). This is equally the meaning of the word "vainness and vexation of spirit" or "vanity and a striving after wind." ("emptiness, and struggling for breath"), though the first of these two tetrasyllables is the better grounded.

Finding no adequate satisfaction in the pursuits of the scholar and thinker, taken by themselves, he seeks to combine these with the pursuit of agreeable sensations—alike those which come from luxury and those which come from activity and enterprise and achievement (2 1–12). No one could find in such a shape his life. He is making the experiment, but again he only attains to unreality and perplexity of spirit. He says to himself that at least it is in itself profitable to be a wise man rather than a fool, but his comfort is impaired by the fact that both alike are mortal (vs 13–17). He finds little reassurance in the idea of laboring for the benefit of posterity; posterity is often not worthy (vs 18–21). One may toil unremittingly, but what is the use (vs 22.23)?

He does not find himself helped by bringing God into the problem. "It is no good for a man that he should eat and drink and make his soul see good in his toil" (vs 24–26, as most naturally translated), even if he thinks of it as the gift of God; for how can one be sure that the gift of God is anything but lust of life, and that he is just to dismiss lightly the idea of God as a factor in the problem. It is true that there is a time for everything, and that everything is "beautiful in its time." It is also true that ideas of infinity are in men's minds, ideas which they cannot utterly or fully comprehend (3 1–18). Here are tokens of God, who has established an infinite order. If we understood His ways better, that might unravel our perplexities. And if God is, immortality may be, and the solution of our problems may be in that direction. For a man cannot let up in that direction if the speaker were coming out into the light, but doubt resumes its hold upon him. He asks himself, "Who knoweth?" and he settles back into the darkness. He has got to talk more lightly about "eat and drink, and make his soul enjoy good" is not worth while; and now he reaches the conclusion that, unsatisfactory as this is, there is nothing better (vs 19–22). And so the record of experiences continues, hopeful passages alternating with pessimistic passages. After a while the agnosticism and pessimism recede somewhat, and the hopeful passages become more positive. Even though "the poor man's wisdom is despised," we are addressed, called the "poor."

Therefore, it is wise heard in quiet are better than the cry of him that ruleth among fools" (9 17). He says "Surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God" (8 12), no matter how strongly appearances may indicate the contrary.

The gnomic sections are mostly free from agnostic and pessimism. The book as a whole sums itself up in the conclusion, "Fear God, and keep his commandments" (12 15).

Of course the agnostic and pessimistic utterances in Eccle are to be regarded as the presentation of one side of a question. Disconnect them and they are no part of the moral and religious teaching of the book, except in an indirect way. At no point should we be misled in thinking that there is really doubting in regard to God or moral obligation. He delineates for us a soul in the toils of mental and spiritual conflict. It is a delineation which may serve for warning, and which is in other ways wholesome and constructive; and in the outcome of it, it is full of encouragement.

In some passages the speaker in Eccle has in mind the solution of the problems of life which we are accustomed to call Epicurean (e.g. 5 18–20; 7 16.17; 8 15; 9 10, not 2 24)—the principle of indulgence, or of avoiding extremes, and in getting from life as many agreeable sensations as possible; but it is not correct to say that he advocates this philosophy. He rather presents it as an alternative.

His conclusion is the important part of his reasoning. All things are vanity. Everything passes away. Yet (he says) it is better to read and use good words than bad words. Therefore because the Great Teacher is wise, he ever teaches the people knowledge, and in so doing he ever seeks to do good words, which he has heard from his teacher, who is a man of truth. "The words of the wise are as goads; and as nails well fastened" ("clinched at the back") (12 11). Such are the words of all the great masters. So (he ends) my soul, be warned! There are many books in this world. Choose good ones. And his conclusion is: Revere the Mighty Spirit. Keep to good principles. That is the whole duty of man. For everything at last becomes clear; and "good" stands out clearly from "evil."

We have noticed that our book has "I" sections and "thou" sections. Certainly there are structural marks, but as such they are capable of being interpreted in various ways. 2. Compositional Authorship? Partialistic hypotheses can easily be formed, and perhaps there is no great power to be in them, that there is a thing, that there are no phenomena which cannot be accounted for by the hypothesis that we have here just the work of one author, who sometimes speaks proverbial utterances, either his own or those of other men. As proving the integrity of the book three points present themselves. First, in some cases (e.g. 7 14b–16) the experience matter and the gnomic matter are closely combined in sense and in grammatical construction. Second, it is possible to interpret all the comments as the thinking of the author as a whole argument. Third, if we so interpret them the book is a unit, the argument moving forward continuously out of the speculative into the practical, and out of the darkness into the light.

The speaker in Eccl calls himself Kôheleth (1. 2. 12 and other places), rendered “the Preacher” in the EV. The word does not occur 4. Kôheleth elsewhere, although it is from a stem common in common use. Apparently it has been coined for a purpose by the author of Eccl. In form it is a fem. participle, though it denotes a man. This is best explained as a case of the using of an abstract expression for a concrete, as when English say “Your Honor,” “Your Majesty.” The other words of the same stem are used in composition of people gathering in assemblies, and the current explanation is to the effect that Kôheleth is a person who draws an audience whom he may address. To this there are two objections: First, the participle is intransitive; its natural implication is that of a person who participates in an assembly, not of one who causes the participants to assemble. Second, the assembly distinctively indicated by the words of this stem is the official assembly for the trans- action of public business, such as the One Great Innt. on this basis Kôheleth seems to mean citizenship, or concretely, a citizen—a citizen of such respectability that he is entitled to participate in public assemblies. It is in the character of citizen-king that the speaker in Eccl relates his experiences and presents his ideas.

This word for “assembly” and its cognates are in the Gr often tr by ἐκλήσια and its cognates (e.g. Dt 4.10; 9.10; Jgs 20.2; 21.5-8). So we are not surprised to find Kôheleth rendered by the Gr ἐκκλησιαστέας, and this Latinized into Ecclesiastes.

The speaker in Eccl speaks not only in the character of Kôheleth, but in that of “the son of David, king in Jerusalem” (1.1). So far as the Son of David was the king in Jerusalem? question might be either Solomon or any other king of the dynasty, or might be a composite or an ideal king. He is represented (1.12-2.11) as “king over Israel,” and as distinguished for wisdom, for his luxuries, for his great enterprises in building and in business. These marks fit Solomon better than any other king of the dynasty, unless possibly Uzziah. Possibly it is not absurd to apply to Solomon even the phrase “all that he did in Jerusalem,” which otherwise we find only in 1 Ch 29.25; 1 K 3.12; 2 Ch 1.12. It is safer, however, to use an alternative statement. The speaker in Eccl is either Solomon or some other actual or composite or ideal king of the dynasty of David.

If it were agreed that Solomon is the citizen king who, in Eccl, is represented as speaking, that would not be the same thing as agreeing that

5. Date and Solomon is the author of the book.

Authorship

No one thinks that Sir Galahad is the author of Tennyson’s poem of that name. Kôheleth the king is the character into whose mouth the author of Ecclesiastes puts the utterances which he wishes to present, but it does not follow that the author is himself Kôheleth.

The statement is often made that Jewish tradition attributes the writing of Eccl to Solomon; but can anyone cite any relatively early tradition to this effect? Is this alleged tradition anything else than the confusing of the author with the character whom he has depicted? The well-known saying in Bâbahâ’ Bathrâ’ attributes Eccl to “Hezekiah and his company,” not to Solomon. And the tradition which is represented by the order in which the books occur in the Heb Bibles seems to place it still later. But there are now many factors which this tradition cannot be noted: First, it classes Eccl with the 5 miscellaneous books (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est) known as the five ne‘gillôth, the five Rolls. Second, in the count of books which makes the number 23 or 24 in classes Eccl as one of the last 5 books (Eccl, Est, Dan, Jœl, Neh, 1 and 2 Ch). That the men who made this arrangement regarded the books of this group as the latest in the Bible is a natural inference.

This agrees with the internal marks which constitute the principal evidence we have on this point.

The grammatical character and the vocabulary of Eccl are exceptionally peculiar, and they strongly indicate that the book was written in the same period with these other latest books of the OT. The true date is not much earlier or later than 400 BC (see Chronicles), though many place it a cent. or a cent. and a half later. Details concerning these phenomena may be found in Driver’s Introduction or other Introductions, or in commentaries. Only a few of the points will be given here, with barely enough illustrative instances to render the points intelligible.

In Eccl the syntax of the vb. is peculiar. The imperfect with were passed over, the ordinary Heb narrative tense, occurs—for example, “And I applied my heart” (1.17)—but it is rare. The narrator habitually uses the perfect with הוה (e.g. 1.13; 2.11.12.14.15.16.17). In any Eng. book we would find it very nearly the same. We were in the habit of using the progressive form of the vb. instead of the ordinary form— if instead of saying “And I applied my heart” he should say “And I was applying my heart,” “And I was looking on all the works,” “And I was turning” (1.13; 2.11.12), and so on. Another marked peculiarity is the frequent repeating of the pronoun along with the vb.: “I said in my heart, even I;” “And I was hating, even I, all my labor” (2.1.18 and continually). The phrase with this in the one in Jerusalem question might be either Solomon or any other king of the dynasty, or might be a composite or an ideal king. He is represented (1.12-2.11) as “king over Israel,” and as distinguished for wisdom, for his luxuries, for his great enterprises in building and in business. These marks fit Solomon better than any other king of the dynasty, unless possibly Uzziah. Possibly it is not absurd to apply to Solomon even the phrase “all that he did in Jerusalem,” which otherwise we find only in 1 Ch 29.25; 1 K 3.12; 2 Ch 1.12. It is alleged that Ecel copies from Ecclus, but it is more probable that the latter copied from the former. It is alleged that the Wiss controvers Eccl; if it does, that does not prove that the two are contemporary. It is alleged that the writer is familiar with the philosophy of Epicurus, and therefore must have lived later than Epicurus, who died 270 BC; or even later than Lucretius of the 1st cent. BC. If there were proof that this was a case of borrowing Epicurus or Lucretius might have been the borrowers; but there is no such proof; the selflessness which constitutes the nucleus of Epicureanism has exhibited itself in human lit. from the beginning. The doctrine that there is no God made Ecel and Omar Khayyam have no weight to prove that the Heb author was later than the Pers. Ecel

ED ("T", "ədh", "witness"): The name of the altar erected by the trans-Jordanic tribes upon finally taking possession of Gilead (Josh 22 10.11.34); probably E. of the Jordan opposite Jericho. But neither the MT nor the LXX contained the word. Both the AV and RV, however, insert the word on the authority of a few MSS. It has been suggested that it is the final "eth in Gal'ədh, the name given by Laban and Jacob to the eigth of Jacob's tents in the vicinity (Gen 31 47.48). According to the MT, the name of the altar is the entire sentence: "It is a witness between us that Jeh is God." The opposition of the ten tribes to the erection of this altar was on the score that it was built after the pattern of the great altar burnt offering (Josh 22 11.50), which was a horned altar forbidden in ordinary lay sacrifice. There is in it, therefore, no indication of a general opposition to lay sacrifices on altars of earth or unhewn stone (see Wiener, EPC, 198).

EDDINUS, ed'i-us (B), "E'dinw, E'dinwos, A, "E'dinu, E'dinwos: One of the "holy singers") at Josiah's Passover (1 Esd 1 15). AV reads here Jeduthun, the corresponding name in the psalms (2 Ch 35 15).

EDEN, e'd'n (T, "e'dhon, "delight"); "E'dep, Edem): (1) The land in which "Jeh God planted a garden," where upon his creation "he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen 2 8). In the Assyris, the name means "plain" and it is from this that the Bib. word is probably derived. Following are the references to Eden in the Bible, aside from those in Gen 2 and 3: Gen. 4 16; Is 51 3; Ezek 28 13; 31 9.16.1. 36 55; Joel 2 3. The Garden of Eden is said to be "eastward, in Eden" (Gen 2 8): where the vegetation was luxurious (2 9) and the fig tree indigenous (3 7), and where it was watered by irrigation. All kinds of animals, including Cain's pair, were found there (2 19.20). Moreover the climate was such that clothing was not needed for warmth. It is not surprising, therefore, that the pl. of the word has the meaning "delights," and that Eden has been supposed to mean "the land of delights," and that the word became a synonym for Paradise.

The location of Eden is in part to be determined from the description already given. It must be there where there is a climate adapted to the production of fruit trees and of animals capable of domestication, and in general to the existence of man in his primitive condition. In particular, its location is supposed to be determined by the statements regarding the rivers coursing through it and surrounding it. The river that came from Eden and divided the land into two (Gen 2 10) which was parted and became four heads (ro'shim), a word which (Jgs 8 16; Job 1 17) designates main detachments into which an army is divided, and therefore would more properly signify branches than heads, permitting Jos and others to include the river as referring to the Persian or Jordan. The word, however, is probably a derivative of the name, and the location of the river in the vicinity of the Orinoco or the Jordan is quite possible, and perhaps the river represented in the Talmudic traditions of its location somewhere in the vicinity of the Garden of Eden. It is fair to say, however, that he supposed himself to be upon the E. coast of Asia, for the traditions of its location somewhere in Central Asia are numerous and persistent. Naturalists have, with Quartofojas, generally fixed upon the portion of Central Asia stretching E. from the Pamir, often referred to as the roof of the world, and from which flow four great rivers—the Indus, the Tarim, the Sur Daria (Jaxartes), and the Amu Daria (Oxus)—as the original cradle of mankind. This conclusion has been arrived at from the fact that at the present time the three fundamental types of the races of mankind are grouped about this region. The Negro races are, indeed, in general far removed from the location, but still fragments of them both pure and mixed are found in various localities both in the interior and on the sea-shore and adjacent islands where they would naturally radiate from this center, while the yellow and the white races here meet at the present time in close contact. In the words of Quatrefages, "No other region of the globe presents a similar union of extreme human types distributed round a common center" (The Human Species, 176).

Phylogeny, also, points to this same conclusion. On the E. are the monosyllabic languages, on the N. the polysyllabic or agglutinative languages, on the W. and S. the inflectional or Aryan languages, of which the Sanskrit is an example, being closely allied to nearly all the languages of Europe. Moreover, it is to this center that we trace the origin of nearly all the domesticated animals. Naturally, therefore, the same high authority writes, "There we are inclined to say the first human beings appeared and multiplied till the populations over-flowed as from a bowl and spread themselves in waves in every direction." Hence in the case of our conclusion, as already said, a large number of most eminent authorities agree. But it should be noted that if, as we believe, there was a universal destruction of antediluvian man, the center of dispersion had to be the northern part of the earth, for the latter would be that from the time of Noah, and so would not refer to the Eden from which Adam and Eve were driven. The same may be said of Hezekel's theory that man originated in a submersed continent within the area of the Indian Ocean.

Dr. William F. Warren has with prodigious learning attempted to show that the original Eden was at the North Pole, a theory which has not been favored by any considerations in its support to be cast aside uncondemnedly, for it certainly is true that in preglacial times a warm climate surrounded the North Pole in all the lands which have been explored. In North America, Siberia, and in Spitsbergen abundant remains of fossil plants show to what extent the middle of the Tertiary period the whole circumpolar region was characterized by a climate similar to that prevailing at the present time in Southern Europe, Japan, and the southern United States (see Asa Gray's lectures on "Forest Geography and Archaeology" in the American Journal of Science, CXVI, 85-94, 183-96, and Wright, Ice Age in North America, 5th ed., ch xvii). But as the latest discoveries have shown that there is no land within several hundred miles of the North Pole, Dr. Warren's theory, if maintained at all, will have to be modified so as to place Eden at a considerable distance from the actual pole. Furthermore, his theory would involve the existence of a Tertiary man," and thus extend his chronology to an incredible extent, even though with Professor Green (see Antediluvians) we are permitted to consider the genealogical table of Gen 5 as sufficiently elastic to accommodate itself to any facts which may be discovered.

Much also has to be said in favor of identifying Eden with Armenia, for it is here that the Tigris and Euphrates have their origin, while two others, the Aras (Araxes) emptying into the Caspian Sea and the Choruk (thought by some to be the Phasis) emptying into the Black Sea, would represent the Gihon and the Pishon. Havilah would then be identified with Colchis, famous for its golden sands. But Cush is difficult to find in that region; while these four rivers could by no possibility be regarded as branches of one parent stream.

Two theories locate Eden in the Euphrates valley. Of these the first would place it near the head of the Pers Gulf where the Tigris and Euphrates after their junction form the Tigris and the western arm before reaching the Gulf. Calvin considered the Pishon to be the eastern arm and the Gihon the western arm. Other more recent authorities modify the theory by supposing that Gihon and Pishon are represented by the Karum and the Karkhah rivers which come into the Shatt el-'Arab from the east. The most plausible objection to this theory is that the Bib. account represents all these branches as down stream from the main river, whereas this theory supposes them to be upstream. This objection has been ingeniously met by calling attention to the fact that 2,000 years before Christ the Pers Gulf extended up as far as Eridu, 100 miles above the present mouth of the river, and that it maintained itself for a long while. The Gulf entered the head of the Gulf through separate channels, the enormous amount of silt brought down by the streams having converted so much of the valley into dry land. In consequence of the tides which extend up to the head of the Gulf, the current of all these streams would be turned upstream periodically, and so account for the Bib. statement. In this case the river (Nûdâr) would be represented by the Pers Gulf itself, which was indeed called by the Hebrews a great river, "the bitter river." This theory is further supported by the fact that according to the euneiform inscriptions Eridu was reputed to have in its neighborhood a garden, "a holy place," in which there grew a sacred palm tree. This "tree of life" appears frequently upon the inscriptions with two guardian spirits standing on either side.

The other theory, advocated with great ability by Friedrich Delitzsch, places the site of ancient Babylon, where the Euphrates and Tigris approach to within a short distance of one another and where the country is intersected by numerous irrigating streams which put off from the Euphrates and flow into the Tigris. The level is here considerably lower than that of the Euphrates—the situation being somewhat such as it is at New Orleans where the Mississippi River puts off numerous streams which empty into Lake Pontchartrain. Delitzsch supposes the Shatt el-Nar, which flows eastward into the Tigris, to be the Gihon, and the Pallacopas, flowing on the W. side of the Euphrates through a region producing gold, to be the Pishon. The chief difficulties attending this theory pertained to the identity of the Shatt el-Nar, and the location of Havilah on its banks. There is difficulty also, in all these theories in the identification of Cush (Ethiopia), later associated with the country from which the Nile emerged, or in giving countenance to the belief of Jos and many others that that river represented the Gihon. If we are compelled to choose between these theories it would seem that the one which locates Eden near the head of the Pers Gulf combines the greater number of probabilities of every kind.

EDER, ʾéder (ʾāḏēr, ‘flock’): (1) One of the ‘uttermost cities’ of Judah in the Negeb (‘South’) near the border of Edom (Josh 19 21), possibly Kh. el ’Adar, 5 miles S. of Gaza, but probably this is too far west.

(2) Edor (AV Edar) or better Migdal Eder, ʾmīḏḵāl ʾāḏēr, ‘the tower of the flock’; Pāʾeq, Gāder. After Rachel died and was buried ‘in the way to Ephrath (the same is Bethlehem) . . . Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edor’ (Gen 35 19 21). In ver 27 he is described as proceeding to Hebron. This ‘tower of the flock,’ which may have been only a tower and no town, must therefore be looked for between Bethlehem and Hebron. Jerome says that it was one Rom mile from Bethlehem. In the LXX, however, vs 16 and 21 are transposed, which suggests that there may have been a tradition that Migdal Eder was between Bethel and Bethlehem. There must have been many such towers for guarding flocks against robbers. Cf ‘tower of the watchman’ (2 K 18 8, etc). The phrase ‘Migdal Eder’ occurs in Mic 4 8 where Jerusalem is compared to such a tower.

EDER, ʾēder (ʾāḏēr, ‘flock’). (1) A Moabite Levite in the days of David (1 Ch 23 23; 24 20); son of Mushi. (2) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 15, AV ‘Ader’).

EDES, ʾēdēs: RV Edos (q.v.).

EDGE, ej: Very frequently occurs in the phrase ‘the edge of the sword’ (Josh 10 28, et al.) from the Heb ʾāḏēr, ʾāḏōr, ‘flock,’ ʾāḏār, ʾāḏām, ‘flock.’ Ex 28 7 and 39 4 read ‘ends,’ from ʾḏōr, ʾḏār, ‘end’ (AV ‘edge’), and Josh 13 27 has ‘uttermost part’ for the same Heb word (AV ‘edge’). In Jer 31 29 and Ezek 16 2, ‘The children’s teeth are set on edge’ (ʾḏār, ʾḏāḇāḏ, ‘to be blunt’); i.e. set hard one against another.

EDIFICATION, ed-i-fā-ka’shun, EDIFY, ed-i-fē: The Gr words ἐκκλησία, ἐκκλησιατά, ‘to build,’ are also called Καίρας, ‘the act of building,’ and are used both lit. and fig. in the NT: ‘edify,’ ‘edifying,’ ‘edification.’ are the tr of AV in some 20 passages, all in the fig. sense of the promotion of growth in Christian character. RV in 2 Cor 10 13; 10 10; Eph 4 12 16; 1 Thess 5 11 renders ‘build up,’ ‘building up,’ making the force of the figure clearer to the Eng. reader. In 1 Tim 1 4 the Gr text followed by RV has ἐκκλησία, ἐκκλησιατά, ‘dispensation,’ instead of ἐκκλησία, ἐκκλησιατά, ‘edifying’ (AV). F. K. FARR

EDNA, ed’na (E’daw, Edna): Wife of Raguel and mother of Sarah who married Tobias (Tob 7 2, etc. 10 12; 11 1). In Heb means ‘pleasure’ and corresponds to Lat Anna.

EDOM, ʾēdōm, EDOMITES, ʾēdōm-ītīs (ʾēḏōm, ’ēḏhōm, ‘red’; ʾĒḏēm, Edom): The boundaries of Edom may be traced with some approach to accuracy. On the E. of the northern border ran from the Dead Sea, and was marked by Wády el-Kărāḏ, or Wády el-Haṣā. On the E. it marched with the desert. The southern border ran by Elath and Ezion-geber (Dt 2 8). On the W. of the ’Arabah the north boundary of Edom is determined by the south border of Israel, as indicated in Nu 34 3 f: a line running from the Salt Sea southward of the Ascent of Akarabbin to Zim and Kadesh-barnes. This last, we are told, lay in the ‘uttermost’ of the border of Edom (Nu 20 16). The line may be generally indicated by the course of Wády el-Firgah. How much of the uplands W. of the ’Arabah southward to the Gulf of Akabah was included in Edom it is impossible to say.

The land thus indicated varies greatly in character and features. S. of the Dead Sea in the bottom of the valley we have first the stretch of salt marsh land called eser and Sebkha; then, beyond the line of white Features cliffs that crosses the valley diagonally from N.W. to S.E., a broad depression strewn with stones and sandhills, the débris of an old sea bottom, rises gradually, and 60 miles to the S. reaches a height of about 700 ft. above the level of the Red Sea, 2,000 ft. above that of the Dead Sea. From this point it sinks until it reaches the shore of the Gulf of Akabah, 45 miles farther S. The whole depression is known today as Wády el-’Arabah (cf Heb hā-’arāḥāb, Dt 2 8 RV, etc). On either side the mountains rise steeply from the valley, their edges curving for at least 10 miles to the deep wadys that break down from the interior (see ARABAH). The northern part of the plateau on the W. forms the spacious grazing ground of the ’Azážimeh Arabs. The mountains rise to a height of from about 1,500 ft. to a little over 2,000 ft. The district was traversed by the ancient caravan road to South Pal; and along the eastern side traces of the former civilization are still to be seen. The desert region to the S. is higher, reaching to as much as 2,600 ft. The N. mountain range of the ’Arabah is generally higher in the S. than in the N. Jebel Harên, beside Petra, is 4,780 ft. above sea-level; while E. of Akabah, Jebel el-Hismá may be as much as 5,900 ft. in height. Limestone, porphyry and Nubian sandstone are the prevailing formation; but volcanic rocks are also found. The range consists mainly of rough rocky heights with many almost inaccessible peaks separated by deep gorges. But there are also breadths of fertile land where wheat, grapes, figs, and olives are grown on the flat. Ex 36 2, 6, 13, 22; Nu 31 16; 32 1; Josh 12 17, 20; 21 16; Mic 5 2; Is 21 13; Ob 13. The Semitic inhabitants, however, may have been named from the former: this again may have been derived from a deity, Edom, who may be traced in such a name as Obed-edom (2 S 6 10).

The children of Edom are said to have ‘destroyed’ the Horites who dwelt in Seir before them (Gen 14

3. Origin of Name (25 25), or from the color of the pottage for which he sold his birthright (ver 30). In Gen 36 8 Edom is equated with Edom as dwelling in Mt. Seir; and he is described as the father of Edom (ver 9, Heb). The name however is probably much older. It may be traced in the records of the Twelfth Dynasty in Egypt. In the Am Tab (Brit Mus No. 64) Udumu, or Edom, is named; and in Assyrian inscriptions the name Uduhumu occurs of a city in the Lachish country. Chew pl. 205. The latter may have been named from the former: this again may have been derived from a deity, Edom, who may be traced in such a name as Obed-edom (2 S 6 10).

The children of Esau are said to have ‘destroyed’ the Horites who dwelt in Seir before them (Gen 14 6; Dt 2 22). This only means that the Horites were subdued. Esau married the daughter of Anah, a Horite (Gen 36 20—in ver 2 he is called a Hivite); and the lists in this chapter show that these races mingled. The Horite government was in the hands of "dukes" (Gen 36 29 f, RV "chiefs"). They were succeeded by dukes of the house of Esau (vs 40 f). This form of government gave way to that of an elective monarchy (vs 31 f), and this had existed some time before Israel left the wilderness. The then reigning king would not permit Israel to pass through the land (Nu 20 14 ff; 21 4). Israel was forbidden to "abhor an Edomite," on the ground that he was a brother; and children of the third generation might enter the assembly of the Lord (Dt 23 7 f). War with Edom was out of the question.

Some thirty years after the Exodus, Ramesses III "smote the people of Seir." The Israelites could not have been far off. We first hear of war between Israel and Edom under Saul (1 S 14 47). David prosecuted the war with terrific energy, slaying 18,000 Edomites (so read instead of "Syrians") in the Valley of Salt (2 S 8 13 f); Jobab remaining for six months in the country, which was afterwards given to the Edomites, "until he had cut off every male in Edom" (1 K 11 15 f). Hadad of the blood royal of Edom escaped to Egypt, and later became a source of trouble to Solomon (vs 14 f.25). The conquest of Edom opened to Israel the ports of the Red Sea, whence the expeditions of Solomon and Jehoshaphat set out. In Jehoshaphat's time the king is called a "deputy" (22 47). Its king acknowledged the supremacy of Judah (2 K 3 9, etc). Under Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, Edom revolted. Jehoram defeated them at Zair, but was unable to quell the rebellion (8 20 f). Amaziah invaded the country, slew 10,000 in the Valley of Salt, and took Sela which he named Joktheel (14 7). Uzziah restored the Edomite port of Elath (14 22). In the Syrian war Rezin regained Elath for Syria, and cast out the Jews. It was then permanently occupied by Syrians—here also probably we should read Edomites (16 6). From the cuneiform inscriptions we learn that when Tiglath-pileser subdued Rezin, among the kings from whom he received homage at Damascus was Qaus-malaka of Edom (726 BC). Later Malik-rim paid homage to Sennacherib. To Ezarhadon also they were compelled to submit. And when the Jews would not go, they could to Nebuchadnezzar, and exulted in the destruction of Jerus, stirring the bitterest indignation in the hearts of the Jews (Lam 4 21; Ezk 25 12; 36 3 f; Ob vs 10 f). The Edomites pressed into the now empty lands in the S. of Judah. In 300 BC Mt. Seir with its capital Petra fell into the hands of the Nabataeans. West of the 'Arabah the country they occupied came to be known by the Gr name Idumaea, and the people 5. Idumaeans in Idumaea. Hebron, their chief city, was taken by Judas Maccabeus. In 165 BC (1 Mac 4 29.61; 5 65). In 126 BC the country was subdued by John Hircanus, who compelled the people to become Jews and to submit to circumcision. Antipater, governor of Idumaea, was made procurator of Judah and Idumaea and by Julius Caesar he paved the way to the throne for his son Herod the Great. With the fall of Judah under the Romans, Idumaea disappears from history.

The names of several Edomite deities are known: Hadad, Qaus, Koaß, and, possibly, Edom; but of the religion of Edom we are without information. The language differed little from Heb.

EDOS, v'dos ('Hdos, 'Edos; AV Edes): One who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Ead 9 35); called Iddo, AV "Jadan," in Ezr 10 43.

EDREI, ed're-i ('f, 'N, 'edh're; 'Es'daw, Edr'e-in): (1) One of the cities of Og, not far from Ashtarah, where the power of his kingdom received its deathblow from the invading Israelites (Josh 12 4; Nu 21 33 ff, etc.). It seems to mark the western limit of Bashan and Edom, on the E. (Dt 3 10). It was given to Machir, son of Manasseh (Josh 13 31). Onom places it 24 Rom miles from Bostra. The most probable identification is with Der'a, a town of between 4,000 and 5,000 inhabitants, on the southern lip of Wady Zeidah, about 20 miles as the crow flies E. of the Sea of Galilee. It is the center of an exceedingly fruitful district. The accumulated rubbish in the town covers many remains of antiquity. It is, however, chiefly remarkable for the extraordinary subterranean city, as yet only partially explored, cut in the rock under the town. This is certainly very ancient, and was doubtless used by the inhabitants as a refuge in times of stress and peril. For a description see Schumacher, Across the Jordan (2nd ed., 1910), pp 143 f.

(2) A place not identified, between Kedes and En-hazor (Josh 19 37).

LITERATURE

I. Education Defined.—By education we understand the sum total of those processes whereby society transmits from one generation to the next its accumulated social, intellectual and religious experience and tradition. In part these processes are informal and incidental, arising from participation in certain forms of social life and activity which exist on their own account and not for the sake of their educative influence upon the rising generation. The more formal educative processes are designed (1) to give the immature members of society a mastery over the symbols and technique of civilization, including language (reading and writing), the arts, the sciences, and religion, and (2) to enlarge the fund of individual and community knowledge beyond the measure furnished by the direct activities of the immediate environment (cf Dewey, art. on "Education" in Monroe's CE; cf Butler, M. E. 242-246).

Religious education among ancient and modern peoples alike reveals clearly this twofold aspect of all education. On its informal side it consists in the transmission of religious ideas and experience by means of the reciprocal processes of imitation and example. In each generation, naturally participating in the religious activities and ceremonies of the social group, imbibing as it were the spirit and ideals of the preceding generation as these are modified by the particular economic and industrial conditions under which the entire process takes place. Formal religious education begins with the conscious and systematic effort on the part of the mature members of a social group (tribe, nation, or religious fellowship) to initiate the immature members by solemn rites, patient training, or both, into the mysteries and high privileges of their own religious fellowship and experience. As regards both the content and form of this instruction, these will in every case be determined by the type and stage of civilization reflected in the life, occupations, habits and customs of the people. Among primitive races educational method is simpler and the content of formal instruction less differentiated than on higher culture levels (Ames, PHE). All education is as first religious in the sense that religious motives and ideas predominate in the educational efforts of all primitive peoples. The degree to which religion continues preeminent in the educational system of a progressive nation depends upon the vitality of its religion and upon the measure of efficiency and success with which from the first that religion is instilled into the very bone and sinew of each succeeding generation. Here lies the explanation of the religious-educational character of Hebraic life, and, here, too, the secret of Israel's incomparable influence upon the religious and educational development of the world.

The religion of Israel was a vital religion and it was a teaching religion (Kont, GTJC).

II. Education in Early Israel (from Patriarchal Times)—In the cultural and national development the Hebrews passed through several clearly marked cultural stages which it is important to note in connection with their educational history. At the earliest point at which the OT gives us any knowledge of them, they, like their ancestors, were nomads and shepherds. Their chief interest centered in the flocks and herds from which they gained a livelihood, and in the simple, useful arts that seem gradually to have become hereditary in certain families. With the settlement of the Hebrew tribes in Canaan and their close contact with Canaanitish culture, a more established agricultural life with resulting changes in social and religious institutions gradually superseded the nomadic stage of culture. A permanent dwelling-place made possible, as the continual warfare of gradual conquest made necessary, a closer federation of the tribes, which ultimately resulted in the establishment of the monarchy under David (W. R. Smith, RS; Davidson, HE).

In these conditions, in both the nomadic and the agricultural, there was no distinct separation between the spheres of

1. Nomadic religion and ordinary life. The relations of the people to Yahweh was conceived by them in simple fashion as periods involving on their part the obligation of filial obedience and loyalty, and on Yahweh's part reciprocal parental care over them as His people. The family was the social unit and its head the person whom Yahweh had designated as authority and leadership. The tribal head or patriarch in turn combined in himself the functions which later were differentiated into those of priest and prophet and king. Education was a matter of purely domestic interest and concern. The home was the only school and the parents the only teachers. But there was real instruction, all of which, moreover, was given in a spirit of devout religious earnestness and of reverence for the common religious ceremonies and beliefs, no matter what was the cultural, national, or religious institution was the sole topic of husbandry or of some useful art, or whether it was the sacred history and traditions of the tribe, or the actual performance of its religious rites. According to Jos (Ant, IV, viii, 12) Moses himself had commanded, "All boys are to learn the most important parts of the law since such knowledge is most valuable and the source of happiness"; and again he commanded (Apion, II, 25) to teach them the rudiments of learning (reading and writing) together with the laws and ceremonies, in the hope that they might not transgress or seem ignorant of the laws of their ancestors, but rather emulate their example. Certain it is that the earliest legislation, including the Decalogue, emphasized parental authority and their claim on the reverence of their children: "Thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which Jehovah giveth thee" (Ex 20:12); "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death. And he that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21:15-17); while every father was exhorted to explain to his son the origin and significance of the great Passover ceremony with its feast of unleavened bread: "And thou shalt tell thy son in that day, saying, It is because of that which Jehovah did for me when I came forth out of Egypt" (Ex 13:8).

2. Agricultural

The period of conquest and settlement developed leaders who not only led the allied tribes in battle, but served as judges between their own people and were received in the tenure of the ancestral religion. In the Period time, sufficient cooperation was obtained to make possible the organization of strong intertribal leagues and, finally, the kingship, as the increasing political influence, says Ames, "was accompanied by a religious consciousness which became ultimately the most remarkable product of the national development" (Ames, PHE, 174 f.). The establishment of the kingdom and the beginning of the city and commercial life were accompanied by more radical cultural changes, including the differentiation of religions from other social institutions, the organization of the priesthood, and the rise and development of prophecy. Elijah, the Tishbiite, Amos, the herdsman from Tekoa, Isaiah, the son of Amoz, were all champions of a simple faith and ancient religious ideals as over against the worldly-wise diplomacy and sensuous idolatry of the surrounding nations.

Under the monarchy also a new religious symbolism developed. Yahweh was thought of as a king in whose hands actually lay the supreme guidance of the state: "Accordingly the organization of the state included provision for consulting His will and obtaining His direction in the great policies of the nation" (W. R. Smith, RS, 30). Under the teaching of the prophets the ideal of personal and civic righteousness was moved to the very forefront of Hebrew religious thought, while the prophetic ideal of the future was that of a time when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah, as the waters cover the sea" (Isa 11:9), when all "from the least of them unto the greatest of them" shall know him (Jer 31:8). Concerning the so-called "schools of the prophets," which, in the days of Elijah and Elisha, Jericho and Gilgal (2 K 2 3:5; 4 38 f.), and probably in other places, it should be noted that these were associations or brotherhoods established for the purpose of mutual edification rather than education. The Bible does not use the word "schools" to designate those fraternities. Nevertheless we cannot conceive of the element of religious training as being entirely absent.

Shortly before the Bab captivity King Josiah gave official recognition and sanction to the teachings of the prophets, while the Deuteronomic legislation of the same period strongly emphasized the responsibility of parents for the religious and moral instruction of their children. Concerning the words of the law Israel is admonished: "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up; (De 6:6-7). For the benefit of children as well as adults the law was to be written "upon the door-posts" and "gates" (Ex 20:24; De 6:6-7, 11:19). For the second priestly generation, the Israelites were to bow down to Yahweh and acknowledge His rule.

"Thus the trials of the nation lead to a comprehensive universalism within which the suffering Israel gains an elevated and ennobling explanation. (Ames, PRI, 155). In the prophetic vision of Ezekiel we must seek the inspiration for the later development of Jewish ritual, as well as the basis of those eschatological hopes and expectations which find their fuller expression in the apocalypse of Rev. When culture and the prophets of the time were considered, the principles and moral teachings that were developed were significant elements in the social and religious condition of Israel, and the consciousness of their own and succeeding generations, thereby giving to future teachers of the race the essence of their message, and preparing the way for the larger and fuller interpretation of religion and life contained in the teachings of Jesus. The immediate influence of their teaching is explained in part by the variety and effectiveness of their teaching method, their marvelous simplicity and directness of speech, their dramatic emphasis upon essentials and their intelligent appreciation of social conditions and problems about them.

The immediate bond of union, as well as the textbook and program of religious instruction, during the period of the Exile, was the Book of the Law. The Exile, and subsequently, was the Book of the Law. When in 458 BC a company of exiles returned to Pal, they, along with the poorer brethren who had been carried away, restored the Jewish community at Jerus, and under the suzerainty of Persia, a new nationalism, based, even more than had been the earlier monarchy, upon the theocratic conception of Israel's relation to Yahweh. During this period it was that writings of poets, lawgivers, prophets and sages were brought together into one sacred collection of scrolls, known later as the OT canon, of which the Torah (the law) was educationally the most significant. The recognized teachers of this period included, in addition to the priests and Levites, the "wise men" or "scribes" and the "prophets" or sōphētēn (lit. "those learned in Scriptures").

Whither or not the sages and scribes of the later post-exilic times are to be regarded as one and the same class, as an increasing number of scholars are inclined to believe, or thought of as distinct classes, the wise men and the prophets or sōphētēn, but in all probability all forms of book learning as well. Suggestions of their existence and function are met with in earliest times.
both in Israel and among other nations of the East. As illustrations of their appearance in preexilic OT history may be cited the references in 2 S 14:1-20; 1 K 4:32; Isa 29:10. It is no lesser personage than King Solomon who, both by his contemporaries and later generations as well, was regarded as the greatest representative of this earlier group of teachers who uttered their wisdom in the form of clever, epigrammatic proverbs and shrewd sayings. The climax of Wisdom-teaching belongs, however, to the later post-exilic period. Of the wise men of this latter day an excellent description is given for us in the Book of Eccles 39:3-4.8.10; cf 1-11:

"He seeks out the hidden meaning of proverbs,
And is conversant with the subtleties of parables,
And appears before him who rules;
He travels through the land of strange nations;
For he hath tried good things and evil among men.

He shows forth the instruction which he has been taught
And glorifies in the law of the covenant of the Lord.

Nations shall declare his wisdom,
And the congregation shall tell out his praise."

Of the pedagogic experience, wisdom and learning of these sages, the Book of Prov forms the Bib. repository. Aside from the Torah it is the oldest book of education. The wise men conceive of life itself as a discipline. Parents are the natural instructors of their children:

"My son, hear the instruction of thy father.
And forsake not the law of thy mother."

—Prov 1:8.

(Cf 4:1-4; 6:20; 13:1.) The substance of such parental teaching is to be the "fear of Yahweh" which "is the beginning of wisdom"; and fidelity in the performance of this parental obligation has the promise of success:

"Train up a child in the way he should go.
And even when he is old he will not depart from it."

In their training of children, parents are to observe sternness, not hesitating to apply the rod of correction, when needed (cf 23:13-14), yet doing so with discretion, since wise reproof is better than "a hundred stripes" (17:10). Following the home training there is provision for further instruction at the hands of professional teachers for all who would really obtain unto "wisdom" and who can afford the time and expense of such special training. The teachers are none other than the wise men or sages whose words "heard in quiet" (Eccl 9:17) are "as goads, and as nails well fastened" (12:11). Their precepts teach diligence (Prov 6:6-11), chastity (7:5), charity (16:21), truthfulness (17:7) and temperance (21:17; 23:20.21.29-35); for the aim of all Wisdom-teaching is none other than

"To give prudence to the simple,
To the young man knowledge and discretion:
That the wise may hear, and increase in learning;
And that the man of understanding may attain unto sound counsels."

—Prov 4:5.5.

The şaphîrîm or "men of book learning" were editors and interpreters as well as scribes or copyists of ancient and current writings. As such they did not become prominent and Levites until the wise men, as such, stepped into the background, nor until the exigencies of the situation demanded more teachers and teaching than the ranks of priests and Levites, charged with the performance of liturgical duties, could supply. Even then both a priest and a şaphîr (Ezr 7:11; Neh 8:1ff), concerning whom we read that he "set his heart to seek the law of Jeh, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances" (Ezr 7:10). Likewise the Levites often appear as teachers of the law, and we must think of the development of scribes (scrbm) as a distinct profession as proceeding very gradually. The same is true of the characteristic Jewish religious-educational institution, the "synagogue," the origin and development of which fell within this same general period (cf SYNAGOGUE). The pupils of the şaphîrîm were the Pharisees (prî'âshim or "separatists") who during the Maccabean period came to be distinguished from the priestly party or Sadducees.

The conquest of Persia by Alexander (332 BC) marks the rise of Gr influence in Pal. Alexander himself visited Pal and perhaps Jerus. (Jon, And, X, 1, 8), befriended the Greek and Roman Jews and granted to them the privilege of self-government, and the maintenance of their own social and religious customs, both at home and in Alexandria, the new center of Gr learning, in the founding of which many Jews participated (see ALEXANDRIA). During the succeeding dynasty of the Ptolemies, the Gr and Jewish culture penetrated to the very heart of Judaism at Jerus, and threatened the overthrow of Jewish social and religious institutions. The Maccabean revolt under Antiochus Epiphanes (174-164 BC) staved the reestablishment of the temple ritual during the early part of the Maccabean period (161-63 BC) were the natural reaction against the attempt of the Seleucidae forcibly to substitute the Gr gymnasia and theater for the Jewish synagogues and temple (cf 1 Macc 1:53; cf 1 Macc 1, 3, 9, 13 and 2 Macc 4-10).

The end of the Maccabean period found Phariseism and strict Jewish orthodoxy in the ascendency with such Hellenic tendencies as had found permanent lodgment in the lives and practical duties of the aristocratic Sadducees. The establishment of Rom authority in Pal (63 BC) introduced a new determining element into the environmental conditions under which Judaism was to attain its final distinguishing characteristics. The genius of the Romans was practical, legalistic and institutional. As organizers and administrators they were pre-eminent. But their religion never inspired to any exalted view of life, and education to them meant always more life's practical preparation for life's practical duties. Hence the influence of Rom authority upon Judaism was favorable to the development of a narrow individualistic Phariseism, rather than to the fostering of Gr idealism and universalism. With the destruction of Jerus by the Romans more than a cant, later (70 AD) and the cessation of the temple worship, the Sadducees as a class disappeared from Jerus, which has ever since been represented by the Pharisees devoted to the study of the law. Outside of Jerus and Pal, meanwhile, the Jewish communities at Alexandria and elsewhere were much more hospitable to Gr culture and learning, at the same time exercising a reciprocal, modifying influence upon Gr thought. It was, however, through its influence upon early Christian theology and education that the Hellenistic philosophy of the Alexandrian school left its deeper impress upon the substance and method of later Christian education.

IV. Education in New Testament Times (from the birth of Christ to the end of the 1st cent.)

—Elementary schools: Jewish education in the time of Christ was of the orthodox traditional type and in the hands of scribes, Pharisees and learned rabbis. The home was still the chief institution for the dispensation of school training. Although synagogues, with attached schools for the young, were to be found in every important Jewish community. Public elementary schools, other than those connected with the synagogues, were of slower growth and do not seem to have been common until, some time after Joshua ben Gamala, high priest from 63–65 AD, ordered that teachers be appointed in every province and city to instruct children having attained the age of 6–7 years. In the synagogue schools the teachers, or attendant, not infrequently served as schoolmaster (cf Schoolmaster).

As in earlier times the Torah, containing now the sacred OT writings as a whole, though with emphaof apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers (1 Cor 12 28; Eph 4 11). The apostles were the itinerant leaders and missionaries of the entire church. Their work was largely that of teaching, Paul insisting on calling himself a teacher as well as an apostle (1 Cor 4 17). The prophets were men with a special message like that of Agabus (Acts 21 10.11). The evangelists were itinerant preachers, as was Philip (8 40), while the pastors, also called bishops, had permanent charge over individual churches. The professional teachers included both laymen and those ordained by the laying on of hands. Their work was regarded with highest honor in the church and community. In contrast with the itinerant church officers, apostles and evangelists, they, like the pastors, resided permanently in local communities.

With this class the author of the Epistle of James identifies himself, and there can be little doubt that the epistle which he wrote reflects both the content and form of the instruction which these earliest Christian teachers gave to their pupils. Before the close of the first cent. the religious educational work of the church had been organized into a more systematic form, out of which there developed gradually the catechumenate of the early post-apostolic period (see CATECHUMEN).

In the Did., or Teachings of the Apostles, there has been reserved for us a textbook of religious instruction from this earlier period (Kent, GTIJ). Necessarily, the entire missionary and educational work of the apostles and evangelists was edifying, and throughout this earliest period of church history we must think of the work of apostles, evangelists and pastors, as well as that of professional teachers, including a certain amount of systematic religious instruction besides further PEDAGOGY; SCHOOL; TEACHER; TUTOR.

EDUTH, eduth (אֶדְוָתָה, "pith"; "testimony, "testimony") a technical term for the Ten Commandments or for the Law: In Ps 50 10, title, "set to Shoshannim Eduth" (lit. "a lily [is the testimony]"); 90 title, "set to Shoshannim Eduth" (lit. "lilies [is the testimony]"), The Heb words appear to be intended to designate a melody by the first few words ordinarily associated with it. See Psalms.

EFFECT, efekt, EFFECTUAL, efektu'al: In the OT, RV renders "fulfilment" for "effect" in Ezek 12 23 (Heb dāebār, "matter"); and in Jer 48 30 "His boastsings have wrought nothing" for the vague rāēšim shall not a... of AV. AV "make of none effect" occurs repeatedly— as the tr of Gr akouō, "render void" (Mt 15 6; Mk 7 13); of katarageō, "annul" (Rom 3 3 [AV "make without effect"]; 14; Gal 3 17); and of kenō, "make empty" (1 Cor 1 17). RV renders

"make of none effect" in Rom 3 3; Gal 3 17; "make void" in the other cases, with no apparent reason for the lack of uniformity. Gr energēō is the opposite in meaning of katarageō above. Its derivative energēs, "effective," is rendered "effectual" by EV in 1 Cor 15 19; Phil. ver 6. RV dispenses with "effectual," "effectually," in the other cases where AV has used these words as auxiliary in the tr of energēs or of energēs, "working" (2 Cor 1 6; Gal 3 8; Eph 3 7; 4 16; 1 Thess 2 13; Jas 5 16).

EGG (עָגִּ֫ה, čegah; ὀσον, oson; Lat ovum): An oval or spheroid body produced by birds, fishes and reptiles, from which their young emerge when incubated or naturally developed. The fertile egg of a bird consists of the yolk, a small disk from which the embryo develops, the albuminous white, and a calcareous shell. The most ancient records prove that eggs have been used as an article of diet ever since the use of the flesh of fowl began. Chickens were unknown in the Slavonic period, and we must query concerning the taste of the white of an egg might have referred to those of pigeons, ducks, eggs taken from the nests of geese or swans, game birds or ostriches. "Can that which hath no savor be eaten without salt? Or is there any taste in the white of an egg?" (Job 6 6, RVm "the juice of purslain"). In Lk 11 12 there is every possibility that the egg of our common domestic fowl is referred to, as "chickens" (q.v.) had been imported and were numerous in church times. Or if he shall ask an egg, will he give him a scorpion?" The reference in Isa 59 5 is to the egg of a serpent, and is figurative of the schemes of evil men: "They hatch adders' eggs, and weave the spider's web: he that eateth of their eggs dieth; and that which is brokenh out into a viper."—GENE STRATTON-PORTER

EGLAH, eg’la (אֶגְלָה, egelāh, "feather"); Wife of David and mother of Ithream (2 S 3 5; 1 Ch 3 3).

EGLAIM, eg’lāim (אֶגְלָיָ֑מ, eglayim; ἀγαλήματι, Agalem): A place named in Isa 15 8, possibly in the S. of Moab. Onom identifies it with Agallim, a village 8 Rom miles S. of Areopolis. It cannot now be identified.

EGLATH-SHELISHYAH, eg’lath-shel-i-shy’ya (אֵגְלַת-שְׁלִישְׁיָ֑ה, eglahth sh’lish’yāh): Found in Isa 15 5; Jer 48 34 (Heb) in oracles against Moab. AV tr" an "heifer of three years old"; RV takes it as the name of a place, but RVm has "a heifer three years old," acc. to LXX. In the former case strong and unconquered cities, Zoar and Horonaim, are compared to the heifer not yet broken to the yoke. Such use of "heifer" is not infrequent (cf Jer 46 20; Hos 10 11, etc.). The majority of scholars, however, take it as a place-name of one, which is "the third Eglah," as if there were three towns of that name. No probable identification has now been suggested. —W. E WING

EGLON, eg’lon (אֶגְלֹन, eg'lōn, "circle"); A king of Moab in the period of the Judges who, in alliance with Ammon and Amalek, overcame Israel and made Jericho his capital, presumably driven across the Jordan by the turmoil in his own kingdom which at that time was probably being used as a battle ground by Edom and the desert tribes (cf Gen 36 35). After 18 years of servitude the children of Israel were delivered by Ehud the Benjamite, who like so many other Benjamites (cf Jgs 20 16) was left-handed. Under the pretext of carrying a present to the tyrant, he secured a private interview and assassinated him with a two-edged sword which he had carried concealed on his right side (Jgs 3:19-22). Ehud made his escape, rallied the children of Israel against him and returned to conquer the Moabites (Jgs 3:30).

EGLON, eg'lon (ἔγλων, 'eglōn; 'Oδόλλας, Odolłān): A royal Canaanite city whose king joined the league headed by Abram and fought against the Gibeonites, which suffered overwhelming defeat at the hands of Joshua (Josh 10). Joshua passed from Libnah to Lachish, and from Lachish to Eglon on his way to Hebron (vs 31 ff.). It was in the Shephelah of Judah (15:39). The name seems to be preserved in that of Khirbet Ajlūn, about 10 miles W. of Beit Jābrīn. Professor Petrie, however, thinks that the site of Tell Nejǐlū might have been contemporary with that at Tell el-Hesā (Lachish). It lies fully three miles S.E. of Tell el-Hesā.

LITERATURE

Egypt (אֵジֶפֶּט, miqraŷān; Ḥ ʾAyyūn, Ḥ ʾAygūtos): Usually supposed to represent the dual of Mısir, referring to "the two lands," as the Egyptians called their country. This dualism, however, has been questioned.

I. The Country—Though Egypt is one of the earliest countries in recorded history, and as regards its continuous civilization, yet it is a late country in its geological history and in its occupation by a settled race. The whole land up to Silsileh is a thick mass of Eocene limestone, with later marls over that in the lower districts. It has been elevated on the E., up to the mountains of igneous rocks many thousand ft. high toward the Red Sea. It has been depressed on the W., down to the Fayum and the extensive Nile valley. This strain resulted in a deep fault from N. to S. for some hundreds of miles up from the Mediterranean. This fault left its eastern side about 200 ft. above its western, and into it the drainage of the plateau poured, widening it out so as to form the Nile valley, as the permanent drain of northeast Africa. The access of water to the rift seems to have caused the basal outflows, which are seen as black columnar basalt S. of the Fayum, and brown massive basalt at Khankaal, N. of Cairo.

The gouging out of the Nile valley by rainfall must have continued when the land was 300 ft. higher than at present, as is shown by the frequency of alluvium and by lake levels in the upper reaches of the Nile. It is known that water flowed over the desert, and that the Nile was at some stage at 20 ft. above the present Nile level. Then, after the excavations of the valley, it has been submerged to 500 ft. lower than at present, as is shown by the rolled gravel beds and deposits on the tops of the water-worn cliffs, and the filling up of the tributary valleys—as at Thebes—by deep deposits, through which the successive stream beds have been scooped out. The land still had the Nile source 30 ft. higher than it is now within the human period, as seen by the worked flints in high gravel beds above the Nile plain. The distribution of land and water was very different from that at present when the land was only 100 ft. lower than now. Such a change would make the valley an estuary up to S. of the Fayum, would submerge much of the western desert, and would unite the Gulf of Suez and the Mediterranean. Such differences would entirely alter the conditions of animal life by sea and land. And as the human period began when the water was considerably higher, the conditions of climate and of life must have greatly changed in the earlier ages of man's occupation.

The earliest human remains belonging to the present conditions of the country consists of a few palaeolithic flints found in the side valleys.

3. Earliest at the present level of the Nile. As Human these are perfectly fresh, and not rolled or altered, they show that palaeolithic man lived in Egypt during prehistoric conditions. The close of this palaeolithic age of hunters, and the beginning of a settled population of cultivators, cannot have been before the drying up of the climate, which by depriving the Nile of its water and silt has caused the Nile to dry up and to have been deposited and formed a basis for agriculture. From the known rate of deposit, and depth of mud soil, this change took place about 10,000 years ago. As the recorded history of the country extends 7,500 years, and we know of two prehistoric ages before that, it is pretty well fixed that the disappearance of palaeolithic man, and the beginning of the continuous civilization must have been about 9,000 to 10,000 years ago. For the continuation of this subject see the section on "History" below.

The climate of Egypt is unique in the world. So far as solar heat determines it, the condition is tropical; for, though just N. of the tropic which lies at the boundary of Egypt and Nubia, the cloudless sky enables the sun to shine full on all parts of the land, throughout the whole year. So far as temperature of the air is concerned, the climate is temperate, the mean heat of the winter months being 52° and of the summer about 80°, much the same as Italy. This is due to the steady presence of northerly winds, which maintain fit conditions for active, strenuous work. The rains are always in the form of showers, and the dry air gives the same facility of living that is found in deserts, where shelter is only... needed for temperature and not for wet; while the inundation provides abundant moisture for the richest crops.

The primitive condition—only recently changed—of the crops being all raised during five cool months from November to April, and the inundation covering the land during all the hot weather, left the population free from labor during the enervating season, and only required their energies when work was possible under favorable conditions. At the same time it gave a great opportunity for monumental work, as any amount of labor could be drawn upon without the smallest reduction in the produce of the country. The great structures which covered the land gave training and organization to the people, without being any drain upon the welfare of the country. The inundation covering the plain also provided the easiest transport for great masses from the quarries at the time when labor was abundant. Thus, the climatic conditions were all in favor of a great civilization, and aided its production of monuments. The whole mass of the country being of limestone, and much of it of the finest quality, provided material for construction at every point. In the south, sandstone and granite were also at hand upon the great waterway.

The Nile is the great factor which makes life possible in Northeast Africa, and without it Egypt would only be a desolate corner of the sandy desert. All things else in that region are products of the Nile, and it is for this reason that it is the great canal of the desert.

6. The Nile Saharan. The two of the two essentially different streams takes place at Khar- tum. The White or light Nile comes from the great plains of the Sudan, while the Blue or dark Nile descends from the mountains of Abyssinia. The Sudan Nile, which is four hundred miles long, rises from the Blue Nile, and the sudd vegetation, so that it carries little mud; the Abyssinian Nile, by its rapid course, brings down all the soil which is deposited in Egypt, and which forms the basis for cultivation. The Sudan to Aswan, and about 6 days from Aswan to Cairo, or 80 to 90 miles a day, which shows a flow of 3 to 3½ miles an hour when in flood.

The fauna has undergone great changes during the human period. At the close of the prehistoric age there were wild ox, lion, leopards, stag,

7. The Fauna. The long-necked gazelle and great dogs, none of which are found in the historic period. During historic times various kinds of antelopes have been exterminated, the hippopotamus was driven out of the Delta during Rom times, and the crocodile was cleared out of Upper Egypt and Nubia in the last century. Cranes and other birds shown on early sculptures are now unknown in the country. The animals still surviving are the wolf, jackal, hyaena, dogs, ichneumon, jerboas, rats, mice, lizards (up to 4 ft. long) and snakes, besides a great variety of birds, admirably figured by Whymper, Birds of Egypt. Of tamed animals, the ox, sheep, goat and donkey are ancient; the cat and horse were brought in about 2000 BC, the camel not commonly known till 200 AD, and the buffalo was brought to Egypt and Italy in the Middle Ages.

The cultivated plants of Egypt were numerous. In ancient times we find the maize (durrah), wheat, barley and lentil; the rice, currant, date palm, dun palm, fig, olive and pomegranate; the onion, garlic, cucumber, melon and radish; the sorghum, sycomore and tamarisk; the flax, henna and clover; and for ornament, the lotus, convolvulus and many others. The extension of commerce brought in by the Gr period, the bean, pea, sesame, lupin, helbeh, acacia and sugar-cane; also the peach, walnut, castor-oil and pear. In the Rom and Arab. ages came in the chufa or nut, sesame, orange, kumquat, and lemon. In recent times we have come the cactus, aloe, tomato, Indian corn, lebbek acacia and beetroot. Many European flowering and ornamental plants were also used in Egypt by the Greeks, and brought in later by the Arabs.

The original race in Egypt seems to have been of the steatopygous type now only found in South Africa. Figures of this race are known in the caves of France, in Malta, and in Somaliland. As this race was still known in Egypt at the beginning of the neolithic civilization, and is there represented only by female figures in the graves, it seems that it was being exterminated by the new-comers and that the women were kept as slaves.

The neolithic race of Egypt was apparently the Libyan stock. There seems to have been a single type of the Amorites in Syria, the prehistoric Egyptians and the Libyans; this race had a high, well-filled head, long nose slightly aquiline, and short beard; the profile was upright and not prognathous, the hair was wavy brown. It was a better type than the present south Europeans, of a very capable and intelligent appearance. From the objects found and the religious legends, it seems that this race was subdued by an eastern, and probably Arabian race, in the prehistoric age.

II. The History.—The founders of the dynastic history were very different, having a profile with nose and forehead in one straight line, and rather thick, but well-formed lips. Historically the indications point to their coming from about Somaliland by water, and crossing into Egypt by the Koptes road from the Red Sea. The IId Dynasty gave place to something blood, probably of the Black Path. In the VIth and VIIth Dynasties foreigners poured in apparently from the N., perhaps from Crete, judging by their foreign products. The XVth and XVIth Dynasties were Hyksos, or Sem "princes of the desert" from the E. The XVIIth and XVIIIth

First Cataract of the Nile.
Dynasties were Berber in origin. The XIXth Dynasty was largely Sem from Syria. The XXIIId Dynasty was headed by an eastern adventurer Sheshonq, or Shusmaq, "the man of Susa." The XXIVth Dynasty was already Libyan. The Greeks then poured into the Delta and the Fayum, and Hellenized Egypt. The Roman made but little change in the population; but during his rule the Arab began to enter the eastern side, and by 641 AD the Arab conquest swept the land, and brought in a large part—perhaps the majority—of the ancestors of the present inhabitants. After 3 cents. the Egyptians—the old Libyans—conquered Egypt again. The later administrations by Persians, Circassians, Turks and others probably made no change in the general population. The economic changes of the past cent. have brought in Greeks, Italians and other foreigners to the large towns; but all these only amount to an eighthith of the population. The Copts are the descendants of the very mixed Egyptians of Rom age, kept separate from the Arab invaders by their Christianity. They are mainly in Upper Egypt, where some villages are entirely Coptic, and are distinguished by their superior cleanliness, regularity, and the freedom of the women from unwholesome seclusion. The Copts, though only a fifth of the population, have always had a large share of official posts, owing to their intelligence and ability. The state of the Mosque. In dealing with the history, we here follow the dating which was believed and followed by the Egyptians themselves. All the monumental remains agree with this, so far as they can check it; and the various arbitrary reductions that have been made on some periods are solely due to some critics preferring their internal sense to all the external facts. For the details involved in the chronology, see Historical Studies, II (British School of Archaeology in Egypt). The general outline of the periods is given here, and the detailed view of the connection with OT history is treated in later sections.

1. 1st and 2d Ages:

Prehistoric: Arbitrary reductions that have been made on some periods are solely due to some critics preferring their internal sense to all the external facts. For the details involved in the chronology, see Historical Studies, II (British School of Archaeology in Egypt).

2d Age: Upon these people came in others probably from the E., who brought in the use of the Arab face-veil, the belief in amulets, and the Pers lapis lazuli. Most of the previous forms of pottery disappear, and nearly all the productions are greatly altered. Copper became more common. Copper, silver and lead were also known. Heliopolis was probably a center of rule.

3d Age: About 5000 BC a new people came in with the elements of the art of writing, and a strong political ability of organizing. Before 5500 BC they had established kings at Abydos in Upper Egypt, and for 3 cents. they gradually increased their power. On the carved slates which they have left, the standards of the allied tribes are represented; the earliest in style being those of the X XIVth Dynasties. There was a standard as far N. as Hermopolis, and the latest bears the standard of the Nile. The conquest of all Egypt is marked by the beginning of the series of numbered dynasties beginning with Mena, at about 5550 BC. The civilization rapidly advanced. The art was at its best under the third king, Zes, and then steadily declined. Writing was still hieroglyphic under Mena, but became more syllabic and phonetic toward the end of the dynasty. The work in hardstone was at its height in the vases of the early part of the 1st Dynasty, when an immense variety of beautiful stones appear. It greatly fell off on reaching the IIId Dynasty. The tombs were all of timber, built in large pits in the ground.

4th Age: The IIId Dynasty fell about 5000 BC, and a new period followed by the Old Kingdom. The IVth Dynasty was one of the greatest rulers of Egypt. He organized the administration on lines which lasted for ages. He reformed the religious system, abolishing the endowments, and substituting models for the sacrifice of animals. He trained the largest body of skilled labor that ever appeared, for the building of his pyramid, the greatest and most accurate structure that the world has ever seen. The statuary of this age is more lifelike than that of any later age. The later reigns show steady decay in the character of work, with less dignity and more superficiality in the art.

5th Age: By about 4050 BC, the decline of Egypt allowed of fresh people pressing in from the N., probably connected with Crete. There are few traces of these invaders, a curious class of barbaric barbs used as seals are their commonest remains. Probably the so-called "Hylasos sphinxes" and statues are of these people, and belong to the time of their attaining power in Egypt. By 3600 BC, the art developed into the great ages of the Xth to the XIth Dynasties which lasted about 2 cents. The work is more scholastic and less natural than before; but it is very beautiful and of splendid accuracy. The exquisite jewelry of Dushur is of this age. After some centuries of decay this civilization passed away.

6th Age: The Sem tribes had long been filtering into Egypt, and Bab Semites even ruled the land.
until the great migration of the Hyksos took place about 2700 BC. These tribes were ruled by kings entitled “princes of the desert,” like Shishak, the Sem Abish, or Abishai, shown in the tomb of Beni-hasan, as coming to Egypt. By 1700 BC the Beni-hasan priests who had adopted the Egyptian civilization pressed down from the S., and ejected the Hyksos rule. This opened the most flourishing period of Egyptian history, the XVIIIth Dynasty, 1587–1328 BC. The profusion of painted tombs at Thebes, which were copied and popularized by Gardiner Wilkinson, has made the life of this period very familiar to us. The immense temples of Karnak and of Luxor, and the finest of the Tombs of the Kings have impressed us with the royal magnificence of this age. The names of Sheshenq I (Shishak) in 952 BC, the founder of the XXIId Dynasty. His successors gradually decayed till the fall of the XXIIId Dynasty in 721 BC. The Ethiopian XXIth Dynasty then held Egypt as a province of Ethiopia, down to 664 BC.

6. 7th Age: under Psamtek (Psammitiches I), 664–610 BC, and continued under the well-known names of Necho, Hophra and Psamtek, and under Persian Amasis until overthrown by the Persians in 525 BC. From 405 to 342 the Egyptians were independent; then the Persians again crushed them, and in 332 they fell into the hands of the Macedonians by the conquest of Alexander.

The XIXth and XXth Dynasties were a period of continual degradation from the XVIIIth. Even in the best work of the 6th Age there is hardly ever the real solidity and perfection which is seen in that of the 4th or 5th Ages. But under the Ramessides cheap effects and showy imitations were the regular system. The great Ramesses II was a great advertiser, but inferior in power to half a dozen kings of the previous dynasty. In the XXth Dynasty one of the royal daughters married the high priest of Amen at Thebes; and on the unexpected death of the young Ramesses V, the throne reverted to his uncle Ramesses VI, whose daughter then became the heiress, and her descendants, the high priests of Amen, became the rightful rulers. This priestly rule at Thebes, beginning in 1102 BC, was balanced by a purely secular rule of the north at Tanis (Zoan). These lasted until the rise of

The Macedonian Age of the Ptolemies was one of the richest and most brilliant at its start, but soon faded under bad rulers till it fell hopelessly to pieces and succumbed to the Rom subjection in 30 BC. From that time Egypt was ground by taxation, and steadily impoverished. By 300 AD it was too poor to keep even a copper currency in circulation, and barter became general. Public monuments entirely ceased to be erected, and Decius in 250 AD is the last ruler whose name was written in the old hieroglyphs, which were thenceforward totally forgotten. After three more cents, of increasing degradation and misery, the Arab invasion burst upon the land, and a few thousand men rode through it and cleared out the remaining effete garrisons of the empire in 641 AD.

7. 8th Age: The Arab invasion found the country exhausted and helpless; repeated waves of tribes poured in, and for a generation or two there was no chance of a settlement. Gradually the majority of the inhabitants were pressed into Islam, and by about 800 AD a strong government was established from Bagdad, and Egypt rapidly advanced. In place of being the most impoverished country it became the richest land of the Mediterranean. The great period of mediaeval Egypt was under the guidance of the Persian civilization, 800–969 AD. The Tunisian dominion of the Fatimites, 969–1171, was less successful. Occasionally strong rulers arose, such as Salah-el-Din (Saladin), but the age of the Mamlukes, 1250–1577, was one of steady decline. Under the Turkish dominion, 1517. Egypt was split up into many half-independent counties, whose rulers began by yielding tribute, but relapsed into ignoring the Caliphate and living in continual internal feuds. In 1771 Aly Bey, a slave, succeeded in conquering Syria. The French and British quarrel left Muhammad Aly to rise supreme, and to guide Egypt for over 40 years. Again Egypt conquered Syria, 1831–39, but was compelled by Europe to retreat. The opening of the Suez Canal (1869) necessarily led to the subjection of Egypt to European direction.

The foreign connections of Egypt have been brought to light only during the last 20 years. In place of supposing that Egypt was isolated until the Greco conquest, we now see that it was in the closest commercial connections with the rest of the world throughout its history. We have already noted the influences which entered by conquest. During the periods of high civilization in Egypt, foreign connections came into notice by exploration and by trade. The lazuli of Persia was imported in the prehistoric age, as well as the emery of Syria. In the Ist Dynasty, Egypt conquered and held Sinai for the sake of the turquoise mines. In the IIId Dynasty, large fleets of ships were built, some as much as 160 ft. long; and the presence of much pottery imported from Crete and the north, even before the patron, to a Mediterranean trade. In the Vth Dynasty, King Unas had relations with Syria. From the XlIf Dynasty comes the detailed account of the life of an Egyptian in Pal (Sanchat); and Cretan pottery of this age is found traders in Egypt. I

III. Old Testament Connections. — The Hyksos invasion unified the rule of Syria and Egypt, and Syrian pottery is often found in Egypt. 1. Semitic of this age. The return of the wave of connections when Egypt drove out the Hyksos, and subdued Syria, the Euphrates was the greatest expansion of Egypt. Tahutmes I set up his statue on the Euphrates, and all Syria was in his hands. Tahutmes III repeatedly raided Syria, bringing back plunder and captives year by year throughout most of his reign. The number of Syrian artists and of Syrian women brought into Egypt largely changed the style of art and the standard of beauty. Amenhophet III held all Syria in peace, and recorded his triumphs at the Euphrates on the walls of the temple of Soleb far up in Nubia. His monotheist son, Amenhophet IV, took the name of Akhenaton, "the glory of the sun's disc," and established the worship of the radiant sun as the Aton, or Adon of Syria. The cuneiform letters from Tell el-Amarna place all this age before us in detail. There are some from the kings of the Amorites and Hittites, from Naharain and even Babylonia, to the great sacerd Amenhophet III. There is also the long series describing the gradual loss of Syria under Akhenaton, as written by the governors and chief of the various towns. The main letters are summarized in the Students' History of Egypt, II, and full abstracts of all the letters are in Syria and Egypt, arranged in historical order.

A new harem of Seti I and his son Rameses II, but they only held about a third of the extent which formerly belonged to Amenhophet III. Mer-Abimelech was Phichol, the Egyg name Pa-hkal, "the Syrian," showing that the Cerraries were not Syrians.

The history of Joseph rising to importance as a capable slave is perfectly natural in Egypt at that time, and equally so in later periods down to our own days. That this occurred during the Hyksos period is shown by the title given to Joseph—Abrekh, (ābrēkkh) (Gen 41 43) which is Abarqesh, the high Bab title. The names Zaphnath-paasekh, Asenath, and Potipherah have been variously equated in Egyptian, Naville seeing forms of the XVIIIth Dynasty in them, but Spiegelberg, with more probability, seeing types of names of the XXIIId Dynasty or later. The names are most likely an expansion of the original document: but there is not a single feature or incident in the relations of Joseph to the Egyptians which is at all improbable from the history and civilisation that we know. See Joseph.

The descent into Egypt and sojourn there are what might be expected of any Sem tribe at this time.

The allocation in Goshen (Gen 47 27) was the most suitable, as that was on the eastern border of the Delta, at the mouth of the Wady Tumilat, and was a district isolated from the general Egyptian population. The whole of Goshen is not more than 100 sq. miles, being bounded by the deserts, and by the large Egypt city of Budastias on the W. The accounts of the embalming for 40 days and mourning for 70 days (Gen 50 3), and putting in a coffin (Gen 50 26) are exact. The 70 days' mourning existed both in the Ist Dynasty and in the XXth.

The oppression in Egypt began with a new king that knew not Joseph. This can hardly be other than the rise of the Berber conquerors.

6. The Oppression in Egypt. — who took the Delta from the Hyksos at the beginning of the XVIIIth Dynasty, about 1552 BC, and expelled the Hyksos into Syria. It could not be later than this as the period of oppression in Egypt is stated at 4 centuries. (Gen 16 13; Acts 7 6), and the Exodus cannot be later than about 1200 BC, which leaves 360 years for the oppression. Also this length of oppression bars any much earlier date for the Exodus. The 360 years of oppression from 430 of the total sojourn in Egypt, leaves 70 years of freedom there. As Joseph died at 110 (Gen 50 26), this implies that he was over 40 when his family came into Egypt, which would be quite consistent with the history.

The store cities Pitom and Raamases are the sites Tell el-Maskhuta and Tell Rotab in the Wady Tumilat, both built by Rameses II as frontier defences. It is evident then that the serving with rigor was under this king, probably in the earlier part of his long reign of 67 years (1900-1234 BC), when he was actively campaigning in Pal. This is shown in the narrative, for Moses was not yet born when the rigor began (Ex 1; 2 2), and he grew up, slew an Egyptian, and then lived long in Midian before the king of Egypt, perhaps 40 or 50 years after the rigorous servitude began, for he is represented as being 80 at the time of the Exodus (Dt 34 7). These numbers are probably not precise, but as a whole they agree well enough with Egyptian history. After the king died, Moses returned to Egypt, and began moving to get his kin away to the eastern deserts, with which he had been well acquainted in his exile from Egypt. A harsher servitude ensues, which might be expected from the more rigorous reign of a man who had permitted the slackness of the old age of Rameses. The campaign of Merenptah against Israel and other people in Pal would not make him any less severe in his treatment of Semites in Egypt.

The plagues are in the order of usual seasonal troubles in Egypt from the red unwholesome Nile in June, through the Plagues frogs, insects, hail and rain, locusts, and sandstorms in March. The death of the firstborn was in April at the Passover.

The date of the Exodus is indicated as being about 1200 BC, by the 4 centuries, of oppression, and by the names of the land and the city of Raamases (Gen 47 4; cf Ex 1 11).

9. Date of the Exodus. — The historical limit is that the Egyptians apparently not inessantly named their year, as the name of the 19th to 1194 BC, and then abandoned it till the invasion of Shishak. As there is no trace of these Egyptian invasions during all the ups and downs of the age of the Judges, it seems impossible to suppose the Israelites entered Canaan till after 1194 BC. The setting back of the Exodus much earlier has arisen from taking three simultaneous histories of the Judges as consecutive, as we shall noticen further on. The facts stated above, and the length of all three lines of the priestly genealogies, agree completely with the Egyptian history in putting the Exodus at about 1220 BC, and the entry into Canaan about 1180 BC.

The route of the Exodus was first a concentration at Raamases or Tell Rotab, in the Wady Tumilat, followed by a march to Succoth, a general name for the region of Bedawy booths; from there to Elsam in the edge of the wilderness. The scope of the modern highway by which they turned and encamped before Pi-hahiroth, the Egyg Pa-hakheres, a serapeum. Thus turning S. to the W. of the Red Sea (which then extended up to Tell el-Maskhuta), they had a Migdol tower behind them and Baal-shepin opposite to them. They were thus "entangled in the land. Then the strong east wind drove them to the Alan, and made a road by which they crossed the gulf and reach the opposite shore. They then went, "three days in the wilderness," the "three days" route without water to Marah, the bitter spring of Hawara, and immediately beyond reached Elsam, which corresponds entirely with the Wady Tumilat, where they encamped by the Red Sea. All of this account exactly agrees with the traditional route down the W. of the Sinaiian peninsula; it will not agree with another route, and there is no reason to look for any different location of the march. See Exodus I. 11.

The numbers of the Israelites have long been a difficulty. On the one hand are the census lists (No 1, 2 and 3 of Numbers) with their summaries of 600,000 men besides children and a mixed multitude about 22,273,250. On the other hand there are the exact statements of there being 40,000 armed men entered Canaan with Joshua (Josh 4 13), and the 35,000 who fought against Midian (Jgs 7 3). Besides these, there are the general considerations... that only 5,000 to 10,000 people could live in Goshen, that the Amalekites with whom the Israelites were equally master (Ex. 17:11) could not have exceeded about 5,000 in Sinai, that Moses judged all disputes, and that two midwives attended all the Israelite births, which would be 140,000 on a population of 600,000. Evidently the statements of numbers are contradictory, and the external evidence is all in accord with lesser numbers. Proposals to reduce arbitrarily the larger numbers have been frequent; but there is one likely line of misunderstanding that may have originated the increase. In the census lists of the tribes, most of the hundreds in the numbers are 400 or 500, others are near those, and there are none whatever on 000, 100, 500 or 900. Evidently the hundreds are independent of the thousands. Now in

The Pharaoh whose daughter was married to Solomon must have been the same Pasekhbanu; he reigned from 987-952 BC, and the marriage was about 970 in the middle

14. Pharaoh's requital of the reign. Another daughter of Pasekhbanu was Karamat, who was the wife of Shishak. Thus Solomon and Shishak married two sisters, and their aunt was queen of Edom. This throws light on the politics of the kingdoms. Probably Solomon had some child by Pharaoh's daughter, and the Egyptians would expect that to be the heir. Shishak's invasion, on the death of Solomon, was perhaps based upon the right of a nephew to the throne of Judah.

The invasion of Shishak (Egypt, Sheshenq) took place probably at the end of his reign. His troops were Lihim (Libyans), Sukkim (men 15. Shishak of Saccoth, the east border) and Kushim (Ethiopians). The account of the war is on the side of the great fore-court at Karnak, which show long lists of places in Judah, agreeing with the subjugation recorded in 1 K 4:22-26, and 2 Ch 12:2-13.

Zerah, or Usaron, was the next king of Egypt, the son of Karamat, Solomon's sister-in-law. He invaded Judah unsuccessfully in 903 BC (2 Ch 14:9), deposing Tunip of the Libyans and Sudanis (2 Ch 15:8). A statue of the Nile, dedicated by him, and naming his descent from Karamat and Pasekhbanu, is in the British Museum.

After a couple of cents, the Ethiopian kings intervened. Shabaka was appointed viceroy of Egypt by his father Piankhy, and is described by the Assyrians as Sibe, commander-in-chief of Muzri, and by the Hebrews as the viceroy of Muzri or So, king of Egypt (2 K 17:4). Tirhakah next appears as a viceroy, and Hezekiah was warned against trusting to him (2 K 19:9). These two kings touch on Jewish history during their viceregalities, before their full reigns began. Nechoi next touches on Judah in his raid to Carmel, in 609 BC, when he slew Josiah for opposing him (2 K 23:29-30; 2 Ch 35:20-24).

After the taking of Jerus, for fear of vengeance for the punishment of Ishmael (2 K 25:23-26; Jer 40:1-4, 22), the remnant was sent to the frontier fortress of Egypt, and the new colony was founded at Elephantine of five cities, near Aswan, one of which was named after the temple of Yahu filled the space between two roads.

writing the statements, such as "Rohen, 46,500," the original list would be 46 'eleph, 5 hundred people, and 'eleph means either "thousands" or else "groups" or "families." Hence a census of 46 tents, 500 people would be ambiguous, and a later compiler might well take it as 46,500. In this way the whole census of 92 tents, 5,550 people, would be misread as 663,550 people. The checks on this are, that the number per tent should be reasonable in all cases, that the hundreds should not fluctuate more than the tens between the first and last census, and that the total should correspond to the known populations of Goshen and of Sinai; these requirements all agree with the reading of the lists. The ultimate details beyond the Egyptian period are dealt with in Egypt and Israel, 45, 55. See Exodus, IV.

Two points need notice here as incidentally bearing on the Egyptian connections: (1) the Israelites in Egypt before the Exodus, indicated by the census in Canaan before 1230 BC, and the raids during the Egypt residence (1 Ch 7:21); (2) the Egyptian names of the Judges, west, north, and east, each totaling to 120 years, in accord with the length of the four priestly genealogies (1 Ch 6:4-8:22-28:33-35:39-43:44-47), and showing that the dates are about 1220 BC the Exodus, 1180 BC the entry to Canaan, 1150 BC the beginning of Judges, 1050 BC Saul (Egypt and Israel, 52-55).

The connections with the monarchy now begin. David and Joab attacked Edom (2 S 8:14), and Hadad, the young king, was carried

13. Hadad off by his servants to Egypt for safety. The Pharaoh who received and supported him must have been Siamen, the king of Ezion, which city was then an independent capital apart from the priest kings of Thebes (1 K 11:15-and faced upon 3 houses, implying a building about 60 or 70 ft. wide. It was built of hewn stone, with stone columns, 7 gates, and a cedar roof. It was destroyed in 410, after lasting from before Cambyses in 525 BC, and a petition for rebuilding it was presented to the Persian kings.

The most flourishing period of the Jews in Egypt was when Oniah IV, the son of the royal high priest Oniah, was driven from Jerusalem by the abolition of Jewish worship and ordinances at Jerusalem. In 170 BC he fled to Egypt, and there established a new Jerusalemic community. The great mound of the temple still remains there, with the Passover ovens beneath it, and part of the massive stone foundations of it. It remained a stronghold of free Judaism until after Titus took Jerusalem; and it was only when the Zealots tried to make it a center of insurrection, that at last it was closed and fell into decay. Jos is the original authority for this history (see Egypt and Israel, 97-110).

The Jews in Egypt followed a very different development from the Bab. Jews, and this Egypt type largely influenced Christianity. In the 8th century BC, the woman named "Trust Yahweh" had no objection to swearing by the Egyptian goddess Seet when making an Egyptian contract; and in Jer 44 15-19, the Jews boasted of their heathen worship in Egypt. Oniah had no scruple in establishing a temple and sacrifices apart from Jerusalem, without any of the particularism of the Maccabean zealots. Philo at Alexandria labored all his life for the union of Jewish thought with Greek philosophy. The Heraclisian school of the 3rd century BC, religious thought was developing under eclectic influence of Egyptian, Jewish, Pers, Indian and Greek beliefs, and producing the tenets about the second God, the Eternal Son, who was the Logos, and the types of Conversion, as the Divine Ray, the New Birth, and the Baptism. Under the reign of Alexander III, 200-100 BC, provided the basis of thought and simile on which the Pauline Epistles, were built. The great wrench in the history of the church came when it escaped from the Bab-Jewish formalism of the Captivity, which ruled at Jerusalem, and grew into the wider range of ideas of the Alexandrian Jews. These ideas had been preserved in Egypt from the days of the monarchy, and had developed a great body of religious thought and phraseology from their eclectic combinations. The formations and conceptions of Christianity with Egypt are outside our scope, but some of them will be found in Egypt and Israel, 124-41.

The Egyptian cities, places and peoples named in the OT may briefly be noted. Avnen (Ezk 30 17) or the land of the Egyptians was the land of Oniah IV (Gen 41 45) is the "As of Egyptian," the "great seer," one of the greatest of the religious officials. The schools of Heliopolis were celebrated, and it seems to have always been a center of learning. The site is now marked by the great inclosure of the temple, and one obelisk of Senusert (XIth Dynasty). It was here that the Egyptian kings had their installation to come and bathe in the lake in which the sun bathes daily, the "Ainneh-Shena," or "Lake of the Sun" of the Arabs, connected with the fresh spring here which Christian tradition attributes to the visit of Virgin and Child. The great sycamore tree here is the successor of that under which the Virgin is said to have rested.

Baal-Zephon was a shrine on the eastern site of the head of the Red Sea, a few miles S. of Msallaleh; no trace is now known of it (Ex 14 2).

Cushim or Ethiopia were a part of the Egypt army of Shishak and of Asurk (2 Ch 12 3; 18 8). The army in was 4 brigades, that of Ptah of Memphis, central Egypt; that of Amen of Thebes, Southern Egypt and Ethiopia; that of Set of the eastern frontier (Sukkim); and that of Ra, Heliopolis and the Delta.

Goshen was a fertile district at the west end of the Wady Tumilat, 40 to 50 miles N.E. of Cairo. It was bounded by the deserts of the N. and S.E. and by the city of Bubastis on the W. Its area was not over 100 sq. miles; it formerly supported 4,000 Bedawin and now about 12,000 cultivators.

Libim, the Libyans who formed part of the Egyptian army as light-armed archers, from very early times. Mespil is the name of any tower, familiar also as Magdala. It was applied to some watchtower on the W., the Red Sea, probably on the high land above the Severanum.

No is Thebes, in Assy Nia, from the Egyptian Nu, "the city." This was the capital of the XIth Dynasty and of the XVIIIth-XXlst Dynasties. Owing to the building being of sandstone, which is not of much hard, they have largely remained since the desolation of the city under Ptolemy X. The principal divisions of the site are: (1) Karnak, with the temple of the XIIth Dynasty, built over by all the successive kings of the XVIIIth Dynasty, and enlarged by Seti I and Rameses II, and by Shishak, Tirhakah, and the Ptolemies. The whole temple of Amon and its subsidiary temples form the largest mass of ruins that is known. (2) Luxor, the temple of the XIXth Dynasty, and the tomb of the birth of Amenhepep III (1440 BC), added to by Rameses II. (3) The funerary temples, bordering the western shore, of the kings of the XVIIIth to XIXth Dynasties. These have mostly been destroyed, by the unscrupulous quarrying done by each king or his workmen. The temple of Amon, in good condition is that of Rameses III, which is left because no later king required its material for building. (4) The great cemetery, ranging from the splendid rock halls of the Tombs of the Kings, covered with paintings, down to the humblest graves. For any detailed account see either Baedeker's or Murray's Guides, or Weggall's Guide to Antiquities.

Nimri, the Egyptian Men-nofer, Gr Memphis, now Mitreben, 12 miles S. of Cairo. This was the capital from the foundation at the beginning of the dynasties. Thebes and Alexandria shared its importance, but it was the seat of government down to the Arab invasion. In Roman times it was as large as London N. of the Thames. The outlying parts are now all buried by the rise of the soil, but more than a mile length of ruins yet remains, which are now being regularly worked over by the British School. The heart of the city is the great metropolitan temple of the god, nearly all of which is now under 10 feet of soil, and under water most of the year. This is being excavated in sections, as it is all private property. At the north end of the ruins is the palace mound, on which has been cleared the palace of Apries (Hophra). Other temples have been located, as well as the foreign quarter containing early Gr pottery and the temple of Proteus named by Herodotus (see Memphis, i, ii, iii). In later times, the ancient name for Upper Egypt in the prophets is "It is the Egypt Pa-ta-shu, the vast land." "Firesett is the Egypt Pa-Bast, Gr Bubastis, at the eastern side of the Delta, the city of the cat-headed goddess Bast. The ruins are still large, and the temple site has been excavated, producing sculptures from the IVth Dynasty onward.

"Pythom is the Egypt Pa-Tum, the city of the Sungod Tum or Atum, who was worshipped on the E. of the Delta. The site has remains of the fortress of Ramesses II, built by the Israelites, and is now known as Tell el-Moszkhu, 11 miles W. of Ismailia.

"Raameses is the other city built by the Israelites, now Tell Rotab, 20 miles W. of Ismailia. A walled camp existed here from early times, and the temple of Ramesses was built on the top of the older ruins. A large part of the temple front is now at Philadelphia, excavated by the British School.

"Sin is the Gr Pelusium, Assyri Siirtu, Ab. Tinekh, now some desolate mounds at the extreme E. coast of Egypt.

"South was the district of "booths," the eastern part of the Wady Tumilat. It was written in Egyp Thuku and abbreviated to Thu in which form it appears as a Rom name. The people of Succoth were Sikkim, named in the army of Shishak (2 Ch 12).

"Syene, Heb Swenakh, mod. Aswan, the southern border town of Egypt at the Cataract. The greater part of the old town was on the island of Elephantine. Here the Jewish papyri were found, and that was probably the Jewish settlement with the temple of Yahu. The town on the eastern bank—the present Aswan—was of less importance.

"Tahatnepes, Tahaphernes, Gr Daphnae, Ab. Tell Defeneh. This was the first station on the Syrian road which touched the Nile canals, about 10 miles W. of Kantara on the Sues Canal. It seems to have been founded by Psammethicus about 664 BC, to hold his Gr mercenaries. The fort, built by him, abounded in Gr pottery, and was finally desolated about 666 BC, as described by Herodotus. The fort and camp have been excavated; and the pavement described by Jeremiah (ch 43), as opposed to the entrance, has been identified.

"Zoan, Gr Tanis, Ab. Sar, is about 26 miles from the Sues Canal, and a Gr town in the delta from the coast. The ruins of the temple are surrounded by the wall of Passchkhanu, 80 ft. thick of brickwork, and a ring of town ruins rises high around it. The temple was built in the VIIth Dynasty, adorned with many statues in the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties, and under Ramesses II had many large granite obelisks and statues, esp. one colossal of the king in red granite about 90 ft. high. It is probable that the Pharaoh lived here at the time of the Exodus.

IV. The Condition of Egypt During the Different Periods of Civilization and Thought According to Certain Outline of the Civilization of the Egyptians. The language had primitive relations with the Sem and the Libyan. Perhaps one common stock has separated into three languages—Sem, Egypt and Libyan. But though some basic words and grammar are in common, all the bulk of the words of daily life were entirely different in the three, and no one could be said to be derived from the other. Egypt, so far as we can see, is a separate language without any connection as close as that between the Indo-European group. From its proximity to Syria, Sem loan words were often introduced, and became common in the XVIIIth Dynasty and fashionable in the XIXth. The language continually altered, and after periods of later grammar, Coptic is as different from it as Italian is from Latin.

"The writing was at first ideographic, using a symbol for each word. Gradually, signs were used phonetically; but the symbol, or some emblem of the idea of the word, was added to it, now called a determinative. From syllabic signs purely alphabetic signs were produced by clipping and decay, so that by 1000 to 500 BC the writing was almost alphabetic. After that it became modified by the influence of the short Gr alphabet, until by 200 AD it was expressed in Gr letters with a few extra signs. The actual signs used were elaborate pictures of the objects in the early times, and even down to the later periods very detailed signs were carved for monumental purposes. But as early as the 1st Dynasty a very much simplified current hand had been started, and during the pyramid period this became hardly recognizable from the original forms. Later on this current hand, or hieratic, is a study by itself and was written much more fully than the hieroglyphs on monuments, as its forms were so corrupt that an ample spelling was needed to identify the word. By about 800 BC begins a much shortened set of signs, still more remote from their origins, known as demotic, which, while it continued the popular writing till Rom times. On public decrees the hieroglyphic and demotic are both given, showing that a knowledge of one was useless for reading the other, and that they were separate studies.

"The literature begins during the pyramid period, before 4000 BC, with biographies and collections of maxims for conduct; these show well-regulated society, and would benefit any modern community in which they were used. In the XVIIth Dynasty, tales appear, occupied with magic and foreign travel and wonders. A long poem in praise of the king shows very regular versification and system, of the type of Ps 136, the refrain differing in each stanza and being probably repeated in chorus, while the independent lines were sung by the leader. In the XVIIIth Dynasty, tales of character begin to develop and show much skill, long annals were recorded, and in the XIXth Dynasty there is an elaborate battle poem describing the valor of Ramesses II. At about 700 BC there is a considerable tale which describes the quarrels of the rival chiefs, and the great flight regulated like a tournament by which the differences were settled. Such are the principal literary productions of Egypt.

"The religion of Egypt is an enormous subject, and that by which Egypt is perhaps most known. Here we can only give an outline of the growth and subdivisions of it. There never was any one religion in Egypt Future Life during historic times. There were at least four religions, all incompatible, and all believed in at once in varying degrees. The different religions can heat be seen apart by their incommensurability alone in the future life.

ANCIENT EGYPTIAN PAINTINGS ON CLOTH
furniture and provisions. For the servants, put their figures doing household work, and their service is eternal. For the master himself, put the most lifelike image that can be made, and his soul will occupy that as a restful home fitted for it. This principle is still believed in. Funeral offerings of food are still put even in Muslim graves, and a woman will visit a grave, and, removing a tile, will talk through a hole to her dead husband.

(2) The dead went to the kingdom of Osiris, to which only the good were admitted, while the evil were rejected, and consigned either to monsters or by fire. This heavenly kingdom was a complete duplicate of the earthly life. They planted and reaped, sported and played. And as the Egypt felicity consisted in making others work for them, so each man was provided with a retinue of serfs to cultivate the land for him. These ushabti figures in later times usually number 400, and often 1 in 10 of them is clad as an overseer. A special chapter of the Book of the Dead is to be recited to animate them, and this, more or less abbreviated, is often inscribed upon the figures.

(3) The dead joined the company of the immortal gods, who float on the heavenly ocean in the boat of the sun. With them they have to face the terrors of the hours of the night when the sun goes through the long chambers, where directions are needed for safety in this passage, and these form a large part of the funerary texts, esp. on the Tombs of the Kings in the XIXth–XXIst Dynasties. To reach the boat of the sun a boat must be provided in the tomb, with its sails and sails an Osiris. Such are frequent from the Xth–XIst Dynasties.

(4) The dead were carried off by the Hathor cow, or a bull, to wait for a bodily resurrection. In order to preserve the body for some life after the soul, these pastures were protected by an appropriate amulet; hence dozens of different amulets were placed on the body, esp. from about 600–400 BC.

Now it will be seen that each of these beliefs contradicts the other three, and they represent, therefore, different religious origins.

The mythology is similarly diverse, and was unified by uniting analogous gods. Hence when we see the compounds such as Ptah-Khentiamenti, Osiris-Khentiamenti, it is clear that each god of the compound belongs to a different kingdom, like Pallas-Athena or Zeus-Labrandeus, in Gr compounds. So far as we can at present see, these gods linked with each of the beliefs about the soul are as follows:

(1) The soul in the tombs and cemetery.—With this belief belong the animal gods, which form the earliest stratum of the religion; also Sokar the god of "Silence" and Mert Sokar, the "Lover of Silence," as the gods of the dead. With this was allied a belief in the soul sometimes going to the west, and hence Khent-amenti, a jackal-headed god, "he who is in the west," became the god of the dead.

(2) The soul in the heavenly kingdom.—Osiris is the lord of this kingdom, Isis his sister-wife, Horus their son, Nebhet (Nephthys) the sister of Isis, and Set her husband. Set also was regarded as coequal with Horus. This whole mythology results probably from the fusion of tribes who were originally monotheistic, and who each worshipped one of these deities. It is certain that the later parts of this mythology are tribal history, regarded as the victories and defeats of the gods whom the tribes worshipped.

(3) The soul in the sun-boat.—Ra was the Sun-god, and in other forms worshipped as Khepera and Atmu. The other cosmic gods of the same group are Nut, the heaven, and her husband Geb, the earth; Shu, space, and his sister Tefnut. Anhur the Sky-god belongs to Upper Egypt.

(4) The soul in the company of the gods of the future.—Probably to this group belong the gods of principles, Hathor the female principle; Min the male principle; Ptah the architect and creator of the universe; his spouse Maat, abstract truth and justice. Foreign gods frequently appear also in Egypt, mostly from Syria. Two importations were of great effect. Aton the radiant energy god, who united with Ra and was worshipped by the Ptolemaic kings, and Adonis, introduced by Alexander.

6. Foreign gods of the sun, the adorers of the sun—Dioscuri, or Adonis, was introduced by Alexander, and his allies united in adoring Zeus-Sarapis. The Egyptian gods were passed from one dynasty to another, and had been worshipped by the Ptolemies; and some, like Isis, were combined with Isis of the Greeks.

The laws are but little known until the late Gr period. Marriage was usual with a sister, but this may have been with a half-sister, the sons being the aristocratic ones. Polygamy was unusual, but legal, as many as six wives being represented in one instance. Kings of course had unlimited harems. Divorce was unusual, but was probably easy. In Coptic times a marriage oath was taken, and for divorce by either party, on paying six times the marriage gift. Property was strictly guarded.

The national character was easygoing, kindly, never delighting in torture like the Assyrians and Romans, but liable to be too slack.

8. Character and careless—as at present. Firmness, decision and fortitude were held up as the leading virtues. The structure of society, the arts and the industries are outside of the scope of this article. (For differing views on chronology and sites, see art.)

EHI, e'hī (יהו, 'ēhī): Apparently a contracted form (Gen 46 21). See AHIRAM.

EHUD, e'hud ('יהו, 'zhāḏāh, “united,” “strong”): A Benjaminite, son of Gera, deliverer of Israel from oppression by Moab (Jgs 3 15-30). Gaining access alone to the presence of King Eglon under pretence of a secret errand connected with the payment of Israel’s tribute, Ehud, a left-handed man, drew the sword he had concealed upon his right side, and thrust the king through. He locked the doors of the upper chamber after him, made his escape, and with the Israelites overcame Moab at the fords of the Jordan, slaying some 10,000. Ehud’s name occurs again in the Benjamite genealogy (1 Ch 7 10).

EITHER, e'ither, e'ther: Often in the sense still common, “one or the other” (1 Ch 21 21; Mt 6 24, etc.), but also in the obs sense of “both” or “each” (Lev 10 1; 1 K 7 15; Jn 19 18; Rev 22 2), or in place of (RV) “or” (Lk 6 42; 15 8; Phil 3 12; Jas 3 12).

EEKER, e'ker (אֶקֶר, eker, “root”): A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 27).

EKREBEL, ek'ré-bel (אֵקְרֶבָּאוֹל, Ekrebel): Appears only in Jdh 7 18. It lay on the brook Mochmr-er, near Bethoath. It is identical with Akrebeia, the site of which Onom speaks as the capital of the district of Akrabattine. It corresponds to the mod. ‘Akrebeh, 8 miles S.E. of Nazibis. Akron, ek'ron, EKRONITE, ek'ron-it (אֱֹקְרוֹנ, ekrón, “migration,” “rooting out”): “Akkaroni, Akkaron”: The most northerly of the chief cities of the Philis. It was not subduced by Joshua (13 3) but was allotted, in the division of the land, first to Judah and then to Dan (16 14,45,46; 19 43). It was taken by Judah (Jgs 1 18). The people of E. are prominent in the story of the ark in the land of the Philis. It was they who proposed to have it sent back to Israel (1 8 5; 16 10). After the defeat of the Philis, when David killed Goliah, the Israelites pursued them to the gates of E., which was evidently the nearest walled town in which the fugitives could take refuge (17 52). It was the seat of the worship of the god Baalzebub, as appears in the account of the sickness and death of Hezekiah (2 K 1 2 3.6.16). It is included among other cities in the denunciations of Amos (1 8) and of Jeremiah (25 20). Zephaniah declares that it shall be rooted up (2 4), and Zechariah speaks of its consternation at the fall of Tyre (9 5.7). From the Amos records we learn that it revolted against Sennacherib and expelled Padi, the governor he had placed over it, and sent him to Hezekiah, at Jerusalem, for safe keeping. Sennacherib marched against it and E. called in the aid of the king of Mursi, formerly supposed to be Egypt but now regarded by some scholars as a district of Northwestern Arabia. Sennacherib raised the siege of E. to defeat this army, which he did at Eltekeh, and then returned and took the city by storm and put to death the leaders of the revolt and carried their adherents into captivity. He then compelled Hezekiah to restore Padi, who was once more made governor. This affair led to the famous attack of Sennacherib on Hezekiah and Jerusalem (Rawl., Anc. Mon., I, 159). E. is mentioned in 1 Mac 10 59 as being given by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabaeus, and it appears in the accounts of the first Crusade. Ekronite: An inhabitant of Ekron, used in pl. in. EL. See God, Names of.

ELA, e'la (Egypt, Ely, 1 Esd 9 27): (1) Same as Elam (Ezr 10 26).

(2) Father of Shimei (1 K 4 18, AV “Elah”). See Elah, 2.

ELADAH, e-lad-ā. See ELEADAH.

ELAH, e'la (אֵלָה, elā, “oak” or “terebinth”): (1) A “duke” or “sheik” (head of a clan, RV “chief”) of Edom (Gen 36 41).

(2) Shimei-ben-Elah, Solomon’s commissary in Benjamin (1 K 4 18 AV).

(3) A son of Caleb the son of Jephunneh (1 Ch 4 15).

(4) Father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 K 16 30; 17 1).

(5) A Benjamite, son of Uzezi, one of the chiefs of the tribes when the country was settled (1 Ch 8 8).

(6) King of Israel. See next article.

ELAH, e'la. Son of Baasha, fourth king of Israel (1 K 16 6-14). He reigned two years, 888-887 BC. The statement that he came to the throne in the 26th year of Asa, reigned two years, and died in the 27th year of Asa, illustrates the Heb method of synchronizing the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah (cf. 1 K 15 53; 16 8). Elah appears to have been a debauchee. While he was drunken in the house of Azra, his chamberlain, Zimri, one of his military leaders, conspired against him and murdered him. According to Jos (VIII, xii, 4) he took advantage of the absence of the army, which was at Gibbethon, to kill Elah. The extermination of the royal family followed the murder of the king. Baasha’s dynasty had its origin in a murder and it ended in a murder. The government had no stability. These revolutions illustrate the truth that “the sword shall perish with the sword.”

ELAH, VALE OF (אֶלַהַ, elah, “valley of the terebbinth”; ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā, ḫē'kalās ‘Ḥašā): The scene of the events of 1 S 17 24; referred to also in 1 S 21 9. There can be no doubt that this is the Wady es Sūnī (“valley of the terebbinth”), or part of it. This is the southernmost of the great valleys which cut through the Shephelah. Commencing near Hebron, close to Beith Sūr, it descends under the name Wady es Sūr in a more or less northerly direction until near Beith Netîfîth where it turns abruptly west and receives the name Wady es Sūnī. Here it is joined by the Wady en Najî, coming from the N., and from the E. by the Wady el-Fândî, down which descends an ancient road from Bethlehem. Where all these valleys coalesce the Wady es Sunt expands into a wide and level bottom, half a mile across. On a steep hill to the southern side and a little S.E. of the wide expanse is Kh. esh-Shumwik, the site of Socoh. That the great events of 1 S 17 2 f took place here there can be no doubt: the Philis ranged themselves upon the southern hills; the Israelites to the N. or N.E. Upon the wide level valley the context with Goliath occurred. The exact position of Saul's forces may be a matter of speculation, but the late Principal Miller of Madras, who made a special study of the locality (Levant of All Lands, ch. 7), considered that the little valley ascending N.E. from Wady es Sunt to Beit Netfiy was probably the actual Vale of Elath and that here the Israelites had their fortifications. His elucidation of the whole story is most convincing.

A well-known tract, partly mountainous, whose western boundary, starting on the N.E. side of the Pers Gulf, practically followed the course of the lower Tigria. It was geographical bounded on the N. by Media, on the Position E. by Persia and on the W. by Babylonia. The Assyro-Babilonians called it to the tract Elamtu, expressed ideographically by the Sumerian characters for Nimma or Numma, which seems to have been its name in that language. As Numma or Elam apparently means "height," or the like, these names were probably applied to account of mountainous nature. Another name by which it was known in early times was Ashšan, for Anshan or Anzan (Anshan), one of its ancient cities. The great capital of the tract, however, was Susa (Shushan), whence its Gr name of Susiana, interchanging with Elamis, from the Sem Elam.

Elam consisted of a plain occupying a depression in the mountains of Iran or Persia. Of this the smaller part—which, however, was also the most ancient historically—lay between the Push't-e Kuh on the W., the Lur mountains on the N., the Bakhtiari heights to the E. and S.E., and the hills of Ahwaz to the S. The larger plain has as its northern boundary these same Ahwaz hills, and reaches to the sea on the S.

The Push't-e Kuh mountains are a series of very high parallel ranges described as "a veritable wall" between Mesopotamia and the elevated depression of the Kerka. Its principal peak is in the Kerib-Kuh (2,500 meters=8,200 ft.)—a difficult range of surprising regularity. The valleys on the S.W. slope belong properly to Babylonia, and could be invaded with ease by the Kerib-Kuh the country is well protected not only against Mesopotamia, on the W., but also against Persia on the E. The nomad Lurs of the present day are practically independent of Persia. The mountain ranges of Luristan increase in height as one approaches the Pers plain, the loftiest summits of the principal range attaining a height of 5,000 meters (=16,400 ft.).

From these mountain ranges descend large rivers which flow through Elam to the sea. The Kerka (Gamas-dh) rises in the Pers plain near Nehavend, and is practically a torrent until it reaches Susa, below which it becomes less rapid, and loses itself in the Hawizeh marshes. The Ab-e-Diz, a river with a greater volume of water is formed by the uniting of two streams above Dizful. It is so violent that it carries down boulders and even tree-trunks from the mountains, and after a winding course joins the Kyrān at Kut-e-Bend-e-Kir. The Bellād-Rud, between the Ab-e-Diz and the Kerka, rises in the mountains of Luristan, and varies greatly as to its volume, being sometimes a mere brook, and at others a large river. The Kyrān, with which a number of smaller streams unite, rises on the Bakhtiari mountains. After receiving the Ab-e-Diz and the Bellād-Rud at Kut-e-Bend-e-Kir, it becomes an important waterway, navigable as far as Shuster. This is identified with the Bib. Ulai (Assyr. Uldas, classical Evades). Anciently it flowed itself into the Pers Gulf, which in past cents. extended much farther inland than now, at present joins the Shatt el-Arab at Mohammerah.

The climate is a variable one. Between November and March the rains begin, with S.E. and S. winds, and the mountains are covered with snow. In January and February there are violent storms, and the night brings 8° or 10° of frost. Spring begins at the end of February, and vegetation advances so rapidly that harvest takes place about the end of April. The wind then turns S. and S.W., bringing with it a heat rising sometimes to 140° F., destroying all the verdure of the country. Notwithstanding the rigors of the climate, however, it was anciently a well-populated district, and exceedingly fruitful, as now. That the district of Afghanistan is poor and barren is due to the carelessness and improvidence of the people, who, like the people of the ancient irrigate the small canals which increase the land.

The vegetation of Susiana is said not to be very varied. On the river banks are to be found willows, tamarisks and many kinds of acacias. Apparently there are no forests—the sacred groves referred
6. Vegetation

There are several important plants in the region. The date palm is found in the deserts of the region, especially in the northeastern part of the country. The pomegranate and other fruits from the Iranian plain are also cultivated. The groundnut is another important crop, especially in the western part of the country.

The fauna of the region is diverse and includes a variety of animals. The lion is found in the eastern part of the country, while the elephant and the wild ass are found in the central region.

7. Fauna

Africa. The elephant, wild ass, wild ox and ostrich are no longer found in the region.

The region is also home to a variety of animals, including the cheetah, the black rhinoceros, the white rhinoceros, and the elephant. The region is also home to a variety of birds, including the hammerkop, the sacred ibis, the flamingo, and the stork.

8. The Population

According to De Morgan, the original population was mainly Negrito, and has mingled with the Arab stock to such an extent that mulattoes among them are not rare. He regards this type as being represented among the soldiers as among the people conquered by Naram-Sin about 3000 BC. Nevertheless pure Semites had settled in the country at a very early date, and it is probably on account of this that Elam is called (Gen 10 22) a son of Shem—indeed, the male Semites are found by Fr. explorers in Susa show how strong their influence was.

It was to all appearance during the 2d millennium BC that certain Kassites overran W. Mesopotamia, and settled in the northern part of Elam, which was thereafter called by the Assyrians m'dk Kalatu, "the land of the Cossaeans." As these people seem to have spoken an Aryan language, there was apparently no really new race introduced in consequence of their invasion.

The two principal cities were Susa or Shushan, called Susus in the native texts, and regarded as the old capital, situated on the Ulai (Kärkha); and Anzan (Ashshan, Anshan), more to the S.W. This latter was the capital of Cyrus the Great and his immediate predecessors, the tract having been conquered apparently by Šišpiš (Temespi), his ancestor, at the end of the 6th cent. BC. Susa, an important commercial center in the 3d millennium BC, became again one of the three capitals of the Pers empire during the rule of the Achaemenids.

From the inscriptions of Mal-Amir, to the E., we learn that that was the place of another kingdom called Apirst, the land of the Aparshites of Ér 4 9. In the 2d (so-called Median or Scythian) version of the late Pers inscriptions this name is given as Hapištri, Halapirin, and Haltupirin, and appears as the equivalent of the Bab Elammat (Elamit) or Elam without the nominative ending. In the Ptolemaic (H)uwašt, or (H)uwaša, Nations" whence the modern Hūs or Khūšūs, this implies that the kings of Apirst at one time held dominion over Susa, and perhaps the whole of Elam. Strabo (11.3.6, 8) quoting Nearchus speaks of "a land called Apirst, which was inhabited by a race who occupied the mountains E. of the Euphrates—the Amorians or Mardians on the Pers border, the Chaldeans and Elamites on the borders of Persia and Susa, and the Cossaeans (Kassites) by the Medes. The Amorians would seem to have been the Apirst (Hapištri), the Elamites were probably from (H)uwaša, while the Cossaeans (cf 1 Macc 6 1) were the Elamites. Among the tribes who made the history of the country, therefore, were probably the Chaldeans, who seem not to be mentioned in the early inscriptions.

The dialects of Susa, the second Achaemenian VSS, and of Apirst, differ but slightly from each other. They are variants of an agglutinative language, and have retained many innovations of the period of the Persian empire.

11. The Languages of Elam

Elamites is not related to any other known language. The statement in Gen 10 22, therefore, applies only to the Sem section of the population, as it is unlikely that the people speaking Apirst could be described as "sons of Shem.

(1) The earliest period.—Beginning with the semi-mythical period, we have the story of the fight of the Bab hero Gilgamesh with the Elamite Blackbird (Káruru in the Babylonian text), who was defeated by the hero and his helper Enki-di, and beheaded. The earliest really historical reference to the Elamites as the foes of Babylon, however, is apparently contained in a letter from the priest Lugal-en-anna to the priest En-etu-tarzi announcing that the Elamites had invaded Lagas and carried off considerable booty. The writer, however, had attacked the Elamites, and taken plunder from them in his turn. As there seems to be a reference to division of spoil, this is an excellent parallel to the Elamite expedition, made in alliance with the Babylonians, against the cities of the plain (Gen 14).

(2) Sargon of Agadé and his successors.—Sargon of Agadé, early in his reign, attacked the Elamite, but apparently the Elamite only fell into the hands of the Babylonians during the time of Naram-Sin, his son, who is seemingly shown leading his troops in that region on the splendid stele bearing his name that was found at Susa. Elam apparently regained its independence, however, during the time of Uru-šu-uk, king of Kih, who invaded the country, and brought back considerable spoil. One of the chiefs of Susa about this time was Simbi-tiša-bak, Chaldean domination, however, did not last long. Dungi, king of Ur of the Chaldees, about 2500 BC, invaded the country accompanied by his vassal Gudea, viceroy of Lagas. Dungi has left evidences of his conquests in the buildings which he erected at Susa, but the principal buildings of this period were constructed by Baššuššak, son of Simbi-tiša-bak, viceroy of Susa and potentate in Elam. He built, a temple to the god of Susa, the Sugu, reservoirs, the gate of Šuššak, and dug the Sigan canal. He was evidently one of the great rulers of the land.

(3) The suzerainty of the kings of Ur.—Somewhat later came Iṣušu, his son Kal-Ruḫurarrī, and his grandson Iṣušu II, who in turn occupied the throne during the time of Bīz-Suk, king of Ur. Elam was at this time still under Bab suzerainty, which continued under his successor, Gimil-Sin, who also built at Susa, his vassal being Ebarti-kin-Dadu, viceroy of Susa. Gimil-Sin was succeeded by his son Ibi-Sin as overlord in Elam, who invaded and devastated the country, probably to suppress a revolt. There was apparently no ill-will between the two nations, however, for the viceroy of Susa is said to have married a daughter of Ibi-Sin. Another and possibly later viceroy seems to have married Mekubi, daughter of Billama, viceroy of Aminunak, who, as Elamite princess, erected buildings at Susa.

(4) Elam becomes predominant 2280 B.C. — It was probably shortly after this that Kudur-Nabhanu threw off the Sem yoke, and, invading Babylonia, brought back much spoil to Elam. The date indicated for this ruler by the inscriptions of Assurban-apli is 2280 B.C. The positions of the rulers of Elam and Babylonia were now changed, and the kings of Babylonia had to acknowledge Elamite suzerainty. As Elamite and Bab sovereign, Kudur-Nabhanu instilled Susa to a feudatory ruler, and among the viceroy who governed Elam may be mentioned Sirukdu, who constructed at Susa, and Temti-Agun, his sister's son, who built in that city the temple to Isme-karaš, "for the health of Kutir-Nabhanu and his family." After passing to other rulers, the government of Susa fell to Ebari, father of Silpha, during whose reign Simti-Silhak ruled in Babylonia. Nūr-Addi and Rim-Anum, kings of Larsa (Elaswar), were his vassals.

(5) The extension of Elamite authority westward. — Attabakšu (or Attabahu), Šilpha's sister's son, then became 'shepherd of Susa.' Among the temples which he built was one dedicated to the goddess Narute, and he erected a bridge near his residence. Kudur-mabuk, son of Simti-Silhak, was at this time adda ("father," probably meaning protector) of Emutūbašu and the W.—Amurru, the land of the Amorites, whither marched Chedorlaomer and Amraphel, with their allies, in the time of Abraham (Gen 14). Kudur-mabuk of Larsa was succeeded by his son Eri-Aku (probably the Iri-Agun of Larsa of the Elamite texts), and if he be really, as some probable, the Amraphel of Gen 14 1 9, then this is also the period when Chedorlaomer ruled in Elam. The strange thing, however, is, that the name of this last does not occur in any recognizable form, unless it be the Kudurugaljum of certain half-legendary inscriptions (see CORIJAM). The Elamite line in Larsa was continued after the death of Eri-Aku by Rim-Sin, his brother, who succeeded him.

(6) Babylonia again supreme. — What the history of Elam during this period was remains to be discovered, but Ammurapi, who ruled between Amraphel of Gen 14 1 9, seems to have invaded the country in his 30th year. In his 31st he defeated Rim-Sin of Larsa, following this up, in his 32d, by overthrowing the army of Aminunak. All these successes in Elam and its dependencies probably made the kingdom of Babylon supreme in the land. But more details bearing upon this period are needed. It is thought probable that the Elamite king Sadi (?) or Taki (?) came into conflict with, and was defeated by, Ammurapi, in the 4th descents from Hammurabi, who reigned about 1890 B.C. Apparently the Elamite ruler had tried to regain his independence, but failed.

(7) Jurbattila's challenge to Kuri-palzu. — Omitting the names of rulers concerning whom but little or nothing is known, we come to the reign of Untaš-Gal, patron of the arts. Numerous temples were built by him, and sanctuaries at Susa dedicated. He has left a magnificent bronze statue representing his queen Nāpi-Asu. He seems to have been overthrown by Untaš-Gal, of a more legitimate line, who was likewise a builder of temples. After the apparently short reign of Kidin-Ḫrutana came that of Hurbatila (Jurbattila), who, desiring to throw off the Babylonian yoke, challenged Kuri-palzu, king of Babylon, to battle at Dūr-Dungi. The challenge was accepted, with disastrous results, for Jurbattila was captured by the Bab king at the place named. This, however, did not put an end to the strife, and in the end Kidin-Ḫrutana was victorious over Bēl-nadin-sum, king of Babylon, about 1180 B.C.

(8) Elam again supreme. — Later came the military exploits of Sutruk-Nabhanu, who invaded Babylonia, slew the king Zagaga-šum-idila, and helped by his son Kutir-Nabhanu in his exploits. He took and took away the stele of Naram-Sin, the code of Hammurabi, and several other monuments, which were carefully preserved at Susa. He also defeated the king of Aminunak. It is this collection of spoils which has contributed to make the success of the Fr. excavations at Susa what it is.

(9) Elam again defeated, but recovers. — The war between Babylonia and Elam recorded for the reign of Nebuchadrezzar 1 (c 1020 BC) probably took place, according to Scheil, during the reign of Sul-ṣina-hamur-Lagamar. The Elamite king was defeated on the banks of the Ulai, Elam was ravaged, and much spoil taken. The principality called Nammar was detached from Susian territory and reunited to the domain of Babylonia. Apparently the Elamites now turned their attention to regaining their military prestige, the result being that an Elamite king occupied the Bab throne from 939 to 934 B.C. The history of this period has still to be discovered, but the Babylonians apparently soon shook off the Elamite yoke, and are not heard of at this time, however, that another power,—Assyria—appeared on the scene, and took the field—not only against Babylon, but also on the borders of Elam. An Elamite contemporary of Nabonassar of Babylon was Ḫabbiannas III, 742 B.C.

(10) The last conflict between Elam and Assyria. — At this time, however, the Assyrians became dominant in Babylonia (see Tigrath-pileser and Shalmaneser), but it was probably not until the reign of Sargon of Assyria (see SARGON) that Elam came into conflict with Assyria. Merodach-baladan, a pretendant to the throne of Babylon, made common cause with Humbanigas, who fought with the Assyrians in an army to Dēr. Naturally the Assyrians claim the victory, but the Babylonians say that they were defeated. After the death of Humbanigas, his successor, Šutur-Nabûnû or Īstar-hundu (Bab), still befriended Merodach-baladan, and advanced to his help. Sargon first attacked the Chaldaean and defeated them at Dār-Atarna, and, entering Elam, stormed and captured the cities of the land. The Elamite king took refuge in the mountains, and Merodach-baladan had to resist the Assyrians unaided.

The Installation of Ummanigas.

(11) Sennacherib against Chaldaea and Elam.—As Sargon had his attention fully occupied elsewhere, he made no attempt to follow up his success, and it seems not to have been until the reign of Sennacherib that any serious invasion of the country on the part of the Assyrians was made. In 697 BC that king marched again against Merodach-baladan, who had taken refuge at Nasiju and other places on the Elamite side of the then elongated Pers Gulf. Here the Chaldaeans, with their Elamite allies, were defeated, and the Elamite cities plundered and destroyed. Hallušu, king of Elam, on the retirement of the Assyrians, invaded Babylonia as being part of the territories of the Assyrian king, and having captured Assûr-nadin-šum, Sennacherib's son, who had ruled in Babylon 6 years, carried him off to Elam, setting Nergal-ūṣerib on the throne of Babylon. On the arrival of the Assyr revenging host in Babylonia, Nergal-ūṣerib fled to Elam, but was captured near Niffer. The Elamites were evidently very dissatisfied with their king—possibly owing to his policy—and killed him in a revolt after a reign of six years. This action on the part of the Elamites, however, did not save the people from Assyrian vengeance, for Sennacherib invaded and ravaged the country from Ḫāš to Bit-Burnakī. Apparently the Elamites had expected their new ruler, Kudurru (Kudur-Nabûnû), to save them from the reprisals of the Assyrins, but as he had failed to do this, he, in his turn, was deposed and killed after a reign of 10 months. The new king of Elam was Umman-Mesana, who espoused the cause of Muṣēšib-Marduk, the new king of Babylon, and gathering a force of Babylonians and Elamites at Ḫalûf, fought a battle there, in which the Babylonians record success for the allies. Sennacherib, however, himself claims the victory, and describes with great wealth of detail the horrors of the fight. Next year (689 BC) Sennacherib marched into Babylonia to complete the work, and Muṣēšib-Marduk, having been captured, was sent prisoner to Assyria. Umman-Mesana died at the end of the year, after a 4 years' reign, and was succeeded by Ḥumba-haldāšu I (689–682 BC), of whom nothing is known. In 682 BC Ḥumba-haldāšu II mounted the throne. The death of Sennacherib and the troubles attending the accession of Esarhaddon encouraged Nabûzēr-napēti-lāir, son of Merodach-baladan, again to raise the standard of revolt. Defeat was the result, and he fled to Elam, there to be captured by Ḥumba-

(12) Assyrian friendship and Elamite ingratitude. —Friendship with Assyria was a complete reversal of Elamite policy, and to all appearance peace, though probably unpopular, persisted between the two countries for several years. Ḥumba-haldāšu's two brothers revolted against him and assassinated him, and Urtakū, one of the murderers, took the Elamite throne. Not daring to be openly hostile to Assyria, however, he sent his brother Te-umman to intrigue in Chaldaea in favor of a man named Najlüšalīm, but the Chaldaean chiefs answered that Na'id-Marduk, their lord, lived, and they were the servants of the king of Assyria. Also, during a famine in Elam, certain Elamite tribes migrated into Assyria to escape the scarcity, and were kindly treated by Assur-bani-apli, who had succeeded his father on the Assyrian throne. Notwithstanding this, however, Urtaku invaded Babylonia, and allied with certain Chaldaean tribes. Overtaken by the Assyrian army, he fought with them near his own border, but was defeated and fled. He died prematurely (by his own hand) the same year, and was succeeded by his brother Te-umman (Tepti-Humban).

(13) Te-umman and the Elamite seed-royal; Assyria's triumph.—This king, who is described by Assur-bani-apli as being in the likeness of an evil spirit, immediately set to work to secure the death of all the sons of Urtaku and Umman-aldas (Jumbab-Haldasu II), his brother; and these princes, five in number, with 60 of the royal seed of Elam, fled and sought refuge with the Assyrian king. Te-umman immediately sent two messengers to Assur-bani-apli demanding the surrender of the fugitives. This was refused, and war broke out between the two countries immediately after. The Assyrians came up with the Elamites at Der, but Te-umman feared to join issue there, andretreating, took up a strong position near his capital, Susa, with his front protected by the river Ulai. Defections from his army now so weakened the forces of Te-umman that he endeavored to treat with Assur-bani-apli, who naturally refused to listen to terms, and ordered his troops to attack. The defeat of the Elamites was a foregone conclusion, and Te-umman perished, with his son, in the thick of the battle, as is dramatically depicted by the sculptors of Assur-bani-apli in the bas-reliefs which adorned the walls of his palace. An Assyrian general was then sent to Susa with Umm-an-igas, the prince chosen as the successor of Te-umman, and he was proclaimed while the bodies of the fallen Elamites covered the battlefield, and the waters of the Ulai carried others down to the place of its outflow. Tammaritu, the new king's youngest brother, was at the same time made king of Hidali, in the mountain region. In the triumphal procession at Nineveh which took place on the Assyrian army's return, the head of Te-umman and his son Tamritu figured, the former hanging from the neck of Dununu, king of Gambulu, and the latter from the neck of Samgum, Dununu's brother.

Tammaritu therefore marched at the head of an army into Babylonia, but in his absence Indabigas, one of his servants, headed a revolt against him, and proclaimed himself king in Susa. In the battle which ensued between the two pretenders, Tammaritu was defeated, and fled to the seacoast with a part of the Elamite royal family. He ultimately embarked in a ship on the Pers Gulf with the intention of escaping, but was wrecked, and gave himself up to an Assyrian officer, who sent him to Assyria.

(15) Elam's further changes of rulers.—Indabigas, the new Elamite king, now sent an embassy to make peace with Assur-bani-apli, who at once demanded the surrender of Nabû-bêl-šumûti, son of Merodach-baladan, and the Assyrians whom he had enticed and taken with him. Before this demand could reach Indabigas, however, his people had revolted against him and put him to death, and Umman-aldas, son of Attametu, sat on the throne, after defeating Indabigas on the banks of the Habtu. The same demand was made to Umman-aldas as had been made to Indabigas, but Nabû-bêl-šumûti, not wishing to fall into the hands of the Assyrians, called on his armor-bearer to dispatch him, and the two ran each other through with their swords.

(16) King Tammaritu's treachery.—Nevertheless Assur-bani-apli decided to replace Tammaritu, the former Elamite king, on the throne, and to this end invaded Elam. The Assyrians were, as usual, successful, and on learning this, Umman-aldas fled to the mountains. Entering Susa, Tammaritu was once more proclaimed king of Elam, he, in return, promising to regard Assur-bani-apli as his lord, and to pay tribute. No sooner had the Assyrian army departed, than the new king of Elam began to plot against the power which had raised him. To all appearance his intentions to revolt were reported to the Assyrian king, who at once sent an army and plundered the country, and Tammaritu again fell into Assur-bani-apli's hands. Umman-aldas now returned and resumed the government. Unwilling to regard his former efforts as fruitless, the Assyrian king decided to finally subdue the land, and to this end invaded it; the pretext being that the Elamites refused to deliver up the image of the goddess Nannâ, which had been carried off from Erech 1,635 years before, in the time of Kudur-Nabûhunte (see [4] above). The two armies faced each other on the banks of the Tigris, and after an attack in which the Assyrians were at a disadvantage, the Elamites gave way, and Ummân-alâdis fled to the mountains. According to the Assyrian king's record, an enormous booty was taken, including many sacred and ancient royal statues preserved at Susa. The image of Nanhâd was restored to the shrine at Eshûr with great rejoicing. In the triumphal celebrations at Nineveh, Tammaritu was one of the captive kings who drew the Assyrian king's chariot to the temple of Ištar, when he rendered the goddess thanks for his victory.

(14) Elamite ingratitude and treachery.—For a time there was peace in Elam, but soon the discontent of Šamaš-sum-ukin, king of Babylon, Assur-bani-apli's brother, sought to break it. Urged by him, Umman-igas forgot the benefits which he had received at the hands of Assur-bani-apli, and sent an army into Babylonia under the command of Undasi, son of Te-umman, telling him to avenge upon Assyria the killing of his father. Notwithstanding the great strength of the allied army, they did not succeed in making headway against the Assyrians. Tammaritu, nephew of Umman-igas, after the defeat of the Elamite forces in Chaldaea, revolted against him, and having defeated him, cut off his head, and took the crown. Šamaš-sum-ukin immediately turned his attention to the new ruler, and induced him by fresh presents to come likewise to his aid.

(17) Dominion passes from Assyria.—To all appearance Elam now became a province of the Assyrian empire, though not for long, as this collapsed in the year 606 BC, and the center of government was shifted to Babylon, under Nabopolassar, who became its ruler. Nebuchadrezzar (604), Evîl-Merodach (561), Neriglissar (559), and Nabonidus (555–538 BC), were successively masters of Elam. The mention of the kings of Elam in Jer 25, however, suggests that the old states of the country remained relatively independent, though 49 35–39 prophesies the dismemberment of the country, and the destruction of its king and princes. This is thought to refer to the annexation of the country by Teispes, and its passing, through his son Cyrus, to Cambyses. The Great King was also all kings of Anzan—to Darius Hystaspis. In Isa 21 it is apparently the later Cyrus who is referred to when Elam, with Media, is called upon to "go up" to the siege of Babylon.

(18) The later state of Elam.—After Cyrus, the history of Elam was that of Persia, of which it henceforth formed a part. In all probability, however, the Elamites were as warlike and as intractable as ever. During the reign of the little-known Kharacenean king, Aršpâsînâ, they made incursions into Babylonia, one of the opponents of this king's generals being Ptit, "the enemy, the Elamite"—a phrase of old standing, apparently. Elam, to its whole extent, was smitten with the sword, and Ptit (or Elam) was elain or captured. One of the cities which they attacked was Apameia, probably that on the Sellas river. Acts 29 implies that the old language of Elam was still in use, and the Elamites were still recognized as a nationality, as late as the 1st cent. of our era.

Owing to the many Semites in Elam, and the nearness of the Bab states, Bab deities—Anu and Anšat, Enlî, Ešil, Ninîn, and Ninîlî, Merodach and Ištar—were largely worshipped (see BAB, BABYLO, BABYLON). The chief deity of the non-Semitic pantheon seems to have been Inšûnînâ, the patron-deity of Susa, identified with Ninîn, the son of Enîl, by the Babylonians, who quote also other names applied to him—Lûqarîlî, Sinîlî, Adûslî, Sûnînî, and Dûâhk. Merodach seems to have been represented by the Sumerian character Gâl, "great," and Zêr-pantû was apparently called Nin-sîl in Elam. Ištar was known as Usan, Lagamar, Lagamar, or Lagamal, was apparently identified with the Bab Lagamal, one of the gods of Dalîm near Babylonia—his name is generally regarded as forming part of the name CEDBORÂM (q.v.). Nahûntû, Nâňûntû, or (Bab) Nan-înîdî was the Bab-sun god Samas; Kûnîzîjî was the W. Šem. Hadad, also known by his Mitannian (Hittite) name of Tešup. Humûn, Human, or Unlimited (Assyr.), "the god of the winds," "the king," was possibly regarded as the Bab Merodach. The currency of Bab myths in Elam is suggested by the name of the goddess Belûsî, possibly the Bab Bêlîlî, sister of Tammus. The word for "god" in Elamite was nap, explained by the Babylonians as one of the names of Enlî, implying that the Elamites regarded him as "the god" by divine right. Of their deities, six (one of them being Lagamar) were worshipped only by Elamite kings. Elam had temples and temple-towers similar to those in Babylon, as well as sacred groves, wherein no stranger penetrated. (See ERE, s.v. "Elamites.")

The rediscovery of the history of Elam is one of the most noteworthy things of modern research. It has revealed to us the wonderful development of that kingdom which had importance; made at an exceedingly early date, Her

Literature as important as the Bab states 4,000 years BC, though probably hardly so advanced in art and lit. Nevertheless, the country had adopted the cuneiform method of writing, and possessed also another script, seemingly of more ancient date. As both Sem Bab and Susian (Anzanite) were spoken in the country, numerous documents in both languages have been found, mostly historical, or of the nature of dedications, some of which are inscribed on objects presented to temples. There are also a number of archaic tablets of the nature of accounts, written in a peculiar cuneiform character. The cylinder-seals are either inscribed with dedications, or with the name of the owner, his father, and the god whom he worshipped, as in Babylonia. Of other lit. there are but mere traces—an exorcism against mosquitoes shows the desire of the people to rid themselves of the discomforts of this life. Contracts testify to the existence of laws, but the laws themselves have yet to be discovered. The stele of Hammurabi, which was found at Susa, did not belong to Elamite lit., but to that of Babylonia. Elamite art during the first period was naturally rude, and it is doubtful whether metals were then used, as no traces of them were found.

15. Art during the 1st and 2nd periods

Prehistoric

The second period is described as being less artistic than the first. The pottery is more ordinary, and also more roughly made, though better ware also exists. Painted ornamentation is found. Vessels of white or pink limestone, some of them very large, occur, but alabaster is exceedingly rare. There is no indication of writing at this period, but rudely engraved seals, with animal forms, are found. The buildings were of crude brick or piled-up earth, though baked brick was sometimes used. A change seems to have taken place in the conditions of life at the end of this period, implying invasion by a more civilized race.

The Spinning-Woman (from Susa).
The indications of invasion during the second prehistoric period are confirmed, according to M. Jéquier, by what is found in the layer of the archaic period, which succeeded the Pre-Pottery. The latter, in part, consists of clay tablets, some of which have pictures of Viceroys, marked cylinder-seals. The pottery and that of is scanty and not characteristic, but the Kings the working of alabaster into vases had developed considerably, and some of the smaller forms (ointment or scent-bottles) are good and varied. Some have the form of the duck, the wild boar, and other animals. During the period of the šasšak or viceroy, fine sculptures in low relief — the scorpion-man and the sacred tree, military prisoners with their guard, siege-operations and the dead on the battlefield; and as examples of work in the round, ivory and alabaster statuettes. Later on, during the time of the kings of Elam and Susa, the objects of art increase in number, though large objects in the round are rare. Noteworthy are the statues in bronze, the former being very numerous. The largest production of this kind is the almost life-size statue of queen Napir-Asu, consort of Untash-Gal, which, however, is unfortunately headless. It is a remarkable piece of work, and has great artistic merit.

In all probability Elam was much hindered in her material and intellectual development by the intractable and warlike nature of her conquered people — indeed, the history of the country, as far as it is known, is a record of strife and conflict, and the temperament indicated by the ancient inhabitants of Elam records seems to have been inherited by the wild tribes which occupy the more inaccessible districts. What conduced to quarrels and conflicts in ancient times was the law of succession, for the Elamite kings were not generally succeeded by their eldest sons, but by their brothers (see ELESAH). The inhabitants of the towns at the present time in all probability do not differ in any essential respect from those of Persia in general, and among them there is probably no great amount of ancient Elamite blood, though the Elamite type is met with, and probably occurs, in consequence of occasional mingling, in various parts of modern Persia.

ELASA, el-a-sa (‘Aaard, Asaad); AV Elasa, el-assa): The place where Judas pitched his camp before the battle in which he was overwhelmed and slain (1 Mace 9 5). It probably corresponds to the modern Khirbet el-assā, between the two Beth-horons.

ELASAH, el-a-sa (אֶלָסָה, ’el-āsāh, “God has made”):
(1) An Israelite who had married a foreign wife (Ez. 22:22).
(2) A son of Shaphan, by whom, with Gemariah, King Zedekiah sent a message to Babylon (Jer 39 3). See ELEASAH.

ELATH, Ἐλalleries, or ELOTH, Ἐλ롯 (אֶלָלָה, ’elālah, Ἐλλῆς, ’elēth, Ἐλαθ; AV Adon, Ailôn; [Dt 2 8], Adâr, Ailēth [2 K 16 8]): A seaport on the Red Sea in the territory of Edom. It is named along with Ezion-geber in the account of Israel’s journey round the land of Edom (Dt 2 8). It appears as Allath, and Ailôn in the LXX, and in Jos as Ilianon (Am, vi, 4), while Onom has Adēm, Ailām. From this we may gather that the Aram. ‘ālôn or ḥalēth, was in use as well as the Heb ’elālah or ’elēth. The name, “grove,” was doubtless chosen from the presence of certain sacred trees. It may be identical with El-panar of Gen 14 5, and Elâh of Gen 36 41. When David conquered Edom, Elâh passed into the hands of Israel (2 S 8 14). It was a position of great importance in connection with the trade with South Arabia. Here the merchant fleets of Solomon and Jehoshaphat were fitted out, and hence they sailed (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17; 1 K 22 48). In the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, Edom shook off the land of Judah (2 K 8 20), but under Amaziah and Uzziah it was again subdued (2 K 15 13 10 22). Finally it was taken from Azah by Rezin, king of Syria. The Jews were driven out and the Syrians (Edomites?) took permanent possession (16 6). It is identical with the modern ’Aṣabā, at the head of the gulf of that name. W. EWING

ELBERTH, el-bérith (Jgs 9 46). See Baal-berith.

EL-BETH-EL, el-beth-eel (אֶל־בֶּית־אֵל, ’el bēth-el, “God of Bethel”; Ba‘thel, Baithel): By this name Jacob called the scene of his vision at Luz, when he returned from Paddan-aram (Gen 35 7).

ELCIA, e’lisha, RV ELKIAH (q.v.).

ELDAALH, el-dālah (אֶלְדָּלָה, ’elādāḥ, “God has called?”): A son of Midian (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 3 33).

ELDAD, el-dād (אֶלְדָּד, ’elāḏāh, “God has loved”): One of the seventy elders chosen by Moses at the command of Jeh to share “the burden of the people” (Nu 11 16 25). Eldad and his companion Medad were not present with the rest at the tent of meeting, yet the Spirit rested also upon them and they prophesied in the camp (vs 26 29).

ELDAD, el-dād, AND MODAD, mō’dād, BOOK OF: In the LXX they are called Eldad and Medad. In the AV the names are given as Eldad and Medad; meaning “God has loved” (“God loves”) and “object of love” (?). They were two of the seventy elders chosen by Moses (Nu 11 26), and while the others obeyed the summons and went to the tabernacle, these two remained in the camp (Nu 11 26). The nature of their prophecy is not recorded, and this naturally became a good subject for the play of the imagination. It furnished the basis for a lost work which was quoted by Hermes (Ves 2 3): “The Lord is near to them who return unto him, as it is written in Eldad and Medad, who prophesied to the people in the wilderness.” The Pal Tgs also filled in the subject of the prophecy of Eldad and Medad, and, as they have it, it related to the coming of God and Moses against Israel at the end of the days. One of the Tgs has the expression, “The Lord is near to them that are in the hour of tribulation.” The authors of the Tgs were either dependent upon that work or upon a similar tradition; and the former of these views is the more probable. Lightfoot and Holtzmann think the lengthy quotation in 1 Clem 23 and 2 Clem 11 is from the Book of Eldad and Medad. The work is found in the Stichometry of Nicephorus and consists of 400 stichoi, which would make it about twice the length of the Cant. A. W. FORTUNE and, consequently, experience was best fitted to govern: thus Had. iii.149). Later the idea of age became merged in that of dignity (I. ii.404, ii.570; Od. i.116 ff.) and in like manner the word πατρις was used. It came to be used among the Romans (Cic. Rep. 2.8. 14). So also among the Germans authority was intrusted to those who were older; cf Tacitus, Agricola. The same is true among the Arabsians to the present day, the sheik being always a man of age as well as of authority.

From the first the Hebrews held this view of government, although the term “elder” came later to be used of the idea of the authority for which, at first, age was regarded necessary. Thus the office appears in both J (9th cent. BC) (Ex 3 16; 12 21; 24 1, of the elders of the Hebrews; and of the Egyptians, Gen 50 7); and E (8th cent. BC) (Ex 17 5; 18 12; 19 7 [Da]); Josh 24 31, elders of Israel, or of the people. Cf. the principle of selection of heads of tens, fifties, etc., Ex 16 13 ff.; seventy being selected from a previous body of elders; cf. Je (Nu 11 16 24). Seventy are also mentioned in Ex 24 1, while in Jgs & 14 seventy-seven are mentioned, although this might be taken to include seven princess. Probably the number was not uniform.

Elder as a title continues to have place down through the times of the Judges (Jgs 8 16; 2 7[D]); cf. Ruth 4 2 ff. into the kingdom. Saul asked to be honored before the elders (1 S 15 30); the elders of Bethlehem appeared before Samuel (18 4); the elders appeared before David in Hebron (2 S 17 15; 1 Ch 11 3); elders took part in the temple procession of Solomon (1 K 8 3; 2 Ch 5 4). They continued through the Persian period (Est 6 5 8; 6 7 11; 9 14; 10 8 14) and the Macabean period (Jdt 6 16; 7 23; 8 10; 10 6; 13 12; 1 Macc 13 35), while the NT (πρεσβυτέροι, presbuteros, Mt 16 21; 26 47 57; Mk 8 31; Lk 9 22; Acts 4 5 35) makes frequent mention of the office.

The elders served as local magistrates, in bringing murderers to trial (Dt 19 12; 21 1 ff; Josh 20 4), punishing a disobedient son (Dt 21 19), inflicting penalty for slander (22 15), for noncompliance with the Levirate marriage law (25 7 ff), enforcing the Law (27 1), conducting the service of expiation of the tribes (Lev 14 13 ff).

In certain passages different classes of officers are mentioned as “judges and officers” (Dt 16 18), “elders” and “officers” (31 28), “heads, tribes, elders, officers” (29 10 [Heb 9]), it is probable that both classes were selected from among the elders, and that to one class was assigned the work of judging, and that the “officers” exercised executive functions (Schur). In entirely Jewish communities the same men would be both officers of the community and elders of the synagogue. In this case the same men would have jurisdiction over civil and religious matters.

Elder in the NT (πρεσβυτέροι, presbuteros):

1. The word is used adjectively to denote seniority (Lk 15 25; 1 Tim 5 2).

2. Referring to the Jewish elders of the synagogue, usually associated with the scribes and Pharisees, and NT passages cited in the previous article.

3. It denotes certain persons appointed to hold office in the Christian church, and to exercise spiritual oversight over the flock and members of them. From the name in Acts 14 23; 20 17 it may be inferred that the churches generally had elders appointed over them. That “elders” and “bishops” were in apostolic and sub-apostolic times the same, is now almost universally admitted; in all NT of reference their functions are identical. The most probable explanation of the difference of names is that “elder” refers mainly to the person, and “bishop” to the office; the name “elder” emphasizes what he is, while “bishop,” that is “overseer,” emphasizes what the elder or presbyter does. See Bishop; Church Government; Ministry.

ELEAD, el-e-ad (אלהד, ’el'adh, “God has testified”): An Ephraimit, slain while making a raid, by the men of Gath (1 Ch 7 21).

ELEADAH, el-e-ad-eh (אלהד, ’el'adhah, “God has adorned”): An Ephraimit (1 Ch 7 20).

ELEALEH, el-eale (אלה, elah, “God has ascended”): Lay in the country taken from Shilon and within the lot given to Reuben (Nu 32 3 37 f). “Their names being changed” seems to apply to all the towns mentioned. There is no indication of the other names. Elealeh is noticed with Heshbon in the oracles against Moab in Isa 25 8 4. Onom locates it one Rom mile from Heshbon. It is represented today by el'Al, a mound crowned with ruins, about a mile N. of Heshbon.

ELEASA, el-e-sa. See ELASA.

ELEASAH, el-e-sa (in Heb identical with Eleasha, which see):

1. A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 39 40).

2. A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 37; 9 43).

ELEAZAR, el-e-zar, el-e-zar, el-e-zar (איהז, el'azer; אפלpackageName, Eleazar, “God is helper”):

1. The 3d son of Aaron by Elishaba (Ex 6 23; Nu 3 2). He married one of the daughters of Puciel, who bore him Phinehas (Ex 26). With his father and 3 brothers he was consecrated to the priest’s office (Ex 23 1). After the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, he occupied a more important position, and he and Ithamar “ministered in the priest’s office” during the absence of Aaron from the camp (Lev 10 6 1; Nu 3 4; 1 Ch 24 2 2 ff). He was given the oversight of the Levites and had charge of the tabernacle and all within it (Nu 3 32; 4 16). To Eleazar fell the duty of beating out for an altar covering the censers of Korah and his fellow conspirators who had attempted to seize the priest’s bread (Nu 16 37 39). On the death of Aaron, Eleazar succeeded him (Nu 20 25 ff). He assisted Moses with the census after the plague in the plains of Moab (Nu 26 1 ff), and with Moses and the elders heard the petition of the daughters of Zelophehad who wished to be served as heirs to their father (Nu 27 1 ff). After the entrance into Canaan, Eleazar and Joshua gave effect to the decision arrived at by giving the daughters of Zelophehad a share in the land of Manasseh (Josh 17 4). He was priest and adviser to Joshua, the successor of Moses (Nu 27 19; 31 12 ff), whom he also assisted in partitioning Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 17; Jos 14 1; 19 51; 21 1). He was buried in the hill (Num 26 11; “Gibeon”) and his son in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh 24 33). For some reason unknown the descendants of Ithamar seem to have held the chief position among the priests from Eli till the accession of Solomon, when Abiathar was intrusted to the task. Eleazar, the descendant of Eleazar, was appointed in his place (1 K 2 26 ff). Ezra was a descendant of Zadok.
(Ezr 7 1 ff); and the high priest's office was in the temple of Zadok till the time of the Maccabees.

(2) The son of Abinadab, sanctified to keep the ark of Jehovah, it was brought from Beth-shemesh to Kiriath-jearim after being sent back by the Philistines (1 S 7 1).

(3) The son of Dodi, one of David's three mighty men. A famous feat of arms with David at Ephes-dammim is recorded (2 S 33 9 f); 1 Ch 11 12 f where he is named the son of Dodo).

(4) A Levite, a son of Mahli, a Merarite. It is recorded that he had no sons, but daughters only, who were married to their cousins (1 Ch 23 21, 22; 24 32).

(5) A priest who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr 8 33); the son of Phinehas. (5) and (6) may be identical.

(6) A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12 42).

(7) A son of Mattathias and brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 2 5; 6 43 f; 2 Mac 8 23).

See Asmonaean; Maccabees.

(8, 9) Two others are mentioned in 1 Mac 8 17; 2 Mac 6 18 ff.

(10) An ancestor of Jesus, 3 generations before Joseph (Mt 1 15).

ELEAZURUS, ελέαζουρος, NV ELIASIBUS (q.v.).

ELECT, ελέκτω. That is, "chosen," "selected." In the OT the word represents derivatives of ἐλεκτός, ἐλεκτής. It means properly an object or objects of selection. This primary meaning sometimes passes into that of "eminence," "valuable," "choice," often thus as a fact, in places where AV uses "chosen" (or "elect") to translate the original (e.g. Isa 42 1; 1 Pet 2 6). In AV "elect" (or "chosen") is used of Israel as the race selected for special favor and to be the special vehicle of Divine purposes (so 4 in Apost. Tobs and Eccles); of the great Servant of Jehovah (cf. Lk 23 35; the "Christ of God, his chosen"); of cedemn of Jacob, of Moses, Rufus (Rom 16 13); "the lady," and her "sister" of 2 Jn; of the holy angels (1 Tim 5 21), with a possible suggestion of the lape of other angels.

In the NT, "elect" (or "chosen") is used of a human community, also described as believers, saints, the Israel of God; regarded as in some sense selected by Him from among men, objects of His special favor, and correspondingly called to special holiness and service. See further under Election. In the Eng. VSS "elect" is not used as a vb.: "to choose" is preferred; e.g. Mk 13 20; Eph 1 4.

HANDLEY DUNLM

ELECT LADY, ελεκτής λαίδη (ελεκτής κυρία, ελεκτής κυρία; 2 Jn ver 1): In accordance with strict grammatical usage these words of address may be tr in three ways: "to an elect lady" (which as an address is too indefinite); or, both words being taken as proper names, "to Ekeklektē Kuria" (an improbable combination of two very rare names); or "to Ekeklektē, lady" (anglicized, "to the lady [or 'Madam'] Ekeklektē.") The other translations which have been given—to "the elect lady" or "to the elect Kuria"—are open to objection on account of the omission of the article; but this violation of rule is perhaps not without parallel (cf 1 Pet 1 1). The translation adopted will partly depend upon whether we regard the epistle as addressed to an individual or to a community. Dr. Rendel Harris believes this question to be settled by the discovery in the papyri of numerous instances which prove that kuria and kuria were used by ancient letter-writers as terms of familiar endearment, applicable to brother, sister, son, wife, or intimate friend of either sex (Expositor, March, 1901; see also Findlay, Fellowship on the Life Journal, ch iii.). In the light of this suggestion we should naturally translate, "to my [dear] lady Ekeklektē." Grammatically, this is strongly supported by 1 Tim 1 2 and 2 Tim 1 2 (Τιμίαν γυναῖκας . . . Διόνυσσας. . . . τιμίαν, Timiōnas γυναῖκας . . . agapeī, τίμιαν, τιμίαν; 'Timiōnas beloved . . . child'); and the fact that the name Ekeklektē has not yet been discovered, though Ekeklektos has, offers no grave objection. This is the tr favored by Clement of Alexandria, who says of the opisthe: scripta vero est ad quaedam Babyloniam nomine Ekeklektōs, et ista autem electionem ecclesiae sanctae ("It is written to a certain Babylonian, Ekelektē by name; but it signifies the further election of the holy church"). It seems doubtful whether he means by the last clause that Elects is simply a personification of the church, or a real person whose name was derived from the Christian idea of election. Either way the rendering, "to the lady Ekelektē," is suitable, and upon the whole it seems the best. Ekeklektē is not an adj. but a noun. If the person is intended, it is "the lady Electē;" if a church, it is designated, not "the elect Lady," but "the lady Elect." The mention of "thy elect sister" in 2 Jn ver 13 does not hinder either supposition. See further Cyprian, JOHN, THE EPISTLES OF.

ROBERT LAW

I. The Word in Scripture.—The word is absent from the OT, where the related Heb vb. (בֹּלָה, בָּלָה) is frequent. In the NT it occurs 6 t (Rom 9 11; 11 5.7.28; 1 Thess 1 4; 2 Pet 1 10). In all these places it appears to denote an act of Divine selection taken as effect upon human objects so as to bring them into special and saving relations with God: a selection such as to be at once a mysterious thing, transcending human analysis of its motives (so eminently in Rom 9 11), and such as to be knowable by its objects, who are (2 Pet) exhorted to "make it sure," certain, a fact to consciousness. It is always (with one exception, Rom 9 11; see below) related to a community, and thus has close affinity with the OT teachings upon the privileged position of Israel as the chosen, selected race (see under ELECT). The objects of election in the NT are, in effect, the Israel of God, the new, regenerate race called to special privilege and special service. From one point of view, that of the external marks of Christianity, they may thus be described as the Christian community in its widest sense, the sense in which the sacramental position and the real are prima facie assumed to coincide. But from 2 Pet it is manifest that much more than this has to be said if the incidence of the word present to the writer's mind is to be rightly felt. It is assumed there that the Christian, baptized and a worshipper, may yet need to make "sure" his "calling and election" as a fact to his consciousness. This implies conditions in the "election" which far transcend the terms of success and failure.

II. The Mysterious Element.—Such impressions of depth and mystery in the word are confirmed by... the other passages. In Rom 9:11 the context is charged with the most urgent and even staggering challenge to submission and silence in the presence of the inscrutable. To illustrate large assertions as to the liberty and sovereignty of the Divine dealings with man, the apostle brings in Esau and Jacob, individuals, twins as yet unborn, and points to the inscrutable difference of the Divine action toward them as such. Somehow, as a matter of fact, the Eternal appears as appointing to unborn Esau a future of comparative disfavor and to Jacob of favor; a future announced to the still pregnant mother. Such determinations by honor and disfavor, the apostle says, "the purpose of God according to election might stand." In the whole passage the gravest stress is laid upon the isolation of the "election" from the merit or demerit of its objects.

III. Incidence upon Community and Individual.

—It is observable that the same characteristic, the inscrutable, the sovereign, is attached in the OT to the "election" of a favored and privileged nation. Israel is repeatedly reminded (see e.g. Dt 7) that the Divine call and choice of them to be the people of God has no relation to their virtues, or to their strength. The reason lies out of sight, in the Divine mind. So too "the Israel of God" (Gal 6:16) in the NT, the Christian community, "the new, peculiar people." They which are called by the unmerited favor (e.g. Tit 3:5). And the nature of the case here leads, as it does not in the case of the natural Israel, to the thought of a Divine election of the individual, similarly inscrutable and sovereign. For the idea of the New Israel involves the thought that in every genuine member of it the provisions of the New Covenant (Jer 31:31) are being fulfilled: the sins are remembered no more, and the law is written in the heart. The bearer of the Christian name, but not of the Christian spiritual standing and character, having "not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his" (Rom 8:9). The chosen community accordingly, not as it seems ab extra, but as it is in its essence, is a fellowship of individuals each of whom is an object of unmerited Divine favor, taking effect in the new life. And this involves the exercise of electing mercy, C.f. e.g. 1 Pet 1:3. And consider Rom 11:4-7 (where observe the exceptional use of "the election," meaning "the choice of") where...

IV. Cognate and Illustrative Biblical Language.

—It is obvious that the aspects of mystery which gather round the word "election" are not confined to it alone. An important class of words, such as "recipient," "destinataire," "adorne," "purposum," "gift," bears this same character; asserting or connoting, in appropriate contexts, the element of the inscrutable and sovereign in the action of the Divine will upon man, and particularly upon the will and action of God. And it will be felt by careful students of the Bible in its larger and more general teachings that one deep characteristic of the Book, which with all its boundless multiplicity is yet one, is to emphasize on the side of man everything that can humble, convict, reduce to wondering silence (see for typical passages Job 40:34; Rom 3:19), and on the side of God everything which can bring home to man the transcendence and sovereign claims of his almighty Maker. Not as unrelated utterances, but as part of a vast whole of view and teaching, occur such passages as Eph 2:8 and Rom 11:33-36, and even the stern, or rather awestruck, phrases of Rom 9:20-21, where the potter and the clay are used in illustration.

V. Illustrations of Inquiry Here. Scope of Election.

—We have sought thus in the simplest outline to note first the word "election" and then some related Scriptural words and principles, weighing the witness they bear to a profound mystery in the action of the Divine will upon man in the spiritual sphere. What we have thus seen leaves still unnoted what, according to Scripture, is the goal and issue of the elective act. In this art, remembering that it is part of a Bible Encyclopedia, we attempt no account of the history of thought upon election, in the successive Christian centuries, nor again any discussion of the relation of election in Scripture to extra-Scriptural philosophies, to theories of necessity, determination, fatalism, or freedom. We attempt instead to set before us the election as used in the Bible. Studying it so, we find that this mysterious action of God on man has relation, in the Christian revelation, to nothing short of the salvation of the individual (and of the community of such individuals) from sin and condemnation, and the preservation of the saved to life eternal. We find this not so much in any single passage as in the main stream of Bible language and tone on the subject of the Divine selective action. But it is remarkable that the recorded thoughts of Our Lord if these we find assertions in this direction which could hardly be more explicit. See Jn 6:37; 44.45; 10:27-29. To the writer the best summary of the Scriptural evidence, at once definite and restrained, is the language of the 17th Anglican art.: They which are called by the unmerited favor (e.g. Tit 3:5). And the nature of the case here leads, as it does not in the case of the natural Israel, to the thought of a Divine election of the individual, similarly inscrutable and sovereign. For the idea of the New Israel involves the thought that in every genuine member of it the provisions of the New Covenant (Jer 31:31) are being fulfilled: the sins are remembered no more, and the law is written in the heart. The bearer of the Christian name, but not of the Christian spiritual standing and character, having "not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his" (Rom 8:9). The chosen community accordingly, not as it seems ab extra, but as it is in its essence, is a fellowship of individuals each of whom is an object of unmerited Divine favor, taking effect in the new life. And this involves the exercise of electing mercy, C.f. e.g. 1 Pet 1:3. And consider Rom 11:4-7 (where observe the exceptional use of "the election," meaning "the choice of") where...

VI. Perseverance.

—The anxious problem of PERSEVERANCE will be treated under that word. It may be enough here to say that alike what we are permitted to read as revealed, and what we may humbly apprehend as the reason of the case, tend to the reverent belief that a perseverance (rather of the Lord than of the saints) is both taught and implied. But when we ponder the nature of the subject we are amply prepared for the large range of Scriptures which on the other hand condemn and preclude, for the humble disciple, so gross a misuse of the doctrine as would let it justify one moment's presumption upon Divine mercy in the heart which is at the same time sinning against the Divine love and holiness.

VII. Considerations in Relief of Thought.

—We close, in view of this last remark, with some detached notes. It is an imperious question: the unspeakable trial which to many devout minds the word before us has always brought.

First in place and importance is the thought that a spiritual fact like election, which belongs to the innermost purpose and work of the 1. Antinomies. Eternal, necessarily leads us to a region where comprehension is impossible, and where we can only reverently apprehend. The doctrine passes upward to the sphere where antinomians live and move, and where we must be content to hear that there are antinomy and contradictions, but which are really various aspects of infinite truth. Let us be content to know that the Divine choice is sovereign; and also that "his tender mercies are over all his works," that "he willeth not the death of a sinner," that "God is love." Let us relieve the tension of such submissively reliance by reverently noting how the supreme antimony meets one type of human need with its one side, and with its other another. To the "fearful saint" the Divine sovereignty of love is a sacred cordial. To the seeking penitent the Divine compassion of love opens the door of peace. To the deluded theorist who does not love and obey, the warnings of a fall and ruin which are possible, humanly, from any spiritual height, are a merciful beacon on the rocks.

Further, we remember that election, in Scripture, is as different as possible from the wish necessity of, e.g., the Stoics. It never appears.

2. Fatalism as mechanical, or as a blind destiny.

Another thing has given us otherwise supreme proofs that He is all-good and all-kind. And it is related that all His attributes are being but as a sinner. It has never presented as an arbitrary force majeure. Even in Rom 9 the "silence" called for is not as if to say, "You are hopelessly passive in the grasp of infinite power," but, "You, the creature, cannot judge your Maker, who must know infinitely more of cause and reason than his handiwork can know."

The mystery, we may be sure, has behind it supreme right and reason, but in a region which at present at least we cannot penetrate. Again, election never appears as a violation of human will. For never in the Bible is man treated as irresponsible. In the Bible the relation of the human and Divine wills is inscrutable; the reality of both is assured.

NEVER is the doctrine presented apart from a moral context. It is intended manifestly to deepen man's submission to—not force, but—Moral faith. In the practical experience of the soul its designed effect is to emphasize in the believer the consciousness (itself native to the true state of grace) that the whole of his salvation is due to the Divine mercy, no part of it to his merit, to his virtue, to his wisdom. In the sanctified soul, which alone, assuredly, can make full use of the mysterious truth, is it designed to generate, together and in harmony, awe, thanksgiving and repose.

A necessary caution in view of the whole subject is that here, if anywhere in the regions of spiritual study, we inevitably "know in part," and in a very limited part. The treatment of election has at times in Chrisian history been carried on as if, less by the light of revelation than by logical process, we could tabulate or map the whole subject. Where this has been done, and where at the same time, under a sort of mental rather than spiritual fascination, election has been placed in the foreground of the system of religious thought, and allowed to dominate the rest, the truth has (to say the least) too often been distorted into an error. The Divine character has been beclouded in its beauty. Sovereignty has been divorced from love, and so defaced into an arbitrary fiat, which has for its only reason the assertion of omnipotence. Thus the grievous wrong has been done of αἰεράμον τις λέγειν πρό τοι Θεον, "defamation of God." For example, the revelation of a positive Divine selection has been made by inference to teach a corresponding rejection ruthless and terrible, as if the first part of the mysterious truth, is to reject or crush even the faintest aspiration of the created spirit toward God. For such a thought not even the dark words of Rom 9 18 give Scriptural excuse. The case there in hand, Pharao's, is anything but one of arbitrary power, training or divine will acting upon an individual and right.

Once more, the subject is one as to which we must on principle be content with knowledge so fragmentary that its parts may seem contradictory in our present imperfect light. The one thing we may be sure of is that the veil is so thick that nothing can be hidden there which will really contradict the supreme and ruling truth that God is love.

Finally, let us from another side remember that here, as always in the things of the Spirit, "we know in part." The chosen multitude are 5. The sovereignly called, . . . justified, Unknown . . . glorified." (Rom 8 29,30). But Future for a purport in Gen 30,31: 'Elohe-

They are saved, and kept, and raised to the perfect state, for the service of their Lord. And not till the cloud is lifted from the unseen life can we possibly know what that service under eternal conditions will include. That is a matter for an end terminating in themselves.

ELECTRUM, έλεκτρυμα: The RVm rendering of χορμᾶ, hoshalim, of Ezek 1 4.27; 8 2 (LXX έλεκτρυμα, elektron, Vulg electrum). Both AV and ERV has "amber" while the ARV has "gold metal." Gesenius says electrum must not be understood as being here used for amber, but for a kind of metal remarkable for brightness, compounded of gold and silver. "Amber" is undoubtedly a poor rendering, as the Hev term means "polished brass." ARV has the more correct rendering, however, may well have been known to Ezekiel (EB s.v.). See also STONES, Precious: Buying, IV.

EL-ELOHE-ISHMAEL, el-Elohe-Isma-el, el-Elohe-Isma-el, el-Elohe-Isma-el, el-Elohe-is'sma-el, el-Elohe-is'sma-el, el'Elohe-Isma-el, el'Elohe-Isma-el, el'Elohe-Isma-el, el'Elohe-Isma-el, el'Elohe-Isma-el, and el'Elohe-Isma-el, "God, the God of Israel" in ARVm and AVm: Found only in Gen 33 20 as the name given to the altar erected at Shechem by Jacob, henceforth known as Israel, on the parcel of ground purchased by him from the inhabitants of Shechem, his first encampment of length and importance since the return to Pal from Paddan-aram and the eventful night at Peniel (Gen 33 20). This unusual combination of names has given occasion for much speculation and for various text emendations. Already the LXX sought to meet the difficulty by reading ωοτογρα & el to the altar of Israel, instead of the wa-togrd ló 'el MT, and "he called it El" etc. Wellhausen, followed by Dillmann, Driver and others, changes "altar" to "pillar," because the Heb verb, un-dakh, is used with yiqhd, "pillar," in Gen 44 14-20, so making this religious act a parallel to that at Bethel. But Delitzsch, New Comm on Gen, properly rejects this purely fanciful change, and understands the compound name as the altar's inscription. Dillmann well suggests that "altar" or "pillar" may be supplied, reading thus: "called it the altar of El, the God of Israel." The peculiar phrase is best and most readily understood in its close connection with the struggle at Peniel, recorded in Gen 32. Being victorious in that struggle, Jacob received the new name "Israel"; and to his first altar in Pal he gave that name of God which appeared in his own new name, further explaining it by the appositive phrase "Elohe-Israel." Thus his altar was called, or dedicated to, "El, the God of Israel." Edward Mack ELEMENT, el't-ment, ELEMENTS (ά στοιχεια, ἡ στοιχεία), "the letters of the alphabet," "the elements out of which all things are formed," "the heavenly bodies," "the fundamental principles of any art or science." One of the constituent parts of the physical universe ("elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," ARVm "the heavenly bodies").

In 2 Pet 3 10, the constituent parts of the physical universe ("elements shall be dissolved with fervent heat," ARVm "the heavenly bodies").

(1) In Gen 4 39, RV has "rudiments," as in AVm, and in Col 2 8,20, where the reference is to imperfect Jewish ordinances. See Rudiments.

ELEPH, τόφ (ΤΟΦ), ἡ-a-leph, "the ox": A place in the lot of Benjamin not far from Jerus (Josh 18: 28). The name is omitted by LXX, unless, indeed, it is combined with that of Zelah. It may be identified with Liffa, a village W. of Jerus (Conder, HDB, s.v.). Others identify Liffa with Nephthoah.

ELEPHANT, κφραντς (Job 40:15 AvM [AVαν] "hippopotamus", RV "ivory"); 1 K 10:23 AvM; 2 Ch 9:21 AvM; 1 Mac 3:34; 6:28 ff; 8:6): Possibly in Job it is the extinct mammoth. See BEHEMOTH; IVORY.

ELEPHANTINE, ελαφ-εφαν (SEVEN R). See SEVEN R.

ELEVEN, ελαφ-ν, STARS. See ASTRONOMY.

ELEVEN, ελαφ-ν, THE (οι ἑδεξαι, κυη ἑδεξα): The eleven apostles remaining after the death of Judas. The definite art. used serves to designate them as a distinct and definite group whose integrity was not lost by the loss of one of the twelve. The college of the Twelve' had come to be so well recognized that the gospel writers all used on occasions the word with the definite art. to represent the Twelve Apostles chosen by Jesus. This custom still remained and the numeral merely changed, as, "Afterward he was manifested unto the eleven' (Mk 16:14; cf Lk 24:33; Acts 2:14). On the other hand, however, the subset, is also sometimes used, as "The eleven disciples went into Galilee" (Mt 28:16; cf also Acts 1:26). As an illustration of the fixedness of usage, Paul refers to the eleven' as the "twelve" when he recounts the appearances of Jesus after his resurrection: "And that he appeared to Cephas; then to the twelve' (1 Cor 15:5).

ELIHANAN, ελαβαν ( Heb, 'elhanan, "whom God gave"):

(a) A great warrior in the army of David who slew a Philii giant. There is a discrepancy between 2 S 21:19 and 1 Ch 20:5. In the former passage we read, "And there was again war with the Philis at Gebh; and Elhanan, the son of Jareære-gim the Beth-lehemite, slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam"; while in the latter we are told, "And there was again war with the Philis; and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam". Most modern critics prefer as the original text of the latter part of the two discrepant statements the following: "And Elhanan the son of Jair the Beth-lehemite slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam". It is contended that the Chronicler slightly modified the text before him, in order to bring it into harmony with 1 S 17, where David is said to have slain a Philii giant Goliath. There is almost unanimous agreement that "Jareære-gim is a corrupt reading, and the "Jair" in 1 Ch 1 is to be preferred. From Jerome to the present some scholars identify Elhanan with David, and thus remove the discrepancy. Ewald (Hist, III, 70) argued that the name "Goliath" was inserted in 1 S 17 and 21 by the narrators, whose compositions are embodied in Samuel, Elhanan being the real victor over Goliath, while David's antagonist was simply called the "Philistine".

(b) The son of Dodo of Bethlehem, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23:24; 1 Ch 11:26). Some moderns think there was only one Elhanan, and that he was the son of Dodo of the clan of Zab.

ELI, ελι (Heb, 'eli): A descendant of Ithamar, the fourth son of Aaron, who exercised the office of high priest in Shiloh at the time of the birth of Samuel. For the first time in Israel Eli combined in his own person the functions of high priest and judge, judging Israel for 40 years (1 S 4:18). The incidents in Eli's life are few; indeed, the main interest of the narrative is in the other characters who are associated with him. The chief interest centers in Samuel. In Eli's first interview with Hannah (1 S 1:12 ff), she is the central figure; in the second interview (1 S 1:24 ff), it is the child Samuel. When Eli next appears, it is as the father of Hophni and Phinehas, whose worthless and licentious lives had profaned their priestly office, and earned for them the title "men of Belial" (or "worthlessness"). Eli administered no stern rebuke to his sons, but only a gentle chiding of their greed and immorality. Thereafter he was warned by a nameless prophet of the downfall of his house, and of the death of his two sons in one day (1 S 2:27-30), a message later confirmed by Samuel, who had received this word directly from Jehovah (1 S 3:11 ff). The prophecy was not long in fulfilment. During the next invasion by the Philis, the Israelites were utterly routed, the ark of God was captured, and Hophni and Phinehas were both slain. When the news reached Eli, he was so overcome that he "fell from off his seat backward by the side of the gate; and his neck brake, and he died" (1 S 4:14). The character of Eli, while sincere and devout, seems to have been entirely lacking in firmness. He appears from the history to have been a good man, full of humility and gentleness, but weak and indulgent. His is not a strong personality; he is always over-shadowed by some one more commanding or interesting figure.

ELI, ελι (Heb, 'eli, ELI, LAMA, l'hi 'm, SABACH-THANI, sa-bak-tha-ni). See ELOI, ELOI, etc.

ELIAB, ελαβ-θα (Elī'aḇh, "God is father"):

2. A Reubenite, father of Dathan and Abiram (Nu 16:11-12; 26:6; Dt 11:6).
3. Eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (1 S 16:6), once called Elihu (1 Ch 27:18). He was of commanding appearance (1 S 16:6), and when serving with Saul's army at the time when he was confronting the Philis and Israelites, he was so resolute as to lead over his brother David (17:28 f.). His daughter Abihail became a wife of Rehoboam (2 Ch 11:18).
4. An Ephraimite, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:27); called Elid in ver 64, and Elihu in 1 S 11:1.
5. A Gadite warrior with David (1 Ch 12:9), one of eleven mighty men (vs 8:14).
6. A Levite musician (1 Ch 15:18-20; 16:5).
7. An ancestor of Judith (Jeh 8:1; 9:2).

ELIADA, ελι-αδ (El',i-aḏ, Elidad):

1. One of the sons of David (2 S 5:16; 1 Ch 3:8; called Beeliada, 1 Ch 14:7 [q.v.]).
2. A descendant of Benjamin and a captain in the army of Jehoshaphat, commander of 200,000 men (2 Ch 17:17), 3 kings.
3. (Father of Rezon, an "adversary" of Solomon (1 K 11:23, AV "Elidad").

ELIADAS, ελι-α-δας (El'ı-a-ḏad, Elidad): A son of Zamoth who married a strange wife (1 Esd 9:28); called Elioenai in Ezr 10:27.

ELIADUN, ελι-α-δυν, RV ILIADUN (q.v.).
ELIAH, 6-l'a. See Elijah.

ELIAHABA, 6-l'a-ba, 6-l'a-ba (אֵלִיָּהָ בַּע, 'elyah-ba) "God hides"); One of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 32; 1 Ch 11 35).

ELAIKIM, 6-l'k-kim (אֶלְיָקִים, 'elyakhim) "Eleai-kim": (1) The son of Hilkiah who succeeded Shebna as governor of the palace and "grand vizier" under Hezekiah (Isa 22 20). The functions of his office are seen from the oracle of Isaiah in which Shebna is deposed and Elaiakim set in his place (Isa 22 15 ff). He is the "treasurer" (RVM "steward"), and is "over the house" (ver 15). At his installation he is clothed with a robe and girdle, the insignia of his office, and, having the government committed into his hand, is the "father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah" (ver 21). The key of the house of David is laid on his shoulder, and he alone has power to open and shut, this being symbolic of his absolute authority as the king's representative (ver 22).

One of Solomon's officials is the first mentioned as occupying this position (1 K 4 6), and this office was continued in both the Northern and Southern Kingdoms (1 K 16 9; 18 3; 2 K 10 5; 15 5). Its importance is seen from the fact that after Azariah was smitten with leprosy, Jotham his heir "was over the household, judging the people of the land" (2 K 15 5).

When Sennacherib sent an army against Jerusalem in 701, Elaiakim was one of these Jewish princes who held on behalf of Hezekiah a parley with the Assyrian officers (2 K 18 18-20,37; Isa 36 3-11,22). As a result of the invader's threats, he was sent by Hezekiah in sackcloth to Isaiah, entreating his prayers to Jeh on behalf of Jerusalem (2 K 18 2; Isa 37 2).

(2) The original name of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, whom Pharaoh-necho made king of Judah (2 K 23 34; 2 Ch 36 4).

(3) A priest who assisted at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt after his return from Babylon (Neh 12 41).

(4) A grandson of Zerubbabel and ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1 13).

(5) An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 30).

ELIALI, 6-l'-a-li (אֶלְיָלָי, Elial; Eliali): 1 Esd 9 34; possibly corresponds to "Binnui" in Ezr 10 98.

ELIAM, 6-l'am (אֵלִיָּם, 'ely'am, "people's God"?):

(1) Father of Bathsheba (2 S 11 3); in 1 Ch 3 5 called Ammiel.

(2) One of David's "thirty," son of Abiathob the Gilonite (2 S 23 34).

ELIAONIAS, 6-l'-a-6-n'as (אֶלְיַעְוָנָיָא, Elia'onias): A descendant of Phاشath Meah (1 Esd 8 31); called "Eliehoenai" in Esr 8 4.

ELIAS, 6-l'us. See Elijah.

ELIASAPH, 6-l'-a-saf (אֶלְיָסָפ, 'elysáfáh, "God has added"): (1) Son of Deuel; prince of the tribe of Gad in the Exodus (Nu 1 14; 2 14; 7 42 47; 10 20).

(2) Son of Lael; prince of the Gershonites (Nu 3 24).

ELIASHIB, 6-l'-a-shib (אֶלְיָשִּׁיב, 'elyashibh, "God restores"): (1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24).

(2) Head of the eleventh course of priests (1 Ch 24 12).

(3) The high priest in the time of Nehemiah. He, with his brethren the priests, helped in the rebuilding of the wall (Neh 3 1). But later he was "called unto Tobiah" the Ammonite (13 4) and allowed that enemy of Nehemiah the use of a great chamber in the temple (ver 5); and one of his grandsons, a son of Joia, married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite and was for this expelled from the community by Nehemiah (ver 28). See SANBALLAT.

(4, 5, 6) Three Israelites, one a "singer," who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 24,27,36).

(7) Father of Jehohanan (Ezr 10 6); probably identical with (3) above. Called Elisah in 1 Esd 9 1.

ELIASIB, 6-l'a-sib. See Elieshah.

ELIASIBUS, 6-l'-a-s-b-us ('Elüšib'-os, Elisib'os, AV Eliasurus): One of the holy singers who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 24); called "Elisibh" in Ezr 10 27.

ELIASIMUS, 6-l'-a-s-m-nus ('Elüši-mos, Elisimos, AV Elisimus): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 28).

ELIASIS, 6-l'a-s-is ('Elüši'-a, Elisia): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34); corresponds to "Jaa" in Ezr 10 37.

ELIAHATH, 6-l'-a-tha (אֵלִי-אַת, 'ely'ath, "God has come"): A Hemanite, head of the twentieth division of the temple musicians (1 Ch 25 4,27).

ELIDAD, 6-l'-a-dad (אֵלִידַּד, 'elidad, "God has loved"): Prince of Benjamin in the division of the land (Nu 34 21); perhaps the same as LEIAD (q.v.).

ELIEHOENAI, 6-l'-e-h'-en-ai (אֶלְיֶהוֹגֶנָּה, 'elyh'o-nay, "to Jeh are mine eyes"): (1) (AV Eliehoenai) a Korahite doorkeeper (1 Ch 26 3).

(2) (AV Eliehoenai) Head of a family in the Return (Ezr 8 4).

ELIEL, 6-l'el, e-li-el (אֶלְיֶאל, 'ely'e'el, "El is God," or "my God is God"): (1, 2, 3) Mighty men of David (1 Ch 11 46 47; 12 11).

(4) A chief of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24).

(5, 6) Two chiefs of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 20 22).

(7) A chief Levite from Hebron (1 Ch 15 9 11).

(8) A Kohathite in the line of Elkanah, Samuel and Heman (1 Ch 6 34); see ELIJA (4).

(9) A Levite of the time of Hezekiah (1 Ch 31 13).

ELIENAI, 6-l'-e-n'ai (אֶלְיֶנָה, 'ely'nah): A Benjamite chief (1 Ch 8 20).

ELIEZER, 6-l'-e-z'ër, 6-l'-e-z-er (אֵלִיֶּזֶר, 'elyzer; AV El'z-e-er, Eliezer, "God is help"): (1) The chief servant of Abram (Gen 15 2); ARV "Eliezer of Damascus," ERV "Dammossek Eliezer." The Heb is peculiar: lit. "And the son of the possession ['meshekh] of my house is Dammossek [of] Eliezer." A possible but unlikely meaning is that his property would become the possession of Damascus, to the city of Eliezer. TG Syr (RVM) read "Eliezer the Damascusene": this supposes a reading, "Eliezer ha-dammosek" or "mid-dammosek." The text may be corrupt: the assonance between 'meshekh and Dammossek is suspicious. Abram calls Eliezer 'one born in my house,' i.e. a dependant, a member of his household, and so regards him as a his integrity and stands ready to present his cause to God (31:35–37). The friends, however, have exhausted their resources, and through three discourses have been silent, as it were, snuffed out of existence. At this point, then, that Elihu is introduced, to renew their contention with young constructive blood, and represent their cause (as he deems) better than they can themselves. He is essentially at one with them in condemning Job (34:34–37); his only quarrel with them is on the score of the inconclusiveness of their arguments (32:3.5). His self-portrayal is conceived in a decided spirit of satire on the part of the writer, not unmingled with a sardonic humor. He is very egotistic, very sure of the value of his ideas; much of his alleged prolixity is due to that volatile self-deprecation which betrays an inordinate opinion of oneself (cf 32:6–22). This, whether inferior composition or not, admirably adapts his words to his character. For substance of discourse he adds materially to what the friends have said, but in a more rationalistic vein; speaks edifyingly, as the friends have not done, of the disciplinary value of affliction, and of God’s means of revelation by dreams and visions and the interpreting of an inferior necessary friend (33:13–28). Very evidently, however, his ego is the center of his system; it is he who sets up as Job’s mediator (33:5–7; cf 39:5–36), and his sage remarks on God’s power and wisdom in Nature are full of self-importance. All this seems designed to accentuate the almost ludicrous humiliation of his collapse when from a natural phenomenon the oncoming tempest shows unusual and supernatural signs. His words become disjointed and incoherent, and cease with a kind of attempt to recant his pretensions. And the verdict from the whirlwind is: “darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge.” Elihu thus has a real function in the story, as honorable as overweening self-confidence is apt to be. LITERATURE

(1) The great prophet of the times of Ahab, king of Israel. E. is identified at his first appearance (1 K 17:1) as “E. the Tishbeh, who was of the sojourners of Gilead.” Thus his native place must have been called Tishbeh. A Tishbeh (Thibeh) is in the territory of Naphtali is known from Tob 1 2; but if (with most modern commentators) the reading of the LXX in 1 K is followed, the word tr sojourners is itself “Tishbeh,” locating the place in Gilead and making the prophet a native of that mountain region and not merely a “sojourner” there.

1. The Works of Elijah.—In 1 K 16 20–34 we read of the impetuous of Ahab, culminating in his patronage of the worship of the Tyrian Baal, god of his Tyrian queen Jezebel (ver 31). Ver 34 mentions as another instance of the little weight attached in Ahab’s time to ancient prophetic threatenings, the rebuiling by Hiel the Bethelite of the banned city of Jericho, “with the loss’ of Hiel’s eldest and youngest sons.” This is the situation which calls for a judgment of Jeh, announced beforehand, as is often the case, by a faithful prophet of Jeh.
Whether E. was already a familiar figure at the court of Ahab, the narrative beginning with 1 K 17 1 does not state. His garb and manner identified him as a prophet, in any case (2 K 1 8; of Zee 15 4). E. declared in few words that Jeh, true and only rightful God of Israel, whose messenger he was, was even at the very time sending a drought which should continue until the prophet himself declared it at an end. The term is to be fixed, indeed, not by E. but by Jeh; it is not to too short (‘these years’), and it is to come only when the chastisement shall be sufficient.
Guided, as true prophets were continually, by the ‘word of Jeh,’ E. then hid himself in one of the ravines east of (‘before’) the Jordan, where the brook Cherith afforded him water, and ravens brought him abundant food (‘bread and flesh’ twice daily), 1 K 17 2–6. As the drought advanced the brook dried up. E. was then directed, by the ‘word of Jeh,’ as constantly, to betake himself beyond the western limit of Ahab’s kingdom to the Phoen village of Zarephath near Sidon, where that widow, to whom Jeh sent him was found gathering a few sticks from the ground at the city gate, to prepare a last meal for herself and her son. She yielded to the prophet’s command that he himself should be first from her; and when that day’s supply extended beyond Phoenicia and continued there for a full year.)
But when the widow’s son fell sick and died, the mother regarded it as a Divine judgment upon her sins, a judgment which had been drawn upon her by the grace of God, as the prophet explained; the prayer of E., life returned to the child (vs 17–24).

“In the third year,” 1 K 18 1 (1 K 4 25; 1 S 5 17 give three years and six months as the length of the drought), E. was directed to show himself to Ahab as the herald of rain from Jeh. How sorely both man and beast in Israel were pressed by drought and the resulting famine, is shown by the fact that King Ahab and his chief steward Obadiah were in person searching through the land for any patches of grazing ground, so that if the drought extended beyond Phoenicia and continued there for a full year.)
The words of Obadiah upon meeting E. show the impression which had been produced by the prophet’s long absence. It was believed that the Spirit of God had removed to some other unknown, inacsessible, mysterious region (vs 10.12). Obadiah feared that such would again be the case, and, while he entreated the prophet not to make him the bearer of a message to Ahab, appealed to his own well-known piety and zeal, as shown in his sheltering and feeding, during Jezebel’s persecution, a hundred prophets of Jeh. E. reassured the steward by a solemn oath that he would show himself to Ahab (ver 15). The king greeted the prophet with the haughty words, “Is it thou, thou troublest of Israel?”
E.’s reply, answering scorn with scorn, is what we should expect from a prophet; the words of Israel are not to be charged to the prophet who declared the doom, but to the kings who made the nation deserve it (vs 17.18).

Elijah went on to challenge a test of the false god’s power. Among the pensioners of Jezebel were 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of the Asherah—still fed by Kozor and Jezebel of the famine of 18.5. Accepting E.’s proposal, Ahab called all these and all the people to Mt.
Carmel (vs 19.20). E.’s first word to the assembly implied the folly of their thinking that the allegiance of a people could be successfully divided between two deities: “How long go ye leaping between the two sides?” (possibly “leaping over two thresholds,” over the Ironical’ to the custom of leaping over the threshold of an idol temple, to avoid a stumble, which would be unprioprious; of 1 S 5 1–5).

Taking the people’s silence as an indication that they admitted the force of his first words, E. went on to propose his conditions for the test: a bullock was to be offered to Baal, a bullock to Jeh, but no fire put under; “The God that answereth by fire, let him be God.” Thus the proposal was as fair (vs 22–24).
Throughout a day of blazing sunshine the prophets of Baal called in frenzy upon their god, while E. mocked them with merciless sarcasm (vs 25–29). About the time for the regular offering of the evening sacrifice in the temple of Jeh at Jerus, E. assumed control.
Rebuilding an ancient altar thrown down perhaps in Jezebel’s persecution; using in the rebuilding twelve stones, symbolizing an undivided Israel such as was promised to the patriarch Jacob of old; drenching their sacrifice and altar water from a spring under the slopes of Carmel, until even a trench about the altar, deep and wide enough to have a two-4’th of a half (quarter)-bushe measure in it, was filled—the prophet called in few and earnest words (1 S 30–37).
The answer of Jeh by fire, consuming bullock, wood, atler and the very dust, struck the people with awe and fear. Confirmed that Jeh was God alone for them, they readily carried out the prophet’s stern sentence of death for the prophets of the idol god (vs 38–40). Next the prophet bade Ahab make haste with the meal, probably a sacrificial feast for the multitude, which had been made ready;
because rain was at hand. On the mountain top, E. bowed in prayer (1 S 10, 11). At evening he rose to look out across the sea for the coming storm: At last the appearance of a rising cloud as small as a man’s hand was reported; and before the hurrying chariot of the king could reach the place to Jezebel it was overtaken by “a great rain” from heavens black with clouds and wind after three rainless years.
With strength above nature, E. ran like a courier before Ahab to the very gate of Jezebel (vs 41–46).

The same night a messenger from Jezebel to E.,
The message as a night servant “said to E., I am Jezebel” (so the LXX), “so let the Horeb and I brake, for I break, I break if I break the 5 8–11.17.18; Jer 34 18.19), “If I make not thy life as the life of one of the slain prophets of Baal ‘by morrow about this time.’” Explain E.’s action how we may—and all the possible explanations of it have found defenders—he sought safety in some flight. At Beer-sheba, the southernmost town of Judah, he left his ‘servant,’ whom the narrative does not elsewhere mention. Going onward into the southern wilderness, he sat down under the scantly shade of a desert broom-bush and prayed that he might share the common fate of mankind in death (19 1–4). After sleep he was refreshed with food brought by an angel. Again he slept and was fed. In the strength of that food he then wandered on for forty days and nights, until he found himself at Horeb, the mountain sacred because there Jeh had revealed Himself to Moses (vs 5–8). The repetition of identical words by E. in vs 10 and 14 represents a difficulty. Unless we are to suppose an accidental repetition by a very early copyist (earliest text) is that of the famine of G. 19.20.
E., we may see in it an indication that E.’s despondency was not easily removed, or that he sought at Horeb an especial manifestation of Jeh for his encouragement, or both. The prophet was hidden to take his stand upon the sacred mount; and Jeh was heralded by tempest, earthquake and thunderstorm (vs. 9-12). These were Jeh’s forerunners only; Jeh was not in them, but in the “still small voice,” such as the prophets were accustomed to hear within their souls. When E. heard the not unfamiliar inner voice, he recognized Jeh present to hear and answer him. E. seems to be seeking to justify his own retreat to the wilderness by the plea that he had been “very jealous,” had done in Jeh’s cause all that mortal prophet could do, before he fled, yet at all costs to the same people who had forsaken the law and “covenant” of Jeh, thrown down His altars and slain His prophets, would have allowed the slaughter of E. himself at the command of Jezebel; and in him would have perished the last true servant of Jeh in all the land of Israel (vs. 13-14).

Divine compassion passed by E.’s complaint in order to give him directions for further work in Jeh’s cause. E. must anoint Hazael to seize the throne of Syria, Israel’s worst enemy among the neighboring powers; Jehu, in like manner, he must anoint to put an end to the dynasty of Ahab and assume the throne of Israel; and Elisha, to be his own successor in the prophetical office. These three, Hazael and his Syrants, Jehu and his followers, even Elisha himself, are to execute His judgments upon the idolaters and the sorcerers in Israel. Jeh will leave Himself 7,000 (a round number, a limited but not an excessively small one, conveying a doctrine, like the doctrine of later prophets, of the salvation of a righteous remnant to expose the works of the wicked and go against the judgment because they did not share the sin. If E. was rebuked at all, it was only in the contrast between the 7,000 faithful and the one, himself, which he believed to number all the righteous Jews.

The anointing of Hazael and of Jehu seems to have been left to E.’s successor; indeed, we read of no anointing of Hazael, but only of a significant interview between that worthy and Elisha (2 K 7-15).

4. The Case of Naboth. E. next appears in the narrative as rebucker of Ahab for the judicial murder of Naboth. In the very piece of ground which the king had coveted and seized, the prophet appeared, unexpectedly and uninvited, and called to account upon Ahab and Jezebel and all their house the doom of a shameful death (1 K 21). There was present at this scene, in attendance upon the king, a captain named Jehu, the very man already chosen as the supplenter of Ahab, and he never forgot what he then saw and heard (2 K 9:25-26).

Ahab’s penitence (1 K 21:28-29) averted from himself some measure of the doom. His son Ahaziah, who pulled it down upon his own head (2 K 9:30).

5. Elijah in the wilderness. Sick unto death from injuries and received in a fall, Ahaziah sent to ask Ahaziah an oracle concerning his recovery at the shrine of Baal-zebub in Ekron. E. met the messengers, brought them back with a prediction, not from Baal-zebub but from Jeh, of impending death. Ahaziah recognized by the messengers’ description the ancient “enemy” of his house. A captain and fifty soldiers sent to arrest the prophet were consumed by fire from E.’s word. A second captain with another fifty met the same fate. A third besought the prophet to spare his life, and E. went with him to the king, but only to repeat the words of doom (2 K 1). A foreboding, shared by the “sons of the prophets” at Bethel and Jericho, warned E. that the closing scene of his earthly life was at hand.

6. Elijah to Translated E. He desired to meet the end, come in to Jordan with the stroke of his mantle, that the two might pass over toward the wilderness on the east. Elisha asked him that he might receive a firstborn’s portion of the spirit which rested upon his master. “A chariot of fire, and horses of fire” appeared, and parted the two asunder; “and E. went up by a whirlwind into heaven” (2 K 2:1-11).

In 2 Ch 21:12-15 we read of a “writing” from E. to Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. The statements of 2 K 3:11,12 admit of no other interpretation than that given in the Hebrew prophet’s similar prophecy. The prophetic work had already occurred in the lifetime of Jehoshaphat. It has been pointed out that the difficult verse, 2 K 8:16, appears to mean that Jehoram began to reign at some time before the death of his father; it is also conceivable that E. left a message, reduced to writing either before or after his departure, for the future king of Judah who should depart from the true faith.

II. The Work of Elijah. One’s estimate of the importance of the work of E. depends upon one’s conception of the condition of things which the prophet confronted in Northern Israel. While it is true that the reign of Ahab was outwardly prosperous, and the king himself not without a measure of success in the political aspect of his reign, his religious policy at best involved such tolerance of false faiths as could lead only to disaster. Ever since the time of Joshua, the religion of Jeh had been waging its struggle in the old Canaanite worship of the power of the earth, and the Baal worship, and the Baalim, the “Baals” or “lords” of this and that neighborhood, whose ancient altars stood “upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree” (Dt 12:2). The god imported from Phoenicia by Jezebel bore also upon such a mission, the name, the character and the worship were worse and more debasing than anything that had before been known. Resistance offered by the servants of Jeh to the claims of the queen’s favored god led to persecution, rightly ascribed by the historian to Jezebel (1 K 18:4). In the face of this danger, the differences between the worship of Jeh as carried on in the Northern Kingdom and the same worship as practised at Jerusalem, work out of sight of E. E. was not to recall the people from the Tyrian Baal to Jeh, the God of their fathers. The vitality of the true religion in the crisis is shown by the fidelity of such a man as Obadiah (1 K 18:3), or by the perseverence of Jeh, in his righteous anger and hatred of all that had happened of persecution (19:18).

The work begun by E. was finished, not without blood, by Jehu; we hear no more of the worship of the Tyrian Baal in Israel after that anointed usurper’s time (2 K 9:10). To say that E. at Horeb “learns the gentleness of God” (Strachan in HDB) is to contradict the immediate text of the narrative and the history of the times. The direction given E. that he should anoint one man to seize the throne of Israel and a prophet to continue his own work, with the promise and prediction that these three forces should unite in executing upon guilty Israel the judgment still due for its apostasy from Jeh and its worship of a false god, who had not a word of peace; the very vision of peace was hidden from his eyes, reserved for later prophets for whom he could not prepare the way. It was his mission to destroy at whatever cost the heathen worship which else would have destroyed Israel itself, with consequences whose evil we cannot estimate, even though we would have had no standing-ground had it not been for the work of E. and the influences which at divine direction he put in operation.

III. Character of the Prophet. It is obvious that the Scripture historian does not intend to furnish us with a character-study of the prophet E. Does he furnish anything new to the material on which such a study may profitably be attempted? The explanation found in Jas 5 17, "E. was a man of like passions [m "nature"] with us," is brief indeed; but examination of the books which have been written upon the life of E. leads to the conclusion that it is possible to err by attaching too much importance to events which were never intended to bear, as well as by introducing into one's study too much of sheer imagination. It is easy, for example, to observe that E. is introduced to the reader with suddenness, and the account of his appearance in the narrative seem abrupt; but is one warranted in arguing from this a lack of truth in the prophet's character? Is not the sufficient explanation to be reached by observing that the historian's purpose was not to give a complete biographical history of any individual, whether prophet or king, but to display the working of Jeh on upon and with the kingdoms of Israel and Judah through the prophets? Few personal details are therefore to be found recorded concerning even such a prophet as E.; and moreover, in all cases, they have not been designed to give a teaching message.

The imagination of some has discerned a "training of E."
the in the experiences of the prophet; but to admit that there must have been such a training would enable us to discuss traces of it in the scenes and incidents which have been recorded.

Distrusting, for the reasons above suggested, any attempt at a detailed representation of the prophet's inner life, one may seek, and prize, what seems to lie upon the surface of the narrative: faith in Jeh as God of Nature and as covenant God to his people.

IV. Miracles in the Elijah Narratives.—The miraculous element must be admitted to be prominent in the experiences and works of E. It cannot be estimated apart from the general position which the student finds it possible to hold concerning miracles recorded in the OT. The effort to explain away E.'s miracles by a rationalistic way may be wholly unprofitable. E.'s "ravens" may indeed be converted by a change of vowel-points into "Arabians"; but, in spite of the fact that Orientals would bring offerings of food to a holy hermit, the whole tenor of the narrative favors rather than nullifying the idea that E.'s "ravens," and saw in the event another such exercise of the power of Jeh over all things as was to be seen in the supply of meal and oil for the prophet and the widow of Zarephath, the fire from heaven, the parting of the Jordan, or the appearance of the prophet by a whirlwind into heaven. Some modern critics recognize a different and later source in the narrative of 2 K 1; but here again no real difficulty, if any difficulty there be, is removed. The stern prophet who would order the slaughter of the 450 Baal prophets might well call down fire to consume the soldiers of an apostate and a hostile king. The purpose and meaning of the E. chapters is to be grasped by those who accept their author's conception of Jeh, of His power over Nature and with Nature in mind, rather than by those who seek to place that conception by another.

V. Elijah in the NT.—Malachi (4 5) names E. as the forerunner of the "great and terrible day of Jeh," and the expectation of Elijah was a characteristic mark of those who expected the Second Coming. Mk 6 15 [Lk 9 8; Mt 16 14] Mk 8 28 [Lk 9 19; Mt 27 47-49] Mk 15 35-36. The interpretation of Malachi's prophecy fore-shadowed in the angelic announcement to Zacharias (Lk 1 17), that John the Baptist should do the work of another Elijah, is given on the authority of Jesus Himself (Mt 11 14). The appearance of E., with Moses, on the Mt. of Transfiguration, is recorded in Mt 17 1-13 [Mk 9 2-13 || Lk 9 28-36], and in Mt 11 14 || Mk 9 13 Jesus again identifies the E of Malachi with John the Baptist. The fate of the soldiers of Ahaziah (2 K 1) is in the mind of James and John on one occasion (Lk 9 54). Jesus Himself alludes to E. and his sojourn in the land of Sidon (Lk 4 25-26). Paul makes use of the prophet's earlier appearance (Rom 11 1). In Jas 5 17-18 the work of E. affords an instance of the powerful supplication of a righteous man.

2) A "head of a father's house" of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 27, AV "Eliah").

3) A man of priestly rank who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21).

4) A layman who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 26).

the Harodite (Uradite), one of David's guard, the "thirty" (2 S 23 25). Omitted from 1 Ch 11 27.

ELIM, e'lim (D'lim, e'trimus; A'doa, A'dam). The second encampment of the Israelites after crossing the Red Sea. It was a contrast to the previous camp called "Marah" because of the bitterness of the waters, for there were twelve springs of water, and threescore and ten palm trees (Ex 15 27; 16 1; Nu 33 9). The traditional site is an oasis in Wady Charundel, cir 63 miles from Suez. See Exodus; Wanderings of Israel.

ELIMELECH, e-lim'e-lek (g-lim'e-lek, e'ilimelek, "my God is king"); 1 Abeimelech, Abeimeleche, *A'liemelhe, A'limmel). Elimelech was a member of the tribe of Judah, the son of Bethuel, a man of wealth and probably head of a family or clan (Ruth 1 23; 2 13). He lived during the period of the Judges, had a hereditary possession near Bethlehem, and is chiefly known as the husband of Naomi, the mother-in-law of Ruth and her daughter-in-law of David the king.

Because of a severe famine in Judaea, he emigrated to the land of Moab with his wife and his sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Not long afterward he died, and his two sons married Moabitish women, Ruth and Orpah. Ten years in all were spent in Moab, when the two sons died, and the three widows were left. Soon afterward Naomi decided to return to Judah, and the sequel is told in the Book of Ruth. See Ruth; Naomi.

ELIOENAI, e-ll-o'-en-ai. See Elihoreni.

ELIONAS, el-i'-nas (Eliounas, Elidnes, Elionate, Elionatis). The name of two men who had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9 22-23), corresponding respectively to "Elioenai" and "Eliacer" in Ezr 10 22-31.

ELIPHAL, e-lip'hal, e-lip'al (g'liph'al, "g'lliph'al, "God has judged"); Son of Ur, one of the mighty men of David's armies in the Census (2 S 23 35). By another name identifies him with Elipelet, son of Ahian, the son of the Masachithie (2 S 23 34; cf Davis, Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. "Ur"). See also 1 Ch 14 5-7.
ELIPHALAT, ē-līf′-ă-lat (Eliphalt, Eliphaltai; 1 Esd 8:39; 9:33): Called "Eliphelet" in Ezra 8:13, 10.33.

ELIPHAZ, ē-lī-fāz, ē-līf′-āz (יֵלָיפַ֖א, Elapha, "God is fine gold") (1) Son of Eshai by Adah, and father of Teman, Kenaz and Amalek (Gen 36:4.10; 1 Ch 1:35f). See also EDOU.

ELIPHAZ: The first and most prominent of the three friends of Job (Job 2:11), who come from distant places to condole with and comfort him, when they hear of his affliction. That he is to be regarded as their leader and spokesman is shown by the greater weight and originality of his speeches (contained in chs 4, 5, 16, 22), the speeches of the other friends being in fact largely echoes and emotional enforcements of his thoughts, and by the fact that he is taken as their representative (Job 42:7) when, after the address from the whirlwind, Jehovah appoints their expiation for the wrong done to Job and to the truth. He is represented as a venerable and benignant sage from Teman in Idumeæa, a place named for its wisdom (cf Jer 49:7), as was also the whole land of Edom (cf Ob ver 8); and doubtless it is the writer's design to make his words typical of the best wisdom of the world. This wisdom is the result of ages of thought and experience (cf Job 42:7), and was developed under a period of years (cf 7:27), when, and claims the authority of revelation, though only revelation of a secondary kind (of Eliphaz' vision, 12:18), and his challenge to Job to obtain the like, 5:1). In his first speech he deduces Job's affliction from the natural conditions of life from creation (4:7-11), which cause he makes broad enough to include innate impurity and depravity (4:17-19); evinces a quietism which depricates Job's self-destroying ebullitions of wrath (5:2.3; cf Job's answer for its wisdom (4:4); and promises restoration as the result of penitence and submission. In his second speech he is irritated because Job's blasphemous words are calculated to hinder devotion (16:4), attributes them to iniquity (vs 5,6), restates his depravity doctrine (vs 14-16), and initiates the lurid descriptions of the wicked man's fate, in which the friends go on to overstate their case (16:20-35). In the third speech he is moved by the exigencies of his theory to impute actual frauds and errors to Job, injustices indulged in because God was too far away to see (32:5-15); but as a close holds open to him still the way of penitence, abjuring of iniquity, and restoration to health and wealth (23:21-30). His utterances are well composed and judicial (see coldly academic, Job thinks, 16:4,5), full of good religious counsel abstractly considered. Their error is in their inveterate presupposition of Job's wickedness, their unsympathetic clinging to theory in the face of fact, and the supressing of the human element in the friendship of Jehovah.

ELISHA, ē-līs′-ē-ha (אֵלִישָׁה, 'Elishah, "God is salvation"); LXX 'Ekuratos, Elisæus; NT 'Elisæus, Elizasos, Elisias, Elises (Lk 4:27 AV): I. HIS CALL AND PREPARATION 1. His Call 2. His Preparation 3. The Martyrdom of Elijah II. HIS PROPHETIC CAREER 1. Reckoning of His Career 2. His Ministry in a Private Capacity 3. His Ministry in a Public and National Capacity 4. Characteristics of His Ministry (1) In Comparison with Elijah (2) General Features of His Ministry III. GENERAL ESTIMATE LITERATURE A prophet, the disciple and successor of Elijah. He was the son of Shaphat, lived at Abel-meholah, at the northern mouth of the Jordan valley and a little S. of the Sea of Galilee. Nothing is told of his parents but the father's name, though he must have been a man of some wealth and doubtless of earnest piety. No hint is given of Elisha's age or birthplace, and it is almost certain that he was born and reared at Abel-meholah, and was a comparatively young man when we first hear of him. His early life thus was spent on his father's estate, in a god-fearing family, and under the influence of the many of God's prophets. His moral and religious nature was highly developed in such surroundings, and from his work on his father's farm he was called to his training as a prophet and successor of Elijah.

I. HIS CALL AND PREPARATION.—The first mention of him occurs in 1 K 19:16. Elisha was at Horeb learning perhaps the greatest lesson of his life; and one of the three duties with which he was charged was to anoint Elisha, the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah, as prophet in his stead.

Elisha soon went northward and as he passed the lands of Shaphat he saw Eliash plowing in the rich level field of his father's farm. Twelve

1. His Call yoke of oxen were at work, Elisha had just finished his plowing with the twelfth yoke. Crossing over to him Elisha threw his mantle upon the young man (1 K 19:19). Elisha seemed to understand the meaning of the symbolic act, and was for a moment overwhelmed with its significance. It means to be ready; to be worth using, and to be a partner with him in the work of the prophecies. It also means to be anointed as the son and successor of Elijah in the prophetic office. Naturally he would hesitate a moment before making such an important decision. As Elijah strode on, Elisha felt the irresistible force of the call of God and ran after the great prophet, announcing that he was ready to follow, only he wished to give a parting kiss to his father and mother (19:20). Elisha seemed to realize what it meant to the young man, and bade him "Go back again; for what have I done to thee?" The call was as Elisha seemed to think, and the response had better be deliberate and voluntary. But Elisha had fully made up his mind, slew the yoke of oxen with which he was plowing, boiled their flesh with the wood of the implements he was using, and made a farewell feast for his friends. He then followed Elijah, making a full renunciation of home ties, comforts and privileges. He became Elijah's servant; and we have but one statement describing their relationship (2 K 3:11): he "poured water on the hands of Elijah.

They seem to have spent several years together (1 K 22:1; 2 K 1:17), for Elisha became well known among the various schools of the prophets. While ministering to the needs of Elijah, Elisha learned many deep and important lessons, imbued with much of his spirit, and developed his own rare qualities of nature and efficiency until he was ready for the prophetic service himself. It seems almost certain that they lived among the schools of the prophets, and not in the mountains and hilles as Elijah had previously done. During these years the tie between the two men became very deep and strong. They were years of great sighning, to a young prophet and of careful teaching on the part of the older. The lesson learned at Horeb was not forgotten and its meaning would be profoundly impressed upon the younger man. The whole after-life shows that he had deeply imbued the teaching.

The final scene shows the strong and tender affection he cherished toward his master. Aware that the end was near, he determined to be with him until the last. Nothing could persuade him to leave Elijah.

3. The Parting Gift

When asked what should be done for Elijah, he asks for the elder son's portion, a double portion, of his master's spirit (2 K 2:9). He has no thought of leaving the records of the followed firstborn son. The request shows how deeply he had imbibed of his master's spirit already. His great teacher disappears in a whirlwind, and, awestruck by the wonderful sight, Elisha rends his clothes, takes up the garment of Elijah, and goes in his stead. He was a young man, was eager to serve, and had a quick eye. Elijah, as he passed, smote the waters to test whether the spirit of Elijah had really fallen upon him, and as the water parts, he passes over dry shod. The sons of the prophets who have been watching the proceeding, have seen the man of God at once observe that the spirit of Elijah rested upon Elisha, and they bowed before him in reverence and submission (2 K 2:12–15).

Elisha now begins his prophetic career which must have lasted 50 years, for it extended over the reigns of Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Joash. The change in him is now so manifest that he is universally recognized as Elijah's successor and the religious leader of the prophetic schools. The skepticism of the young prophets regarding the translation of Elijah found little sympathy with Elisha, but he is especially indulgent and courteous to them (2 K 2:16–18).

II. His Prophetic Career.—As we study the life of Elisha we look first at the record of his career. The words are the record of the events and the language is the language of history—no strict chronological order. Like other Scripture writers he has followed the system of grouping his materials. The record in 2 K 2:19–27 are probably in the order of their occurrence. The events in 2 K 3:1–6 cannot be chronologically arranged, as the name of the king of Israel is not mentioned. In 2:23, the prophet says he has no more into the land of Israel, and ver 24 proceeds to give an account of Ben-Hadads’ invasion and the terrible fate of the Syrians. In 2 K 4:1–36 he is in friendly converse with the king. In ch 15 the death of Naaman, the leper, and this is followed by the sad account of his last interview with Elisha (2 K 13:14–19) which event occurred some years previously.

When he began his career of service he carried the mantle of Elijah, but we read no more of that mantle; he is arrayed as a divine judge before the Israelites, he carries a private citizen (2 K 2:12) in common garments (brâykhâdîm). He carries a walking-staff of ordinary citizens, using it for working miracles (2 K 4:29). He is denounced from lives in different cities, sojourning at Bethel or Jericho with the sons of the prophets, or dwelling in his own home in Dothan or Samaria (2 K 6:24,32). He passed through the land of Syria often on foot that a prophet’s chamber was built for his special use (4:5–11). His ministry began by shutting up the heavens for three and a half years; Elisha’s began by healing a spring of water near Jericho (2:21).

One of these possessed certain noxious qualities, and complaint is made to Elisha that it is unfit for drink, and the inhabitants of Jericho refused to drink of it (2:19). He takes salt in a new vessel, casts it into the spring, and the waters are healed so that there was not “from thence any more death or miscarriage” (2:21).

(2) Leaving Jericho, ‘a pleasant situation,’ he} passes up to the highlands of Ephraim, doubtless by the Wady Suweinit, and approaches Bethel, a seat of Baal worship and headquarters of idolatry. The bold head, or perhaps closely cropped head, of Elisha, in contrast to the long hair of the younger man, may explain the ridicule of some “young lads out of the city,” who called after him “Go up, thou baldhead,” their taunt manifesting the most blatant profanity and utter disregard of God or anything sacred. Elisha, justly angered, turned and cursed them in the name of Jeh. Two years soon break forth from the woods of that wild region and make fearful havoc among the boys. Elisha may have shown severity and a vindictiveness in this, but he was in no way disposed to blame for the punishment which overtook the boys. He had nothing to do with the bears and was in no way responsible for the fate of the lads. The Sept adds that they threw stones, and the rabbis tell how E. was himself punished, but these attempts to tone down the affair are uncalled for and useless (2:23,24).

(3) From Bethel E. passed on to Mt. Carmel, the home of a school of the prophets, spent some time there and returned to Samaria the capital (2:25). His next deed of mercy was to relieve the pressing needs of a woman of one of the prophets. The name of the place is not given (4:1–7).

(4) On his many journeys up and down the country, he frequently passed by the little village of Shunem, on the slopes of “Little Hermon.” The modern name is Tell‘An. It was about three miles from Jezreel. Accustomed to accept hospitality of one of the women of the place, he so impressed her with his sanctity that she appealed to her husband to build a chamber for the “holy man of God, that passeth by us continually.” When he passed on and in return for this hospitality a son was born to the woman, who suddenly dies in early boyhood and is restored to life by the prophet (4:8–37).

(5) E. is next at Gilgal, residing with the sons of the prophetic family. It is a time of famine and they are subsisting on what they can find. One of them finds some wild gourds (pałkêlu’dhah), shreds them into the pot and they are cooked. The men have no sooner begun to eat than they taste the poison and cry to Elisha, “O man of God, there is death in the pot!” Throwing in some meal, E. at once renders the dish harmless and wholesome (4:38–41).

(6) Probably at about the same time and place and during the same famine, a man from Baalath-shalisha brings to Elisha the bones of Elisha’s master, Naaman. The bones were wrapped in a bundle of fresh barley bread and fresh ears of grain. Unselfishly E. commands that it be given to the people to eat. The servant declared it was altogether insufficient for a hundred men, but E. predicts that there will be enough and is abundantly supplied with bread (4:42–44). This miracle closely resembles the two miracles of Jesus.

(7) The next incident is the healing of Naaman, the leper, commander of the Syrian army (5:1–19). He is afflicted with the leprosy, the leper’s leprosy of the leprous kind (ver 27). A Jewish maiden, captured in one of their numerous invasions of Eastern Pal., and sold into slavery with a multitude of others, tells her mistress, the wife of Naaman, about the wonder-working Elisha. The maiden tells her mistress that Elisha can heal the leprosy, and Naaman resolves to visit him. Through the king he obtains permission to visit E. with a great train and rich presents. The prophet sends his servant to tell him to dip seven times in the Jordan river, and he will be healed. Naaman is angry at the lack of deference on the part of Elisha and turns away in a rage to go home. Better counsels prevail, and he obeys the prophet and is cured. E. absolutely refuses the rich presents Naaman offers, and permits the Syrian to take some earth from Jeh’s land, that he may build an altar in Syria and worship Jeh there. The idea was that a God was localized, and could be worshiped in his own land. E. gives Naaman permission apparently to worship Rimmon while avowedly he is a worshipper of Jeh. The prophet appreciates the difficulties in Naaman's path, believes in his sincerity, and by this concession in no way proved that he believes in the actual existence of a god named Rimmon, or that Jeh was confined to his own land, or in any way sanctions idolatrous worship. He is conciliatory and tolerant, making the best of the situation.

(8) A merciful nature is apparent from the part of Elisha follows, but it was richly deserved. Gehazi's true character now manifests itself. He covets the rich presents brought by Naaman, runs after him, and by a clever story secures a rich present from the general. E. divinates his trick and deems him and his family to be afflicted with Naaman's leprosy forever (5 20—27).

(9) A group of the sons of the prophets, probably at Jericho, finding their quarters too small, determine to build new quarters near the Jordan. While felling the timber the ax-head of one, a borrowed tool, fell into the water and disappeared. It would have been useless to have attempted to search for it in that swift and muddy stream, so he cries in distress. Elisha, in a sick, cast-iron pot, in the spot where the ax fell, and makes the iron swim on the surface (6 1—7).

Elisha's services to his king and country were numerous and significant.

3. His Ministry in a Public and National Capacity

(1) The first, one recorded took place during the attempt of Jehoram to resubjugate Moab which had revolted under King Mesha. In company with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom his southern banded hosts found themselves without water in the wilderness of Edom. The situation is desperate. Jehoram appeals to Jehoshaphat, and on discovering that Elisha was in the camp all three kings appeal to him in their extremity. He refuses any help to Jehoram, bidding him appeal to the prophets of his father Ahab and his mother Jezebel. For Jehoshaphat's sake he will help, calls for a minstrel, and under the spell of the music recollects himself. He orders the captain of the chariots to make trenches to hold the water which shall surely come on the morrow from the land of Edom and without rain. He moreover predicted that Moab would be utterly defeated. These predictions are fulfilled, Mesha was overthrown in his capital, and in desperation sacrifices his firstborn son and heir on the walls in sight of all Israel. In great horror the Israelites withdraw, leaving Mesha in possession (5 4—27).

(2) His next service occurred at Samaria. The king of Syria finds that his most secret plans are divulged in some mysterious way, and he fails more than once to take the king of Israel. He suspects treachery in his army, but is told of Elisha's divulging powers. Elisha is living at Dothan; and thither the king of Syria sends a large army to capture him. Surrounded by night, E. is in no way terrified as his servant is, but prays that the young man's eyes may be opened to see the mountains full of the chariots and horses of Jeh. Going forth to meet the Syrians as they close in, E. prays that they may be stricken with blindness. The word ἁναρέω is used only here and in Gen 19 11 and probably means mental blindness, or bewilderment, a confusion of mind amounting to illusion. He now tells the young man to take a bow and arrow to the young lion place, but when he will lead them to the right place. They follow him into the very heart of Samaria and into the power of the king. The latter would have smitten them, but is rebuked by E. who counseled that they be fed and sent away (2 K 6 8—23). Impressed by such mysterious power and strange clemency the Syrians retreat.

(3) The next incident must have occurred some time previous, or some time after these. Samaria is besieged, the Israelites are encouraged to defend their capital to the last, famine prices prevail, and mothers begin to cock their children and eat them. The king in horror and rage will wreak vengeance on Elisha. The latter divines his purpose, anticipates any action on the king's part, and predicts that there will be abundance of food on the morrow. That night a messenger arrives. The king sees the Syrian host. They imagined they heard the Hittites coming against them, and fled in headlong rout toward the Jordan. Four lepers discover the deserted camp and report the fact to the king. He suspects an ambush, but is persuaded to send a few men to reconnoitre. They find the camp deserted and treasures strewing the path right to the Jordan. The Samaritans lose no time in plundering the camp and Elisha's predictions are fulfilled to the letter (6 24—7).

(4) The prophet's next act was one of great significance. It was the carrying out of the first order given to Elijah at Horeb, and the time seemed ripe for it. He proceeds north to Damascus and finds Hazael, the son of Benhadad, sick. Elisha sends a rich present by the hands of his chief captain Hazael and inquires whether he will recover. Elisha gives a double answer. He will recover, the disease will not be fatal, yet he will die. Fixing his eyes on Hazael, E. sees the successor to Benhadad who will be a terrible scourge to Israel. The man of God weeps, the fierce captain is ashamed, and when told of what he shall do, represents himself as a dog and not able to do such things. But the prophet is too entirely: he tells Benhadad he will recover, and on the morrow smothers him and succeeds to the throne (8 7—15).

(5) The next move of E. was even more significant. It is the fulfilling of the second order given Elijah at Mt. Horeb. The Israelites are fighting the Syrians in defense of Ramoth-gilead. The king, Jehoram, is wounded and returns home to Jezeel to recover. E. seizes on the opportune moment to have the house of Ahab avenged for its many sins. He sends prophets with a vial of oil to Ramoth-gilead with orders to anoint Jehu, one of the captains of the army, as king over Israel. The young prophet obeys, delivers his message and flees. Jehu tries to take him alive to reveal the nature of his mission. Elisha forces to tell, and is at once proclaimed king. He leaps into his chariot, drives furiously to Jezeel, meets the king by the vineyard of Naboth, sends an arrow through his heart, tramples to death the queen Jezebel, butchers the king's sons and exterminates the royal family. He then treacherously murders the priests of Baal and the revolution is complete; the house of Ahab is destroyed, Baal worship overthrown, and an able king is upon the throne (chs 9, 10).

(6) Elisha retains his fervent and patriotic spirit until the last. His final act is in keeping with his long life of generous deeds and faithful patriotic service. He is on his deathbed, having witnessed the fearful oppressions of Israel by Hazael who made Israelites as dust under his feet. The young king Joash visits him, weeps over him, calling him, "My father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." The dying prophet bids him take his bow and arrow to the young lion place, but when he will lead them to the right place. They follow him into the very heart of Samaria and into the power of the king. The latter would have smitten them, but is rebuked by E. who counseled that they Syria many times, but now he shall smite her only three (13 14-19).

(7) The last wonder in connection with Elisha occurs after this death. His bones were reported to have Vitalizing power (13 20-21). Tradition says that the man thus restored to life lived but an hour; but the story illustrates something of the reverence held for E.

(1) In comparison with Elijah.—In many respects Elisha is a contrast to his great predecessor. Instead of a few remarkable appearances and striking events, he was a steady and faithful servant of God's holy ministry: instead of the rugged hills his home was in the quiet valley, and instead of solitary goodness he loved the social life and the home. There were no sudden appearances and disappearances, people always knew where to find him. There were no long seasons of hiding or retirement, he was constantly moving among the people or the prophetic schools. There were no spectacular revolutions, only the effect of a long steady ministry. John was a prophet Elijah's more than the earlier. Elisha had learned well his master's art. His death (Hosea 13:19) was not so much in the temple, the fire and the earthquake, as in the still small voice, (1 K 19 12).

Elisha was a prophet of fire, Elisha more of a man of water. The former called down fire out of heaven to consume those sent to take him; Elisha anticipates the king when he comes to take him (2 K 5:32-33) and gives proper notice of the fact. But Elisha never seemed to lose his readiness to come upon the army which surrounded him at Dothan, and escape in a chest of dung. (6 21-23). Elisha was austere and terrible, but Elisha was so companionable that the woman at Shunem built him a little chamber and a tilting place could be helped more by the strains of music than by the mountain solitudes. (13 9). The multiplication of the oil and the cruse is much like the continued supply of meal and oil to the widow of Zarephath (1 K 17:10-16), and the raising of the Shunammite's son like the raising of the widow's son at Zarephath (17 17-24).

(2) General features of his ministry.—His services as a pastor-prophet were more remarkable than his military victories. He could be severely in the presence of deliberate wrongdoing, stern and unflinching when the occasion required. He could weep before Hazael, knowing what he was going to do to Israel, yet he anointed him king of Syria (2 K 5:11-15). When the time was ripe and the occasion opportune, he could instigate a revolution that wiped out a dynasty, exterminated a family, and caused the murder of the priests of Baal (chs 8, 9). He possessed the confidence of kings so fully that they admitted him to their councils and would have wreaked vengeance on him (31 31). He was something of a military strategist and many times saved the king's army (6 10). The king of Israel goes to him for his parting counsel (13 14-19). His advice or command seemed to be always taken unhesitatingly. His contribution to the religious life of Israel was not his least service. Under Jehu he secured the destruction of the Baal worship in its organized form. Under Hazael the nation was trodden down and almost extinguished. For his anointing by his own ministry many were saved from bowing to Baal. His personal influence among the schools of the prophets was widespread and beneficial. He that escaped the sword of Hazael was slain by Jehoash and he that escaped Jehoash was slain by Elisha. Elisha finished the great work of putting down Baal worship begun by Elijah. His work was not so much to add anything to religion, as to cleanse the religion already possessed. He did not ultimately save the nation, but he did save a large proportion of it. The corruption were not all eradicated, the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat were never fully overcome. He passed through a bitter and distressing national humiliation, but emerged with hope. He eagerly watched every turn of events and his counsels were more frequently adopted than those perhaps of any other prophet. He was "the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof" (33 14). No condemnation of calf-worship at Dan and Bethel is recorded, but that does not prove that it was not fully sanctioned. He refers to the test between Jehoshaphat and Baal worship. The corrupted form of Jeh worship was a problem which Amos and Hosea had to face nearly a cent. later.

III. General Estimate.—His character was largely molded by his mentor, Elijah. He was kind and benefactor of foreigner as well as of Israelite. He was large-hearted and generous, tolerant to a remarkable degree, courageous and shrewd when the occasion required, a diplomat as well as a statesman, severe and stern only in the presence of evil and when the occasion demanded. He is accused of being vindictive and of employing falsehood with his enemies. His faults, however, were the faults of his age, and these were but little manifested in his long career. He was a strenuous pastor's life. He served for years and his task was that of teaching and helping, rather than working of miracles. He continually went about doing good. He was resourceful and ready and was gifted with a sense of humor. His type is "the man of God," he proved his right to the title by his zeal for God and loving service to man.

ELISHAH, 'el-issä' (אֶלֶישָׁה, "Elishah", "God saves"); "Eker, Elia, Ekerel, Eleasar", More frequently assigned in Gen 10 4 as the eldest son of Javan, and in Ezk 27 7 as the source from which the Tyrians obtained their purple dyes. On the ground of this latter statement attempts have been made to identify it with Southern Italy or the north of Africa. Jos (Ant. I, vi, i) identified Elishah with the Aeolians. The Tg on Ezk gives "the province of Italy." Other suggestions include Hellas, Elis, and Asia; the last-named is a kingdom mentioned in the Am Tab, but its precise location is unknown. It is improbable as yet to claim certainty for any of these conjectures.

A. C. GRANT

ELISHAMA, 'el-issä'-'mä (אֶלישָׁם, 'Elishāma"), "God has heard!"

(1) Grandfather of Joshua and son of Ammihud; prince of the tribe of Ephraim in the Exodus (Nu 1 10; 7 48-53; 1 Ch 7 26).

(2) A son of David, born in Judah (2 S 5 16; 1 Ch 3 8).

(3) By textual corruption in 1 Ch 3 8 for Elisha, another of David's sons; of 2 S 5 15.

(4) A scribe of Jehoshákim (Jer 36 12.20.21).

(5) One "of the seed royal," grandfather of Ishmael, the slayer of Gedaliah (2 K 25 25; Jer 41 1).

(6) A man of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 2 41).

(7) One of the priests appointed by Jehovah to teach the law (2 Ch 17 6). F. K. FARMER

ELISHAPHAT, 'el-issä'-fat (אֶלֶישָׁפָח, "Elishaphat," "God is judge") This man figures in the Levitical conspiracy against Athaliah, to make Joash king. He was one of the "captains of hundred" employed in the enterprise by Jehoiada the priest (2 Ch 23 1).

ELISHEBA, 'el-issä'-bä (אֶלֶישָׁבָה, "Elisheba"), "God swears," "God is an oath". Daughter of Amminadab, sister of Noah, wife of Aaron, mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, the foundress, therefore, of the entire Levitical priesthood (Ex 6 23).
ELISHUA, el-ih-shu'ah (יְשַׁוֵעַ, 'elshuah'). "God is rich," "God is salvation": Son of David (2 S 5 15; 1 Ch 14 5); apparently called Elishama (1 Ch 3 6). In the latter locus we have most probably a misreading by the copyist of the name Elshaa.

ELISIMUS, el-ih-s'im-us, RV ELIASIMUS (q.v.).

ELIU, el-ih'u (אֵלִיאוֹד, Eliod; RV ELIHU): One of the ancestors of Judith (Jh 8 1), and therefore of the tribe of Simeon.

ELIUD, el-ih'yud (אֵלִיעָד, Elaid; "God my praise"): An ancestor of Jesus, four generations before Joseph (Mt 1 15).

ELIZAPHAN, el-i-zaf'hen (אֱלִישָפָן, Eliphaan; LXX Ελισαφᾶν, Elisaphan, Ελισαφάν, Elisaphan, Ελισαφάνε, Elisaphan, "God has protected"): cf. וָנָא, נוֹפָנָיָה, Zophaniah, "Yah has protected," and Phoen יְנָבָה, "Ba'al has protected").

(1) The son of Uziel, the son of Kohath, and so a prince of the Levitical class of the Kohathites (Nu 3 30; 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 29 13). But in 1 Ch 15 8; 2 Ch 39 13 his class seems to be co-ordinate with that of the Kohathites. He is called Elisaphan in Ex 6 22; Lev 10 4.

(2) A "prince" or chief of Zebulun, who represented that tribe in the division of the land (Nu 34 25).—WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

ELIZUR, el-i'zur (אֱלִישֻּר, Eliphar; Ελίσαφος, Elisesphus, "Yah is my rock"); cf Zariel "my rock is God" (Nu 3 35): A chief or prince of the tribe of Reuben (Nu 1 5; 2 10; 7 30; 10 18).

ELKANAH, el-k'a-nah (אֵלְכָּנָה, elkannah, "God has possessed"): An Ephraimithe, the father of Samuel (1 S 1 1–28; 2 1 21). Of his two wives, Hannah, the childless, was best beloved. At Shiloh she received through Eli the promise of a son. Elkanah, with Hannah, took the young Samuel to Shiloh when he was weaned, and left him with Eli as their offering to Jeh. They were blessed with three other sons and two daughters.

(2) The second son of Korah (Ex 6 24), who escaped the fate of Korah, Dathan and Abiram (Nu 26 11).

(3) One "next to the king" in Jerus in the time of Ahaz; slain by one Zichri of Ephraim in war with Pekah (2 Ch 28 7).

(4) One of the Kohathites among David's "mighty men" (1 Ch 12 16).

(5) A Levi, possibly the same as (2) above (1 Ch 6 23 25 36).

(6) Another Levi of the same line (1 Ch 6 26 35).—F. K. FARR

ELKIAH, el-k'i'a (אֵלְכַּיָּה, Elcia; AV Elcia): An ancestor of Judith (Jh 8 1).

ELKOSHITE, el-kosh-it (אֵל-כֹּשֶּת, ha-el-kosheth; LXX Ἐλκοσαίου, Elkeosaiou, Ἐλκασιοῦ, Elkasiou, Ἐλκασίων, Elkasioun, Ελκοσαίου, Elkosaiou): Used with the art. "the Elkoshite" (Nah 1 1). Probably a gentile adj. giving the home of the prophet; not definitely identified. Three traditions may be noted: (1) The Neo-ELMADAM, el-ma'dam (WH Ἐλμαδᾶμ, Elmadam; TR Ελμαδᾶμ, Elmadam; AV Elmadam): An ancestor of Jesus; according to St. Luke's genealogy, in the 6th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

ELNAAM, el-nā'am (אֶלנָ'אָם, 'el-nā'am, “God is delightfulness”); of Phoen “Gadannah”); According to MT the father of two of David's warriors (1 Ch 11 46); according to LXX himself one of the warriors.

ELNATHAN, el-nā'than (אֵלנָ'תָּן, 'elnāthan, “God has given”):
(1) The grandfather of Jehoachin (2 K 24 8).
(2) A courtier of Jehoiakim; he was one of those sent to Egypt to bring back the prophet Uriah (Jer 26 22), and one of those who heard the reading of the book of the covenant and entreated Jehoiakim not to burn the roll (Jer 36 1225)—possibly the same person as (1) above.

(3, 4, 5) The name of two “chief men”—unless textual corruption has introduced the name at its second occurrence. The forms of the first word as tv vary in the two narratives, being in Mt as first above and in L as in second reading. With some perversions of form probably from Ps 22 1 (יהָּנָא אֶל נַ מֶ וֶ נֶ מֶ נֶ מֶ נֶ מֶ נֶ מֶ מֶ נֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ מֶ M. There is an interesting but difficult problem in connection with the interpretation of this passage. There seems to be a mixture of Aram and Heb. The first two words, whether in Heb or Aram, have sufficient similarity to each other and each sufficient similarity to the name itself to warrant the jeer that Jesus was calling upon Elias, or the sincere supposition of those who might not fully understand the language, that he was actually calling on Elias. The forms lamā and lama used in Mt and Mk respectively (WH ed) represent the various possible forms, the first the Aram., and the second the Heb. The various readings and tv of the latter word, sabachtani, only add confusion to an effort at ultimate explanation of the real statement. Certainly the influence of the Aram. played a great part in the transmission of the original. The spirit revealed by Jesus in this utterance seems to be very much like that displayed in the Garden when He cried out to have the cup removed from Him.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

ELON, e'lôn (אֵלוֹנֶ, elôn, “terebinth”):
(1) A Zebulunite, who judged Israel ten years, and was buried in Ajalon (Jgs 12 112).
(2) A son of Zebulan (Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26).
(3) A Hittite who seduced daughter Esau wedded (Gen 26 34; 36 2).

ELON, e'lôn (אֵלוֹנֶ, elôn, a “terebinth”; Akāv, Ailōn): An unidentified town in the territory of Dan, named between Jablath and Timnah (Josh 19 43). It is possibly identical with Elōn-beth-Hanan which, along with Shaalbam and Bethshemesh, formed one of Solomon’s commissariat districts (1 K 4 9). Conder has suggested Bet' Anān, about 4 miles N.W. of Neby Samwil: it is quite uncertain.

who simply follows 1 Macc. The text should therefore be corrected to read as in RV, “in Elymas in Persia there was a city.”

ELYON, e'il-yon. See El-Elyon; God, Names of.

ELZAPHAN, el-zap-fan. See Elzaphan.

EMATH, em-ath (אֶמָת, Emath; cf cf Gen 20:14; 22:24; 31:30; 34:16; 46:20; Gen 24:60; 29:16; 31:58; 45:26; 46:26; 49:24; Deut 11:24). E. was a city of the tribe of Naphtali, on the north of the Jordan, opposite Beth-arabah, of which the text says (and which is apparently identical with ‘Amathus) that it was the native city of Simeon, the blind Seer.

EMBALMING, em-bal-ming (אֶבֶלָם, ‘em-balm; See also Abraham’s body, Josh 24:32). E. was used by the Egyptians in the embalming of their dead, on which subject see EMBALMING.

EMBROIDERY, em-broid-er’i (ἀμβρωσία, rīkmah; AV Needlework): Rīkmāh was applied to any kind of cloth which showed designs in variegated colors. The method of manufacture is unknown. The designs may have been woven into cloth or drawn in by a needle or hook (Jgs 5:30; Ps 45:14; Ezek 16:10.13.18; 26:16; 27:16.24).

Mā‘ashē rāḏām is trd “the work of the embroiderer” in RV instead of “needlework!” (Ex 26:36; 27:16; 28:39; 36:37; 38:18; 39:29; Jgs 5:30; Ps 46:14).

Rāḏām, “embroiderer,” occurs in Ex 35:35; 38:23. The fact that this word is used instead of ṣarōag, “weaver,” would lead us to suppose that the embroiderers’ work was either different from that of the weaver or that a “rāḏām” was esp. skilled in fine weaving. Another word, ḥōshēḇ, is used to describe a skilled weaver. “Cunning work” in AV of Ex 26:1.31; 26:6.15; 35:33.35; 36:8.35; 39:8.35 is rendered in ARV “work of the skillful workmen.” The passage has been freely rendered “designers.” In RV of Ex 38:39 ṣāḥābḥōr is trd “weave.” In Ex 26:4 occurs the word tōshēḇ, which is trd “broidered” in AV and “checker work” in RV. If this kind of work is what it is supposed to be, it is more truly “needlework” than the embroidery.

This work is still done in some of the Syrian cities and towns, esp. in Damascus. Small caps for men to wear under their ordinary headdress and loose outer garments or dressing-gowns are the forms in which it is commonly seen. The checker-work effect is obtained by sewing in a cotton string between two pieces of cloth, so as to form designs. The patterns usually run to straight lines such as signage or squares. The effect is striking, and we can well imagine would have made an impressive priest’s robe, esp. if costly materials were used. See also CRAFTS.

EMEK-KEZIZ, e-mek-kā’ē-zīz (אֵימֶק קֶזֶיז, ‘emek kē+zīz; AV Valley of Keziz [Josh 18:21]): A town in Benjamin named between Beth-hoglah and Betharabah, and therefore to be sought in the plain, probably S. of Jericho. The name has not been recovered.

EMERALD, em’īr-ald. See STONES, Precious.

EMERODS, em’er-o’dīz (אֵימֶר אוֹדוֹס, ‘ôphādīm, ‘ôphārōm, thōrīm): These words are used in the account of the plague which broke out among the Philis while the captive Ark of the Covenant was in their land. ‘Ôphādīm lit. means rounded eminences or swellings, and in RV of Ps 78:36 is “tumors” (1 S 6:5–12). In the Heb. text of this passage K‘r substitutes for it the word thōrīm, a term which occurs in the next chapter in the description of the golden models of these swellings that were made as votive offerings (S 11:17–18). The swellings were symptomatized by the plague and the history is precisely that of the outbreak of an epidemic of bubonic plague. The older writers compared by success in the account in 1 S with Ps 78:66 that they were hemorrhoids (or piles), and the older Exod. term in AV is a 16th-cent. form of that Gr word, which occurs in several medical treatises of the 16th and 17th cents. There is, however, no evidence that this identification is correct.

In the light of the modern research which has proved that the rat-flea (Pulex cheopis) is the most active agent in conveying the virus of plague to the human subject, it is worthy of note that the plague of tumors was accompanied by an invasion of mice (aithōr) or rats. The rat is not specifically mentioned in the Bible, although it was as common in Can. and Israelite times as it is today, a fact demonstrated by the frequency with which their bones occur in all strata of the old Palestinian cities, so it is probable that the term used was a generic one for both rodents.

The coincidence of destructive epidemics and invasions of mice is also recorded by Herodotus (ii.141), who preserves a legend that the army of Senacherib which entered Egypt was destroyed by the agency of mice. He states that a statue of Ptah, commemorating the event, was extant in his day. The god held a mouse in his hand, and bore the inscription: “Whosoever sees me, let him reverence the gods.” This may have been a reminiscence of the story in Isa 37:36, 39, or another reference see PLAGUE.

EMIM, e’mim (אֶמִּים, ’emim; ‘Ophaim, Om-mai-nim, ’Ophaim, Om-nim, or ’Ophaim, Omni-nim): Stated to have been the earlier inhabitants of Moab (Dt 2:10.11), and to have been of tall stature, and hence “accounted Rephaim [or giants] as the Ana-kim” or the Zamzummim of Ammon (ver 20). The name was given to them by the Moabites, it may not have been that by which they called themselves. A tall race, known to the Israelites as Rephaim (q.v.), once existed in Southern Pal as well as on the E. side of the Jordan, but its exact relationship is unknown. In the time of Abraham the Emim were living in the Moabite district of Shech-hariathaim, identified with the modern Kuraybat (Gen 14:5).

A. H. SAYCE
EMMANUEL, 8-man’o-el. See Immanuel.

EMMANUS, 8-ma’us, em’a-us (Emmāmos, Emmānūaṣ, derivation uncertain, but probably from ἐκποίημα, hammath, “a hot spring”): Jos (BJ, IV, i, 2) says: “Now Emmiaus, if it be interpreted, may be rendered ‘a warm bath’ for therein is a spring of warm water useful for healing.” Here he is referring to the hot springs near Tiberias. Possibly the same Gr name may not always have been derived from the same Heb, and as Cheyne suggests (2) may have come from גַּם-ח, ha-mōḏāḵ (see below).

(1) A place where Judas Macabeaus defeated Gorgias (1 Mac 4); it was “in the plain” (1 Mac 3:40); it was subsequently fortified 1. Emmiaus by Bacheides (1 Mac 9:50). It is of the Apocrypha xi, 2; BJ, i, 2; ii, 11; v, 1; xx, 4; IV, 3; 10, 1, 6, and is mentioned in the Talm and Midr. It is now the modern mud-village of ‘Amwas, 20 miles along, and a little N. of, the main road from Jerusalem to Jaffa. In the 3d cent. it was called Nicopolis and was an episcopal see; in early Christian times it was famous for a spring of reputed healing qualities.

(2) The Emmaus of Lk 24:13, a village 60 furlongs (stadiam) from Jerusalem.

Early Christian tradition appears to have identified it with (1) and, hence, to harmonize with it, the Emmaus of 60 furlongs. Eusebius and Jerome place this Emmaus at ‘Amwas; but in the St. Luke it was 1. a city (1) and not a village (kôm), and secondly (2) the distance, 40 miles there and back, is an almost impossible one for the narrative. In Crusading times this difficulty appears to have been realized, and on what grounds is not known. Kômēth as at just over 90 stadia, N.W. of Jerusalem, was selected as the site of Emmaus. There a fine church was built in recent years by the Franciscans of Jerusalem and today a Franciscan hospital and school attached to the church, and a newer German hospital, combine with the considerable picturesque quality of the place itself to fortify the tradition.

A much more probable site is Kulunīyeh, a village about 35 stadia from Jerusalem, on the road to Jaffa. Jos narrates (BJ, VII, vi, 6) that Vespasian “assigned a place for 800 men only whom he had dismissed from his army which had been for their habitation; it is called Emmaus and is distant from Jerusalem 60 furlongs.” This is almost certainly the Emmaus of Lk; it is highly probable that the name kulunīyeh is derived from the fact of its being this Emmaus. Close to this place is a ruin known as Bīt Mizān, which is probably the Mozāh (Ὑμίλας, ha-mōḏāḵ) of Jos 18:26 which in the Talm (Sukk. 4:5) is also described as a colonia. Today it is a “colony” of Jews who have revived and always use the old name Mōḏāḵ for their settlement.

Other suggestions for this Emmaus are (a) el Khama, considerably to the W. of Jerusalem (Conder); Jaffa road than Kulunīyeh (Lg, etc); and (b) ‘Arīṣ, S. of Bethlehem, remains of Roman baths have been found (Mrs. Finn). In not one of the places suggested are there any hot springs.

E. W. G. MARMERMAN

EMMER, em’är (Elomāmos, Elomārēm; Head) of a family, some of whom had married foreign wives (1 Ead 9:21); called “Immer” in Ezr 10:20.

EMMERUTH, em’er-oth (Elomāromos, Emmē- roth; AV Meruth; 1 Ead 5:24); Corresponding to “Immer” in Ezr 2:37.

EMMOR, em’ōr: Translated from the Gr Ἔμμωρ, Emmör, the tr of Heb ucción, hámôr, “ass” (Acts 7:16 AV; RV “Hamor,” q.v.).

EMPTY, em’pə-ti, EMPi’TER, em’pə-ti-er (κενός, keneō; “Empty,” adj; meaning void, etc, as the tr of τρίπος, τρίς, τρίς, τρίς, τρίς, τρίς, etc, occurs in the literal sense of “with nothing” (Gen 31:42; Job 22:9); in 2 S 1:22, it is equivalent to “in vain,” “hungry” (Isa 29:8); in some instances the meaning is comparative only; πτώσις, ἄρρητα, “to gush out,” “to pour out,” “to empty” is used adjectivally (Hos 10:1, “Israel is an empty vine”; but RV takes the Heb word in its original sense of “pouring out,” rendering “Israel is a luxuriant vine”); τόπος, “emptiness” (Job 26:7); keneō, “empty” is so tr (Mk 12:3); in Mt 5:38, the Gr word is scholёia: “to be free,” “unoccupied”; “to empty” (vb.) is the tr of ἄρρητος (Nah 2:2), of δάκαλ, “to become poor,” etc (Isa 19:6, ERV “minished,” AV “diminished”). RV has “empty” for “vain” (Eph 6:6), “emptied himself” for “enthusiasm” (1 Jn 4:7). RV “emptied out” for “gathered” (2 K 22:9; 2 Ch 34:17, “poured out.”)

EMULATION, em’o-lə’shən (ἐπαθέν, želō, πα-θέναι, parasēthō): Occurs twice in the NT, once in a bad and once in a good sense.

(1) In Gal 5:20 AV it is the tr of στολέω (seal,” “earnestness,” “enthusiasm”) which it is classed among “the works of the flesh” and signifies the stirring up to emulation in others, as a sign of what we are, or have, or profess. The Gr word is used in this sense in Acts 13:45; Rom 13:12; Cor 13:3; Jas 3:14,16; 2 Cor 12:20; Gal 5:20; RV τελ. by “jealousy.” It denotes a work of the flesh or lower nature, which Christians often fail sufficiently to guard against; it pleases “the flesh” to excite such a feeling in others.

(2) In Rom 11:14 AV “emulation” is the tr of parasēthō (to make one zealous or jealous), and is there used in a good sense. RV translates it “emulation” by any means I may provoke to emulation [RV jealous] them that are my flesh” (cf Rom 10:19, quoted from Dt 32:21). It is well to “provoke to emulation” in this sense, those who are slow or indifferent, by the example of earnestness and self-sacrifice of our part. This is not to please “the flesh,” but to serve “the Spirit.”

EN- (עֵנ, ’aṅin [cf Arab. ’Ain]: The Heb word for “spring” or “fountain”; Gen 16:7; Nu 33:3; Neh 2:14; Prov 8:28 [fem. pl.]). It occurs in numerous compound words, as EN-GEN, EN-HAD- DAH, EN-NAKHORE, EN-HAzaR, EN-RIMMON, EN-BOGEL, EN-SHEMESH (q.v.). In the same way the word ’Ain is a very common component of Arab. names of places throughout Pal and Syria at the present day. Places with names compounded with En- were almost certainly located near a spring. See FOUNTAIN; WELL.

ENABLE, en-’ə-bal: Only in 1 Tim 1:12 (AV and RV) in the sense of “strengthen” (Gr endur- mônā, “endue with strength”).

ENAİM, en-ā’īm (יוֹנִי, ‘enayim, “place of a fountain”; Avvā, Enān; Gen 14:14 [AV “in an open place”], v. 21 AV “openly”): A place which lay between Adullam and Timnath; probably the same as Enam (Josh 15:34). Also mentioned in close connection with Adullam. It was in the Shephelah of Judah. The Talm (Pesik. Rab. 23) mentions a Kephar Enam. Conder proposes Khur-bet Wady 'Albn, which is an ancient site, evidently of great strength and importance, lying between Kh. 'Am Shems and the village of Deir Aban. The ruins crown a lofty and almost isolated hill; the greatest objection to the identification is that there is no fountain at all in the immediate neighborhood.
There may have been one in earlier times. See PEP, III, 128.

ENAM, e-nam. See preceding article.

ENAN, e-nan ([[2]], en-an, "having fountains," or "eyes," i.e. "seen-eyed"); in LXX Aías, Ainán):
The father of Ahira, and prince of Naphtali at the first census of Israel (Nu 1 15; 2 29; 7 78.83; 10 27).

ENASIBUS, e-nas-i-bus ("Evârêbêas, Endisibos, 1 Esd 9 34): Corresponding to "Elisâhib" in Ex 10 30.

ENCAMPMENT, en-kamp'ment. See WAR.

ENCAMPMENT BY THE RED SEA: According to the version of the wanderings of Israel given in Nu 35, they "encamped by the Red Sea" (ver 10) before leaving Elion and before entering the Willer-ness of Sin. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

ENCHANTMENT, en-chant'ment: The occult arts, either supposedly or pretentiously supernatural, were common to all oriental races. They included enchantment, sorcery, witchcraft, soothing-saying, augury, necromancy, divination in numberless forms, and all kinds of magic art. Nine varieties are mentioned in one single passage in the Pent (Dt 18 10.11); other varieties in many passages both in the OT and NT, e.g. Lev 19 26.31;
Isa 2 6; 57 3; Jer 27 9; Mic 5 12; Acts 9 9.11, 13 6.8; Gal 5 20; Rev 9 21. The extent of the magic arts (forbidden under Judaism and Christianity) may incidentally be seen from the fact that the Scriptures alone refer to their being practiced in Chaldaea (Dn 5 11), Babylon (Ezk 21 21), Assyria
(2 K 17 17), Egypt (Ex 7 11), Canana (Lev 19 23); 19 26.31); Asia (Ephesus, Acts 19 13.
19), Greece (Acts 16 16), Arabia also, as "customs from the East," etc (Isa 2 6) indicates. These secret arts were prohibited by the laws of Moses (Dt 19 8-12), inasmuch as they constituted a peculiar temptation to Israel to apostasie. There were a constant incentive to idolatry, clouding the mind with superstition, tended and were closely alleged to imposture (Mt 24 24). The term "enchantment" is found only in the OT and its Heb orignals indicate its varieties.

1) 5098, qâ'eb, "to wrap up," "muffle," "cover," hence "clandestine," "secret." This was the hidden element that enabled the magicians of Egypt to impose on the credulity of Pharaoh in imitating or reproducing the miracles of Moses and Aaron; "They... did in like manner with their enchantments" (Ex 7 11.22). Their inability to perform a genuine miracle is shown by Ex 8 18.

2) 3703, nâbash, "to hiss," "whisper," referring to the mutterings of sorcerers in their incantations.

Relative as a derivative noun this Heb word means "a serpent." This involves the idea of cunning and craft. Although employed in the wider sense of augury or propheticism, its fundamental meaning is divination by serpents. This was the form of enchantment sought by Balaam (Nu 24 1).
Its impotence against the people of God is shown by Nu 23 23 in. Shalmaneser forced this forbidden art upon the Israelites whom he carried captive to Assyria (2 K 17 17). It was also one of the heathen practices introduced during the apostasy under Ahab, against which Elijah protested (cf 1 K 21 20).

3) ?? ??, làbash, "to whisper," "mutter," an onomatopoeic word, like the above, in imitation of the hiss of the serpent. It is used of the offensive practice of serpent charming referred to in Eec 10 11, and as D Wellington says, in loc., "signifies the whispering of formulas of charming." See also Isa 3 3, "skillful enchantress"; Jer 22 17, "serpents, cockatrice" RV "adders", which will be here charmed"; Ps 58 4.5, "the voice of charmers [RVm
"enchancers"], charming never so wisely." Ophi-omy, the art of charming serpents, is still practised in the East.

4) ? ? ? , hâvb, "to bind," hence "to bind with spells," "fascinate," "charm," descriptive of a species of magic practised by binding knots. That this method of operator, e.g. the use of the magic knot for exorcism and other purposes, was common, is indicated by the custom of the East. The constant repetition and uselessness of this and other forms of enchantment are clearly shown in Isa 47 9.12. This word is also used of the charming of serpents (Dt 18 11; Ps 58 8). (5) ? ? ? , tân, "to cover," "to cloud," hence "to use covert arts." This form of divination was
esp. associated with idolatry (so Gesenius, Heb Lex.).
Deltzsch, however, in a note on this word (Isa 2 6), doubts the meaning "conceal" and thinks that it signifies rather "to gather auguries from the clouds."
He translates it "cloud-interpreters." The word is not generally supported. Rendered "enchancers" (Jer 27 9, RV "soothsayers"; so also in Isa 2 6), often trd in RV "practice augury," as in Lev 19 26; Dt 18 10-14; 2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6; a form of magical art corresponding in many respects to that of the Gr mântos, who uttered oracles in a state of divine frenzy. LXX χαρακτήρ, χλέ-donomai, i.e. augury through the reading or acceptance of a sign or omen. A kindred form of enchantment is mentioned in the NT (Mcm 5 27).
Gr γόργος, gôrîs, "enchancers," "jugglers," the original indicating that the incantations were uttered in a kind of howl; rendered "seducers" AV, "impostors" RV; of Rev 19 20). The NT records the names of several magicians who practised in a class of conscious impostors: Simon Magus (Acts 8 9); Bar-Jesus and Elymas (Acts 13 8.9); the slave girl with the spirit of Python ("divination," Acts 16 18); "vagabond [RV "strolling"] Jews, exorcists" (Acts 19 13; cf Lk 11 19); also the magicians of Moses' day, named Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim 3 8).

All these forms of enchantment claimed access through supernatural insight or aid, to the will of the gods and the secrets of the spirit world. In turning away faith and expectation from the living God, they struck a deadly blow at the heart of true religion. From the enchanters of the ancient Orient to the medicine-men of today, all exponents of the "black arts" exercise a cruel tyranny over the benighted people, and multitudes of innocent victims perish in body and soul under their subtle impostures. In no respect is the exalted nature of the Heb and Christian faiths more clearly seen than in their power to emancipate the human mind and spirit from this mental and moral darkness, the superstition and fear, and the benighting effect of these occult and deadly arts. For more detailed study see DIVINATION; ASTROLOGY.

END (τέλος, ἐνδορ, ἐνδορπή, ἐπιθέμα, ἐνεπιθέμα, αὐτάληθος, τέλος, τελείω, τελείωσις, ἀνεπιθέμα): The end of anything is its termination, hence also finality. For "purpose" it is the tsr of several Heb and Gr words, chiefly in the OT of ἐνδορ (properly, "a cutting off") and other words from the same root (Gen 6:13, "The end of all flesh is come before me"); ἀνεπιθέμα, "hinder party," is also frequently ἐνδορ. "end" (Dt 11:12; Ps 37:37, 38, ARV) "There is a happy end to the man in peace... The end of the wicked shall be cut off;" ERV "latter end" [ver 37], m "rewarded" or "future posterity;" 73:17; Jer 5:31). ἵππος (from ἵππος "to complete," or for "when all complete") (2 Chr 20:16; Ecc 3:11; 7:2). "End" in the sense of purpose is the ts of *m'lan, "to the intent" (Ex 8:22, "to the end thou mayest know"), and of ἀνεπιθέμα (from ἄνερ, "to speak"); Ecc 7:14, "to the end that man should find nothing after him" (RV "should not find out anything [that shall be] after him"). "Ends of the earth" is the ts of *ephes, "extremities" (Dt 33:17; Ps 22:27), also of κανάνη, "wing" (Job 39:13). Other words are נָכָה, "utmost" (Job 34:30, 34:32; Ps 39:11); נָכָה, "revolution" (Ex 34:22; 2 Chr 24:23, RVm "revolution"), etc. The vb. occurs almost invariably in the phrase "to make an end," as the ts of ἀνεπιθέμα, "to finish," "complete." (Gen 27:30; Dt 20:9; Jer 26:8, etc); also of ἀναθέμα, "to complete" (Isa 33:1), and shalom, "to finish" (36:12-18).

In Dnl 9:24, the Heb text has דַּעַת, קַדָּח, "to seal up," "to complete" (or "to finish"), but the margin, followed by AV, RV, Driver and most moderns, has דַּעַת, קַדָּח, "to finish," "end." "complete." a difference of one letter; but practically none in the sense, to the end," "to finish the transaction," which proceeds.

In the NT the common word for "end" is τέλος "an end," "termination," "termination" (Mt 10:22; 24:8; Jn 13:1, RVm "to the utmost"); Rom 6:21, "The end of those things is death;" 6:22, "the end eternal life;" 10:4, "Christ is the end of the law unto righteousness" (Rom 3:30; 6:15; 22:13, etc); ἀνάκοινος, "outgoing" (He 13:7, RV "issue"); ὑπερθέλεια, "full end," is used of "the end of the world" (Mt 13:39; He 9:26); πέρας, "extremity," "the ends of the world" (Rom 10:18); ἀκρός, "a point, end" (Mt 24:31, "from one end of heaven to another end") as purpose; the ts of ἐν τῷ, "with a view to" (Acts 7:19; Rom 11:16; 4:16; 1 Thess 3:13); of εἰς τὸν, "unto this" (Jn 18:37; Rom 14:9; 2 Cor 2:9); of ἐπί τοῦ, "toward this" (Lk 11:18). To end (vb.) in πλέον, "to fill up" (Lk 7:1; Acts 21:9); once πτέρνουν (Lk 1:21) become, (Jn 13:2, "supper being ended," which RV corrects, giving, "during supper").

For "end" RV has "uttermost part" (Jos 15:8, etc); "latter end" (Ps 73:17; ERV Ps 73:38; Prov 5:4); "issue" (Dnl 12:2, m "latter end") (He 13:7); "side." (Ezek 41:12). Conversely it has "end" for "uttermost part" (Jos 15:5); for "side" (Dt 4:32); for "conclusion" (Ecc 12:13); for "an end" (Prov 23:18); for a reward, m "seized" or "future, the Heb "latter end"); final (He 6:10); for an end (Job 18:2); reserves for ("ARV "hunt for") for "at one end" (Jer 51:31), "on every quarter;" for "until the day and night come to an end" (Job 26:10), "unto the confines of light and darkness;" for "have an end" (Lk 23:37), "that fulfillment, m (Ex 23:19), m (2 Chr 33:17), "perfectly on;" for "at the end of" for "in these last days" (He 1:2); "His end was nigh" for "He died" (He 11:22); "its own end, instead of "for himself" (Prov 16:4, m his own purpose);" "there is neither end to nonsense"

For "this end" (Job 26:5); "to this end" (for "therefore" (Mk 1:38; 1 Tim 4:10); for "this cause," "to this end" (Jn 18:37 bis), "unto this end" (1 Pet 4:6); "to this end" for "for this purpose" (Acts 26:16; 1 Jn 3:8), "to which end" for "wherefore" (2 Thess 1:11); "to the end" inserted in Gen 19:12 and several other passages. "For the ends of the earth" see Astronomy, III. 2. W. L. Walker

END OF THE WORLD. See Eschatology; World, End of the.

ENDAMAGE, en-dar'maj: Arabic for "damage").

Ezr 4:13 AV: "Thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings." RV "It will be hurtful unto the kings" (Aram. PR, wazoz; cf 1 Esd 5:3).

ENDEAVER, en-de'ver: The sense of this word has suffered weakening since the time of AV. Then it implied utmost exertion and success; now rather forlorn hope and possible failure. Thus RV reads "giving diligence," "give diligence," for AV "endeavoring," "endeavor," in Eph 4:3; 2 Pet 1:15, respectively; but "endeavored" is suffered to remain in 1 Thess 2:17 (ἐργάζομαι, αποστολόν, ἀντιγραφέω, "exert oneself"). Cf also Acts 16:15, AV "endeavored," RV "sought" (Gr zētō, 'seek').

ENDIROWS, end 't urns (ἐνθάρρυν, sφrrha'tey&m, "giving in time to certain persons, as of the world. In text, both AV and RV, "hooks," denoting stails or places for the fastening of victims for sacrifice, or perhaps the two heartstones. The term is a corruption from another word similar in form and identity of usage. This word, "ardiron," from Middle Eng.; has assumed many peculiar forms, as "andarne," "sundirne," from which the form is doubtless derived, though this is not the original and has no relation to it. ARV reads, "According to Vulg and Syr, "ledges.""

ENDLESS, end 'les (ἀκατάλυτος, abatábutos [He 7:16], ἀμπεφόνος, apérfotos [1 Tim 1:3]): This Eng. word occurs twice in the NT, and is there represented by the two Gr words above noted.

(1) In He 7:16 Jesus is said to be a priest "after the power of an endless life." The word means lit. as in RV, "indissoluble." It is not simply that Christ's priesthood was eternal. The priesthood was based upon His possession, by nature, of a life which in time and eternity death could not touch. This distinguished Him essentially from priests under the law.

(2) In 1 Tim 1:4, Paul warns Timothy against giving heed in his ministry to "false teachers" and endless (limitless) genealogies. The allusion seems to be to the series of emaculations (aeons) in gnostic speculation, to which no limit could be set.

Distinct from the above are the words denoting "everlasting," "eternal," which see. James Orr

EN -DOR, en dor (אֶנְדֹּר, en dor, Josh 17:11; ἐνδορ, ἐνδορ, I S 38:7; ἐν ψυμ, ἐν δόρ, Ps 83:10; A, ἐνδορ, ἐνδορ, B, ἐνδορ, ἐνδορ, C); Nahr Kishon; Nador; B, Adadir, Adador; A town in the lot of Issachar assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17:11). Here dwelt the woman who had a familiar spirit, whom Saul consulted on the night before the battle of Gilboa (I S 28:7). Here also, according to Ps 83:10, perished fugitives of Sisera's army, after the defeat at the battle of the Kishon and Tabor. It is generally identified with the modern Endar, a small village on the northern slope of Jebel ed-Duby, with several ancient caves. It is not far from Nain and Shunem, and looks across the vale which the broken head of Sisera may have attempted to make their way eastward to the open uplands, and thence to their native North. Coming hither from Gilboa, eluding the Philistines under cover of the darkness, Saul would cross the Vale of Jezreel, and pass round the eastern base of the mountain, the Philistines being on the west.

END-DOR, WITCH, with OF: In 1 S 28 8-25, it is narrated how Saul, in despair of mind because he had forsaken him, on the eve of the fatal battle of Gilboa, resorted in disguise to ‘a woman that had a familiar spirit’ ( ‘oph; see DIVINATION; NECROMANCY), at En-dor, and besought the woman to divine for him, and bring him up from the dead whom he should name. On the woman reminding him how Saul had cut off from all land those who practised these arts—a proof of the existence and operation of the laws against divination, witchcraft, necromancy, etc. (Lev 19 31; Dt 18 9-14) the king assured her of immunity, and bade her call up Samuel. The incidents that followed have been the subject of much discussion and of varied interpretation. It seems assumed in the narrative that the woman did see an appearance, which, the king on describing it, recognized to be that of Samuel. This, however, need be only the narrator’s interpretation of the events. It is not to be credited that the saintly Samuel was actually summoned from his rest by the spells of a professional diviner. Some have thought that Samuel, by God’s permission, did indeed appear, as much to the woman’s dismay as to the king’s; and urge in favor of this the woman’s evident surprise and terror at his appearance (vs 12 ff), and the true prophecy of Saul’s fate (vs 16-19). It may conceivably have been so, but the more reasonable view is that the whole transaction was a piece of feigning on the part of the woman. The LXX uses the word expostrathos (‘a ventriloquist’) to describe the woman and those who exercised kindred arts (ver 9). Though pretending ignorance (ver 12), the woman doubtless recognizes Saul from the first. It was she who saw Samuel, and reported his words; the king himself saw and heard nothing. It required no great skill in a practised diviner to forecast the general issue of the battle about to take place, and the disaster that would overtake Saul and his sons; while if the forecast had proved untrue, the narrative of the witch of En-dor would never have been written. Saul, in fact, was not slain, but killed himself. The incident, therefore, may best be ranked in the same category as the feats of mediumship.

ENDOW, en-`do`, ENDUE, en-`du`: “Endow” meant originally “to provide with a dowry”; “endue” took the meaning “clothe”; the likeness between the lit. meanings has confused the metaphorical use of the words in spite of their difference in origin. Thus we find in Gen 30 20, AV “endued me with a good dowry,” RV “endowed me with a good dowry” (אָ֖פֶ֣ת, zābhaulāh, “bestow upon,” “endow”); Ex 22 16, AV “endow her to be his wife,” RV “pay a dowry for her” (אָ֖פֶת, māḥar, “purchase,” “endow”); cf Dt 22 29; 2 Ch 22 18, AV and RV “endued” with understanding (from שָׁ֖פֶת, yāḏaḥ, “know”); and Lk 24 49, AV “endued with power,” RV “clothed” (ἐνδόθη, endōthi, “clothe”).

F. K. PARR

ENDS OF THE EARTH. See Astronomy, III, 2.

ENDURE, en-`dʊr`: Used in the Bible (1) in the sense of “continue,” “last,” as in Ps 9 7, “The Lord shall endure for ever” (AV “Jeh sitteth as king for ever”); 30 5, “Weeping may endure for a night” (RV “tarry,” m “may come in to lodge at even”); 67 27, “the meat which endured,” AV, RV “the food which abideth” (2); and in the sense of “bear” (He 12 20); “bear up under” hardship, persecution, etc (2 Tim 3 11; 1 Pet 2 19); “to remain under” (He 10 32; 12 2; Jas 1 12; 5 11); “to be strong, firm” (He 11 27); “to persevere” beneath a heavy burden (Mt 10 22).

EN-EGLAIM, en-`eg-lɑ`im, en-`eg-lɑ`im (אֶנֶ֥גֶלְאֶימ֥) ‘En-eglaim, “fountain of calves?” In Ezekiel’s vision of the waters it is one of the streams through which the nations shall pass (Ezek 47 10). The situation must be near the entrance of the Jordan into the Dead Sea (see EN-GEDI). Tristram (Bible Places, 93) identifies it with ‘Ain Hajlah (cf Beth-hoglan); Robinson (BHR, II, 498), with ‘Ain Feathubah.

ENMESSAR, en-`məs-ər, ‘Enemessar, ‘Enemessar, ‘Endemassar, ‘Enemessaraus: Generally allowed, sinceGrothius, to be a corruption, though occasionally defended as an alternative form of Shalmanasar (Tob 1 2.15, etc) who carried Israel captive to Nineveh, as related in 2 K. Among the captives was Tobit, taken from Thissbe in Gilead, where the prophet Elijah was born, and he lived. The writer of Tob makes Sennacherib the son (1 15), as well as the successor of Enemessar, whereas, according to the Assyrian inscriptions, Sennacherib was the son of Sargon. This is only one of several serious historical difficulties in the narrative of Tob. The corruption of the name is variously explained. Rawlinson supposes the first syllable of the word Shal to have been dropped, comparing the Buphasochus of Abydenus for Nabopolassar. Dr. Pinches takes Enemessar for Sennacherib, sh being changed to s and then to the smooth breathing, though the rough breathing more commonly takes the place of a dropped s; both scholars admit the easy transposition of the liquids m and n. Shalman-ashur is the Assyrian form of Shalmaneser.

ENEMY, en-`e-mi, (אָ֏נֶמֵי) ‘Enemey, ‘Enemay, ‘Enemays, ‘Enemaysar, ‘Enemaysar, ‘Enemaysar, ‘Enemaysar: “Enemy,” “enemies,” are frequent words in the OT. The Heb word most often so used is ḥēḇb, “stranger,” “one who hates,” very frequent in the Ps, eg 3 7; 6 10; 7 5; 8 2; 9 36; 13 2, where the cry is often for deliverance from enemies. Another word for “enemy,” found chiefly in the poetical books, is gār, “garr, “dis- teressor,” “straitener” (Nu 30 9; Job 16 9; Ps 27 2 12, RV “adversary,” etc); also gărā (Eet 3 10; Ps 8 2; 10 5 AV, etc). Other words are ‘ār, “one awake” (1 S 28 16 AV; Dnl 4 19 AV); sāne, “perhaps, to be sharp or bite” (Ex 1 10; Prov 25 21; 27 6); shākur, “to watch?” (Ps 5 8; 27 11), and šām, “to stand up,” or “withstand” (Ex 32 25).

In the NT ektthes, “enemy,” “opponent,” is the only word used “enemy” (Mt 5 43 44; Mk 12 36; Lk 1 71 74, etc), and used with dēktheros (a man) joined to ektthes (Mt 13 28).

In RV “adversary” is frequently substituted for “enemy” (Nu 24 8; Dt 33 41; Ps 6 7; 7 6; 44 10.
etc.; for “O thou enemy,” etc (Ps 9 6) we have “The enemy are come to an end”; instead of “When the enemy shall come in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him” (Isa 59 19) we have “For he will come as a rushing stream, which the breath of Jehovah driveeth” (with the text of AV in m). “The fire of thine enemies shall devour them” (36 11). “Fire shall devour thine adversaries” (text of AV in m).

The frequent reference to enemies in the OT is what we should expect to see in these early times on the part of a people settling in a land that had been occupied by other tribes, worshiping other gods. The spirit of their law was that expressed by Our Lord in His Sermon on the Mount, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy.” This He changed: “but I say unto you, Love your enemies.” An approach toward this spirit had been made in the later prophets by their inclusion of the whole world under one God, who had a gracious purpose toward all, but the near statement of it we only find in Prov 25 21 (quoted by St. Paul, Rom 12 20). See also Ex 23 4, and of 2 K 6 22; 2 Ch 28 15.

ENENEUS, εν-εν’s-ta’s, εν-εν’s; W. The of Jos. See height permitting Ch permitted this the instead rendered the this enemies shall devour them (36 11). “Fire shall devour thine adversaries” (text of AV in m).

ENFLAME. See INFLAME.

ENGADDI, en-gad’i (Sir 24 14 RV, “on the sea shore”). See EN-GEDI.

ENGAGE, en-gai’; From נַגָּה, ἄρρηβ, “to pledge,” Jer 30 21, AV “Who is this that engaged his heart”; RV “he that hath boldness”?).

ENGANNIM, en-gan’im (בִּגָּן, ’en garnnim’, “spring of gardens”):
(1) A town in the territory of Judah, named with Zanoah and Eshtol (Josh 15 34). It is probably identical with the modern Um’m Jima, S. of Wady es-Seror, not far from Zanoah (Zand’s).
(2) A town in the lot of Issachar (Josh 19 21), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (21 29). In 1 Ch 6 73 it is replaced by Anem. It probably corresponds to the Gimea of Jos (Ant. XX, vi, 1); and may certainly be identified with the modern Jenin, a prosperous village on the southern edge of the plain of Esraelon, with beautiful gardens, fruitful orchards and plentiful supplies of water from the local springs.

W. EWING

EN-GEDI, en-ge-di, en-ge’di’ (“גְּדִי”, ’en gedhi’, “fountain of the kid”): Identical with the present Ain Jidi. According to 2 Ch 20 2 it is the same as Hazazon-tamar, mentioned in Gen 14 7 as occupied by the Amorites and as having been attacked by Chedorlaomer “taking Kadesh and El Paran on his way to the Vale of Siddim.” The place is situated upon the W. shore of the Dead Sea about midway between the N. and the S. ends, and was included in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 62). The spot is rendered attractive by the verdure clothing it by reason of immense fountains of warm water, 80° F., which pour out from beneath the limestone cliffs. In the time of Solomon (Cant 1 14) palms and vines were cultivated here. Jos also mentions beautiful palm groves. In the time of Eusebius it was still a place of importance, but since the Middle Ages it has been almost deserted, being occupied now only by a few Arabs. The oasis occupies a small area a few hundred feet above the Dead Sea marked by the 690 ft. sedimentary terrace heretofore described (see Dead Sea). The limestone borders rise so abruptly to a height of 2,000 ft. immediately on the W., that the place can be approached only by a rock-cut path. Two streams, Wady Suger and Wady el-Areikah, descend on either side through precipitous rocky gorges from the untraversable wilderness separating it from Bethemeth and Hebron. It was in the caves opening out from the sides of these gorges that David took refuge from Saul (1 S 24 1). During the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20 2), the children of Ammon, Lasha and Mt. Seir attempted to invade Judah by way of En-gedi, but were easily defeated as they came up from the gorges to occupy the advantageous field of battle chosen by Jehoshaphat.

LITERATURE

English Versions of the Scriptures.—The battle for vernacular Scripture, the right of a nation to have the sacred writings in its own tongue, was fought and won in England. Ancient VSS, such as the Syriac and the Gothic, were produced to meet obvious requirements of the teacher or the missionary, and met with no opposition from any quarter. The same was the case with the efforts of the Anglo-Saxon church to provide portions of Scripture for the use of the people. Even in later times the Latin church seems to have followed no consistent policy in permitting or forbidding the use of the Scriptures. In one country the practice was forbidden, in another it was regarded with forbearance or permitted under authority (Adinis and Arnold, Catholic Dictionary, London, 1884, art. “Bible”); and so it came about that the different nations of Europe came by the inestimable boon of an open Bible in different ways. Germany, for example, after the attempts of numerous translators who seem to have been quite untrammaded in their work owed, under Providence, to the faith, the intrepidity and the genius of Luther the national version which satisfied it for more than three centuries, and, after a recent and essentially conservative version, to the translation that completed the old among them by Jerome at the very beginning of the Bible in 5th cent.; and from this version—\textit{the Vulg}—practically all further tr\textsuperscript{a} were Anglo-Saxon and made till the days of Luther. Within a National revision of the Bible in English by archbishop of York, there was a new and more perfect version of Augustin English in England and his settlement at Canterbury (597 AD) Caedmon, a monk of Whitby, produced (870) his metrical version of the Bible, hardly indeed to be reckoned a version of the Scriptures in the ordinary way, though it paved the way for such. Bede of Jarrow (672-735) tr\textsuperscript{a} the Creed and the Lord's Prayer and, according to the beautiful letter of his pupil, Cuthbert, breathed his last on the completion of his tr of the Gospel of John into the language of the people of Aldehelm, bishop of Sherborne in the county of Dorset (d. 709), tr\textsuperscript{a} the Psalter in another tr with which the name of King Alfred is associated; and the other efforts of that ruler to spread the knowledge of the Scriptures of his people are well known. Notice, too, should be taken of the glosses. "The gloss," says Eadie (\textit{English Bible}, I, 14, n.), "was neither a free nor yet a literal tr, but the interlinear insertion of the vernacular, written against word of the original, so that the order of the former was usually irrespective of idiom and usage." The finest example of these is seen in the Lindisfarne Gospels, which were written in Lat about the year 700, and provided with an interlinear tr about 950 by Alfred, the reigning king. These with a version of a considerable section of the OT by Elftric, archbishop of Canterbury about the year 990, comprise the main efforts at Bible tr into Eng. before the Norman Conquest. In Anglo-Saxon this was the practice of the versions of any tr of the complete Bible, or even of the complete NT. The sectional VSS, moreover, cannot be shown to have had any influence upon succeeding VSS. For nearly three centuries after the Conquest the inter- relations among the different sections of the NT, with the conditions of the language prevented any real literary progress. The period, however, was marked by the appearance of fragmentary tr\textsuperscript{a} of Scripture into Norman French. From some Augustinian monastery, too, in the north of the East Midland district of England, about the year 1200, appeared the \textit{Ormulum}, a curious metrical work of some 20,000 lines, consisting of a paraphrase of the Gospel of the day and an explanatory homily for 32 days of the year. Like the work of Caedmon the monk, it was not exactly Bible tr, but it doubtless prepared the way for such. Three VSS of the Psalter, naturally always a favorite portion of Scripture with the translator, are assigned to the first half of Wycliffe's century. The reformer himself in one of his tracts urges a tr of the Bible to suit the humbler classes of society, on the plea that the upper classes already have their version in French. It was only in the long and splendid reign of Edward III (1327-77), when the two races that had existed in the country since the Conquest were perfectly united, that the predominance of English asserted itself, and the growth of the power and of the mental activity of the people instinctively took new form of expression. The century of Wycliffe, it is to be remembered, was also that of Langland, Gower and Chaucer.

BORN IN YORKSHIRE about the year 1320, Wycliffe was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he soon became a Fellow and was for a short time Master, resigning the latter position in 1361 on account of a representation to a living in Lincolnshire. He died at Lutterworth in Leicestershire in 1384. It was during the last quarter of his life that he came forward as a friend of the people and as a pionic writer on their behalf. Notwithstanding the external prosperity of the reign of Edward III, there was much in the ecclesiastical and social circumstances of the time to justify popular discontent. The Pope derived from England alone a revenue larger than that of any prince in Christendom. The nobility presented the crown and pretensions of the higher clergy; and, according to Green, "the enthusiasm of the Friars, who in the preceding century had preached in praise of poverty, had utterly died away and left a crowd of impudent mendicants behind it." The Black Death, "the most terrible plague the world ever witnessed," fell in the middle of the century and did much further to embitter the already bitter condition of the poor. In France things were better than in England, and the French settled permanently in England. It is not wonderful that Wycliffe began, as is said, his version of the NT with the Book of Rev. With his social teaching the present art is not specially concerned. He probably involved much more than the elucidation of the inherently demoniacal level doctrines of Christianity, though some of the Lollards, like the Munster peasants in the German Reformation, associated it with dangerous socialistic practices and the application of Christianity to the solution of social problems in any age easy to effect in practice. His tracts show (Eadie, I, 59 ff) that it was from what Wycliffe had felt the Bible to be to himself that there sprang his strong desire for the freedom of it possible for his countrymen. To this was due the first Eng. version of the Bible. To this also was likewise due the institution of the order of "poor priests" to spread the knowledge of the Bible as widely as possible throughout the country. There is some uncertainty as to the exact share which Wycliffe had in the production of the 14th cent. version. The tr of the NT was finished about the year 1380 and in the last years of the entire Bible was translated by his former supporter. Wycliffe's being the work of Nicholas Hereford, Work? one of the reformer's most ardent supporters at Oxford. The work was revised on thoroughly sound principles of criticism and interpretation, as these are explained in the preface to the new edition, by John Purvey, one of Wycliffe's most intimate friends during the latter part of his life, and finished in 1388. "Other scholars," says F. G. Kenyon, of the British Museum, "assisted him in his work, and we have no certain means of knowing how much of the tr was actually done by himself. The NT is attributed to him, but we cannot say with certainty that it was entirely his own work" (\textit{Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts}, 200, 3d ed, London, 1898). This entirely corresponds with the position taken up by Forshall and Madden, the editors of the great Oxford edition of Wycliffe's version issued in 4 large quarto vols in 1850. That work was undertaken to honor Wycliffe and in compensation for England's indebtedness to the reformer. The editors were men of the first literary rank; they spent 22 years upon this work; and it is recognized as a credit at the college to scholarship and research of Oxford and of England. Its most straightforward Introduction answers by anticipation by far the greater part of the criticisms and claims put forth by Dr. Gasquet (Our Old English Bible and Other Essays, London, 1898; 2d ed., 1908). The claim is made that the work published in Oxford in 1850 is really not Wycliffe's at all but that of his bitterest opponent, the Bishop of London, who represented the party of Rome. Gasquet's work on this subject is mainly worthy of notice on account of his meritorious research in other departments of the English Reformation. His arguments and statements are met by Kenyon (op. cit., 204–8). The controversy is further discussed by G. M. Trevelyan (2d ed., London, 1908), a work which cannot be too highly praised for its deep research, its interesting exposition and its cordial appreciation of the reformer and his works.

"Nothing," says Trevelyan (Appendix, 361), "can be more damning than the licenses to particular people to have Eng. Bibles, for they distinctly show that without such licenses it was thought wrong to have them. The age of printing, it is to be remembered, was not yet.

The Wycliffe Bible was issued and circulated in copies each of which was written by the hand. About 170 copies of this manuscript Bible are still in existence. They form a striking proof of what England and the world owed to the faith, courage and zeal of John Wycliffe and his "poor priests."

It is a remarkable fact that before the year 1500 most of the countries of Europe had been supplied with a version of the Scriptures printed in the vernacular tongue, while England and the world waited for the appearance of the English Bible of Wycliffe. For some reason, it is not yet known, Wycliffe had nothing but the scattered copies of his work. Even Caxton, eager as he was his search for works to translate and to print, while he supplied priests with service-books, preachers with sermons, and the clerk with "(Green, History of the English People, 1st ed., 308). In 1525 Tyndale went to London to try to find a patron for his work in Tunstall, bishop of London, who had studied Gr with Latimer at Padua and was one of the most noted humanists of the day. To show himself capable for the work, Tyndale took with him to London a version of a speech of Isocrates. But the Bishop of London's service was full; and after spending a year with a friendly alderman in London, "at last," he says in the Preface to his Five Books of Moses, "I understood not only that there was no room in my Lord of London's palace to translate the NT, but also that there was no place to do it in all England." He left the country and never returned to it. He spent the remaining twelve years of his life in exile and for the most part in great hardship, sustained by steady labor and by the one hope of his life—the giving to his countrymen of a reliable version of the Holy Scriptures in their own tongue. He went first to Hamburg, and there, as it seems, issued in the year 1524 versions of Mt and Mk separately, with marginal notes. Next year he removed to Cologne, and arranged for the printing of the complete NT, the tr of which he accomplished alone, from the study of the Gr text of Erasmus in its original and revised editions and by a comparison with the Vulgaris Vulg. VSS which, as already stated, had anticipated that of England. The story of the interruption by Coelhæus of the actual work of printing, and of his warning the King and Wolsey of the impending invasion of the text thus printed by Luther, may well be included as a romance. His interference resulted in the prohibition by the city authorities of the printing of the work and in the sudden flight of Tyndale and his assistant, Joyce, who sailed up the Rhine with the precious sheets and resolved to print a new edition to Worms, the city of the famous Diet in which Luther four years before had borne his testimony before the Emperor. The place was now Lutheran, and here the work of printing could be carried out in security and at leisure. To baffles his enemies, as it seems, a small octavo edition was first printed without glosses; then the quarto edition was completed. The "pernicious literature" of both editions, without name of the translator, was shipped to England in 1526; and of the other edition of the NT in English (three surreptitiously) were distributed, numbering, it is computed, 15,000 copies. The unfavorable reception of Tyndale's work by the King and the church authorities may in some measure be accounted for by the fact which at the moment were associated with the Reformation in Germany, and by the memories of Lollardism in connection with the work of Wycliffe. So vehement was the opposition at any rate to Tyndale's work, and so determined the seal in buying up and burning the book, that of the six editions above mentioned there "remains of the first edition one fragment only, . . . of the second one copy, wanting the title-page, and another very imperfect; and of the others, two for three copies which are not however satisfactorily identified" (Westcott, History of the English Bible, 45, London, 1898). Meanwhile Tyndale took to working on the OT. Much discussion has taken place on the question whether he knew Heb (see Ezdeil, I, 209 ff.). Tyndale's own distinct avowal is that it was from the Heb direct that such tr of the OT as he accomplished was made. Very early in 1531 he published separately VSS of Gen and Dt, and in the following year a whole of the OT, each with a prologue and marginal glosses. In 1534 appeared the Book of Job, with a prologue; and in the same year a new version of the NT to counteract one made by Joyce from the Vulg. This has been described by Westcott (op. cit., 185) as 'altogether Tyndale's noblest monument," mainly on account of its short and pregnant glosses. "Tengel himself is not more terse or pointed." A beautifully illuminated copy of this edition was struck off on vellum and presented to the British Museum; and an edition of his revised NT was printed in London— "The first volume of Holy Scripture printed in England"— in 1536, the year of the Queen's death. Tyndale had for some time lived at Antwerp, enjoying a "considerable yearly exhibition" from the English merchants there; but his enemies in England were numerous, powerful and watchful. In 1534 he was betrayed and arrested; and after an imprisonment of nearly a year and a half at the castle of Vilvorde, about 18 miles from Brussels, he was strangled and then burned in 1536, the same year as that of the death of the Queen. The last days of the hero and martyr may have been cheered by the news of the printing of his revised edition of the NT in England.

Miles Coverdale, who first gave England a complete and authorized version of the Bible, was a younger contemporary of Tyndale.

7. Miles Coverdale was a year younger than Tyndale. Luther, who was born in 1483, and Coverdale was four years younger than Tyndale. Born in the North Riding of Yorkshire, he found his way to Cambridge at the time when Erasmus was professor of Gr, and appears as an earlier type not his. He may have got into the good graces of Cromwell, the "malleus monachorum," factotum and secretary to Wolsey, and later on the King's principal abettor in his efforts to render the Church of England thoroughly national, that the Protestantism which he had adopted in the liberal party in the church, he held Lutheran or evangelical views of religion, cast off his monastic habit, and, as Bale says, gave himself up wholly to the preaching of the gospel. He is found in 1527 in intimate connection with More and Cromwell and probably from them he received encouragement to proceed with a tr of the Bible. In 1528 he was blamed before Tunstall, bishop of London, as having caused some to desert the mass, the confession, and the worship of images; and seeking safety, he left England for the Continent. He is said by Foxe to have met Tyndale at Hamburg in 1529, and to have given him some help in the tr of the Pent. An uncertainty hangs over Coverdale's moving to the Continent, and of the period during which much was happening that could not fail to be powerfully changing opinion in England. The result of the Assembly held at Westminster by Warham in May, 1539, and of the Convocation held under his successor, Cranmer, in December, 1534, was that in the latter it was petitioned that "his Majesty would vouchsafe to decree that the sacred Scriptures should be tr into the Eng. tongue by certain honest and learned men, named for that purpose. He adjured and besought the learned men to come to the people according to their learning." Cromwell, meanwhile, who had a shrewd forecast of the trend of affairs, seems to have arranged with Coverdale for the printing of his tr. However this may be, by the year 1534 "he was ready, as he was desired, to set forth" (i.e. to print) his tr; and the work was finished in 1536. And thus, "as the harvest springs from the seed which germinates in darkness, so the entire Eng. Bible, tr no one knew where, presented itself, unbroken and unanticipated, at once to national notice in 1535" (Edie, I, 266). It is declared on the title-page to be "faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn into Englishe: MDXXXV." Coverdale's aboriginality is thus preserved, against the impression that he was a conspicuously honest man. Unlike Tyndale who regarded himself as, in a way, a prophet, with his work as a necessity Divinely laid upon him, Coverdale describes that he had no particular desire to undertake the work—and how he wrought, as it were, in the language of these days, under a compulsion from whom he received no instructions and who "required him to use the Douche [i.e. the German] and the Latyn." He claims further to have done the work entirely himself, and he certainly produced a new version of the OT and a revised version of the NT. He used, he says, five sundry interpreters of the original languages. These interpreters were, in all probability, the Vulg. Luther's version, the Zurich or Swiss-German Bible, the Lat version of Paginus, and he certainly consulted Tyndale on the Pent and the NT. He successfully studied musical effect in his sentences and many of the finest phrases in the AV are directly traced to Coverdale. His version of the Ps is that which is retained and is still in daily use in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale's version were issued in 1537 "with the King's most gracious license," and after this the Eng. Bible was allowed to circulate freely. Certain changes in the title-page, prefaces and other detail are discussed in the works mentioned at the end of this article.

Convocation meanwhile was not satisfied with Coverdale's tr, and Coverdale himself in his honest modesty had expressed the hope that "and if not known by the learned, yet known by the learned." Accordingly in 1537—probably at the suggestion of, and with some support from, Cromwell and certainly to his satisfaction—a large folio Bible appeared, as edited and dedicated to the King by Thomas Matthew. This name has since, the days of Foxe, been held to be a pseudonym for John Rogers, the Protestant martyr of the Marian persecution, a Cambridge graduate who had for some years lived in intimacy with Tyndale at Antwerp, and who became the possessor of his MS at his death. Besides the NT, Tyndale, as above mentioned, had published tr\(^a\) of the Pent, the Book of Jon, and portions of the Apoc, and had left a MS version of Josh to 2 Ch. Rogers, apparently taking all he could find of the work of Tyndale, supplemented this by the work of Coverdale and issued the composite volume with the title, "The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are contained the Old and New Testaments, tr and improved by Thomas Matthew. "Eayre I, Hearken to ye heavens, and thou earth, grave eare: for the Lord speaketh. MDXXXVII." After the burning and burning of Tyndale's NT on its arrival in England 11 years before, it is not easy to account for the royal sanction with which the tr appeared. It was probably granted to the united efforts of Cranmer and Cromwell, aided perhaps by the King's desire to show action independent of the church. The royal sanction is, as has been pointed out, the same year in which it was given to Coverdale's second edition. That version became the basis of our present Bible. It was on Matthew's version that for 75 years thereafter all other versions were based.

Matthew's first edition of 1,500 copies was soon exhausted, and a new edition was issued with some revision by Richard Taverner, a cultivated young layman and lawyer who had in his early years been selected by Wolsey for his college at Oxford. He was imprisoned in its cell for revising Tyndale's NT; but he was soon released for his singular musical accomplishments. He was an excellent Grecian, of good literary taste and of personal dignity. For this reason, he was not enough made, good Grecian as he was, no use of the thing; but through-out aimed successfully at idiomatic expression, as also at compression and vividity. Some of his changes are kept in the AV, such as "parables" for "similitudes," and in Mt 54 12, "The love of the many shall be a plague," and really in greater justice to the Gr article. His dedication to the king is manly and dignified and compares most favorably with the dedications of other translators, including that of the AV. The book appeared in two editions, folio and quarto, in 1539, and in the same year two editions, folio and quarto, of the NT. The Bible and the NT were each reprinted once, and his OT was adopted in a Bible of 1551. But with these exceptions Taverner's version was practically outside of influence on later trs.

The next Bible to appear was named from its size. Its pages are fully 15 in. long and over 9 in. broad. It was meant to be in a way a state 10. The Great Bible. As sufficiently good type, paper and other requisites could not be found in England, it was resolved that it should be printed in Paris. Coverdale and Grafton, the printer, went to Paris to superintend the printing; but the French church authorities interfered and the work was delayed and was returned to be undertaken in London where the work was finished. It was the outcome of the Protestant zeal of Cranwell who wished to improve upon the merely composite volume of Tyndale and Coverdale. Its original and reliable authorities such as Hume, Burnet and Froude have ventured upon statements regarding it, for which there is really no proof (Eadie, 1, 336 ff). The duty of editor or reviser was by Cranwell assigned to Coverdale who, as a protestant, and really in the improvement of the Eng. version, was quite willing to undertake a work that might supersede his own. The rapidity with which the work was executed and the proofs of the minute care devoted to it by Coverdale may appear remarkable to those who are acquainted with the deliberate and leisurely methods of the large committee that produced the AV in the reign of King James or the RV in the reign of Queen Victoria. Of course Coverdale had been over all the work before and knew the points at which improvements were to be applied; and a zealous and expert individual can accomplish more than a committee. Luther tr'd the NT and, after revising his work with Melanchthon, had it printed and made it known to a vast number of German Protestants. He also did the same with the OT. The first part of the Great Bible began in May, 1538, and was completed in April, 1539, a handsomefolio, printed in black letter, with the title, "The Byble in Englyshe, that is to say, the contents of all the holy scripture, both of the olde and newe testament, truly translated after the vertye of the Hebreue and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forscyde tongues. Prynied by Rychard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch. Cvm praefacio edictum de redimendo a 1539." The elaborate notes for which asterisks and various other marks are provided were never supplied; but the actual tr shows devoted attention to the work and much fine appreciation of the original languages and of English. In the NT the version derived assistance from the Lat version of Erasmus, and in the OT from Munster and Paginius. Variations in the text could of course be got from the Complutensian Polyglot. The Great Bible shows considerable improvement upon the preceding trs. The dedication of the NT to Cranwell in the OT. "So carefully," says Eadie (L, 370), "had been Coverdale's revision and so little attachment had he to his own previous version, that in the 53rd chapter of Isaiah the Bible of 1539 differs in nearly forty places from his version of 1535. The reader who had any love for Cranwell and still less for his work, though to avert clerical prejudices, Coverdale had made concessions in his tr. The work was cordially welcomed by the people, and a copy was ordered to be printed for Cranwell. He also did it half by the parson and half by the parishioners.

A further revision of this version was carried out by Coverdale for a second edition which appeared in April, 1540, and is known as Cranmer's Bible, mainly from the judicious and earnest prose which the archbishop wrote for it. It exhibits a text formed on the same principles as that of 1539, but after a fuller and more thorough revision" (Westcott, 254). Two other editions followed in the same year and three more in the year following (1541).

After the publication of the Great Bible (1539-41) no further advance took place for many years. The later years of Henry VIII indeed were marked by serious reaction. In 1542 Convocation with the royal consent made an attempt, fortunately thwarted by Cranmer, to Latinize the Eng. version and to make it in reality what the Romish version of Rheims subsequently became. In the following year Parliament, which then practically meant the Privy Council, under the presidency of the Privy Council, restricted the use of the Eng. Bible to certain social classes that excluded nine-tenths of the population; and three years later it prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible.

It was probably not without some further great destruction of all previous work on the Eng. Bible which has rendered examples of that work so scarce. Even Tunstall and Heath were anxious to escape from their responsibility in lending their names to the Great Bible. The result of this reaction Henry VIII died, January 28, 1547. No new work marked the reign of Edward VI, but great activity prevailed in the printing of previous VSS. Thirty-eight New Testament and thirteen Bibles were published during his reign of six years and a half; and injunctions were issued urging every person to read "the very lively Word of God" and for a copy of the Great Bible with the Eng. paraphrase of Erasmus to be set up in every church. By royal order a NT was to be sold for 22d., a sum representing as many shillings of present value.

Less repressive work regarding the tr and diffusion of Scripture than might have been expected occurred in the reign of Edward VI. In further other directions the reaction was severe enough. According to Lord Burghley, during the three years and nine months of Mary's reign, the number of 400 persons perished—men, women, maidens and children—by imprisonment, torment, famine and fire. Among the martyrs were Cranmer and Rogers; Coverdale escaped martyrdom only by exile and the powerful intervention of the King of Denmark. The copies of the Bibles of Tyndale and Coverdale were—though individual tr's were not specified—proclamations were issued against certain books and authors. Still the books were not, as formerly, bought up and confiscated; and so the activity of Edward's reign in the production of Bibles left copies widely distributed throughout the country at the close of Mary's reign. At this time a NT was printed at Geneva which had great influence upon future VSS of the Bible. This NT was issued in 1557 and was most probably the work of W. Whittingham, an English exile who had married Calvin's sister. It was tr'd from the Gr and compared carefully with other VSS. It had also a marginal commentary which is not much different from the Geneva Bible. This NT was in the same year as the Bible of 1557 and was most probably the work of W. Whittingham, an English exile who had married Calvin's sister. It was tr'd from the Gr and compared carefully with other VSS. It had also a marginal commentary.
was the first tr that was printed in roman letter and in which chapters were divided into verses. Caxton wrote it as an introduction to an abridged epistle, and it had also an address by the reviser himself. A few months after its publication the more serious task of the revision of the whole Bible was begun and continued for the space of two years and more, the translators working at it "day and night." Who the translators were is not said; but Whittingham, probably with Gilby and Sampson, stayed at Geneva for a year and a half after Elizabeth came to the throne, and saw the work through. It was finished in 1560, and a dignified preface was dedicated to Elizabeth. The first was met by a remonstrance from the Congregation at Geneva, among whom was John Bodley, father of the founder of the great library at Oxford. Its handy form—a modest quartto—along with its vigorously expressed Commentary, made it popular even with people who objected to its source and the occasional Calvinistic tinge of its doctrines. It became and remained the popular edition for nearly three-quarters of a century. The causes of its popularity are explained in Westcott's 126 f. Bodley had received the patent for its publication; and upon his asking for an extension of the patent for twelve years, the request was generously granted by Archbishop Parker and Grindely, bishop at Dordon, though the Bishops' Bible was already begun.

The "Breeches Bible."—The Geneva version is often called the "Breeches Bible" from its tr of Gen 3 7: "They sewed figleaves together, and made themselves breeches." This tr, however, is not peculiar to the Geneva version. It is the tr of pericoboma in both the Wycliffe VSS; it is also found in Caxton's version of the "Golden Legend." Queen Elizabeth, the beginning of whose reign was beset with great difficulties, refused the arrangements of Edward VI. A copy of the Great Bible was required to be provided in every church, and every Bible encouragement was given to the reading of the Scriptures. The defects of the Great Bible were admitted, and were not unnatural result of the haste with which it had been—withstanding its two revisions—it had been produced. These became more apparent when set beside the Geneva version, which, however, is a clerical passage, with a preface in which the revisers express a lofty consciousness of the importance of their work. It was published in 1565, and privilegio regiae Majestatis. A revised and in many places corrected edition was issued in 1572, and another in 1575, the year of the archbishop's death. The general aim of the version is a quaint literality, but along with this is found the use of not a few explanatory words and phrases not found in the original text. More exact notice also than in previous VSS is taken of the use of the Gr art. and of the particles and conjunctions. It bears marks, however, of the English translation and the translator by whom the work was done; and of the hurry of the revision of each translator's work by the rest, and of some general revision of the whole. The Geneva version was the work of collegiate labor, to which much of its superiority is due. Though Parker did not object to the circulation of the Geneva version, Convocation made some unsuccessful attempts to popularize the Bishops' Bible; but the Geneva tr was not easily thrust aside. "It grew," says Eadie (II, 35), "to be in greater demand than the Bishops' or Cranmer's. Ninety editions of it were published in the first reign of Elizabeth, as against forty of all the other VSS. Of Bibles, as distinct from New Testaments, there were twenty-five editions of Cranmer's and the Bishops', but sixty of the Geneva.

The production of an official version of the sacred Scriptures for England, was probably due more to rivalry with the Reformers 16. Rheims and Douai than to any great zeal of the authori-

17. The a meeting of bishops and Puritan Version Authorized clergy held (1604) in the interest of Version religion; had an influence in the career of James I and the Hampton Court Conference, which was actually crowned. The meeting was ineffectual in all points raised by the Puritans, but it led to the production of the Eng. Bible. Dr. Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, probably with some reference to the rivalry between the Bishops' Bible and the Geneva version, remarked on the imperfections of the current Bibles. The remark was not very enthusiastically received except by the King, who caught eagerly at the suggestion of a fresh version, "professing that he could never yet see a Bible well translated in English," and blaming specially the Geneva version, probably on account of the pointed character of its marginal notes. Probably with the aid of the universities, the King without delay nominated the revisers to the number of fifty-four from among the best Heb and Gr scholars of the day. Only 47 actually took part in the work which, however—officially at least—they were in no hurry to begin; for, although named in 1604 and with all the preliminary arrangements hastened and settled at the end of the year, they did not begin their work till 1607. Their remuneration was to be by church preten, for which the archbishop was to take measures. The immediate expense, the King suggested, should be supplied by the bishops and chapters who, however, did not respond. "King James' version never cost King James a farthing," says Eadie (II, 153 f), who knew the slow progress, if we confine our attention on this aspect of the revision. They wrought in six companies of which two met respectively in Westminster, Cambridge and Oxford. Elaborate rules, given in full in most histories of the Bible, were laid down for the revisers' guidance, the King being particularly insistent upon Rule 9, which provided for the revision of the work of each Company by the rest. When any Company had finished the revision of a book, it was to be sent to all the rest for their criticism and suggestions, ultimate differences of opinion to be settled at a general meeting of each Company. Learned men outside the board of revisers were to be invited to give their opinions in cases of special difficulty.

One of the Cambridge Companies was specially appointed to revise the Apoc, in which considerable license was taken, as the seven members composing the Company had Apocrypha probably no very firm belief in the inspiration of its books. The marginal notes, too, were not in keeping with those of the OT. By the early translators, Tyndale and Coverdale, the Apoc was simply accepted as part of the heritage of the church; it had a place likewise in the Great Bible, the Bishops' Bible and even of the Geneva copies. But by the middle of the 17th cent. opinion even in the Church of England had changed regarding it, and it was about this time that Bibles began to be printed having the canonical books only. The Apoc is now hardly at all printed otherwise than separately (note also the familiar brevity of the treatment of the Apoc in the RV, as stated below).

Impressed with the importance of their task, the revisers worked strenuously at it for two years; and nine months more were devoted to revision by a special committee consisting of two members from each center, and in 1611 the result of the work appeared. It is not wonderful that the work was described by a contemporary as entitled to give a judgment on it (Rorical, "Table Talk") as "the best translation in the world?"—a verdict that later opinion has abundantly ratified. It was the copetone of a work on which 90 years of solid labor had by different hands been expended, and it was done by half a hundred scholars. The work, however, known Heb and Gr, and who also knew Eng. For three centuries it has grown in popular esteem, and it is justly regarded as one of the best possessions and one of the most unifying influences of the widely scattered English-speaking race.

On the title-page as issued in 1611 the version is described as "newly translated out of the original tongues," and as "appointed to be read in churches," two statements not easy to reconcile with the actual facts. The first rule for the revisers' guidance provided that the work to consist in revision of the Bishops' Bible: it was not said that it was to be a new tr. There is, further, no sanction of the version by King, Parliament, Convocation or Privy Council. Like Jerome's version twelve centuries before, it was left to find acceptance as best it might by its own intrinsic merit. Already in the days of the Commonwealth proposals were made for a new version; but though several meetings were held of a committee appointed by Parliament for Revisions the purpose in 1657, nothing came of the movement (Lewis, History of Translations, 354). For nearly half a century the chief rival of the AV was the Geneva Bible which was in wide private use. Formal revision was not undertaken again till the reign of Queen Victoria. But between 1611 and the date of the recent revision not a few small alterations had been silently introduced into the AV, as was indeed only to be expected if natural progress and improvement in the language were to be correctly represented on the printed page. Advancing literary criticism, too, and minute linguistic study showed that since the days of the revisers many words had changed their meaning, and that various inaccuracies and a few less venial errors could be proved in the revisers' work. But what probably weighed most with scholars in inducing them to enter upon a new version was the extraordinary increase that since the last revision had taken place in our knowledge of the Heb text and more especially of the Gr text of Scripture. Important MSS had been brought to light of which the 17th-cent. revisers knew nothing, and scholars had with minute care examined and compared all the early copies of the Scripture studies which, without altering the main import of the gospel story, were shown to have considerable importance on the actual words and sometimes on the meaning of the text. After much discussion of the subject in special volumes and in the existing magazines and reviews of British and America, there was a general agreement among scholars that a fresh version was advisable.

The history of the Eng. revision is given at length in the preface to the RV of the NT. It was undertaken by six members was appointed with power to add to its numbers. By this committee is nominated (note also that it is taken of the treatment of the Apoc in the RV, as stated below).

Impressed with the importance of the task, the revisers worked strenuously at it for two years; and nine months more were devoted to revision by a special committee consisting of two members from each center, and in 1611 the result of the work appeared. It is not wonderful that the work was described by a contemporary as entitled to give a judgment on it (Rorical, "Table Talk") as "the best translation in the world?"—a verdict that later opinion has abundantly ratified. The first rule for the revisers' guidance provided that the work to consist in revision of the Bishops' Bible: it was not said that it was to be a new tr. There is, further, no sanction of the version by King, Parliament, Convocation or Privy Council. Like Jerome's version twelve centuries before, it was left to find acceptance as best it might by its own intrinsic merit. Already in the days of the Commonwealth proposals were made for a new version; but though several meetings were held of a committee appointed by Parliament for Revisions the purpose in 1657, nothing came of the movement (Lewis, History of Translations, 354). For nearly half a century the chief rival of the AV was the Geneva Bible which was in wide private use. Formal revision was not original text and a more correct and not displeasing rendering of the same. A large number of the changes are certainly not such as appeal strongly to popularity. "The General Introduction of the NT of 1881 has been estimated to differ from that of 1611 in no less than 5,788 readings, of which about a quarter are held notably to modify the subject-matter; though even of these only a small proportion can be considered as of first-rate importance." (Kenyon, 239). On the other hand, Heb, and esp. the cognate Semitic languages, are now a great deal better known than before 1611, and considerable improvement is noticeable in the bringing out of the meaning of the poetical and apocryphal books. The RV contains the best results of the scholarship of the Victorian age and cannot to be regarded as of the greatest utility to the reader and student of the AV. In the religious life the mind is essentially the time will show how the unadorned merits of the RV are such as to outweigh the claims of sentiment and affection with which the AV is held. ENGRAFT, en-gr̩f (Jas 1 21 AV, RV IM-PLANT [q.v.]).

ENGRAVING, en-gr̩v̩ng. See CARVING; Crafts.

EN-HADDAH, en-ha'dā (יהַדָּח, 'en ha'dāh, "swift fountain"): A town in the lot of Issachar mentioned along with En-gannim (Josh 18 21). It is probably identical with Kefr Adan, a village some 3 miles W. of Jezin.

EN-HAKKORE, en-hak'ərə, en-hak-ərə (יהָ֫קַּרְּא, 'en ha-kərə, "spring of the partridge"): Interpreted (Jgs 15 19) as meaning "the spring of him that called." So LXX: πηγὴ τοῦ ἐκείνου, pēg̣h to eipkaloumenōn, the spring was in Lehi but the site is unknown.

EN-HAZOR, en-ha'zor (יהָ֫זֶּר, 'en hōzər; יַהֲזָר, 'Ae̢ṛ, pēg̣ Adōr): A city in the territory of Naphtali mentioned along with Kedesh, Edrei and Iron (Josh 19 37). The ancient name probably survives in that of Hazbreh, on the slopes W. of Kedesh. "En'h" (AV, en-hazor)." A spring and a fountain, and no fountain has been found here.

ENGIMA, ē-nig'ma. See GAMES.

ENJOIN, en-jo'n: Its usual sense is to "impose something," as a command, a charge or a direction. In this last sense it is used in Job 36 23, i.e. "Who hath directed?" In Est 9 31 it means "to command," in Philen ver 8, "to order" or "direct."

ENLARGE, en-lar'j, ENLARGEMENT, en-lar'gment: "To enlarge" is very frequently used fig.: "God enlarge Japheth" (Gen 9 27), i.e. "make him a great nation"; or "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me" (2 Sam 22 37), i.e. "Thou hast given me success." A very peculiar use of "enlarge" is found in AV Ps 4 1: "Thou hast enlarged me" (RV "set me at large"); i.e. "Thou hast given me freedom, deliverance from distress." "Our heart is enlarged" (πληθυν̣ν̣ν̣, plēthuṇν̣ν̣; 2 Cor 6 11), and "Be ye also enlarged" (ver 13), express great love of one party to another. See also 1 Sam 2 1, "My mouth is enlarged," i.e. "full of praise." Exk 41 7, "were broader" (AV, en-largening)."

Enlargement, AV Est 4 14 from יָרָא, rəỵhāw, "to enlarge," "to respite," is rendered "relief" by RV in better harmony with "deliverance" with which the word is paired. A. L. Bassetlun

ENLIGHTEN, en-lit'n: (1) "Nn, ʻor, "illumination" in every sense, used in the ordinary sense of giving natural light (Ps 97 4 AV; see also Exr 9 8) or as a sign of health and vigor (1 Sam 14 27 29). "His eyes were enlightened," lit. "became bright." He had become weary and faint with the day's exertions and anxieties, and now recovers (see Job 33 30 and of Ps 13 3). Thus in sickness and grief, the eyes are dull and heavy; dying eyes are glazed; but health and joy render them bright and sparkling, as with a light from within.

(2) In Ps 18 28 AV, the word יָרָא, rəyah, fig., describes the believer's deliverance from the gloom of adversity and the restoration of joy in the knowledge of God.

(3) Most frequently the terms so tr. mean the giving of spiritual light to the soul (Ps 19 8; Eph 1 18, φωτίζω, φωτιζόμενο: He 4 6; 10 32). This spiritual enlightening the Spirit of God brings about through the Divine word (Ps 119 130; 2 Tim 3 15; 2 Pet 1 19). Sin mars the intellectual discernment; "because that in spiritual discernment all things" (1 Cor 2 15 AV).

EN-MISHPAT, en-mish'pat. See Kadesh.

ENMITY, en-mi'ti (אֶ֫מְנִי, ʻemānī, ʻēmā, ʻēṃḥṛa): "Enmity" (hate) occurs as the tr. of ʻēmāh in Gen 3 15, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed," and in Nu 35 21 22, where the absence of enmity on the part of the man-slayer modifies the judgment to be passed on him.

In the NT "enmity" is the tr of echtheirα: Lk 23 12; Rom 8 7, "The mind of the flesh is enmity against God," Gen 4 4, "The friendship of the world is enmity with God!" (because "the world!" is preferred to God); in Eph 2 15 16, Christ is said to have "abolished in his flesh the enmity," by His cross to have "slain the enmity," that is, the opposition between Jew and Gentile, creating in Himself "one new man, so making peace." See also ABISHU; HATE.

ENNATAN, en-a-ta^n (Ennatural, Ennatun; AV Ennatun) (a misprint) One of Ezra's messengers to fetch Levites for the temple service (1 Esd 8 44); called "Elnathan" in Ezr 8 16.

ENOCH, e^nəkh (˫˫˫˫˫, ḫānāḵh, "initiated"); ḫeḇnė, Henoch;

(1) The eldest son of Cain (Gen 4 17 18).

(2) The son of Jared and father of Methuselah, seventh in descent from Adam in the line of Seth (Jude ver 14). He is said (Gen 5 23) to have lived 365 years, but the brief record of his life is comprised in the words, "Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God translated him" (Gen 5 24). The expression "walked with God" denotes a devout life, lived in close communion with God, while the reference to his end has always been understood, as by the writer of He, to mean, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him" (He 11 5). See further, APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, II, i, 1.

ENOCH (CITY): In Gen 4 17 it is narrated that Cain, who had taken up his abode in the land of Nod, E. of Eden (ver 16), built there a city, and called it after the name of his firstborn son Enoch. It is impossible to fix more definitely the locality of this first of cities, recorded, as Delitzsch says (Genes. in loc.), as registering an advance in civilization. The "city" would be a very simple affair, a place of protection for himself, wife and household, perhaps connected with the fear spoken of in 4 14.

ENOCH, SLAVONIC, sla-von'ik, BOOK OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ENOCH, THE BOOK OF THE SECRETS OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

ENORMITY, e-nôr'mi-ti: The marginal rendering in AV of Is 50 4 for "wickedness" and in RV of Lev 17 4; 29 20; 24 14 for "wickedness." In each case it is the tr of τιμίμαθ, zimmāth, meaning originally, "thought!" or "plot," mostly in a bad sense, lewdness, wickedness; in Lev it is unnatural wickedness—incest.

ENOS, e^nôs, ENOSH, e^nôsh (˫˫˫˫˫, ṣēnāh, "mortal"); ḫeḇnō, Enōde: In the NT (RV and AV) and the OT (AV except 1 Ch 1 1 1), the form is Enoh; in the OT (RV and 1 Ch 1 1 AV), the form is Enos. He son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen 4 28; 5 6 ff; 1 Ch 1 1; Lk 3 38). Enosh denotes seven man as frail and mortal. With Enosh a new religious development began, for "then began men to call upon the name of Jehovah" (Gen 4 26). There seems to be an implied contrast to Gen 4 17 ff which records a development in another department of life, represented by Enoch the son of Cain.

ENQUIRE, en-kwär: This is an OE word now obsolete. It is common in AV. In ARV it is nearly always replaced by the more modern "inquire," a few times by "seek" and "seek," one by "salute" (1 Ch 18 10). With this one exception in the OT the change does not affect the meaning. In Acts 23 15, "enquire something more perfectly" is substituted by "judge more exactly." In Mt 10 11, "search out" replaces it. In Mt 7 16, "learned exactly" replaces "inquired diligently." See Inquire.

EN-RIMMON, en-ri'mon (˫˫˫˫˫˫, en-rimmon, "the fountain of Rimmon" [see Rimmon], perhaps "the spring of the pomegranate"); ḫeḇnō, ḫeḇnā, ḫeḇnō; ḫeḇnō (˫˫˫˫, ṣēmōn, ṣēmōn, ṣēmōn): A city of Judah (Josh 15 32), "Ain and Rimmon"; ascribed to Simeon (Josh 19 7; 1 Ch 4 32, "Ain, Rimmon"). In Neh 11 14 mentioned as inhabited after the Captivity. Zac 14 10, runs: "All the land shall be made like the Arabah, from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerus. It must have been a very southerly place. In the Onom ("Erinnom") it is described as a "small large village with a "city," "near the "city." Kh. Umm er-Rumānīn, 9 miles N. of Beersheba is the usually accepted site. See PEF, 398; SH XXIV.

EN-RGEL, en-r'gel (˫˫˫˫˫, en-rēghēl; ṣēmē, ṣēmē, ṣēmē, ṣēmē): meaning uncertain, but interpreted by some to mean "the spring of the fuller":

No argument from this meaning can be valid because (1) it is a very doubtful rendering and (2) "fulling" vats are common in the neighborhood of most town springs and are today plentiful at both the proposed sites. G. A. Smith thinks "spring of the current," or "stream," from Syr ṣēmē, more probable.

(1) En-rogel was an important landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 16 7; 18 16). Here David's spies, Jonathan and Abinadab, hid themselves (2 S 17 17), and here (1 K 1 9) "Abinadab slew sheep and oxen and fatlings by the stone of Zoholeth, which is beside En-rogel," when he anticipated his father's death and caused himself rebelliously to be proclaimed king.

(2) The identification of this important landmark is of first-class importance in Nebus toponography. Two sites have been proposed:

(a) The older view identifies En-rogel with the spring known variously as "the Virgin's Fount," 'Ain sītī Mirām and 'Ain Umm el deraj, an intermittent source of water which rises in a cave on the W. side of the Kidron valley opposite Siloam (see Gihon). The arguments that this is the one Jerus spring and that this must have been a very important landmark are inconclusive. The strongest argument for this view is that put forward by H. Clermont-Ghent, who located the spring or "village " of the fictitious of Siluwan, who is known as es Zehulel, a word in which there certainly appears to linger an echo of Zoholeth. The argument is, however, not as convincing as it seems. Firstly, Zoholeth was a stone; this is a natural rock scarp; such a stone might probably have been transferred from place to place. Secondly, it is quite common for a name to be transferred some miles, instances are numerous. Thirdly, the writer, after frequent mention of the fictitious of Siluwan, is satisfied that the name is by no means confined to the rock scarp near the spring, but to the whole ridge running along from here to, or almost to, Bīr Būyūh itself. The strongest argument against this identification is, however, that there are so much stronger reasons for identifying the “Virgin’s Fount” with Gibon (see Gihon), and that the two springs En-rogel and Gibon cannot be at one site, as is clear from the narrative in 1 K 14.

(b) The view which places En-rogel at Bir Eyygūb in every way harmonizes with the Genesis data. It has been objected that the latter is not a spring but a well. It is today a well, 125 ft. deep, but one with an inexhaustible supply—there must be a true spring there—under the bottom. Probably one reason it only overflows today after periods of heavy rain is that such enormous quantities of débris have now covered the original valley bed that the water cannot rise to the surface; much of it flows away down the valley bottom past the present surface. The water is brackish and is impregnated with sewage, which is not extraordinary when we remember that a large part of the rock strata from which the water comes is overlaid by land constantly irrigated by the city’s sewage.

Although the well may itself be of considerable antiquity, there is no need to insist that this is the exact position of the original spring En-rogel. The source may in olden times have arisen at some spot in the valley bottom which is now deeply buried under the rubbish, perhaps under the southernmost of the irrigated gardens of the fellahin of Sīlehūd. The neighborhood, at the junction of two deep valleys—not to count the small el wād, the ancient Tyropeion or central place for springing. There would appear to have been considerable disturbance here. An enormous amount of débris from various destructions of the city has collected here, but, beside this, Jos records a tradition which appears to belong to this neighborhood. This says (Ant, IX, x, 4) that an earthquake took place once at Eroge—which appears to be En-rogel—when “half of the mountain broke off from the remainder on the W., and rolling down the valley, came to stand on the eastern mountain till the roads, as well as the king’s gardens, were blocked.” It is sufficient that En-rogel is to be located either at Bir Eyygūb or in its immediate neighborhood; for practical purposes the former will do. En-rogel was an important point on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin. The line passed down the lower end of the Kidron valley, past En-rogel (Bir Eyygūb) and then up the Valley of Hinnom (Wa'dy er Rabōb) to a boundary well adapted to the natural conditions.

With regard to David’s spies (2 S 17 17), whereas the Virgin’s Fount—the great source of the city’s water supply (see Gihon)—just below the city walls (see Zos) was an impossible place of hiding, this lower source, out of sight of almost the whole city and removed a considerable distance from its nearest point, was at least a possible place. Further, the facts that it was off the main road, that it afforded a supply of water, which is an essential need of life—water—and that there were, as there are today, many natural caves in the neighborhood, greatly added to its suitability.

Here too was a most appropriate place for Adoni-jah’s plot (1 K 1 9). He and his confederates dared not go to Gibon, the original sacred spring, but had to content themselves with a spot more secluded, though doubtless still sacred. It is recorded (1 K 1 40:41) that the adherents of Solomon hunted him at Gibon (the Virgin’s Fount) and the people “rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them. And Adonijah and all the guests that were with him [at En-rogel] heard it as they had made an end of eating.” The relative positions of these two springs allow of a vivid reconstruction of the narrative as do no other proposed identifications. The two spots are out of sight the one of the other, but not so far that the shout of a multitude at the one could not be carried to the other.

ENROLMENT, en-rōl’ment. See QUINNUS; TAX.

ENSEMBLE, en-sam’ple. See Example.

EN-SHEMESH, en-shem ‘mesh (םש הנשמה, "en shemesh, "spring of the sun"): An important landmark on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 15 7; 18 17). The little spring “Ain el had’id, E. of Bethany, the last spring on the road descending to Jericho, seems to suit the conditions. “The Apostle’s Fountain” by Christians, on account of a tradition dating from the 15th cent. that the apostles drank there.

ENSIGN, en’sin. See Banner.

ENSUE, en-sū’: Synonymous with “to pursue,” “ensue” is found in 1 Pet 3 11 AV as a tr of δικαίω, dikō, “to follow after” ("to make one’s way, to become established.") Also in Jth 9 5, “such as ensued after” (τα μετεπρετε, "the things that follow").

ENTANGLE, en-tang’gI: Found but 5 times in the Scriptures (AV), once in the OT, yet most significant as illustrating the process of mental, moral and spiritual confusion and enslavement.

(1) Used of physical entanglement, as in the mazes of a labyrinth (ἰζών, ikōn, “to involve,” “be perplexed”). At Moses’ command the children of Israel, before crossing the Red Sea, took the wrong way in order to give Pharaoh the impression that they were lost in the wilderness and cause him to say “They are entangled in the land” (Ex 14 3).

(2) Mental: πεπείθη, πεπείθθα, “to entrap,” “ensnare,” with words, as birds are caught in a snare; cf Ecc 9 12. The Pharisees sought to “entangle” (RV “ensnare”) Jesus in His talk (Mt 22 15).

(3) Moral: τυλίκω, τυλίκθω, “to inwove,” hence intertwine and involve. “A good soldier of Jesus Christ,” says Paul, does not “entangle himself,” i.e. become involved, “in the affairs of this life” (2 Tim 2 4). Having “escaped the defilements of the world,” Christians are not to be “again entangled therein” (2 Pet 2 20).

(4) Spiritual: ἐκτείνω, ἐκτείνθω, “to hold in,” hence to hold captive, as a slave in fetters or under a burden. Having experienced spiritual emancipation, freedom, through Christ from bondage to sin and false religion (Gal 5 1; cf 4 8), the Gentiles were not to become “entangled again in a yoke of bondage” by submission to mere legal requirements, as the external rite of circumcision.

With reference to the thoroughness and irresistibility of God’s judgments, we read in Nah 1 10, “For entangled like thorns” (AV “while they be folded together as thorns”), damp, closely packed and intertwined, “they are consumed utterly as dry stubble” (AV "devoured as stubble fully dry").

Dwight M. Pratt

EN-TAPPUH, en-tap’-th, en-to-pū’th (תפוח, en tappū’th; πυκκ Θαφήθω, pūt Thaphiithō, "apple spring"): Probably in the land of Tappuah which belonged to Manasseh, although Tappuah, on the border of Manasseh, belonged to Ephraim (Josh 17 7 f). It lay on the border of Ephraim which ran southward E. of Shechem, and is probably to be identified with the spring at Yādeif, about 3 miles N. of Lebanon.

ENTREAT, en-trēt’. See INTREAT.
ENYV, en'vi (Greek, kín'áth; ζέλος, zéló, phthónos, phthónos): "Envy," from Lat in, "against," and video, "to look," "to look with ill-will," etc, toward another, is an evil strongly condemned in both the OT and the NT. It is to be distinguished from jealousy. We are jealous of our own; we are envious of another man's possessions. Jealousy fears to lose what it has; envy is pained at seeing another have'" (Crabb's Eng. Synonyms). In the OT it is the tr of kín'áth from káná, "to redden," "to glow" (Job 5 2, RV "jealousy," in indignation, in 26 11 RV "jealousy," see they zeal the people, Prov 27 4, etc); the vb, enyv, occurs in Gen 24 14, etc; Nu 11 29 AV; Ps 106 16; Prov 3 31, etc; in the NT it is the tr of phthónos, "envy" (Mt 27 18; Rom 1 29; Gal 5 21, "envying," etc); of zéló, "resent," "jealousy," "envy" (Acts 13 45), tr "envying," RV "jealousy" (Rom 13 13; 1 Cor 3 3; 2 Cor 12 20; Jas 3 14 16); the vb, phthóno, occurs in Gal 5 26; zēlō in Acts 7 9; 17 5, RV "moved with jealousy"; 1 Cor 10 3, "charity [RV 'love'] envelop not.

The spirit of envy is stated in Prov 27 4: "Who is able to stand before envy?" (RV "jealousy"); its evil effects are depicted in Job 5 2 (RV "jealousy"), in Prov 14 30 (RVm "jealousy"); it led to the crucifixion of Christ (Mt 27 18; Mk 14 10); it is one of the seven deadly sins (Gal 5 21; Eph 5 5; 1 Tim 6 4); Christian believers are earnestly warned against it (Rom 13 13 AV; 1 Cor 3 3 AV; Gal 5 26; 1 Pet 2 1). In Jas 4 5 "envy" is used in a good sense, akin to the jealousy ascribed to God. Where AV has "the spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy," RV reads "Doth the spirit which he made to dwell in us long unto envying?"; ARVm "The spirit which he made to dwell in us ye yearneth for unto jealous envy;" cf Jer 3 14; Hos 2 19; or ERVm "That spirit which he made to dwell in you ye yearneth [for us] even unto jealous envy." This last seems to give the sense; cf "Ye adulteresses" (ver 4), ARVm "That is, who break your marriage vow to God." W. L. Walker

EPAENETUS, ep'ē-ne-tus (Greek, Epaenetos, Epaenetus, "praised"): One of the Christians at Rome to whom greetings are sent by Paul (Rom 16 5). All that is known of him is told here. Paul describes him as "lovely" (2) "who has the firstfruits of Asia unto Christ." TR has "firstfruits of Achaia" but this wrong reading is due to 1 Cor 16 15. He was one of the first Christians in the Roman province of Asia.

This salutation brings up the question of the destination of vs 3-16, for it is argued that they are addressed to the church in Ephesus owing to the fact that Priscas and Aquila and Epaenetus are known to have dwelt in Asia. On the other hand, there are more than 20 others in this list who are not known to have spent any time in Asia. Priscas and Aquila had once dwelt in Rome (Acts 18 2), and there is nothing unusual in an Ephesian dwelling in the capital of the empire. An interesting discovery was made in Rome of an inscription in which was the name of Epaenetus, an Ephesian. S. F. Hunter

EPAPHRAS, ep'af-ras (Greek, Epaphras, Epaphroditos): A contracted form of Epaphroditus. He must not, however, be confused with the messenger of the Philippian community. He was with Paul during a part of his 1st Rom imprisonment, joining in Paul's greetings to Philemon (Philem ver 23). Epaphras was the missionary by whose instrumentality the Colossians became Christians (Col 1 7), and probably the other churches of the Lycaon had been founded by him. In sending his salutation to the Colossians Paul testified, "He hath much labor for you, and for them in Laodicea, and for them in Hierapolis" (Col 4 13). Epaphras had brought to Paul good news of the progress of the gospel, of their "faith in Christ Jesus" and of their love toward all the saints (Col 1 4). Paul's regard for him is shown by his designating him "our beloved fellow-servant," "a faithful minister of Christ" (Col 1 7), and "a bond-servant of Christ Jesus" (Col 1 12 m). The last designation Paul uses several times of himself, but only once of another besides Epaphras (Phil 1 1).

EPAPHRODITUS, ep'af-ro-dit'us (Greek, Epaphroditos, "lovely"): Mentioned only in Phil 2 18. The name corresponds to the Lat Vegetus (=handsome), and was very common in the Rom period. "The name occurs very frequently in inscriptions both Gr and Lat, whether at full length Epaphroditus, or in its contracted form Epaphras" (Lightfoot, Philippians, 123). Epaphroditus was the delegate of the Christian community at Philippi, sent with their gift to Paul during his first Rom imprisonment. Paul calls him "my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier." "The three words are arranged in an ascending scale: common sympathy, common work, common danger and toil and suffering" (Lightfoot, i.e.). On his arrival at Rome, Epaphroditus devoted himself to "the work of Christ," both in his personal, and his assist-ant missionary work. So assiduously did he labor that he lost his health, and "was sick nigh unto death." He recovered, however, and Paul sent him back to Philippi with this letter to quiet the alarm of his friends, who had heard of his serious illness. Paul besought for him that the church should receive him with joy and hold him in honor. S. F. Hunter

EPHIAH, ep'ih (Hebrew, "e'phah, "darkness"); "Ἰηφα, Ἐφερ (Gen 25 4), Ἐφερ, Ἐφερ (Isa 60 6): The name of three persons in the OT, both masc. and fem.

(1) The son of Midian, descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gen 25 4 = 1 Ch 1 33); mentioned again in Isa 60 6 as a transporter of gold and frankincense from Sheba, who shall thus bring enlargement to Judah and praise to Jeh. According to Fried. Deltitsch, Schrader, and Hommel, "Ἐφα is an abbreviation of Ἀφαρ, the Kha-yappa Arabs of the time of Tiglath-pileser III and Sargon. See treatment of this view in Dillmann's Comm. on Gen 25 4).

(2) A concubine of Caleb (1 Ch 2 46).

(3) The son of Jahdai, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 2 47).

Charles B. Williams

EPHIAH, ep'ih (Hebrew, "e'phah, "darkness"): A dry measure of about one bushel capacity. It corresponds to the bath in liquid measure and was the standard for measuring grain and similar articles since it is classed with balances and weights (Lev 19 36; Am 6 5) in the injunctions regarding just dealing in trade. In Zec 5 6-10 it is used for the utensil itself (see Weights and Measures).

EPHIAL, ep'ih-āl (Hebrew, "ephah, in K'thē, "ophā, in K'thēb; Ἀφή, Ἐφή, Ὠφή, Ὠφη, "gloomy," "observing," in LXX): "The Netophathite," whose sons were numbered among "the captains of the forces" left in Judah after the carrying away to Babylon (Jer 40 [LXX 47 8]). His sons assembled at Mizpah with Gedaliah, governor of the scattered Jews, and with him were slain by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah (Jer 41 3).

EPHER, ep'er (Hebrew, "ephēr, "effer, "calf," "young deer"); "Ἀφή, Ἐφή, Ὠφή, Ὠφη, "gloomy," "observing," in LXX): (1) The second son of Midian, descended from Abraham by his wife Keturah (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 1 33). See further Dillmann's Comm. on Gen (Gen 4). (2) The third son of Ezra, descended from the tribe of Judah (1 Ch 4 17). (3) The first of five heads of their fathers' houses, "掃羅族ngr, "mighty men," or "colorful, famous men," in the half-tribe of Manasseh, who dwelt between Bashan and Mt. Hermon (1 Ch 5 23-24).

Ephes-Dammim, s-es-dāmmim (Ἐφέσος Ἐφέσιος, ephe's dam'mim): Some spot between Sochoh and Azekah (1 S 17 1) where the Philistines were encamped; called in 1 Ch 11 13, "Pas-dammim." Ephes = "end of" or "boundary" and the whole word may mean the "boundary of blood." The deep red color of the newly ploughed earth in this situation is noticeable and may have given origin to the idea of "blood" (of Adammim). Cheyne suggests that from Ἐφέσος, Ἐφέσιος, to Ἐφέσιον, dammim, is an easy step, and that the former, meaning "red brown earth," may have been the original. No other satisfactory locality has been found to explain or fix the site. E. W. G. Masterman Ephesian, e-fé-zhan (Ἐφέσιος, Ephésios), Ephesians, e-fé-zhán: A term which, as in Acts 19 28-34.35 and 21 29, was applied to those natives or residents of the city of Ephesus who were adherents of the cult of the goddess Diana. A Jew or a Christian, though a native of Ephesus, would probably have been designated as such, rather than as an Ephesian.

VII. Literature

I. Authenticity.—None of the epistles which are ascribed to St. Paul have a stronger chain of evidence to their early and continued use than that which we know as the end of the Epistle to the Ephesians. Leaving for the moment the question of the relation of Eph. to other NT writings, we find that it not only colors the phraseology of the Apostolic Fathers, but is actually quoted. In Clement of Rome (c 95 AD) the connection with Eph might be due to some common liturgical form in xlv.6 (cf Eph 4 6); though the resemblance is so close that we must feel that our epistle was known to Clement both before and after (cf Eph 1 3-4); xxvii (of 5 21); xxxvi (of 5 18); lix (of 1 18; 4 18). Ignatius (d. 115) shows numerous points of contact with Eph, esp. in his Epistle to the Ephesians. In cap. xii we read: "Ye are associates and fellow students of the mysteries with Paul, who in every letter makes mention of you in Christ Jesus." It is difficult to decide the exact meaning of the phrase "every letter," but in spite of the opinion of many scholars that it must be rendered "in all his epistle," i.e. in every epistle of his, it is safer to take it as an exaggeration, "in all his epistles," justified to some extent in the fact that besides Eph St. Paul does mention the Ephesian Christians in Rom (16 5); 1 Cor (15 32; 16 8-19); 2 Cor (1 8-15; 1 Tim (1 3) and 2 Tim (1 18). In the opening address the connection with Eph 1 3-6 is too close to be accidental. There are echoes of our epistle in cap. i (6 1; ix (20-22); xviii (οἰκονομία, 1 10); xx (2 18; 4 24); and in Ignat. ad Polyc. v we have close identity with Eph 5 25 and less certain connection with Eph 4 2, and in vii with Eph 5 13-17. The Epistle is not the only piece of Polyce in two Epistles to the Ephesians; its balas a striking peculiarity of our letter. The explanation of this peculiarity will meet us when we consider the destination of the epistle (see III below).

(2) Further evidence for the Pauline authorship is found in the general style and language of the letter, which is absolutely ascribed to Soden (Ephes. Christ. Lit., 294) that "every sentence contains verbal echoes of Pauline epistles, indeed except when ideas peculiar to the Epistle come to expression it is simply a mosaic of Pauline phraseology," without accepting his combinatoria. The Tübinger scholars attacked the epistle mainly on the ground of supposed traces of Gnostic or Montanist influences, akin to those ascribed to the Colossians. Later writers have given over this claim to put forward the idea of Paul's later authorship (De Wette, followed by Holtzmann, von Soden and others); dependence on Colossians (Hitzig, Holtzmann); the attitude to the Apostles (von Soden); doctrinal differences, esp. those that concern Christology and the Parousia, the conception of the church (Klopper, Wrede and others). The tendency, however, seems to be backward toward a saner view of the questions involved; and most of those who do not accept the Pauline authorship would probably agree with Jülicher (P. R.), who asserts that Pauline Christianity intimately familiar with the Pauline epistles, esp. with Col., writing about 90," who sought in Eph "to put in a plea for the true catholicism in the meaning of Paul and in his name."

(3) Certain of these positions require that we should examine the doctrinal objections. (a) First of these is the claim that Eph has a different conception of the person and work of Christ from the acknowledged epistles of St. Paul. Not only have we the exalation of Christ, which we find in Col 3:16; Eph 1:22, but in the earlier and further statement that it was God's purpose from the beginning to "sum up all things in Christ, the things in the heavens, and the things upon the earth" (Eph 1:10). This is no more than the natural expansion of the term "all things," which were committed to Christ in 1 Cor 1:28, and is an idea which has at least its foreshadowing in Rom 8:1920 and 2 Cor 5:18. The relation between Christ and the church as given in 1 Cor. 3:23 is in entire agreement with St. Paul's teaching in Rom 13 and 1 Cor. It is still the Pauline figure of the church as the body of Christ, in spite of the fact that Christ is not thought of as the head of that body. The argument in the epistle does not deal with the doctrine of the cross from the standpoint of other epistles, but its teaching is exactly the same. There is redemption (1:7; 4:30); reconciliation (2:14-16); forgiveness (1:7; 4:32). The blood of Christ shed on the cross redeems us from our sin and restores us to God. In like manner it is said that the Parousia is treated (2:7) as something far off. But St. Paul has long since given up the idea that it is immediately; even in 2 Thess 2 shows that an indeterminate interval must intervene, and in Rom 11:25 he sees a period of time yet unfulfilled before the end. (b) The doctrine of the church is the most striking contrast to the earlier epistles. We have already dealt with the relation of Christ to the church. The conception of the church universal is in advance of the earlier epistles, but it is the natural climax of the development of the apostle's conception of the church as shown in the earlier epistles. Writing from Rome with the idea of the empire set before him, it was natural that Paul should see the church as a great whole, and should use the word eclesia in a universal, all-embracing absolute sense; as the Christian brotherhood. As a matter of fact the word is used in this absolute sense in 1 Cor 12:28 before the Captivity Epistles (cf. 1 Cor 1:2; 10:32). The emphasis here on the unity of Jew and Gentile in the church is a part of the progress of the idea of the apostle in the Epistle to the Romans; though in Eph this is "urged on the basis of God's purpose and Christian faith, rather than on the Law and the Promises." Neither is it true that in Eph the Law is spoken of slightly, as some say, by the reference to it here (c 11). In no case is the doctrinal portion of the epistle counter to that of the acknowledged Pauline epistles, though in the matter of the church, and of Christ's relationship to it and to the universe, there is evidence of progress in the apostle's conception of the underlying truths, which none the less find echoes in the earlier writings. "New doctrinal ideas, or a new proportion of these ideas, is no evidence of different authorship." (c) In the view of certain authors is that the language of Paul in any essential different from what we have in 1 Cor.

(4) The linguistic argument is a technical matter of the use of Gr words that cannot well be discussed here. The general case for the Pauline authorship of Eph is the repetition of a sentence, the repetitions on the one hand; the lack of argument, the full, swelling periods on the other hand; the combination of sentences, the repetitions on the one hand; the lack of argument, the full, swelling periods on the other hand; the counterpart in Rom. The minute differences which show themselves in new or strange words will be much reduced in number when we take from the list those that are due to subjects which the author does not discuss elsewhere. Pauline Christianity (Holtzmann, (Eph. 25) gives us a list of those pass legénes 76 in all). But there are none of these which, as Lock says, St. Paul could not have known. There are certain which he does not use elsewhere and others which are only found in his acknowledged writings. The following stand out as affording special ground for objection. The phrase "heavenly places" (tē epourris, 1:3; 2:6; 6:12) is peculiar to this epistle. The phrase finds a parallel (1 in 1 Cor 19 and the thought is found in Paul 20. The devil (ho diabolos, 4:27; 6:11) is used in place of the more usual Satan (satanas). But in Acts St. Paul is quoted as using diabolos in 13:10 and as using Satan in 19:13. In Eph he uses the expression "holy" (hagioi) for apostles (3:5) fails to the ground when we remember that the expression "holy" (hagios) is St. Paul's common word. The Greek language (that he uses of himself in this very epistle (3:8). In like manner "mystery" (emgnēia) is used in the epistles of the same sense that we find it in these. The attack on the epistle fails, whether it is made from the point of teaching or language; and there is no ground whatever for questioning the truth of Christian tradition that St. Paul wrote the letter which we know as the Epistle to the Ephesians.

II. Place and Date of Writing.—The time and place of his writing Eph turn on the larger question of the chronology of St. Paul's life, the relation of the Captivity Epistles to each other, and the second question whether they were written from Caesarea or Rome (for this see Philoem, Epistle to). Sufficient here to say that the place was undoubtedly Rome, and that the time is during the latter part of the two years' captivity which we find recorded in Acts 28:30. The date will then be, following the later chronology, 63 or 64 AD; following the earlier which, in many ways, is to be preferred, about 56.

III. Destruction.—To whom was this letter written? The title says to the Ephesians. With this the witness of the early church almost universally agrees. It is distinctly stated in the Muratorian Fragment (106, 1.20); and the epistle is quoted as to the Ephesians by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., v.14, 3; 24, 3; Tertullian (Adv. Marc., v.11, 17; De Præsc., 36; De Monag., v.); Clement of Alexandria (Strom., iv.65; Paed., i.18) and Origen (Contra Celsum, iii.20). To these there is also the evidence of the extant MSS and VSS, which unite in ascribing the epistle to the Ephesians. The only exception to the universal evidence is Tertullian’s account of Marcion (cir 150 AD) who reads Ad Loodicensem (Adv. Marc., v.11: “I say nothing (contra ibid) saying epistle to Ephesians are lacking in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, and that the corrector of the cursive known as 67 has struck them out of his copy. Besides these a recently described MS, Cod. Laura 184, gives the title: ‘Epheso the epistle to the Ephesians’ and that said by Origen that the scribe suggests that it was compiled from Origen’s writings, omits these words (Robinson, Ephesians, 203). This strong manuscript evidence against the inclusion of these two words in the inscription we must add the evidence of Origen and Basil. Origen, as quoted in Cranmer’s Catena ad loc., writes: “In the Ephesians alone we found the expression ‘to the saints which are,’ and we ask, unless the phrase ‘which are’ is redundant, what it can mean. May it not be that as in Exodus He who speaks to Moses declares His name to be the Absolute One, so also those who are partakers of the Absolute become existent when they are called, as it were, from non-being into being?” (Robinson, p.203). Origen evidently knows nothing here of any reading en Epheßos, but takes the words “which are” in an absolute, metaphysical sense. Basil, a century and a half later, probably refers to this comment of Origen (in his Catena ad loc.) by saying: when writing to the Ephesians, as to men who are truly united with the Absolute One through clear knowledge, he names them as existent ones in a peculiar phrase, saying ‘to the saints which are’ and not ‘to the saints which are also’ as in the inscription. For so those who were before us have handed it down, and we also have found [this reading in old copies].” In Jerome’s note on this verse there is perhaps a reference to this comment on Origen, but the passage is too indefinitely expressed for us to be sure what its bearing on the reading really is. The later writers quoted by Lightfoot (Bib. Essays, 384 f) cannot, as Robinson shows (Eph, 293), be used as witnesses against the Textus Receptus. We may therefore conclude that the reading en Epheßos, it is true, was in the phrase “the saints which are” (tōs oikōn) as absolute, as Origen did; or as meaning “truly,” is impossible. It is possible to take the words with what follows, “and faithful” (kai pistolo), and interpret this latter expression (lygen, “believers”) as in the classical sense of “steadfast.” The clause would then read either “to the saints who are also believers,” or “to the saints who are also faithful,” i.e. steadfast. Neither of these is wholly in accord with St. Paul’s normal usage, but they are at least possible.

The determining factor in the question of the destination of the epistle lies in the epistle itself. We must not forget that, save perhaps in Corinth, there was no church with which Paul was so closely associated as that in Ephesus. His long residence there, of which we read in Acts (chs 19, 20), finds no echo in our epistle. There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20:17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the greeting of the first verse.

2. The In-Scription unto the Saints which are at Ephesus (en Epheßos) and to the faithful in Christ Jesus. When we look at the evidence for this reading we find that the readings en Epheßos are lacking in Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Vaticanus, and that the corrector of the cursive known as 67 has struck them out of his copy. Besides these a recently described MS, Cod. Laura 184, gives the title: ‘Epheso the epistle to the Ephesians’ and that said by Origen that the scribe suggests that it was compiled from Origen’s writings, omits these words (Robinson, Ephesians, 203). This strong manuscript evidence against the inclusion of these two words in the inscription we must add the evidence of Origen and Basil. Origen, as quoted in Cranmer’s Catena ad loc., writes: “In the Ephesians alone we found the expression ‘to the saints which are,’ and we ask, unless the phrase ‘which are’ is redundant, what it can mean. May it not be that as in Exodus He who speaks to Moses declares His name to be the Absolute One, so also those who are partakers of the Absolute become existent when they are called, as it were, from non-being into being?” (Robinson, p.203). 3. The Evidence of the Letter Itself. There is no greeting to anyone of the Christian community, many of whom were probably intimate friends. The close personal ties, that the scene of Acts 20:17-38 shows us existed between him and his converts in Ephesus, are not even hinted at. The epistle is a calm discussion, untouched with the warmth of personal allusion beyond the greeting of the first verse.

4. Conclusion. This element in the epistle, coupled with the strange fact of Marcion’s attributing it to the Laodicæans, and the expression in Col 4:16 that points to a letter coming from Laodicea to Colosse, has led most of the present day to accept Ussher’s suggestion that the epistle is really a circular letter to the churches either in Asia, or, perhaps better, in that part of Phrygia which lies near Colosse. The reason was evidently Eustathios (2:1; 3:2), and from the mission of Tychicus doubtless of a definite locality, though for the reasons given above this could not well be Ephesus alone. It is barely possible that the cities to whom St. John was bidden to write the Revelation, were also the cities to whom St. Paul wrote this epistle, or it may be that they were the churches of the Lycaus valley and its immediate neighborhood. The exact locality cannot be determined. But from the fact that Marcion attributed the epistle to Laodicea, possibly because it was so written in the first verse, and from the connection with Colossians, it is at least probable that two of these churches were at Colosse and Laodicea. On this theory the letter would seem to have been written from Rome to churches in the neighborhood of, or accessible to, Colosse, dealing with the problem of Christian unity and fellowship and the relations between Christ and the church and sent to them by the hands of Tychicus. The inscription would be filled in by the copyist or copies were to be made with the name of the local church written in, and then sent to or left with the different churches. It was from Ephesus, as the chief city of Asia in all probability, that copies of this circular letter reached the church in the world, and from this fact the letter came to be known. In the church at large as that from Ephesus, and the title was written “to the Ephesians,” and the first verse was made to read to the “saints which are in Ephesus.”

IV. Relation to Other New Testament Writings. Eph. raises an important question by the close resemblances that can be traced between it and various other NT writings.
The connection between Eph and 1 Pet is not beyond question. In spite of the disclaimer of as careful a writer as Dr. Bigg (ICC) it is impossible to follow the references to Eph made by others and not feel that St. Peter either knew Eph or made use of it at the very least had discussed these subjects with its author. For, as Dr. Hort tells us, the similarity is one of thought and structure rather than of phrase. The following are the more striking passages with their parallels: Eph 1:3 (1 Pet 1:21); Eph 1:7 (1 Pet 1:5); Eph 1:8-9 (1 Pet 1:3); 1:18-20 (1 Pet 1:3-5); 2:18-22 (1 Pet 2:4-6); 2:20-22 (1 Pet 2:22); 3:9 (1 Pet 1:20); 3:20 (1 Pet 1:12); 4:19 (1 Pet 1:14). The explanations that 1 Pet and Eph are both from the pen of the same writer, or that Eph is based on 1 Pet, are overthrown, among other reasons, by the close relation between Eph and Col.

The connection with the Apocalypse is based on Eph 2:20 as compared with Rev 21:14; Eph 3:5 and Rev 10:7; Eph 6:11 and Rev 19:11; etc.

Writings. Holtzmann adds various minor similarities, but none of these are sufficient to prove any direct knowledge dependence on Eph. The contact with the Fourth Gospel is more positive. Love (agapē) and knowledge (gnōsis) are used in the same sense in both the Gospel and the Epistle. The application of the Messianic title, the Beloved (Eph 1:6), to Christ does not appear in the Gospel (it is found in Mt 3:17), but the statement of the Father's love for Him constantly recurs. The reference to the going up and coming down of Christ (Eph 4:9) is closely akin to Jn 5:13 ("No man hath ascended into heaven, but he"). So, too, Eph 5:11.13 finds echo in Jn 3:19.20; Eph 4:4.7 in Jn 3:34; Eph 5:6 in Jn 3:30. Eph 5:8 is akin to Jn 1:6 and Eph 2:3 to Jn 3:10.

When we turn to Col we find a situation that is without parallel in the NT. Out of 155 verses in Eph, 78 are found in Col in varying degrees of identity. Among them are these: Eph 1:6 || Col 1:18; Eph 1:16ff || Col 1:9; Eph 1:21ff || Col 1:16ff; Eph 2:10ff || Col 2:1ff; Eph 4:15 || Col 2:19; Eph 4:19ff || Col 3:9; Eph 4:32 || Col 3:12ff; Eph 5:5 || Col 3:5; Eph 5:19ff || Col 3:16ff; Eph 5:6 || Col 3:21; Eph 6:5-9 || Col 3:22-4. For a fuller list see Abbott (ICC, xxiii). Not only is Col a bar but there appears to be a similarity in argument so great that Bishop Barr (NT Comm, for Eng. Readers, Ellicott) can make a analysis showing the divergence and similarity by the simple device of different type. To this we must add that there are at least a dozen Gr words common to these two epistles not found elsewhere. Over against this similarity it is to be set the dissimilarity. The general subject of the epistles is not approached from the same standpoint. In one it is Christ as the head of all creation, and our duty in consequence. In the other it is the church as the fulness of Christ and our duty—put constantly in the same words—in consequence thereof. In Eph we have a number of OT references, in Col only one. In Eph we have unique phrases, of which "the heavenly spheres" (τὰ ἐσπάρωμα) is most striking, and the whole treatment of the relation of Jew and Gentile in the church, and the marriage tie as exemplified in the relation between Christ and the church. In Col we have in like manner passages which are real known (τα εἰσπαρωμα, etc.). In Eph we have the controversial section in ch 2, and the salutations. In truth, as Davies (Ep. St. Paul to Eph, Col, and Phil) well says: "It is difficult indeed to say, concerning the patent coincidences of expression in the two epistles, whether the points of likeness or of unlikeness between them are the more remarkable." This situation has given rise to various theories. The most complicated is that of H. Holtzmann, who holds that some passages point to a priority of Col, others to that of Eph; and that Col, as we have it, is composite, based on an original epistle of St. Paul which was expanded by the author of Eph—who was not St. Paul—after he had written this epistle. So Holtzmann would give us the original Col (Pauline), Eph (based on it), and the present Col (not Pauline) expanded from the former through the latter. The theory falls to the ground on its fundamental hypothesis, that Col as it stands is interpolated. The most reasonable explanation is that both Col and Eph are the work of St. Paul, written at practically the same time, and that in writing on the same subjects, to different people, there would be just the differences and similarity which we have in these epistles. The objection that St. Paul could not repeat himself and yet differ as these two letters do is purely imaginary. Zahn shows us that men do just this very thing, giving an account of Bismarck's speaking on a certain subject to a group of officers and later to a large body of men, and yet using quite different language. Moreover, St. Paul is not the man who wrote (Rom and Gal and 1 Tim and 2 Tim) when to do so will serve his purpose. "Simultaneous authorship by one writer," and that writer St. Paul, is the only explanation that will satisfy all the facts in the case and give them due proportion.

V. The Purpose. —If our interpretation of the circumstances, composition and destination of Eph be right, we are now in a position to look beneath the surface and ask why the apostle wrote it. To understand its central theme we must remember that St. Paul, the prisoner of the Lord, is writing in the calm of his imprisonment, far from the noise and turmoil, the conflict and strife, that marked his earlier life. He is now able to look out on the church and get a view of it in its wholeness, to see the part it is to play in God's scheme for the restoration of the human race, to see God's purpose in it and for it and its relation to Him. With this standpoint one can write to the churches about Ephesians on the occasion of their creation. Col, on the other hand, is written to correct false views on some special point, but to emphasise the great central truth which he had put in the very forefront of his letter. God's eternal purpose is to gather into one the whole created universe, to reconcile sinners to Himself, to bring about the union between them and Himself. The apostle's whole prayer is for this end, his whole effort and desire is toward this goal: that they may have full, clear knowledge of this purpose of God which He is working out through Christ Jesus, who is the head of the church, the very fulness of Him who is being fulfilled all over the world. Everything, for the apostle, as he looks forth upon the empire, centers in the purpose of God. The discord between the elements in the church, the distinction between Jew and Gentile, all these must yield to that greater purpose. The vision is of a great oneness in Christ and through Him in God, a oneness of birth and faith and life and love, as men, touched with the fire of that Divine purpose, seek to fulfil, each in himself, the part that God has given him to play in the world, and, fighting against the foes of God, to overcome at last. It is a noble purpose to set before men this great mystery of God's ways. God's means by which, in Christ, He may restore all men to union with Himself. It is an impossible vision except to one who, as St. Paul was at the time, is in a situation where the strife and turmoil of outside life can enter but little, but a situation where he can look out with a calm vision and, in the midst of the world's discord, discern what God is accomplishing among men.

VI. Argument. — The Argument of Eph is as follows:

1. Greeting.

1 1:10: Hymn of praise to God for the manifestation of His purpose for men in Christ Jesus, chosen from the beginning to a new life in hope, predestined to adoption as sons through Jesus Christ, in whom as the Beloved He has predestination (vs 1:3). Redeemed by the blood of Christ by whom we have forgiveness of sins through His grace abounding in us and making us know the mystery of God and the unity of all things in heaven and on earth, and for man, and for all (vs 3-10).

1 1:11-14: For thus Israel has served as a preparation, and to this the Gentiles are come, sealed unto salvation by the Holy Spirit of power.

1 2:16: Thanksgiving for their faith.

1 16-21: Prayer that they may, by the wisdom and revelation, know their destiny and the power of God to fulfill it.

1 2:2-10: Summary of what God has done in Christ. In His sovereignty (vs 22-23), and headship in the church (vs 22-23); His work for men, quickening us from a death of sin into which man has sunk, and existing us to fellowship with Christ by His grace, which has created us for good works as part of His eternal purpose (2 1-10).

1 3:15-16: The contrast between the former estate of the Gentiles, as strangers and aliens, and their present one with Christ in the blood of the new covenant.

1 3:17, 18: Christ, who is our peace, uniting Jew and Gentile and reconciling man to God through the cross; by whom we have access to this grace (Eph 3:12).

1 3:19-22: This is theirs as well as fellow-citizens of the saints, built up on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, become a sanctuary of God in the spirit.

1 3:21: A digression on the "mystery," i.e., the revelation of the hidden character of God in the new covenant, which man may grasp it. The "mystery" is that all men, Jews and Gentiles, are co-heirs and co-partners of the promises of the new covenant.

1 3:21: Paul is a minister, to whom has been given the stewardship of this mystery, unfold to all creatures God's wisdom, in Christ (with regard to what is written in the epistle 1:18-19).

1 3:22-3: Prayer that they may live up to their opportunities (vs 14-19).

1 4:1-6: The outcome of this privilege, the fulfillment of the Divine purpose, must show itself in unity of life in the Christian fellowship.

1 4:7-16: The different gifts which the Christians have are for the building up of the church into that perfect unity which is found in Christ.

1 4:17-24: The spiritual darkness and corruption of the old gentile life set over against the enlightenment and purity and holiness of the new life in Christ.

1 5:1-6: Special features of the Christian life, arising out of the union of Christians with Christ and making for the fellowship in the church. On the side of the individual: sins in word and temper (4:25-26); the power of temptation (5:1-6); the conduct of the Christian and the path of love (5:1-6); the general behavior (15:16-20); on the side of social relations: husband and wife exemplified in the relation of Christ and the church (vs 25-33); children and parents (6:1-4); servants and masters (vs 5-9).

1 5:8-14: The Christian warfare, its foes and armor and weapons.

1 6:1-24: Conclusion.

VII. Teaching. — The keynote to the doctrinal basis of the epistle is struck at the very outset. The hymn of praise centers in the thought of God, the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ. It is to Him that the blessing is due, to Him, who had chosen us from the beginning, in whom there is redemption (1:3-7). God as the very heart and soul of every thing "light of the world." Our Lord Jesus Christ (1:3).

4:6: He is the Father from whom all revelation comes (1:17), and from whom every human family derives its distinctive characteristics (15:15). But He is not only Father in relation to the universe: He is the Head over all (1:24); to the church (vs 9-10); of the children of Our Lord Jesus Christ (1:3). The eternity of Our Lord is distinctly asserted (vs 4-5) as of one existing before the foundation of the world, in whom everything heavenly as well as earthly is united, summed up (vs 10-16).

5:18: He is the Messiah (the Beloved 1:6) is clearly a Messianic term, as the voice from heaven at Christ's baptism, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," shows (Mt 3:17). In Him we are quickened (2:5). He is made perfect in love (vs 10-11). He died on the cross (ver 16), and by His blood (1:7) we have redemption (4:30), and reconciliation with God (2:16). He whom God raised from the dead (1:20), now is in heaven (1:20; 4:8) from which place He comes (4:8), bringing gifts to men. (This interpretation makes the descent follow as an aspect, and not the return of Christ through His gifts of the Spirit which He gave to the church.) He who is in heaven fills all things (ver 10); and, from a wealth which is unsearchable (3:8), as the Head of the church (1:22), pours out His grace to free us from the power of sin (2:1). To this end He endues us with His Spirit (3:16). This teaching about God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, is no abstract theorizing. It is all intensely practical, having at its heart the purpose of God from the ages, which we saw above, is to restore again the unity of all things in Him (1:9-10); to heal the breach between man and God (2:16.17); to break down the separation between Jew and Gentile, and to abolish the enmity not only between them, but between them and God. This purpose of God is to be accomplished in a visible society, the one church, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (vs 20), of which Jesus Christ is the head of the corner, into which we are to be grafted in holy baptism, where they own one Lord, hold to one faith, in one God and Father of all who is above all and through all (4:1-7).

The teaching as to the church is one of the most striking elements of the epistle. In the first place we have the idea that the church is the body of Christ who has already been discussed. The epistle sees the whole Christian community throughout the world bound together into a unity, one fellowship, one body. He has risen to a higher vision than man had ever had before. But there is a further teaching in the epistle. Not only is the church throughout the world one body, but it is the body of Christ who is its Head (1:21). He has, as Lightfoot suggests, the same relation to the church which in vs 10 He has to the universe. He is its Head, "the inspiring, ruling, guiding, combining, sustaining power, the mainspring of its activity, the center of its unity and the seat of its life." But the relation is still closer. It, as the evidence adduced would necessitate, one accepts J. Armitage Robinson's explanation of πληρόμα, as that without which a thing is incomplete (Eph 255), then the church, in some wonderful mystery, is the complement of Christ, apart from which He Himself, as the Christ, lacks fulness. We are needed by Him, that so He may become all in all. He, the Head of restored humanity, the Second Adam, needs His church, to fulfill the unity which He came upon earth to accomplish (of Stone, Christian Church, 85, 86).

Still further, we find in this epistle the two figures of the church, the Temple of the Spirit (2 21 ff), and the Bride of Christ (5 23 ff). Under the latter figure we find the marriage relation of the Lord to Israel, which runs through the O.T. (Hos 3:10, ed.), applied to the union between Christ and the church. The signification of the close tie that binds them, the self-sacrificing love of Christ, and the self-surrender of obedience on the part of the church; and the object of this is that the church may be free from any blemish, holy and spotless. In the figure of the Temple, which is an expansion of the earlier figure in 1 Cor 3:16; 2 Cor 6:16, we see the thought of a spiritual building, a sanctuary, into which all the diverse elements of the churches grow into a compact unity. These figures sum up what the church is, and define which the Divine purpose finds its fulfillment. The progress forward to that fulfillment is due to the combined effort of God and man. "The church, the society of Christian men . . . is built and yet grows. We need to cooperate in its development" (Westcott). Out of this doctrinal development the apostle works out the practical life by which this Divine purpose can find its fulfillment. Admitted into the fellowship of the church by baptism, we become members one of another (Gal. 3:28). It is on this basis that he urges human brotherhood at the entrance of intercourse with each other, and pleads for gentleness and a forgiving spirit (vss. 25-32). As followers of God we are to keep free from the sins that spring from pride and self-indulgence and any fellowship with the spirit of evil (vs. 1-14). Our life is to be lived as seeking the fulfillment of God's purpose for all the relationships of life (5:15-6:9). All is to be done with the full armor of the Christian soldier, as is fitting for those who fight spiritual enemies (6:10ff.).

The epistle is primarily practical, bringing the significance of the great revelation of God's will to the everyday duties of life, and lifting all things up to a higher level which finds its ideal in the indwelling of Christ in our hearts, out of which we may be filled with all the fulness of God (3:17-19).

LETTER TO THE EPHESIANS

CHARLES SMITH LEWIS

Ephesus, of the Hellenistic world, is a city of the Roman province of Asia, near the mouth of the Cayster river, 3 miles from the western coast of Asia Minor, and opposite the island of Samos. With an artificial harbor accessible to the largest ships, and rivaling the harbor at Miletus, standing at the entrance of the valley which reaches far into the interior of Asia Minor, and connected by highways with the chief cities of the province, Ephesus was the most easily accessible city in Asia, both by land and sea. Its location, therefore, favored its religious, political and commercial development, and presented a most advantageous field for the missionary labors of Paul. The city stood upon the sloping sides and at the base of two hills, Prion and Coressus, commanding a beautiful view of the city, and with its climatic zone, and the soil of the valley was unusually fertile.

Tradition says that in early times near the place where the mother goddess of the earth was born, the Amazons built a city and a temple in which they practiced a kind of idolatry. In this little truth of our history bearing at different times the names of Samornia, Trachea, Ortygia and Ptelea, flourished until in the early Gr days it aroused the cupidity of Androclus, a prince of Athens. He captured it and made it a Gr city. Still another tradition says that Androclus was its founder. However, under Gr rule the civilization gradually supplanted that of the Orientals, the Gr language was spoken in place of the Asiatic; and the Asiatic goddess of the temple assumed more or less the character of the Gr Artemis. Ephesus, therefore, and all that pertained to it, was a mixture of oriental and Gr. Though the early history of the city is obscure, it seems that at different times it was in the hands of the Carians, the Leleges and Ionians; in the early historical period it was one of a league of twelve Ionian cities. In 560 BC it came into the possession of the Lydians; 3 years later, in 557, it was taken by the Persians; and during the following years the Greeks and Persians were constantly disputing for the city. Finally, Alexander the Great took it; and at his death it fell to Lysimachus, who gave it the name of Arsinoc, from his second wife. Upon the death of Attalus II (Philadelphus), king of Pergamos, it was bequeathed to the Rom Empire; and in 190, when the Rom province of Asia was formed, it became a part of it. Ephesus and Pergamos, the capital of Asia, were the two great rival cities of the province. Though Pergamos was the center of the Rom religion and of the government, Ephesus was more accessible, the commercial center and the home of the native goddess Diana; and because of its wealth and situation it gradually became the chief city of the province.

It is to the temple of Diana, however, that its great wealth and those immense are largely due. Like the city, it dates from the time of the Amazons, yet what the early temple was like we now have no means of knowing, and of its history we know little excepting that it was seven times destroyed by fire and rebuilt, each time on a scale larger and grander than before. The wealthy king Croesus supplied it with many of its stone columns, and the present from all the parts of the world has been brought to the temple. In time the temple possessed valuable lands; it controlled the fisheries; its priests were the bankers of its enormous revenues. Because of its strength the people stored there their money for safe-keeping; and it became to the ancient world practically all that the Bank of England is to the modern world.

In 356 BC, on the very night when Alexander the Great was born, it was burned; and when he grew to manhood he offered to rebuild it at his own expense; if his name might be inscribed upon its portals. The priests of Ephesus were unwilling to permit, and they politely rejected his offer by saying that it was not fitting for one god to build a temple to another. The wealthy Ephesians themselves undertook its reconstruction, and 220 years passed before its final completion.

Not only was the temple of Diana a place of worship, and a treasure-house, but it was also a museum in which the best statuary and most beautiful paintings were preserved. Among the paintings was one by the famous Apelles, a native of Ephesus, representing Alexander the Great hurling a thunderbolt. It was also a sanctuary for the criminal, a kind of city of refuge, for none might be arrested for any crime whatever when within a bowshot of its walls. Not far from the temple a village in which the thieves and murderers and other criminals made their homes. Not only did the temple bring vast numbers of pilgrims to the city, as does the Kaaba at Mecca at the present time, but it employed hosts of people apart from the priests and priestesses; among them were the large number of artisans who manufactured images of the goddess Diana, or shrines to sell to the visiting stranger.

Such was Ephesus when Paul on his 2d missionary journey (Acts 18:19-21) first visited the city, and when, on his 3d journey (19:8-10; 20:31), he remained there for two years preaching in the synagogue (19:8,10), in the school of Tyrannus (19:9) and in private houses (20:20). Though Paul was probably not the first to bring Christianity to Ephesus, for Jews had long lived there (2:9; 6:9), he was the first to make progress against the worship of Diana. As the fame of his teachings was carried by the pilgrims to his possession. From Asia to Rome the Great took it; and at his death it fell to Lysimachus, who gave it the name of Arsinoc, from his second wife. Upon the death of Attalus II (Philadelphus), king of Pergamos, it was bequeathed to the Rom Empire; and in 190, when the Rom province of Asia was formed, it apotheosis of John. Finally in 262 AD, when the temple of Diana was again burned, its influence had so far departed that it was never again rebuilt. Diana was deserted by her Roman friends and was called a Christian city, and in 341 AD a council of the Christian church was held there. The city itself soon lost its importance and decreased in population. The sculptured stones of its great buildings, which were no longer in use and were falling to ruins, were carried away to Italy, and esp. to Constantinople for the great church of Saint Sophia. In 1308 the Turks took possession of the little that remained of the city, and deported or murdered its inhabitants. The Cayster river, overflowing its banks, gradually covered with its muddy deposit the spot where the temple of Diana had once stood, and at last its very site was forgotten.

The small village of Ayasaluk, 36 miles from Smyrna on the Aidin R.R., does not mark the site of the ancient city of Ephesus, yet it stands nearest to its ruins. The name Ayasaluk is the corruption of three Gr words meaning "the Holy Word of God." Passing beyond the village one comes to the ruins of the old aqueduct, the fallen city walls, the so-called church of St. John or the baths, the Turkish fort which is sometimes called Paul's prison, the huge theater which was the scene of the riot of Paul's time, but which now, with its marble torn away, presents but a hole in the side of the hill Proceeding, Mr. J. T. Wood, for the British Museum, obtained permission from the Turkish government to search for the site of the lost temple of Diana. During the eleven years of his excavations at Ephesus, $80,000 were spent, and few cities of antiquity have been excavated or buildings behind which the visitor can explore. The city wall of Lysimachus was found to be 36,000 ft. in length, inclosing an area of 1,027 acres. It was 10½ ft. thick, and strengthened by towers at intervals of 100 ft. The six gates which pierced the wall are now marked by mounds of rubbish. The sites and dimensions of the various public buildings, the streets, the harbor, and the foundations of many of the private houses were ascertained, and numerous inscriptions and sculptures and coins were discovered. Search however, did not reveal the site of the temple until January 1, 1870, after six years of faithful work. Almost by accident it was then found in the valley without the city walls, several feet below the present surface. It had been destroyed, and such articles as are preserved of Mr. Wood to reconstruct the entire temple plan. The temple was built upon a foundation which was reached by a flight of ten steps. The building itself was 425 ft. long and 220 ft. wide; each of its 127 pillars which supported the roof of its colonnade was 60 ft. high; like the temples of Greece, its interior was open to the sky. For a further description of the temple, see Mr. Wood's excellent book, Discoveries at Ephesus. E. J. Banks

EPHOD, c'fod (ἐφός [28 t], ἐφόδ [20 t], ἐφόδος; LXX ἐπόδοι, ἐποίμι, ἐποίδ, ἐπόδθ, ἐφόδ, ἐφόδος, ἐφόθ, ὀπόθ, ὀποθάδ, στᾶο ἐξαλλος, στᾶο ἐξαλλος, στᾶο ἐποῦνθ, στᾶο ὑπονθ); (1) A sacred vestment originally designed for the high priest (Ex 28 4 ff.; 39 2 ff.), and made of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, held together by two shoulderpieces and a skilfully woven band which served as a girdle for the ephod. On the shoulderpieces were two onyx stones engraved with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. It is not known whether the ephod extended below the hips or only to the waist. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing twelve precious stones in four rows. Underneath the ephod was the blue robe of the ephod extending to the hem of the priest. This robe of the ephod contained thus a garment comprising, in addition to the long robe proper, the ephod with its shoulderpieces and the breastplate of judgment.

(2) From the historical books we learn that ephods were worn by persons other than the high priest. Thus the boy Samuel was girded with a linen ephod while assisting the aged high priest (1 S 2 18); the priests at Nob, 85 in number, are described as men wearing a linen ephod (32 18); and David was girded with a linen ephod when he danced in the procession that brought the ark into Jerusalem (2 S 6 14). The ephod was considered appropriate for the king on this solemn and happy occasion; but it would be reading into the narrative more than it contains to infer that lay worippers were regularly clothed with the ephod; nor are we to suppose that priests other than the high priest were accustomed to wear ephods as rich and elaborate as that of the high priest. Abiathar, who was made high priest after the assassination of his father by Doeg, probably brought to the camp of David the ephod worn by the high priest in his ministrations at Nob (1 S 23 6), and through this ephod David sought in certain crises to learn Jehovah's will (32 9; 37 7). Some have argued that the ephod, which Abiathar brought in his hand, was an image rather than a priestly garment, but there seems no sufficient reason for regarding it as other than a vestment for the high priest. The ephod, however, which Abiathar presents, and the ephod which Solomon was girded with in a cloth may well have been a garment suspended from the wall or itself wrapped in a protecting cloth (31 9).

(3) The ephod mentioned in Jgs 17 5; 18 14 f.; Hos 3 4 is associated with teraphim and other idolatrous images. We may frankly confess that we do not know the shape, size and use of the ephod in these cases, though even here also the ephod may well have been a priestly garment. The same remark holds good of the ephod made by Gideon, and which became an object of idolatrous worship in Israel (Jgs 8 27). It has been argued that a vestment would not cost seventeen hundred shekels of gold. Possibly Gideon set up an apparatus of worshipping and worship containing a girdle which Michal began with the promise to make a graven image and a molten image, and afterward added an ephod and teraphim (17 1–5). Moreover, if gems and brilliants were put on Gideon's ephod, who can say that it did not cost seventeen hundred shekels?

EPHOD, ἐφόδ (ἐφόδ, ἐφοδᾶ): Father of Haniel, prince of Manasseh (Nu 24 23).

EPIRHATHA, c'f-th'a, ef-h'a (Epērhthēa, Ephyrathâ): Aram. word used by Christ (Mt 7 34), the 'Ethpa'im imper. of Aram, pethah (Heb pēthāh), translated, "Be thou!" opened"; cf. Is 35 5. The Aram. was the sole language of Pal. (II Pet 1, Hg 9) and its use shows that we have here the graphic report of an eyewitness, upon whom the dialectic form employed made a deep impression. This and the corresponding act of the touch with the moistened finger is the foundation of a corresponding ceremony in the Roman Catholic formula for baptism.

1. The Patriarch
   - He and his brother Manassesh were adopted by Jacob, and ranked as his own sons, each becoming the ancestor of a tribe in Israel. In blessing his grandchildren, despite their father’s protest, Jacob preferred the younger, foreshadowing the future eminence of his descendants (Gen 41 50 ff; 48 20 ff). In the Blessing of Jacob, however, the two are included under the name Joseph (v. 17).

   - At the first census on leaving Egypt, Ephraim’s men of war numbered 40,500; and at the second census they are given as 52,500 (Nu 1 33; 26 37). See, however, art. Numbers.

   - The head of the tribe along the Exodus was Elissahama, son of Ammihud (1 10). With the standard of the tribe of Ephraim on the W. of the tabernacle in the desert march were Manassesh and Benjamin (2 15 ff).

   - The Ephraimites among the spies was Hoshea (i.e. Joshua), the son of Nun (13 8). At the division of the land Ephraim was represented by prince Kemuel, son of Shiptan (34 24). The future power of this tribe is again foreshadowed in the Blessing of Moses (Dt 33 17). A notable member was Jehovah, whose faith and courage had distinguished him among the spies, succeeded to the chief place in Israel. It was natural that the scene of national assemblies, and the center of the nation’s worship, should be chosen within the land occupied by the children of Joseph, at Shechem and Shiloh respectively.

   - The leadership of Ephraim was further emphasized by the rule of Samuel. From the beginning of life in Pal they enjoyed a certain prestige, and were very active on the point of honor (Jgs 7 24; 8 1; 12 1 ff). Their acceptance of and loyalty to Saul, the first king chosen over Israel, may be explained by his belonging to a Rachel tribe, and by the close and tender relations existing between Joseph and Benjamin.

   - But they were never reconciled to the passing of the scepter to Judah in the person of David (2 S 2 8 ff). That Israel would have submitted to the sovereignty of Abasol, any more than to that of David, is not to be believed; but his revolt furnished an opportunity to deliver his tribes from the power of the southern tribe (15 13). Solomon’s unwisdom and the gross folly of Rehoboam in the management of the northern tribes fanned the smoldering discontent into a fierce flame. This may be the work of the Jebel Jeruham; and from the day of the disruption till the fall of the Northern Kingdom there was no dispute the supremacy of Ephraim, the names Ephraim and Israel being synonymous.

   - The most distinguished of Ephraim’s sons were Joshua, Samuel and Jeroboam I.

2. The Tribe
   - The central part of Western Pal fell to the children of Joseph; and, while the boundaries of the territory allotted to Ephraim and Manassesh respectively are given in Josh 16; the Canaanites in certain cities of both divisions were not driven out. It was probably thought more profitable to enslave them (16 10; 17 13). The boundaries of Ephraim cannot be followed with accuracy, but roughly, they were as follows: The southern boundary, agreeing with the northern border of Benjamin, started from Bethel, and passed down westward by nether Beth-horon and Gezer toward the sea S.; in 2 K 18 30 it tops at upper Beth-horon; it turned northward to the southern bank of the brook Kanah (אֲדַנַּה, Wady Kana), where it ran eastward (17 10) to Michmethath (the plain of Mukhneth); thence it went northward along the western edge of the plain to Shechem. It then bent eastward and southward past Taanath-shiloh (אֲרַנה, Janoah (Yanun)) to Ataroth and Naarah (unidentified) and the Jordan (16 7). From Ataroth, which probably corresponds to Ataroth-addar (see ver 5), possibly identical with Rabbath, the southern border passed up to Bethel. Along the eastern front of the land thus defined there is a steep descent into the Jordan valley. It is torn by many gorges, and is rocky and unfertile. The long slopes toward the westward, however, furnish much of the finest land in Pal. Well watered as it is, the valleys are beautiful in season with cornfields, vineyards, olives and other fruit trees. The uplands are accessible at many points from the maritime plain; but the great avenue of entrance to the country runs up Wady el-'Ash-Sha‘ir, or Bethul, whence, threading the pass between Gerizim and Ebal, it descends to the Jordan valley. In this favored region the people must have lived in the main a prosperous and happy life. How appropriate are the prophetic allusions to these conditions in the days of Ephraim’s moral decay (Isa 28 14; Jer 31 18; Hos 9 13; 10 11, etc!)

Ephraim, Forest of, e'phrā-im (ציַם, ephra'ym): the word ya'ar (Heb) probably agrees in meaning with the Arab. wâr, which indicates a rough country, abounding in rocks, stones and scrub, with occasional trees; not a “forest,” as we understand the term. Here Abasol was defeated and slain (2 S 18 6 ff, AV “wood of Ephraim”).

It must be sought, therefore, E. of the Jordan, in the neighborhood of Mahanaim; but no identification is yet possible.

Ephraim, Gate of. See Jerusalem.

Ephraim, Mount of, e'phrā-im (רייַת, ye'ar): Khirbet el-'Ash-Sha‘ir, or Bethul, the town of Abasol, was a district in Samaria mentioned in 1 Mac 11 34; Ant, XIII, iv, 9.

The town near the wilderness to which Jesus retired after the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11 54). This probably corresponds to Ephraim of Onom (s.v. ’Atar), 2 K 18 30, 8 miles N. of Jerus, and therefore to be sought somewhere in the neighborhood of Sinjil and el-Lubbân. Connected with this may have been the name Aphlaim, a district in Samaria mentioned in 1 Mac 11 34; Ant, XIII, iv, 9.

Ephraim, Woods of. See Forest of.

Ephraimites, e'fra-im-it (ציַם, ephra'ym), sing. e'phrā-im (רָחַל, ’râchāl): A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh 16 10, etc). See also Ephrāthite.
Ephrathite, e'frath-it, e'frath-it. See Ephrath.

Ephrath, e'frath (אֶפְרָת, 'ephrah; 'Ephrāhīm, 'Ephrāhīm; Gen 35:16; 48:7) EPHRATH-MATTH, e'ra-tha, e-ruth (אֶפְרָת-מַתְת, 'ephrah-məth, 'ephrah-məthōh, in the other references: Jos 15:59 [in added verb of LXX only]; Ruth 4:11; 1 Ch 2:19:24:50; Ps 132:6; Mic 5:2, AV "Ephrahath":) The name either of Bethlehem itself or of a district in which Bethlehem was situated. A man of this place was called an Ephrathite (Ruth 1:2; 1 S 17:12). It is held by many authorities that the Ephrath where Rachel was buried (Gen 35:16; 48:7) was a different place, the words "the same is Bethlehem" being a gloss. The reading in Ps 132:6 is doubtful; RV has "Ephrahim."

Ephron, e'frōn (אֶפְרוֹן, 'eϕrōn, "lawnlike"): The Hittite of whom Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah (Gen 23:8 ff; 25:9; 49:30). The transaction was conducted in true oriental fashion, with excessive courtesy, but the large sum of 400 shekels' weight of silver was in the end required (cf 33:19; 1 K 16:24). See also Money; Money, Current.

Ephron, e'frōn (אֶפְרוֹן, 'eϕrōn; 'Ephrān, Ephron): (1) 2 Ch 13:19: "And Abijah pursued after Jeroboam, and took cities from him, Beth-el with the towns thereof, and Jeshanah with the towns thereof, and Ephron with the towns thereof." Another reading is "Ephrahim" (RVm). This is thought by many to be identical with Ophrah (אֹפְרָה, 'opherāh, Josh 18:23) and perhaps with Ephraim (אֶפְרָי אָם, 'eφRAY-im, 2 S 13:23) which both have been localized at the lofty town of Ta'isibeh.

(2) A city E. of the Jordan between Carmion (Asheroth-karnaim) and Scythopolis (Beisaen): "Then Judas gathered together all the Israelites that were in the country... Now when they came unto Ephron (this was a great city in the way as they should go, very well fortified) they could not turn from it either on the right hand or on the left, but they must needs pass through the midst of it" (1 Macc 8:45:46 AV; Ant, XII, viii, 5; also 2 Macc 12:27). Buhl and Schuchard propose Kaph Wady el Ghofr, a ruined tower which completely commands the deep Wady el Ghofr, but the ruins appear to be scanty.

(3) Mt. Ephron: The border of Judah is described (Josh 15:9): "It went out to the cities of Mount Ephron." The position will depend on that of Nephoth and of Kiriath-jearim.

The Epicureans with the Stoics (q.v.) encountered Paul in Athens (Acts 17:18). They were the followers of Epicurus, a philosopher who was born in Samos in 341 BC, and who taught first in Asia Minor and afterward in Athens till his death in 270 BC. His system, unlike most philosophers, maintained its original form, with little development or dissent, to the close of its course. The sect of Paul's opponents of this school may therefore be gathered from the teaching of Epicurus.

The conditions for the rise of Epicureanism and Stoicism were political and social rather than intellectual. Speculative thought was

1. Social and Political Causes: the end reached its zenith in the great constructive ideals of Plato, and the encyclopaedic system of Aristotle. Criticism of these would necessarily drive men back upon themselves to probe deeper into the meaning of experience, as Kant did in later times. But the conditions were not propitious to pure speculation. The breaking up of the Gr city-states and the loss of Gr independence had filled men's minds with a sense of insecurity. The institutions, laws and customs of society, which had hitherto sheltered the individual, now gave way; and men demanded from philosophy a haven of rest for their homeless and weary souls. Philosophy, therefore, became a theory of conduct and an art of living.

Epicurus deprecated the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, whether as philosophy or science, and directed his inquiries to the two practical questions: What is the aim of life? and How to attain to it? Philosophy he defined as "a daily business of speech and thought to secure a happy life."

His ethical teaching is therefore the central and governing factor of Epicurus' philosophy. It belongs to the type generally described as

2. Egoistic as Epicolic Hedonism. The same general principles had been taught by Aris-tippus and his school, the Cyrenaics, a century earlier, and they were again revived in the 17th cent. in England by Thomas Hobbes.

The aim and end of life for every man is his own happiness, and happiness is primarily defined as pleasure. "Wherefore we call pleasure the Alpha and Omega of a blessed life. Pleasure is our first and kindred god. It is the starting-point of every choice and of every aversion, and to it we come back, insamuch as we make feeling the rule by which to judge every good thing" (Epicurus, Letter to Menaeceus). So far Epicurus might seem to be simply repeating the view of the Cyrenaics, but there are important differences. Aristippus held the pleasure of the moment to be the end of action; but Epicurus taught that life should be so lived as to secure the greatest amount of pleasure during its whole course. And in this larger outlook, the pleasures of the mind came to occupy a larger place than the pleasures of the body. For happiness consists not so much in the satisfaction of desires, as in the suppression of wants, and in arriving at a state of independence of all circumstances, which secures a peace of mind that the privations and changes of life cannot disturb. Man's desires are of various kinds: "Some are natural, some are groundless; of the natural, some are necessary as well as natural, and some are natural only. And of the necessary desires, some are necessary if we are to be happy, some if the body is to be rid of uneasiness, some if we are even to live." Man's aim should be to suppress all desires that are unnecessary, and esp., such as are artificially produced. Learning, culture, civilization and the distractions of social and political life are proscribed, much as they were in the opposite school of the Cynics, because they produce many desires difficult to satisfy, and do disturb the peace of the mind. The Epicurean is therefore compared to that of Rousseau and even of Buddha. Like the former, Epicurus enjoins the withdrawal of life from the complexities and perplexities of civilization, to the bare necessities of Nature, but he stops short of the doctrine of Nirvana, for life and the desire to live he regards as good things. He even rises above the superficial resemblance to that of his opponents, the Stoics. The end of nature ataraxia, pleasure begets become. It is supposed, He seeks the peace of mind in his affirmation of the mastery of mind over adverse circumstances. "Though he is being tortured on the rack, the wise man is still happy.

3. Back to Nature

Epicurus' definition of the end of life and of the way to it bears a superficial resemblance to that of his opponents, the Stoics. The end

4. Ataraxia sought by both is ataraxia, 'imper- turbability,' a peace of mind that transcends all circumstances, and the way to it is the life according to Nature. But Nature for Epicurus is purely physical and material, and the utmost happiness attainable is the complete absence of pain.

He justly protests against the representation of his teaching as gross and immoral. "When we say, then, that pleasure is the end and

5. Pleasure aim, we do not mean the pleasures of Is the Ab- sence of Pain seeking them through ignorance, prejudice or willful misrepresentation. By pleasure we mean the absence of pain in the body and trouble in the soul" (Letter to Menoeceus). His own life was marked by a simplicity verging on asceticism, and by kindly consideration for his friends. But the theory was capable of serving the purposes of worse men to justify license and selfishness.

Justice and ordinary morality were recognized in the system as issuing from an original social com- pact, such as Hobbes did, so Rousseau.

6. Social Contract

and resting upon the self-interest and happiness of individuals who entered into the compact the better to gain those ends. Ordinary morality has therefore no stronger sanction than the individual's desire to secure his own happiness. Against public violations of the moral code, the sanction finds its agent in the social order and the penalties it inflicts; but the only deterrent from secret immorality is the fear of being found out, and the necessarily dis- tinct character of such fear itself. Friendship, the supreme virtue of Epicureanism, is based upon the same calculating selfishness, and is to be cultivated for the happiness it bestows to its owners. The fundamental defect of the system is its extreme individualism, which denies any value of their own to the social virtues, and in the negation of the larger activities of life.

Epicurus had no interest in knowledge for its own sake, whether of the external world, or of any ultimate or supreme reality. But he found men's minds full of ideas about the world, immortality and the gods, which disputed their peace and filled them with vain desires and fears. It was therefore necessary for the practical mold of his philosophy to find a theory of the things outside of man that would give him tranquility and serenity of mind.

This is done in his atomic theory of the world. The original constituents of the universe, of which no account could be given, were atoms, the void, and motion. By a fixed law or fate, the atoms moved through the void, so as to form the world as we know it. The same uniformity of all that exists. Epicurus modified this system so far as to admit an initial freedom to the atoms, which enabled them to follow the laws of their own nature. They, as they fell like rain through space, and so to injure, combine and set up rotatory motions in which the worlds, which that is in them, came into being.

He did not follow the idea of freedom in our sense, and man beyond the exigencies of his theory, and the thoroughly materialistic nature of his universe precluded him from deducing a moral realm. By this theory he gets rid of the causes of fear and anxiety that disturb the human mind. Teleology, providence, a moral order of the universe, the artificer-of-fate in the giving of fate, the possibility, bell, reward and punishment after death, are all excluded from the universe where atoms and space do everything. The soul, like the body, is made of atoms, but of a smaller or finer texture. In death, the one like the other desises and goes into nothing.

From the same premises one would expect the com- plete denial of any Divine beings. But it is a curiosity to observe that a system that abstracts the theory of knowledge should require the affirmation of the nature of the gods, and of the way in which Nature provided for them. "For the theory of the gods assumes necessarily in itself the fact of necessity enjoy immortality with supreme re- pose, far removed and withdrawn from our concerns; since it exempt from every kind of danger, strong in its own resources, not wanting aught of us, it is obviously enjoyed by favorable gods (Lucretius). All religion is banned, though the gods are retained. Epicureanism is the first system that shows the common sense in the theory of gods. He was impressed by the fact that "a steadfast unanimity continued to prevail among all men without exception" that gods exist. "A consciousness of god- ness does not allow him to deny the exist- ence of God altogether. Hence his attempt to explain the gods as not to infringe with his general theory" (Wallace, Epicureanism, 209).

During his lifetime, Epicurus attracted a large following to his creed, and it continued to flourish far down into the Christian era. It was presented to the Rom world by the poet Lucretius in his poem De natura rerum, which is still the chief source for the knowledge of it. One OT writer, the author of Eccle, may have been influenced by its spirit, though he did not adopt all its ideas.

The personal charm and engaging character of Epicurus himself drew men to him, and elevated him into the kind of prophet that people would personify the teaching of the school, of success as was the custom of all schools of philosophy. The system was clear- cut and easy to understand, yet has left men, for the most part, offered a plausible theory of life such as could not follow the profounder and more difficult speculations of other schools. Its moral teaching found a ready response in all that was worldly, commonplace and self-seeking in men, that had lost their high ideals and great enthusiasms. Above all it deliv- ered men from the terrors of a dark superstition that had taken the place of religion. It is a remark- able revelation of the inadequacy of Gr religion that Euticus should have relegated the gods of the visible world, without any sense of loss, but only the relief of a great deliverance.

It was inevitable that the teaching of Paul should have brought this school up against him. He came to Athens teaching a God who had been previously declared to be evil and died to accomplish the utmost self- sacrifice, who had risen from the dead and returned to live among men to guide and fashion their lives, and who had promised a judgment according to their deeds reward or punish them in a future world. To the Epicurean this was the revival of all the ancient and hated superstitions. It was not only but impiously; for Epicurus had taught that "not the man who denies the gods worshipped by the multitude, but he who affirms of the gods that they do not multitude believe about them, is truly impious."

EPHIPH, ep'ih-fi (Epaphi, Epiphis): Name of a man mentioned in connection with Pachon in 3 Mac. 6 38. See Times.

A written communication; a term inclusive of all forms of written correspondence, personal and official, in vogue from an early antiquity. As applied to the twenty-one letters, which constitute well-nigh one-half of the NT, the word "epistle" has come to have chiefly a technical and exclusive meaning. It refers, in common usage, to the communications addressed by five (possibly six) NT writers to individual or collective churches, or to single persons or groups of Christian disciples. Thirteen of these letters were written by St. Paul; three by St. John; two by St. Peter; one each by St. James and St. Jude; one—the epistle to the Hebrews—by an unknown writer.

As a whole the Epistles are classified as Pauline, and Catholic, i.e. general; the Pauline being divided into two classes: those written to churches and to individuals, the latter being known as Pastoral (1 and 2 Tim., Titus, Philem); some also including Philo's see Lange on Romana, Am. ed. 16.

The fact that the NT is so largely composed of letters distinguishes it, most uniquely, from all the other sacred writings of the world. The Scriptures of other oriental creeds are known as the Torah, the Tripitaka, the Koran, the writings of Confucius—lack the direct and personal address altogether. The Epistles of the NT are specifically the product of a new spiritual life and era. They deal, not with truth in the abstract, but in the concrete. They have to do with the soul's inner experiences and processes. They are the burning and heart-throbbing messages of the apostles and their confrères to the fellow-Christians of their own day. The chosen disciples who witnessed the events following the resurrection of Jesus and received the power (Acts 1 8) bestowed by the Holy Spirit on, and subsequent to, the Day of Pentecost, were spiritually a new order of men. The only approach to them in the spiritual history of mankind is the ancient Hebrew prophets. Consequently the Epistles, penned by men who had experienced a great redemption and the marvelous intellectual emancipation and quickening that came with it, were an altogether new type of literature. Their object is personal. They relate the vital truths of the resurrection era and the fundamental principles of the new teaching, to the individual and collective life of all believers. This specific aim accounts for the form in which the apostolic letters were written. The logic of this practical aim appears conspicuously in the orderly Epistles of St. Paul who, after the opening salutation in each letter, lays down in a series his thought and the reasons for teaching, in order and by degrees, the doctrinal basis on which he builds the practical duties of daily Christian life. Following these, as each case may require, are the personal messages and affectionate greetings and directions, suited to this familiar form of address.

The Epistles consequently have a charm, a directness, a vitality and power unknown to the other sacred writings of the world. Nowhere are they equaled or surpassed except in the personal instructions that fell from the lips of Jesus. Devoted exclusively to experimental and practical religion they have, with the teachings of Christ, become the text-book of the spiritual life for the Christian church in all subsequent time. For this reason "they are of more real value to the church than all the systems of theology, from Origen to Schleiermacher" (Schaff on St. Paul's Epistles, Hist of Christian Church, 741). No writings in history so unfold the nature and processes of the redemptive experience. In St. Paul and St. John, esp., the pastoral instinct is ever supreme. Their letters are too human, too personal, too practical to be formal documents. They throb with passion for truth and love for souls. Their directness and affectionate intensity convert their authors into prophets of truth, preachers of grace, lovers of men and missionaries of the cross. Hence the value as spiritual biographies of the writers is immeasurable. As letters they are the most spontaneous and the freest form of writing, the NT Epistles are the very life-blood of Christianity. They present theology, doctrine, truth, appeal, in terms of life, and pulsate with a vitality that will be fresh and re-creative till the end of time. (For detailed study of their chronology, contents and distinguishing characteristics, see arts. on the separate epistles.)

While the NT Epistles, in style and quality, are distinct from and superior to all other lit. of this class, they nevertheless belong to a form of personal and written address in common to all ages. The earliest known writings were epistolary, unless we except some of the proverbs and parables of oriental literature, and inscriptions of the ancient Bab and Assyrian kings. Some of these royal inscriptions carry the art of writing back to 3800 BC, possibly to a period still earlier (see O. Renan, Kent's Historical Series, 42-43, secs. 40-41), and we may therefore light to "an immense mass of letters from officials to the court—correspondence between royal personages or between minor officials," as early as the reign of Khammurabi of Babylon, about 2275 BC (ib. 38). The civilized world was astonished at the extent of this international correspondence as revealed in the Am Tab (1450 BC), discovered in Egypt in 1887, among the ruins of the palace of Amenophis IV. This mass of political correspondence is thus approximately synchronous with the Hebrew exodus and the invasion of Canaan under Joshua.

As might be expected, then, the OT abounds with evidences of extensive epistolary correspondence in and between the oriental nations.

4. Letters. That a postal service was in existence in the OT is evident from the Hebrew term דִּבָּרָא (tábr), rǎ'ām, signifying "runners," and used of the mounted couriers of the Persians who carried the royal edicts to the provincial governors. The one extraordinary case in which this courier service in the OT occurs is Est 3 13-15: 8 10.14 where King Ahasuerus, in the days of Queen Esther, twice sends royal letters to the Jews and straps of his entire realm from India to Ethiopia, on the swiftest horses. According to Herodotus, these were usually stationed, for the sake of the greatest safety, in the strongholds of the allies. Sennacherib's letters to Ephraim and Manasseh were sent in the same way (2 Ch 30 16.10). Other instances of epistolary messages or communications in the OT are David's letter to Joab concerning Uriah and sent by him (2 S 11 14.15); Jezebel's, to the elders and nobles of Jezreel, sent in Ahab's name, regarding Naboth (1 K 21 8.9); the letter of Ben-hadad, king of Syria, to Jehoram, king of Israel, by the hand of Naaman (2 K 5 5–7); Jehu's letters to the rulers of Jezreel, in Samaria (2 K 10 12.6.7); Sennacherib's letter to Hezekiah, king of Judah (2 K 18 14; Isa 37 14; 2 Ch 32 17), and also that of Merodach-baladan, accompanied with a gift (2 K 20 12; Isa 39 1). Approaching the NT epistle in purpose and spirit is the letter of earnest and loving counsel sent by Jeremiah to the exiles in Babylon. It is both apostolic and pastoral in its prophetic fervor, and is recorded in full (Jer 29 1.4–32) with its reference to the bitterly hostile and jealous letter of Shemiah, the false prophet, in reply.

As for the way the New Testament was framed, the Bab captivity must have been a great stimulus to letter-writing on the part of the separated Hebrews, and between the far East and Pal. Evidence of this appears in the histories of Ezra and Nehemiah, e.g. the correspondence, based largely on the struggle between the enemies of the Jews at Jerusalem and Artaxerxes, king of Persia, written in the Syrian language (Ezr 4 7–23); also the letter of Tattenai (AV “Tanattai”) the governor to King Darius (Ezr 5 6–17); that of Hanani (2 K 12; 2 Chr 13 6) to Asaph, keeper of the royal forest (Neh 2 8); finally the interchange of letters between the nobles of Judah and Tobiah; and those of the latter to Nehemiah (Neh 6 17.19; so Sanballat ver 5).

The OT Apoc contains choice specimens of personal and official letters, approaching in literary form the epistles of the NT. In each case they begin, like the latter, in true epistolary form with a salutation; the corresponding phrase tends for example, between the enemies of the Jews at Jerusalem and Artaxerxes, king of Persia, written in the Syrian language (Ezr 4 7–23); also the letter of Tattenai (AV “Tanattai”) the governor to King Darius (Ezr 5 6–17); that of Hanani (2 K 12; 2 Chr 13 6) to Asaph, keeper of the royal forest (Neh 2 8); finally the interchange of letters between the nobles of Judah and Tobiah; and those of the latter to Nehemiah (Neh 6 17.19; so Sanballat ver 5).

5. Letters in the Apocrypha

(a) “greeting” or “sendeth greeting” (1 Mace 11 30.32; 12 6.20; 15 2.16), and in two instances close with the customary “Fare ye well” or “Farewell!” (2 Mace 11 27–33, 34–38; cf 2 Cor 13 11), so universally characteristic of letter-writing in the Hellenistic era.

The most magnificent and perfect example of official correspondence in the NT is Claudius Lysias’ letter to Felix regarding St. Paul (Acts 23 25–30). Equally complex in form is the letter, sent, evidently in duplicity, by the apostles and elders to their gentile brethren in the provinces of Asia (Acts 15 23–29). In these two letters we have the first, and with Jas 1 1, the only, instance of the Gr form of salutation in the NT (xαλαλαγε, χαιρετησαι). The latter is by many scholars regarded as probably the oldest letter in epistolary form in the NT, being in purport and substance a Pastoral Letter issued by the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem to the churches of Antioch, Syria and Cilicia. It contained instructions as to the basis of Christian fellowship, similar to those of the great apostle to the churches under his care.

The letters of the high priest at Jerusalem commending Saul of Tarsus to the synagogues of Damascus are another example, written in a different introduction (Acts 9 2; 20 25; cf 28 21; also 18 27). As a Christian apostle St. Paul refers to this common use of “epistles of commendation” (2 Cor 3 1; 1 Cor 16 3) and himself made happy use of the same (Rom 16 15); he also mentions receiving letters, in turn, from the churches (1 Cor 7 1).

Worthy of classification as veritable epistles are the letters, under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit, to the seven churches of Asia (Rev 2 1–3; 3 1–22). In fact every letter in the NT is a letter in the epistolary form, beginning with the benedictory salutation of personal and apostolic address, and closing with the benediction common to the Pauline epistles. This again distinguishes the NT lit. in spirit and form from all other sacred writings, being almost exclusively direct and personal, whether in vocal or written address. In this respect the gospels, histories and epistles are alike the product and exponent of a new spiritual era in the life of mankind.

This survey of epistolary writing in the far East, and esp. in the OT and NT periods, is not intended to obscure the distinction between the letter and the epistle. A clear line of demarcation separates them, owing not merely to differences in form and substance, but to the exalted spiritual mission and character of the apostolic letters. The characterization of a letter as more distinctly personal, confidential and spontaneous, and the epistle as more general in aim and more authoritative in spirit, is a distinction that accounts only in part for the classification. Even when addressed to churches Paul's epistles were as spontaneous and intimately and affectionately personal as the ordinary correspondence. While in most instances it is possible to detect the hand of the epistolary writers of the NT ever anticipated such extensive and permanent use of their letters as is made possible in the modern world of printing. The epistles of the NT are lifted into a distinct category by the divine source and authority, and have given the word epistle a meaning and quality that will forever distinguish it from letter. In this distinction appears that Divine element usually defined as inspiration: a vitality and spiritual endowment which keeps the writings of the apostles permanently "living and powerful," where those of their successors pass into disuse and obscurity.

Such was the influence of the NT Epistles on the lit. of early Christianity that the patristic and pseudoepigraphic writings of the next century assumed chiefly the epistolary form. In letters to churches and individuals the apostolic Fathers, as far as possible, reproduced their spirit, quality and style. See Epistle.

Pseudo-epistles extensively appeared after the patristic era, many of them written and circulated in the name of the apostles and apoc-tolitic Fathers. See Apocryphal Epistles.

9. Apocryphal Epistles—This early tendency to hide ambitious or possibly heretical writings under apostolic authority and Scriptural guise may have accounted for the anathema pronounced by St. John against all who should attempt to substitute another for the inspired (Rev 22). In fact, the entire Book of Rev is marked up as “epistle from Laodicea,” now lost, doubtless written by St. Paul himself to the church at Laodicea, and to be returned by it in exchange for his epistle to the church at Colosee.

EQUAL, ἑκκλωτή (isos, iousa): In Ezek (18 25. 29; 33 17 20), "The way of the Lord is not equal," translates Heb גдовון for לָטֹכֶה, “to weigh,” and means "is not adjusted to any fixed standard," "arbitrary," “fitful," and, therefore, "not equitable, fair, or impartial" (LXX ‘is not set straight’). Cf same Heb word in 1 S 2 3, where the Lord is said to have "called God his own Father" (Gk ἐκκλωσεν πατέρα, i.e. His Father in a peculiar and exclusive sense; cf ἢδον haiso of Rom 8 32, applying the same adj. to the Son in His relation to the Father, i.e. His Son in a sense in which no one else can claim the title). They correctly interpreted the language of Jesus as declaring that He was the Son of God in a way that put Him on an equality with God. The charge against Him is not that He said that He was "like" (himation), but that He was "equal" (isos), i.e. of the same rank and authority.

H. E. Jacobs

EQUALITY, ἑκκλωτήτι (tegrnη, isodetw): In 2 Cor 8 14, lit. "out of equality," i.e. "in equal proportion" or "that there may be equality." In Phil 2 6, it occurs in a paraphrase of Gr τῷ εἰκονίζεται ἵσα θεό, "the being on an equality with God." In this much-discussed passage, ἵσα, according to a not unusual Attic idiom, is construed adverbially (see Meyer on passage), meaning, therefore, not 'the being equal' (AV), which would require ἵσαν, but "the having equal prerogatives and privileges." The personal equality is one thing; the equality of attributes is another, and it is the latter which is here expressed (Lightfoot). The "being on an equality with God," and the "having equal prerogatives" are both deductions from the possession of the "form of God." The thought is that if He who had "the form of God" had under all circumstances exercised His Divine attributes, He would have been employing only what belonged to Him, and would in no way have derogated from what belongs only to God. We regard this as referring to the incarnate Son in His historical manifestation.

EQUITY, ekwi'ti: Is synonymous with "uprightness," which is found in Prov 17 26; Isa 59 14; Mal 2 6 in place of AV "equity." Ecol 2 21 has "skifulness" and RVm "success" for AV "equity." The context favors this tr of ἕκατον, kishron, which is derived from κῆςη, kēshēr, "to succeed." Equity is the spirit of the law behind the letter; justice is the execution of the spirit of equity; honesty is the general everyday use of justice or fairness, equity being the interior or abstract ideal. The Court of Equity overrides the Court of Common Law, deciding not upon terms, but the spirit of the deed.

ER, ʿār (ʾr, ʿer, "watcher"); ʾḤp, ʾĒr: (1) The eldest son of Judah, the son of Jacob, by Shua the Canaanite. Judah took for him a wife named Tamar. It is recorded that Er "was wicked in the sight of Jeh; and Jeh slew him" (Gen 38 3 6 7; 45 12). (2) "Er the father of Lecab" is mentioned among "the sons of Shelah the son of Judah" (1 Ch 4 21). (3) An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy in the 7th generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 28).

ERA, ἐτά: We find no definite era in use in OT times, and such usage does not appear until we reach the period of the Maccabees. There are some references to important events that might have served as eras had they been generally accepted and constantly employed. Such was the Exodius; and this is referred to as the starting-point in fixing the date of the building of Solomon's temple (1 K 6 1), and also for the date of Aaron's death (Nu 33 38). An earthquake is referred to by Amos (1 1) as a well-known event by which to date the beginning of his prophetic career; and Ezekiel in two passages refers to the captivity of Judah as a date for marking certain events in his life. Of these the Exodus would have been the most appropriate event to use as an era, since it marked the birth of the Hebrew nation; but the universal custom of antiquity was to date from the regnal years of the kings, as we see in the history of Egypt and Babylonia and Assyria; this custom was followed by the Hasmoneans as well as the Romans, and was continued down to the Captivity. After the return of the Jews they naturally adopted the regnal years of the Pers kings, under whose rule they were, until the overthrow of the kingdom by Alexander. After this event, the era most widely in use was the Seleucid king, which began in 312 BC, and must have been familiar to the Jews, and we have evidence that they made use of it. When Simon the Maccabees secured the independence of the Jews from the Seleucid king, Demetrius II, in 141 140, they began to date their instruments and contracts from this event as is stated in 1 Maco 13 41 42; and we find that the year of their independence is fixed by reference to the Seleucid era, the first year of Simon being the 170th of that era (see Jos, Ant, XIII, vi, 7). After this they used the era of Simon, dating by his regnal years; but whether they used this as a permanent era during the Absonian Dynasty or dated simply from one of their key events we do not at present know. There is no doubt that the Seleucid era continued to be used throughout the country for several centuries after the downfall of the Seleucid kingdom, as we have abundant evidence from inscriptions. When the Romans took possession of Syria and Pal, their era was of course employed by Rom officials, but this did not prevail among the people. The dynasty of the Herods sometimes employed their own regnal years and sometimes those of the emperors, as appears from their coins. The Jews must have been familiar with the era employed by some of the Phoen towns, such as Tyre and Sidon. Tyre had a local era which began in 126 BC, and Sidon one beginning in 112 BC; and most of the towns on the coast used the era of Alexander, dating from the battle of Issus, until the establishment of the Seleucid era. The Jews would be familiar with these from their commercial connections with the coast towns, but we do not know that they used them. They did not adopt the era of the Creation until after the time of Christ. It was fixed at 4,000 years before the destruction of the later temple, or 3760 BC.

ERAN, ʿarān (ʾr, ʿrān, "watcher," "watchful"); ʾĒrān, ʾĒrān; The son of Eprhim's oldest son Shuthelah (Nu 26 36). Enarites, the descendants of Eran (ib).
ERASTUS, ě-ras’tus ("Erastos, Eratos, "beloved"): The name occurs three times, each time denoting a companion of Paul.

1. Erastus was sent with Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia while Paul remained in Asia for a while. They are designated "two of them that ministered unto him" (Acts 19:22).

2. "Erastus the treasurer of the city" sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom 16:23). He was apparently an important person in the Corinthian community, and with Gaius probably represented that church in these fraternal relations with the Roman community.

3. Erastus is one who, in 2 Tim 4:20, "remained at Corinth."

We have no means of discovering whether one or more than one person is meant in these references. A. C. Headlam ("HDB, s.v.") thinks it improbable that one who held an office implying residence in one locality should have been one of Paul's companions in travel. On the other hand Paul may be designating Erastus (Rom 16:23) by an office he once held, but which he gave up to engage in mission work.

ERECHE, ě-rēk, ěrēk (ΤΣ, ερῆχ; Ὑπέρ, ὘ρή): The second of the cities founded by Nimrod, the other being Babel. (Gen 10:10). The derivation of the name is well known, Erēc being the Sem-Bab Uruk, from the Sumerian Uruq, a word meaning "seat," probably in the sense of "presidential seat." The character with which it is written enters into the composition of the Babylonian names of Larsa and Ur of the Chaldees.

Its identification with Urka, on the left bank of the Euphrates, half-way between Hillah (Babylon) and Korna, is beyond a doubt. It is 3. Position thought that the Euphrates must have flowed nearer to the city in ancient times, as the Gilgamesh legend relates that that hero and his companion Enkidu washed their hands in the stream after having killed the divine bull sent by the goddess Ishtar to destroy them. The shape of the ruin is irregular, the course of the walls of the N.E. having been seemingly determined by that of the Nile canal (Shatt-en-Nil), which flowed on that side. The extreme length of the site from N. to S. is over 3,000 yds., and its width about 2,800 yds. This space is very full of remains of buildings; and the foundations of the walls, with their various gateways, walls and defences, are traceable even now.

Two great deities, Ishtar and Nanna, were worshipped in this city, the temple of the former being E-anna, "the house of heaven!" (or of Anu, in which case it is probable that the god of the heavens, Anu, was also a patron of one of the patrons of the city). Their shrine dedicated to Ishtar is apparently on Adu-driqqa or red-mats, and so called on account of the layers of matting at intervals of 4 or 5 ft. This is the great temple-tower (ziqurtal) of the place, called E-gipara-imenina, "the house of 7 enclosures." The remains are situated in a large courtyard measuring 350 ft. by 270 ft. As in the case of other Bab enclosures, the corners are directed toward the cardinal points, and its height is about 100 ft, above the desert-plain.

As Erech is mentioned with Babylon, Niffer (Calneh) and Eridu, as one of the cities created by Merodach (Nimrod), it is clear that it was clasped with the other ancient cities in Babylonia. It was the city of Gilgames, the half-mythical king of the earliest period, who seems to have restored the walls and temples. Its earliest known ruler of historical times was Ereshkigal, about 4200 BC. The celebrated shrine of Istār on E-gipara. Another great ruler of the early period was Sin-gash, king of Erech, who was a patron of E-anna, and when he restored this shrine, he endowed it with grain, wool, oil and 1 shekel of gold. There seems also to have been a shrine to Nergal, god of war, which was restored by King Sîn-gamal. About 2280 BC Kudur-Nan-hundu, the Elamite king, plundered the city, and carried off the statue of the goddess Nanna, which was only restored to its place by Aššur-bani-āššu, the Assyrian king, about 635 BC. Samsu-iluna seems to have surpassed his father Ḥammurabi (Amraphel) in the restoration of the city, temples, and other buildings; and we must not forget Erech were Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus.

Many tablets have been found on the site, and give promise of interesting discoveries still to come.

5. Literature. Erech was the capital of the hero-king Gilgames, whose name became an expression of the wide world, spoke with the Bar of the city, blood flowed like water in Ebar, the house of Istār's oracle, and the enemy heaped up fire in all the goddess' lands as one heaps up embers.

The consideration in which the city was held is made plain by the geographical lists, from which it would seem that it had no less than 11 names, among them being Ibab or Iliaq, Tia-anna, "the heavenly grove"; other names were Ub-imina, "the 7 regions"; Uzugaro-ismina, "the 7 enclosures"; and Uruk-sarpat, "Erech of the folds" (the name which it always bears in the Gilgamesh legend), given to it either on account of its being a center where pastoral tribes gathered, or because of the flocks kept for sacrifice to its deities.

Besides the inscriptions of the kings already mentioned, tablets of the reigns of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadrezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus, Darius and some of the Seleucids have also been found on the site. In the ruins of the town and the country around, Late Date numerous glazed earthenware (slippered or unfired) coffin and other vessels, used for and in connection with the burial of the dead, occur. These are mostly of the Parthian period, but they imply that the place was regarded as a necropolis, possibly owing to the sanctity attached to the site.

ERI, ě’rī, Erites, ěrīts (יוֹרֵי, ’ehri, "watcher"): The fifth of the seven sons of Gad (Gen 46:16; Nu 26:10). Patronymic, Erites (ib.), a clan of Gad.

ERI-AKU, er-i-a-kū’, ěr-i-kū’: This is the probable Sumerian reading of the well-known Bab-
1. The Name and Titles of Eri-Aku, the whole term "servant of the Moon-god" (Sem wardu or ardú) and the group standing for the Moon-god Sin (written En-zu=Zu-en), otherwise Aku, the whole family of his descendants and their territorially defined possessions, are generally considered to be of a Solomonic etymology (Ellasses—cf that art.), generally identified with the Arrichi (q.v.) of Gen 14:9. Several Assyriologists read the name with the Sem Bab pronunciation of Warad-Sin; and, if this be correct, there would be a certain amount of doubt as to the generally received identification; though this, on the other hand, might simply prove that the ancient Hebrews obtained their transcription from a Sumerian source.

In addition to a number of contract-tablets, the following inscriptions mentioning Eri-Aku or Warad-Sin are known:

2. Inscriptions Mentioning Eri-Aku or Warad-Sin:

(1) A dedication, by Kudur-mabuk, "father of Martu" (Amarra, the land of the Amorites), son of Simiti-Sihhak, Eri-Aku of some sacred object to the Moon-god Nannar, for his own life and that of Eri-Aku, his son, the king of Larsa.

(2) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to Istar of Hallabu, for his own life and that of his father and begetter Kudur-mabuk; the text records the restoration of Istar's sanctuary.

(3) A dedication, by Eri-Aku, to the god Nannar, for the preservation of his own life and that of his father, Kudur-mabuk. The restoration of several temples is referred to.

(4) An inscription of Eri-Aku, "the powerful man," the nourisher of Ur [of the Chaldees], the king of Larsa, the king of Sumer and Akkad; son of Kudur-mabuk, the father of Emutbala. The text records that he raised the wall of Ur, called "Nannar is the consolidator of the foundations of the land," high like a mountain.

(5) A dedication by Eri-Aku to Nin-insina (titles as above). It records the building of the temple Esu-nam-talulu, for his own life, and the life of Kudur-mabuk, the father of his begetter.

3. The Nationality of Eri-Aku, who would seem, from the motives of family policy, to have given his sons Sumerian and Sem Bab names; and it is noteworthy that he did not retain the rule of Larsa for himself, but delegated it to his offspring, keeping for himself the dominion of Emutbala and, as his own inscription shows, the land of the Amorites. With regard to these it may be noted, that the expression adda, "father," probably means simply "administrator." Eri-Aku seems to have died while his father was still alive, and was succeeded by Rim Sin, who, as Francois Thureau-Dangin points out, was the eldest son of Eri-Aku, who, as the king of Larsa, inherited the reign of Rim Sin by a dedication; but there seems to be no inscription in which Rim Sin makes a dedication for the life of his father, implying that Kudur-mabuk died soon after his second son came to the throne. And here the question of the identification of Eri-Aku with Elamite.-Eri-Aku, Elamite claim consideration. This name occurs on certain tablets of late date from Babylonia, and is coupled with a name which may be read Kudur-lagalgunu (for Kudur-lagalgunu, i.e. Chedorlaomer), and Tudduḫu, the sword. These inscriptions are very mutilated, but from the smaller one it would seem that Eri-Aku had a son named Durmahalāni, who ravaged some district, and stolen the sword. But it is more likely that the son of Larsa than that of Elam was the begetter of the sword. There is a possibility that the sword is known from the earlier and later periods.

5. Is Eri-Aku to Be Identified with an old man and child were slain with the sword. If the events recorded belong to this period, they may have taken place after the death of Eri-Aku (-Eku, -Ekus), but before that of Kudur-lagalgunu. It is to be noted that, in accordance with Elamite usage, the son did not pass to the eldest son after a king's death, but to the king's eldest brother. In Elam this led to endless conflicts, and the same probably took place in Larsa until incorporated with the states of Babylonia.

The fact that the history of Kudur-lagalgunu forms the subject of a poetic legend suggests that the texts mentioning these kings may have belonged to a kind of historical romance, of which Chedorlaomer (Amarra), Eri-Aku, and Tuduḫu are the heroes—and, in truth, this is implied by their style. That they are utterly apocryphal, however, remains to be proved.

ERR, ër, ERROR, er’ér;
To err is in the OT the tr of ʿázū, ʿshāḥād, and ʿṭāḥ, both of which mean to wander, to go astray. We have ʿshāḥād in Gen 41:33, "I have played the fool, and have erred!"; Job 19:4, "Mine error remaineth with myself," i.e. "is my own concern," or, perhaps, "only injures myself!"; Ps 119:18; Isa 35:7 AV (thrice); ʿṭāḥ, Ps 56:10; Prov 14:22; Isa 35:8. It means also "to cause to err" (Isa 3:12; 30:28, "a bridle that causeth to err"); Jer 22:13:32; "Their lies [i.e. the unreal deities, creatures of their own imagination] have caused them to err," Am 2:4.

In the NT the word is generally ʾπερράκω, πλανο-δαι, "to wander" (Mt 12:24,7; He 3:10; Jas 5:19)osaicēs, "to miss the mark," to swerve," occurs twice (1 Tim 6:21; 2 Tim 2:18).

Error in the OT represents various words: ʿshāḥād, "to err," "to wander," "to go astray," "oversight" (Eccl 5:6; cf Prov 20:25 and see Inquiry); ʿmāʾshāḥād, with the same meaning, "wandering" (Job 19:4; cf Ps 19:12); ʿšāl, "rashness," "mistake" (2 S 6:7, "God smote him there for his error," RV "rashness"); ʿšālāḥ, "a mistake" (Dn 6:4); ʿṭāḥ, "injury" (Isa 32:6).

In the NT we have ʾπλάνω, wandering (Rom 1:27; Jas 5:20; 1 Jn 4:6; Jude ver 11, "the error of Balaam"); ἀγνοεῖν, "to be ignorant" (He 9:7, m or Gr "ignorance", Par ʿšālāḥ, "to wander" (Prov 20:1) RV has "ereth," m "or rekeah," for "them that are out of the way" (He 5:2), "the ignorant and erring"; for "deceit" (1 Thess 2:3), "error."); "the Eng. word "error" has the same original meaning as the Heb and Gr main words, being derived from error, "to wander." "To err is human," but there are errors of the heart as well as the head. The familiar phrase just quoted seems to have its equivalent in the marginal rendering of Gen 6:3, "the going astray they are flesh." Errors through ignorance are Eri-Aku Recognized from errors of the heart and wilful errors (Lev 5:18; Nu 15:22; Ezk 45:20).
ESARHADDON, ęsar-hadôn (ܐܫܪܗܕܘܢ, 'Esarhaddon; Assy. Ahur-ab-iddina, "Ashur hath given a brother"): During his lifetime, Sennacherib, king of Assyria, made his favorite son, Esarhaddon (681-669 BC) his heir to the throne of Assyria, and although he was not the eldest son, he decreed that he should become the legal heir to the throne of Assyria. Sennacherib, having slain in 681, apparently by two of his sons, who are called in the OT Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 K 19 37), Esarhaddon proceeded to Nineveh, where the rebellion which followed the death of his father collapsed, having existed for about a month and a half. The OT informs us that the murderers of his father fled to Armenia. This is corroborated by the inscriptions which say that at Mecn, in the land of Hamathbat, which can be said to be in Armenia, Esarhaddon fought the rebels and defeated them; whereupon he was proclaimed king. His father had been so dispossessed by Babylon that he had attempted to annihilate the city by making it a swamp. Esarhaddon, however, having been infatuated with the ancient culture of the Babylonians, adopted a conciliatory attitude toward the people. Immediately he planned to restore the city on its old foundations, but the work were laid with impressive ceremonies, and in every way he endeavored to ameliorate the inhabitants by his gracious deeds. Even at Nippur evidences of his work in restoring the ancient shrine of E-li are seen. The king of Assyria and became his vassals, among them being Manasseh of Judah, were required to furnish building materials for his operations in Babylonia. His work in that land explains why the Judaeans king was incarcerated at Babylon (Ob 23-11) instead of Assyria. Esarhaddon was first compelled to defend the kingdom against the inroads of the hordes from the North. The Gimarrā (perhaps referring to Gomor of the OT), who were called Manda, seemed to pour into the land. A decisive victory was finally gained over them, and they were driven back into their own country. Afterward, the Medes and the Chaldaeans were also subjugated. He then directed his attentions toward the West. Sidon having revolted against him (Esarhaddon 41), he captured it, which after three years was finally captured and destroyed. He built another city upon the same site, which he called Kar-Esarhaddon, and endeavored to revivify its commerce. And, as is mentioned in the inscriptions, he rescued the city of Samaria (Samaria) with captives from Elam and Babylonia.

The capture of Tyre was also attempted, but, the city being differently situated, a siege from the land was insufficient to bring about submission, as it was impossible to cut off the commerce by sea. The siege, after several years, seems to have been lifted. Although on a great monolith Esarhaddon depicts Ba'al, the king of Tyre, kneeling before him with a ring through his lips, there is nothing in the inscriptions to bear this out. Siege to the city.

His work in Canaan was preparatory to his conquest of Egypt. Tirhakah, the Ethiopian king of Egypt, was attacked on the borders, but no victory was gained. Several years later he crossed the borders and gained a decisive victory at Ichzupri. He then proceeded to lay siege to Memphis, which soon capitulated; and, Egypt, to the confines of Nubia, surrendered to Assyria. Esarhaddon reorganized the government, and even changed the names of the cities. Nineteen years later, in 668, he invaded Egypt. In 668, Egypt revolted and Esarhaddon, while on his way to put down the revolt, died. He had arranged that the kingdom be divided between two of his sons: Ashurbanipal was to be king of Assyria, and Shamash-shum-ukin was to reign over Babylonia. The nobles decreed, however, that the empire should not be divided, but Shamash-shum-ukin was made viceroy of Babylonia.

ESAU, ęsō (ܐܣܘ, 'Esau); (Heb. Esau): Son of Isaac, twin brother of Jacob. The name was given on account of the hairy covering on his body at birth: "all over like a hairy garment" (Gen 25 25). There was a prenatal foreshadowing of the relation his descendants were to sustain to those of his younger brother, Jacob (ver 23). The moment of his birth also was signalized by a circumstance that betokened the same destiny (ver 26).

The young E. was fond of the strenuous, daring life of the chase—he became a skilful hunter, "a man of the field" (vel sīḥēk). His father warmed toward him rather than toward Jacob, because E.'s hunting expeditions resulted in meats that appealed to the old man's taste (ver 25). Returning hungry from one of these expeditions, however, E. exhibited a characteristic that marked him for the inferior position which had been foretold at the time of his birth. Enticed by the pottage which Jacob had boiled, he could not deny himself, but must, at once, gratify his appetite, though the calm and calculating Jacob should drink the birdbright soup at twice the price (vs 30-34). Impulsively he snatched an immediate and sensual gratification at the forfeit of a future glory. Thus he lost the headship of the people through whom God's redemptive purpose was to be wrought out in the world, no less than the mere secular advantage of the firstborn son's chief share in the father's temporal possessions. Though E. had so recklessly disposed of his birthright, he afterward would have secured from Isaac the blessing that appertained, had not the cunning of Reubenah provided for Jacob. Jacob, to be sure, had some misgiving about the plan of his mother (Gen 27 12), but she reassured him; the deception was successful and he secured the blessing. Now, too late, E. bitterly realized somewhat, at least, of his loss, though he blamed Jacob altogether, and himself not at all (vs 34-36). Hating his brother on account of the grievance thus held against him, he determined upon fratricide as soon as his father should pass away. But Jacob, having foreseen it, sent Jacob to Haran, to abide with his kindred till E.'s wrath should subside (vs 42-45).

E., at the age of forty, had taken two Hittite wives, and had thus displeased his parents. Reubenah had then appealed to E. to use his influence with Canaanitish women. Accordingly, he married a kinswoman in the person of a daughter of Ishmael (Gen 28 6 9). Connected thus with the "land of Seir," and by the fitness of that land for one who was to live by the sword, E. was dwelling there when Jacob returned from Mesopo-tamia. While Jacob dreaded meeting him, and took great pains to propitiate him, and made careful preparations against a possible hostile meeting, very earnestly seeking Divine help, E., at the head of four hundred men, graciously received the brother against whom his anger had so hotly burned. Though E. had thus cordially received Jacob, the latter was still doubtful about him, and, by a sort of duplicity, managed to become separated from him, E. returning to Seir; Jacob crossed over the land, and after again at the death of their father, about twenty years later (Gen 35 29). Of the after years of his life we know nothing.

E. was also called Edom ("red"), because he said to Jacob, "Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage" (Gen 25 8). The land in which he es-established himself was "the land of Seir," so called from Seir, ancestor of the Horites whom E. found there; and called also Edom from E.'s surname, and, it may be, too, from the red sandstone of the country (Sayce).

"Esau" is sometimes found in the sense of the descendants of E., and of the land in which they dwelt (Dt 2 5; Ob vs 6. S. B.S. 19).

LITERATURE

Eschatology of the OT (with Apocalyptic and Apocalyptic Writings).—By "eschatology," or doctrine of the last things, is meant the ideas entertained at any period of the future life, the end of the world, resurrection, judgment; in the NT, the Parousia, and the eternal destinies of mankind. In this art. it is attempted to exhibit the beliefs on these matters contained in the OT, with those in the Jewish apocalyptic and apocalyptic writings that fill up the interval between the OT and the NT.

The subject here treated has been dealt with by many writers (see "literature" below); by none more learnedly or ably than by Dr. R.

B) Dr. H. Charles in his work on Heb, Jewish Charles's and Christian eschatology (A Critical Work in Israel, in Judaism, and in Christianity). The present writer is, however, unable to follow Dr. Charles in many of his very radical critical positions, which affect so seriously the view taken of the literary evidence, and of the development of Israel's religion; is unable, therefore, to follow him in his interpretation of the religion itself. The subject, accordingly, is discussed in these pages from a different point of view from that of Charles.

Individual religion in Israel.—One special point in which the writer is unable to follow Dr. Charles in his treatment, which may be noticed at the outset, is in his view—now so generally favored—that in the time of the Exile religion was not an individual—that Jeh was thought of as concerned with the well-being of the people as a whole, and not with that of its individual members. "The individual was not the religious unit, but the family or tribe" (op. cit., 82) how anyone can entertain this idea in face of the plain indications of the OT itself to the contrary is to present the writer a mystery. There is, indeed, throughout the OT, a solidarity of the individual with his family and tribe, but not at any point to the exclusion of a personal relation to Jeh, or of individual moral and religious responsibility. The pictures of piety in the Book of Gen are nearly all individual, and the narratives containing them are, even on the critical view, older than the 9th or 10th centuries. Belief in the personal—Non-Mythological—individual, who is the subject, of the writers of the history, individuals; Moses, Joshua, Caleb, are individuals; the deeds of individuals are counted to them for righteousness; the sins of others slay them. If there had been ten righteous persons in Sodom, it would have been spared (Gen 18 32). It was as an individual that David sinned; as an individual he repented and was forgiven. Kings are judged on the character. It is necessary to lay stress on this at the beginning; otherwise the whole series of the OT conceptions is distorted.

I. Fundamental Ideas.—The eschatology of the OT, as Dr. Charles also recognizes, is dependent on, and molded by, certain fundamental ideas in regard to God, man, the soul and the state after death, in which lies the peculiarity of Israel's religion. Only, these ideas are differently apprehended here from what they are in this writer's learned work.

In the view of Dr. Charles, Yahveh (Jehovah), who under Moses became the God of the Heb tribes, was, till the time of the prophets, simply a national God, bound up with the land of God and with this single people; therefore, "possessing neither interest nor jurisdiction in the life of the individual beyond the grave. . . . Hence, since early Yahwism pos-

essed no eschatology of its own, the individual Israelite was left to his hereditary heathen beliefs. These beliefs, we find, were elements of "Ancestor Worship" (op. cit., 52; cf. 35). The view taken here, on the contrary, is, that there is no period known to the OT in which Jeh—whether the name was older than Moses or not need not be discussed —was not recognized as the God of the whole earth, the Creator of the world and man, and Judge of all nations. He is, in both Gen 1 and 2, the Creator of the first pair from whom the whole race springs; He judged the whole world in the Flood; He chose Abraham to be a blessing to the families of the earth (Gen 12 3); His universal rule is acknowledged (Gen 18 25); in infinite grace, displaying His power over Egypt, He chose Israel to be a people to Himself (Ex 19 5–6). The ground for denying jurisdiction over the world of the dead thus falls. The word of Jesus to the Sadducees is applicable here: "Have ye not read . . . I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?" (Mt 22 29). God is not the God of the dead, but of the living (Mt 22 32). The resurrection in answer to prayer point in the same direction (1 K 17 21 ff; 2 K 4 34 ff; cf Ps 16 10; 49 15, etc; see further below).

According to Dr. Charles, the OT has two contradictory representations of the constitution of man, and of the effects of death. The older or pre-prophetic view distinguishes between soul and body in man as surviving death (this is not easily reconcilable with the other proposition [p. 37] that "soul or nephesh is identical with the blood", and as retaining a certain self-consciousness, and the power of speech and movement of soul (pp. 39 ff.). This view is in many respects identical with that of ancestor worship, which is held to be the primitive belief in Israel (p. 41). The other and later view, which is thought to follow logically from the account in Gen 2 7, supposes the soul to perish at death (pp. 41 ff.). We read there that "Jehovah God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul. The 'breath of life' (nephesh hayyim) is identified with the "spirit of life" (ruah hayyim). In Gen 6 17, and is taken to mean that the soul has no independent existence, but is "really a function of the material body when quickened by the [impersonal] spirit" (p. 42). According to this view the degeneration of soul (pp. 43 f). This view is held to be the parent of Sadduceism, and is actually affirmed to be the view of Paul (pp. 43-44, 409)—the apostle who repudiated Sadduceism in this very article (Acts 23 6-9).

Body, soul and spirit.—The above view of man's nature is here rejected, and the consistency of the OT doctrine affirmed. The Bib. view has nothing to do with ancestor worship (cf. Dr. Charles's Book of Genesis, pp. 135-36). In Gen 1 26-27 man is created in God's image, and in the more anthropomorphic narrative of Gen 2 7, he becomes "a living soul" through a unique act of Divine inbreathing. The soul (nephesh) in man originates in a Divine inspiration (cf Job 32 8; 33 4; Isa 42 5), and is at once the animating principle of the body (the blood being its vehicle, Lev 17 11), with its appetites and desires, and the seat of the self-conscious personality, and source of rational and spiritual activities. These are higher activities of the soul which, in the OT, are specially called "spirit" (ruah). Dr. Charles expresses this correctly in what he says of the supposed earlier view ("the ruah had become the soul of the body in man, p. 46; see more fully the writer's God's Image in Man, 47 ff.). There is no ground for deducing "annihilation" from Gen 2 7. Everywhere in Gen man is regarded as formed for living fellowship with God, and capable of knowing, worshipping and serving Him. Sec Soul; Spirit.

It follows from the above account that man is regarded in the OT as a compound being, a union of body and soul (embracing spirit), both being elements in his one personality. His death was not to death, but to life—not life, however, in separation of the soul from the body (disembodied existence), but continued embodied life, with, perhaps, as its sequel, change and translation to higher existence (thus Enoch, Elijah; the saints at the Parousia). This is the true original idea of immortality for man (see Immortality). Death, accordingly, is not, as it appears in Dr. Charles, a natural event, but an abnormal event—a mutilation, separation of two sides of the soul, being never intended to be separated—due, as the Scripture represents it, to the entrance of sin (Gen 2 17; 3 19.22; Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 21.22). It is objected that nothing further is said in the OT of a "Fall," and a subjection of man to death as the result of sin. In truth, however, the whole picture of mankind in the OT, as in the NT, is that of a world turned aside from God, and under His displeasure, and death and all natural evils are ever to be connected in relation to the redemption of the body (Alliston, Allot. Theor. 368, 376 ff.; God's Image in Man, 198 ff, 249 ff.). This alone explains the light in which death is regarded by holy men; their longing for deliverance from it (see below); the hope of resurrection; the place which resurrection has in the redemption of the body (Rom 8 23 ff); after the pattern of Christ's resurrection (Phil 3 21), has in the Christian conception of immortality.

II. Conceptions of the Future Life—Sheol.—It is usual to find it contended that the Israelites, in contrast with other peoples, had not the conception of a future life till near the time of the Exile; that then, and after, there was a through the teaching of the prophets Future Life? and the discipline of experience, ideas of individual immortality and of judgment to come first arose. There is, however, a good deal of uncertainty of language, if not confusion, of thought, in such statements. It is true that there is development in the teaching on a future life, true also that important changes ensue inevitably at death, that is, when the spirit is withdrawn (p. 43). A future life is held to be the parent of Sadduceism, is actually affirmed to be the view of Paul (pp. 43-44, 409)—the apostle who repudiated Sadduceism in this very article (Acts 23 6-9).

I. Reserve on This Subject: Israel and Egypt in regard to the future, and the hopes Promises and Largely Wards of righteousness and penalties Temporal of transgression—were chiefly temporal. The sense of individual responsibility, as was shown at the commencement, there certain weaknesses in the theory. It was pointed out that the feeling of corporate existence—the sense of connection between the individual and his descendants—was strong, and the hopes held out to the faithful had respect rather to multiplication of seed, to the restoration of the fortunes of man, to temporal existence (never without piety as its basis) on earth, than to a life beyond death. The reason of this and the qualifications needing to be made to the statement will afterward appear; but that the broad facts are as stated every reader of the OT will perceive for himself. Abraham is promised that his seed shall be multiplied as the stars of heaven, and that the land of Canaan shall be given them to dwell in (Gen 12 1-3; 15); Israel is encouraged by abundant promises of temporal blessings (Dt 11 8 ff; 28 1-14), and warned by the most terrible temporal curses (28 15 ff); David has pledged to him the sure succession of his house as the reward of obedience (2 S 7 11 ff). So in the Book of Job, the patriarch's fidelity he is rewarded with return of his prosperity (ch 42). Temporal promises abound in the Prophets (Hos 2 14 ff; 14; Isa 1 19.26; 35, etc); the Book of Prov likewise is full of such promises (3 18 ff, etc).

All this makes it not the case that the Israelites had no conceptions of, or beliefs in, a state of being beyond death, or believed the death of the body to be the extinction of existence. This was very far from being the case. A hope of a future life it would be wrong to call it, for there was nothing to suggest hope, joy or life in the good sense, in the ideas they entertained of death or the hereafter. In this they resembled most peoples whose ideas are still primitive, but to whom it is a future State not a State at all. They stand as yet, though with Then differences to be afterward pointed out, were Denied on the general level of Sem peoples in their conceptions of what the future state was. This, also, the view taken by Dr. Charles. He recognizes that early Israelites thought attributed a "comparatively large measure of life, movement, knowledge and likewise power [?] to the departed in Sheol" (op. cit., 41). A people that does this is hardly destined to all notions of a future state. This question of Sheol now demands more careful consideration. Here again our differences from Dr. Charles will reveal themselves.

Belief non-mythological.—It would, indeed, have been amazing had the Israelites, who dwelt so long in Egypt, the Pharaoh's slave (some find the word life, been wholly destitute of ideas on that subject. What is clear is that, as already observed, they did not adopt any of the Egyptian notions into their religion. The simplicity of their belief in the God of their fathers kept them from giving up their ideas in the importation of mythological elements into their faith. The AEGYPTIANS may be said, indeed, to answer broadly to the Heb Sheol; but there is nothing in Israelitish thought to correspond to Osiris and his underworld in the Amenti, or the adventures and perils of the soul thereafter. What, then, was the Heb idea of Sheol, and how did it stand related to beliefs elsewhere?

That the soul, or some conscious part of man for which the name may be allowed to stand, does not perish at death, but passes into another state of existence, commonly called hereafter or abode of the dead, is an idea current in all ancient religions, even the most highly developed. The Egyptian belief in Amenti, or home of the dead, was enshrined in the Book of the Dead, which is a collection of religious texts and spells for the afterlife. The concept of a future state, or "life after death," is a fundamental idea in many religious traditions.

3. Survival of Conscious Part

Religious and Theological Conceptions of Sheol.—Sheol is often referred to as the "shadow of death" or "darkness," and is commonly understood as a place of punishment and isolation. It is described as a place where the wicked are consigned after death. However, the concept of Sheol is not limited to a negative afterlife, as it is also associated with ideas of transmigration and rebirth in certain religious traditions.

4. The Hebrew Idea of Sheol

The Hebrew word for "Sheol" is variously translated as "hell," "grave," or "deep well." It is often used metaphorically to describe the state of the dead. The Hebrew concept of Sheol is not as clearly defined as the Greek concept of Hades or the Christian concept of the afterlife. It is a complex idea, influenced by both natural and supernatural elements. The Hebrew concept of Sheol is not as developed as the Christian and Greek concepts, and it is often used in a more metaphorical sense.

III. The Religious Hope—Life and Resurrection

—Such is Sheol, regarded from the standpoint of nature; a somewhat different aspect

a) Nature is presented when it is looked at from a moral point of view. The idea of retribution seems absent. Reward and punishment are in this world; not in the state beyond. Yet, one must beware of drawing too sweeping conclusions even here. The state, indeed, of weakened consciousness and slumberous inaction of Sheol does not admit of much distinction, and the thought of exchanging the joys of life for drear existence in the grave conditions of Sheol has appealed the stoutest hearts, and provoked sore and bitter complaints. Even the Christian can bewail a life brought to a sudden and untimely close.
But even on natural grounds it is hardly credible that the pious Israelite thought of the state of the godly gathered in peace to their people as quite the same as that experienced under the ban of God's anger, and went down to Sheol having bear his humanity. There is a pregnancy not to be overlooked in such expressions as, "The wicked shall be turned back unto Sheol" (Ps 9 17), a "lowest Sheol" unto which God's anger burns (Dt 32 22), "uttermost parts of the pit" (Isa 14 15; Ezek 32 23) to which the proud and haughty in this life are consigned.

Dr. Charles goes so far as to find a "penal character of Sheol" in Pss 49 and 73 (op. cit., 74). Consolation breathes in such utterances as, "Mark the perfect man and the old man: for there is a happy end to the man of peace" (Ps 37 37), or (with reference to the being taken from the evil to come), "He entereth into peace; they rest in their beds, each one that walketh in his uprightness" (Isa 67 2; cf ver 21: "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked"). Even Balaam's fervent wish, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his" (Num 23 10), seems weakened when interpreted only of the desire for a peaceful and godly life, for not too much into OT expressions; the tendency at the present time would seem to be to read a great deal too little (P. Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture, I, 173 ff, 422 ff, may profitably be consulted).

To get at this true sense and meaning of the hope of immortality in the OT, however, it is necessary to go much farther than the idea of any b) Religious happier condition in Sheol. This dispite of mal region is never there connected Immortality with ideal and religious "immortality" in any form. Writers who suppose that the hopes which find utterance in passages of Ps and Prophets have any connection with existence in Sheol are on an altogether wrong track. It is not the expectation of a happier condition in Sheol, but the hope of deliverance from Sheol, and of restored life and fellowship with God, which occupies the mind. How much this implies deserves careful consideration.

It has already been seen that, in the OT, Sheol, like death, is not the natural fate of man. A connection with sin and judgment is implied in it. Whatever Sheol might be Like Death, connected Nothing to the popular, unthinking mind, to the reflecting spirit, that is, the great sin-element in the religion of Jeh, it was a state wholly contrary to man's true destiny. It was, as seen, man's dignity in distinction from the animal, that he was not created under the law of death. Disembodied existence, which is of necessity enfeebled, partial, imperfect existence, was no part of the Divine plan for man. His immortality was to be in the body, not out of it. Separation of soul and body, an after-existence of the soul in Sheol, belonging to the doom of sin. Dr. Salmond fully recognizes this in his discussion of the subject. "The penal sense of death colours all the OT says of man's end. It is in its thoughts where it is not in its words" (op. cit., 158; see the whole passage; cf also Oehler, Theol. of the OT, 243 ff; ET; A. E. Davidson, Theol. of the OT, 432 ff, 439 ff). The true type of immortality is therefore to be seen in cases like those of Enoch (Gen 5 24; cf He 11 5) and Elijah (2 K 2 11); of a bare "immortality of the soul," as Scripture has nothing to say on all hands conceded that, so far as the hope of immortality, in any full or real sense, is found in the OT, it is connected with religious faith and hope. It has not a natural, but a religious, root. It springs from the believer's trust and confidence in the living God; from his conviction that God—his God—who has bound him to Himself in the bonds of an unchanging covenant, whose everlasting arms are underneath him (Dt 33 27; cf Ps 90 1).

2. Religious, will, not destroy him even in Sheol Root of _—_ with him. Faith of Hope him victory over its terrors (of A. B. Immortality Davidson, Comm. on Job, 293-95; Salmond, op. cit., 175). Life is not bare existence, it consists in God's favor and fellowship (Ps 16 11; 20 5; 63 3). The relevant passages in Ps and Prophets will be considered after. Only, it is contended by the newer school, this hope of immortality belongs to a late stage of Israel's religion—to a period when, through the development of the monotheistic idea, the growth of the sense of individuality, the acute feeling of the contradictions of life, this great "venture" of faith first became possible. One asks, however, Was it so? Was this hope so entirely a matter of "intuitions, ventures, and forecasts of devout souls in moments of deepest experience or keenest conflict," as this way of considering the matter represents?

Not necessarily late.—That the hope of immortality could only exist for strong faith is self-evident. But did strong faith come into existence only in the days of the prophets or the Exile? Has it already been taken to the assumption that monotheism was a late growth, and that individual faith in God was not found in early times. It is not to be granted without a surmise that the commonly alleged, the Psalms and the Book of Job, which express this hope, are post-exilian products. If, however, faith in a covenant-keeping God is of earlier date—if it is present in patriarchal and Mosaic days—the question must. Why do we see no evidence from similar hopes? but rather, How should it be prevented from doing so? If a patriarch like Abraham truly walked with God, and received His promises, could he, any more than later saints, be wholly distrustful of God's power to keep and deliver him in and from Sheol? It is hard to credit it. It is replied, there is no evidence of such hope. Certainly these ancient saints did not write psalms or speak with the tongues of prophesies. But is there nothing in their quiet and trustful walk, in their tranquil deaths, in their sense of uncompleted promises, in their pervading confidence in God in all the vicissitudes of life, to suggest that they, too, were able to commit themselves into the hands of God in death and trusped that God was or would ultimately be, well with them in the future? Thus at least Jesus understood it (Mt 22 32); thus NT writers believed (He 11 13.14). Faith might falter, but in principle, this hope must have been bound up with faith from the beginning.

This raises now the crucial question, What shape did this hope of immortality assume? It was not, as already seen, an immortality enjoyed in Sheol; it could only then be a hope connected with him, and this hope was the power of Sheol—in essence, whether precisely formulated or not, a hope of resurrection. It is, we believe, because this has been overlooked, that writers on the subject have gone so often astray in their discussions on immortality in the OT. They have thought of a blessedness in the future life of the soul (thus Charles, op. cit., 76-77); whereas the redemption the Bible speaks of invariably embraces the whole personality of man, body and soul together. Jesus may be remembered, thus interprets the words, "I am the God of Abraham," etc (Mt 22 32), as a pledge not simply of continued existence, but of resurrection. This accords with what has been seen of the connection of death and sin together; but in the case of the immortality man would have enjoyed, had he not sinned, would have been an immortality of his whole person. It will be seen immediately that this is borne out by all the passages of hope of immortality in the OT. These never contemplate a mere immortality of the soul, but always imply resurrection.

(1) Not a late or foreign doctrine.—If the above is correct, it follows that it is a mistake to place the belief in resurrection so late as is often done, still more to derive it from Zoroastrianism (thus Cheyne, Origin of Psalmer, loc. viii) or other foreign sources. It was a genuine corollary from the fundamental Israelitish beliefs about God, man, the soul, sin, death, redemption (eastward, or the immemorial, and the unceasing effort of the child of God to accomplish its end), and gives expression to the extremely unanswerable question, “Oh that thou wouldest hide me in Sheol, that thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a time and remember me. . . . Thou wouldest call and I would answer thee: thou wouldest have desire to the work of thy hands” (vs 13–15; m reads “Thou shalt call,” etc.). Dr. A. B. Davidson says, “To his mind this involves a complete return to life again of the whole man” (Cambridge Comm. on Job, in loc.). This must be taken the splendid outburst in 19:25–27, “I know that my Redeemer liveth,” etc., which, whatever doubts may attach to the precise rendering of certain clauses, undoubtedly expresses a hope not inferior in strength to that in the verse just quoted.

(4) The Prophets.—The presence of the idea of resurrection in the Prophets is not doubted, but the passages are put down as exilic or pre-exilic times, and are explained of ‘spiritual’ or ‘national,’ and not personal, immortality (of individual). This view is often found as a principle in Book of Daniel, which Cheyne grants this regarding the passages in Isa. 25:6–8; 26:19: “This prospect concerns not merely the church-nation, but all of its believing members, and indeed all, whatever Jews are, who submit to the true king, Jeh” (op. cit., 402). There is no call for putting the remarkable passages in Hos.—After two days will he revive us: on the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live before him” (2:23). “I will raise them up from the pit of Sheol: I will redeem them from death: O death, where are thy plagues? O Sheol, where is thy destruction?” (13:14)—later than the time of that prophet. In them the idea of resurrection is already fully present; as is shown in the picture in Ezek 37:1–10 of the valley of dry bones. The climax is, however, reached in Isa 25:6–8; 26:19, above referred to, from which the individual element cannot be excluded (cf Salmond, op. cit., 211–12: “The theme of this great verse, 25:19, therefore, is a personal, not a corporate resurrection”).

(5) Daniel—resurrection of wicked.—Finally, in the OT we have the striking statement in Dan 12:2, “And many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And they that are wise and instructed to the utmost shall shine as the brightness of the firmament,” etc. The peculiarity of this passage is, that in it, for the first time, is announced a resurrection of the wicked as well as of the righteous (of cf. the NT Jn 5:28–29; Acts 24:15; Rev 20:12 f). The word “many” is not to be understood in contrast with “all,” though probably only Israel is in view. The event is connected with a “time of trouble” (ver 1) following upon the overthrow of Antichus, etc. The spiritual problem is, How did this conception of the resurrection of the wicked come about? The resurrection of the righteous, it has been seen, is a corollary from the covenant-faithfulness of Jeh.
But this does not apply to the wicked. Whence then does the idea come? It is given as a revelation, but even revelation connects itself with existing ideas and experiences. The resurrection of the wicked, certainly, does not arise, like that of the righteous, from the consciousness of an indissoluble union with God, but it may well arise from the opposite conviction of the judgment of God. As the sense of individuality grows strong—and it is granted that the teaching of the prophets did much to strengthen that feeling—and the certainty of moral retribution developed, it was inevitable that this should react on the conception of the future, in making it as certain that the wicked should be punished, as that the good should be rewarded, in the world to come. Naturally too, as the counter-part of the other belief, this shaped itself into the form of a resurrection to judgment. We are thus brought, as a last step, to consider the idea of judgment and its effects as found in the prophetic teaching.

It was seen that, under Moses, the promises and threatenings of God were mainly concerned to prepare and to show that the sense of distinctions in Sheth, though not absent, was vague and wavering. Reality Through temporal dispensations men were trained to faith in the reality of moral retribution, and the judgments of God on nations and individuals were still primarily viewed as pertaining to this life, there gradually shaped itself a further idea—that of an approaching consummation of history, or Day of Jehovah, when God's enemies would be completely overthrown. His righteousness fully vindicated and His kingdom established in triumph throughout the earth. The development of this idea may now briefly be exhibited. In this relation, it need only be stated that the writer does not follow the extraordinary mingling of the prophetic texts by certain critics, accepted, though with some misgiving, by Dr. Charles. The "Day of Jehovah," in the prophetic writings, is conceived of, sometimes more generally, as denoting any great manifestation of God's power in judgment or salvation (e.g. the locusts in Joel 2), sometimes more eschatologically, of the final crisis in the history of God's kingdom, as involving the overthrow of all opposition, and the complete triumph of righteousness (e.g. Isa 2 2-5; Joel 3; Am 9 11 ff; Zec 14, etc.). The two things are not unconnected; the one is the prelude, or anticipatory stage, of the other. That feature of prophetic vision sometimes spoken of as the absence of perspective is very conspicuous in the fact that chronology is largely disregarded, and the "Day of Jehovah" is seen looming up as the immediate background of every great crisis, in which the nation may for the time be involved (Assyrian invasions; Bab captivity; Maccabean persecution). The one thing ever certain to the prophet's mind is that the "Day" is surely coming—it is the one great, dread, yet for God's people joyful, event of the future—but the steps by which the goal is to be reached are only gradually revealed in the actual march of God's providence.

(1) Relation to Israel.—The "Day" is in its primary aspect a day of judgment (Isa 2 12); not, however, confined to the judgments only on the adversaries of Israel (Am 5 18 ff). Israel itself would be the first to experience the strokes of the Divine chastisement: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth. THEREFORE will I visit you all for your iniquity" (Am 3 2). God's judgments on Israel, while retributive, were also purifying and sifting; a "remnant" would remain, who would be the seed of a holier community (Isa 6 13; Am 9 9; Zeph 3 13,20, etc.). The Book of Hose beautifully exhibits this aspect of the Divine dealings.

(2) To the nations.—Of wider scope is the relation of the "Day" to the gentile world. The nations are used as the instruments of God's judgments on Israel (Assyrians, Chaldaeans, Persians), but they, too, would in turn be judged by Jehovah (cf. the prophecies against the nations in Isa, Jer, Ezek, Nah, Hab, etc.). The end would be, although this does not fully appear in every prophet, that a remnant of the heathen also would turn to Jehovah, and be rescued from the judgment (Zec 14 10). More generally, an extension of the kingdom of God would take place till the earth was filled with God's glory (e.g. Isa 2 2-5, with Mic 4 1-5; Isa 42 4; 60; 66 7-9; Jer 12 14-16; 16 19-21; Ezek 16 53-55). God will turn the captivity of Sodom and her daughters; Am 9 11; Hab 2 14; cf Ps 22 27-31; 60 2.5; 86 9; 87. These events, in prophetic speech, belong to "the latter days" (Isa 2 2; Jer 48 45; Ezek 38-39; Hos 3 5; Mic 4 1). In Daniel, Jehovah's great power is shown, and the "Day of the Lord," in the eschatological sense, is represented as broken in pieces by the kingdom of heaven, symbolized by a stone cut out of the mountain without hands (Dan 2 44.45; cf 7 27). The kingdom is given by the Ancient of Days to one "like unto the Son of Man." (Dan 7). Zechariah, the post-exilic prophets, share in these glowing hopes (Hag 2 5-7; Zec 2 10; 8 20-23; 14 16). In Mal is found one of the noblest of all the prophetic utterances: "From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same shall be great among the Gentiles," etc (1 11); and prophecy closes with the announcement of Him, Jehovah's messenger, by whom this "great and terrible day of Jehovah" is to be brought in (Mal 4).

The purview, in what is said of the "Day of Jehovah," is thus seen to be confined to earth, though the references to resurrection, and the passages in the close of Isa (66 17; 66 22) about "new heavens and a new earth" imply a further vista. The hope of immortality,—of resurrection life,—in the case of the righteous has already been considered. But what of judgment after death in the case of the wicked? Only dim and enigmatical are the statements, involving God's proprietary claims, in the earlier doctrine of Sheth. There are frequent references to "judgment" in the Pss, sometimes on the world (e.g. 96 13; 98 9; cf 50), sometimes on individuals (e.g. 1 5), but it is doubtful if any of them look beyond earth. Yet many things combined to force this problem on the attention.

(1) Incompleteness of moral administration.—There was the sharpening of the sense of individual responsibility in the prophetic age (Jer 31 29-30; Ezek 18 2 f), which the nation may for the time be involved (Assyrian invasions; Bab captivity; Maccabean persecution). The one thing ever certain to the prophet's mind is that the "Day" is surely coming—it is the one great, dread, yet for God's people joyful, event of the future—but the steps by which the goal is to be reached are only gradually revealed in the actual march of God's providence.

(2) Prosperity of wicked.—There was the special difficulty that the wicked did not always seem to meet with the punishment due to their misdeeds in time. On the other hand, it was thought of as a prophecy of the four kingdoms, these were also to flourish, to have success in their schemes, to triumph over the godly, who were afflicted and oppressed. This was the enigma that so painfully exercised the minds of the psalmists (Psa 10 17, 37, 49, 73, etc). The answer to this was found in the thought that the prosperity of the wicked did not endure. It came to a sudden end (Psa 37 35,36; 73 18-20), while the righteous had a sure compensation in the future (Ps 17 15; 49 15; 73 24, etc.) It was not, however, any going back to the days of the 21st cent. BC for both. Late Jewish and Christian additions are recognized in the latter. Formerly Dr. Charles dated Jub "before 10 AD." The chief dispute relates to chs 37–70 (the "Semiticides") of the Book of En. Three important sections are by Semitic
(Dr. Stanton, etc.) to be post-Christian (end of 1st cent. AD)—a view to which we incline; Dr. Charles and others place them in the 1st cent. BC. Most of the remaining portions of the book are assigned to dates in the first 2 centuries AD. The above should be added the notices of Jewish opinions in Jos.

(3) Rabbinical writings.—For rabbinical ideas, we are chiefly dependent on the Talmudic writings and the Tgs—sources whose late character makes their witness often doubtful (see Talmud; Tanquus). It is only possible to summarize very briefly the varying and frequently conflicting conceptions on exchatological subjects to be gleaned from this text. The rabbinical notions are often wildly imaginative, and, as far as they are not genuine developments from OT ideas, have value only as they may be supposed to throw light on the teachings of the early church. Two exceptions, little is to be gathered from the apocryphal books, and it will be best to treat the subject under headings.

1. Less definite conceptions.—In the apocryphal Euchus (Wisdom of the Son of Sirach) remain still on the old ground of Sheol as a place in which there is no remembrance, thanksgiving or retribution (17 27 28; 41 3 4, etc.; a somewhat different note is heard in 21 10). It is the same in Bar (2 17) and Tob (3 8) is the implications of the apocalyptic ideas, in Tob. "gathered to his fathers" (2 69),
"gathered to his people" (14 30). In the Book of Wis, the influence of Gr ideas is seen in a doctrine of the immortality of the soul only (2 23; 5 1 4; 13 4; 15 3; not a resurrection), possibly of preexistence (6 20). The wicked suffer punishment in Sheol (3 1 10; 5 1 14, etc.).

2. Ideas of Sheol.—Generally, however, in the apocalyptic books, a marked change is seen in the ideas of Sheol. It is still the place of the dead, but is regarded as a place where there is no remembrance or resurrection (21 1 13). One class of the wicked (those already punished in this life) remain there forever, while the others are raised, and pass to the lot of Gehenna (17 2). The righteous are in Paradise—the "garden of life" (61 12), "the garden of righteousness" (67 3). This character of Sheol as a place of punishment (intermediate or final) is met with frequently (Book of Jub 7 29; 22 22; 2 Macc 6 28; 2 Esd 14 6; 15 11; 15 2, etc.). In certain places, Dr. Charles says, "Sheol has become an abode of fire, and therefore synonymous so far with Gehenna. . . . In several passages in the Similitudes, and throughout En 91 104, Sheol and Gehenna are practically identical" (op. cit., 287).

V. Later Jewish Conceptions.—Apocryphal,
Apocalyptic, Rabbinical.—The sources of our knowledge of the exchatological conceptions
among the Jews in the immediately pre-Christian period are:

(1) Apocrypha.—The books of the OT Apoc
(see Apocrypha), taken over, with the exception of
2 Esd, from the LXX (1 2 Esd, but is speaking of the original version. The book is post-Christian (c 80
AD). 1

(2) Apocalyptic literature (see art. under that head, Pi, i, 11, 11).—The remains of this lit. consist of the Sib Or (oldest parts, Book III, from 2d cent. BC), the Book En (see below), the Ps Sol (70–40 BC), with the Ps Sol 2d cent. BC (1 David 190 AD), the Book of Jub, and XII P (see below), the Asc Isa (before 50 AD), and the Asc Isa (before 50 AD). A good deal turns on the dating of some of these books. Several (Apoc Bar, Ass M,Asc Is, with 4 Esd) are post-Christian.

The Book of Jub and XII P have also usually been regarded as such, but Dr. Charles argues for dates in the time of the 21st cent. BC for both. Late Jewish and Christian additions are recognized in the latter. Formerly Dr. Charles dated Jub "before 10 AD." The chief dispute relates to chs 37–70 (the "Semiticides") of the Book of En. Three important sections are by Semitic
(Dr. Stanton, etc.) to be post-Christian (end of 1st cent. AD)—a view to which we incline; Dr. Charles and others place them in the 1st cent. BC. Most of the remaining portions of the book are assigned to dates in the first 2 centuries AD. The above
should be added the notices of Jewish opinions in Jos.

OT ideas, have value only as they may be supposed to throw light on the teachings of the early church. Two exceptions, little is to be gathered from the apocryphal books, and it will be best to treat the subject
under headings.

1. Less definite conceptions.—In the apocryphal Euchus (Wisdom of the Son of Sirach) remain
still on the old ground of Sheol as a place in which there is no remembrance, thanksgiving or retribution (17 27 28; 41 3 4, etc.; a somewhat different note is heard in 21 10). It is the same in Bar
(2 17) and Tob (3 8) is the implications of the apocalyptic ideas, in Tob. "gathered to his fathers" (2 69),
"gathered to his people" (14 30). In the Book of Wis, the influence of Gr ideas is seen in a doctrine of the immortality of the soul only (2 23; 5 1 4; 13 4; 15 3; not a resurrection), possibly of preexistence (6 20). The wicked suffer punishment in Sheol (3 1 10; 5 1 14, etc.).

2. Ideas of Sheol.—Generally, however, in the apocalyptic books, a marked change is seen in the ideas of Sheol. It is still the place of the dead, but is regarded as a place where there is no remembrance or resurrection (21 1 13). One class of the wicked (those already punished in this life) remain there forever, while the others are raised, and pass to the lot of Gehenna (17 2). The righteous are in Paradise—
the "garden of life" (61 12), "the garden of righteousness" (67 3). This character of Sheol as a place of punishment (intermediate or final) is met with frequently (Book of Jub 7 29; 22 22; 2 Macc 6 28; 2 Esd 14 6; 15 11; 15 2, etc.). In certain places, Dr. Charles says, "Sheol has become an abode of fire, and therefore synonymous so far with Gehenna. . . . In several passages in the Similitudes, and throughout En 91 104, Sheol and Gehenna are practically identical" (op. cit., 287).

V. Later Jewish Conceptions.—Apocryphal,
Apocalyptic, Rabbinical.—The sources of our knowledge of the exchatological conceptions
among the Jews in the immediately pre-Christian period are:

(1) Apocrypha.—The books of the OT Apoc
(see Apocrypha), taken over, with the exception of
2 Esd, from the LXX (1 2 Esd, but is speaking of the original version. The book is post-Christian (c 80
AD). 1

(2) Apocalyptic literature (see art. under that head, Pi, i, 11, 11).—The remains of this lit. consist of the Sib Or (oldest parts, Book III, from 2d cent. BC), the Book En (see below), the Ps Sol (70–40 BC), with the Ps Sol 2d cent. BC (1 David 190 AD), the Book of Jub, and XII P (see below), the Asc Isa (before 50 AD), and the Asc Isa (before 50 AD). A good deal turns on the dating of some of these books. Several (Apoc
are raised; elsewhere all the righteous are raised and none of the wicked (En 61:5; 90:33; Ps Sol 3:16); sometimes there is to be a resurrection of all, just and unjust (En 61:12). 2 Mac. dwells much on this, which seems to embrace all Israel (3:16; 13:9; 7:9:14-23). As each reservoir tile there is no resurrection (7:14:36). In En 90:38, the bodies of the righteous are described as "transformed" in the resurrection (cf. the "Similitudes," 39:7-61:4; 62:15). The doctrine of the resurrection (universal) is taught in the Apoc Bar 30:2-5; 60, 61, and in 4 Esd 7:32-37. In Jos the Pharisees are said to have believed in the resurrection of the righteous only (Ant, XVIII, i, 3). This does not coincide with Paul’s statement in Acts 24:15.

(5) Judgment.—The reality of a final judgment, supervening upon the intermediate judgment in Sheol, is strongly affirmed in most of the apocalyptic books. The Book of En speaks much of this final judgment. It describes it as "the great day," "the righteous judgment," "the great day of judgment," "the last judgment," "the judgment of all eternity" (10:6:12, 16:1; 19:1; 22:4:11, 26:4; 90:26:27, etc.). Wicked angels and men are judged, and sentenced as Gehenna without a chance.

The Messiah: An interesting point is the relation of the Messiah to this judgment. With the exception of 4 Esd, the apocalyptic books are silent on the Messiah. In the apocalyptic books the Messiah does appear, but not always in the same light. In the Sib Or (3), Ps of Sol (17, 18), Apoc Bar (39, 40) and in 4 Esd (13:32f) the appearance of Messiah is associated with the overthrow and judgment of the ungodly worldly powers; in the older portions of En (90:16-25) God Himself executed the judgment, and it seems as if the Messiah does not appear till after. In the sec. of En, chs 37-70, on the other hand, the Messiah appears definitely as the judge of the world, and titles resembling those in the NT, "the Righteous One" (30:2; 63:6), "the Elect One" (40:5; 46:3, 4, etc.), above all, "the Son of Man" (46:2-4; 48:2, etc.), are given Him. It is these passages which suggest Christian influence, especially as the conception is not found elsewhere in pre-Christian Apocalyptic and the Book of John, which referring otherwise to En, makes no mention of these passages. Yet another idea appears in later Apocalypse, that, viz. of a limited reign of Messiah, after which take place the resurrection and judgment. 4 Esd has the usual secondary notion that, after a reign of 400 years, the Messiah dies (7:28:29). God in this case is the judge.

(6) The Messianic age and the Gentiles.—The Messianic age, when conceived of as following the judgment (the older view), is unlimited in duration, has Jesus for its center, and includes in the scope of its blessing the converted Gentiles (Sib Or 3:689-726; En 90:30:37; cf 48:5; 63:1; Ps Sol 17:32-35). The righteous dead of Israel are raised to participate in the kingdom. Already in En 90:28:29 is found the idea that the new Jesus is not the earthly city, but a city that comes down from heaven, where, as in 4 Esd, the Messianic reign is limited, the blessed Life after resurrection is transferred to heaven.

(7) Resurrection.—Little is to be added from the rabbinical conceptions, which, besides being difficult to ascertain precisely, are exceedingly confused and contradictory. Most of the ideas above mentioned appear in rabbinical teaching. With the development of nationalistic and world-power conceptions in later rabbinism the appearance of "Armilus"—an Antichrist. The reign of Messiah is generally viewed as limited in duration—400 years (as in 4 Esd), and 1,000 years being mentioned (of Schürer, Hist of Jewish People, Div II, Vol II, 179, ET): At its close takes place a renovation of the world, resurrection (for Israelites only, certain classes being excluded), judgment, and eternal heavenly happiness for the righteous. The punishments of the wicked appear mostly to be regarded as eternal, but the view is also met with of a limited duration of punishment (see authorities in Schürer, op. cit., 183; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, app. XIX, and other works noted in "Literature" below).

1. DOCTRINAL AND RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE.—The subject of eschatology plays a prominent part in NT teaching and religion. Christianity in its very origin bears an eschatological character. It means the appearance of the Messiah and the inauguration of His work; and from the OT point of view these form part of eschatology. It is true in Jewish apocalyptic theology there is not always included in the eschatological age proper, but often regarded as introductory to it (cf Weber, Judische Theol., 371ff). And in the NT also this point of view is to some extent represented, inasmuch as, owing to the great variety of the NT and the only partial fulfillment of the prophecies for the present, that which the OT depicted as one synchronous movement is now seen to divide into two stages, viz. the present Messianic age and the consummate state of the future. Even so, however, the NT draws the Messianic period into much closer connection with the strictly eschatological process than Judaism. The distinction in Judaism rested on a consciousness of difference in quality between the two stages, the content of the Messianic age being far less spiritually and transcendentally conceived than that of the final state. The NT, by spiritualizing the entire Messianic circle of ideas, becomes keenly alive to its affinity to the content of the highest eternal hope, and consequently tends to identify the two, to find the age to come anticipated in the present. In some cases this assumes explicit shape in the belief that great eschatological transactions have already begun to take place, and that believers have already attained to at least partial enjoyment of theMessianic privileges. Thus the present kingdom in Our Lord's teaching is one in essence with the final kingdom; according to the discourses in John eternal life is in principle realized here; with Paul there has been a prelude to the last judgment and resurrection in the death and resurrection of Christ, and the life in the Spirit is the first-fruits of the heavenly state to come. The strong sense of this may even express itself in the paradox that the Jewish eschatological state has arrived and the one great incision in history has already been made (He 2 3:5; 9 11; 10 1; 12 22-24). Still, even where this extreme consciousness is reached, it nowhere supersedes the other more common representation, according to which the present state continues to lie this side of the eschatological crisis, and, while directly leading up to the latter, yet remains to all intents a part of the old age and world-order. Believers live in the "last days," upon them "the ends of the ages are come," but "the last days," "the consummation of the age," still lies in the future (Mt 13 39.40.49; 24 3: 28 20; Jn 6 39.44.54; 12 48; 1 Cor 10 11; 2 Tim 3 1; He 1 2; 9 26; Jas 5 3; 1 Pet 5 1.20; 2 Pet 3 3; 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18).

The eschatological interest of early believers was no mere fringe to their religious experience, but the very heart of its inspiration. It expressed and embodied the profound supernaturalism and soteriological significance of the Christian adventure: the new world was not to be the product of natural development but of a Divine interposition arresting the process of history. And the deepest motive of the longing for this world was a conviction of the abnormal quality of the present time, a sense of sin and evil. This explains why the NT doctrine of salvation has grown up to a large extent in the closest interaction with its eschatological teaching. The present experience was interpreted in the light of the future. It is necessary to keep this in mind for a proper appreciation of the generally prevailing hope that the return of the Lord might come in the near future. Apocalyptic calculation had less to do with this than the practical experiences that the earnest of the supernatural realities of the life to come was present in the church, and that therefore it seemed unnatural for the full fruition of these to be long delayed. The subsequent reeding of this acute eschatological state has something to do with the gradual disappearance of the miraculous phenomena of the apostolic age.

II. General Structure.—NT eschatology attaches itself to the OT and to Jewish belief as developed on the basis of OT prophecy. It created on the whole no new system or new terminology, but rather incorporates much that was current, yet so as to reveal by selection and distribution of emphasis the essential newness of its spirit. In Judaism there existed at this time two distinct types of eschatological outlook. There was the ancient national hope which revolved around the destiny of Israel. Alongside of it existed a transcendental form of eschatology with cosmical perspective, which had in view the destiny of the universe and of the human race. The former of these represents the original form of OT eschatology, and therefore occupies a legitimate place in the beginnings of the NT development, notably in the revelations accompanying the birth of the Saviour, and in the earliest (synoptical) preaching of John the Baptist. There entered, however, into it, as held by the Jews, a considerable element of individual and collective exodaeism, and it had become identified with a literalistic interpretation of prophecy, which did not sufficiently take into account the typical import and poetical character of the latter. The other scheme, while to some extent the product of subsequent theologico-developmental, lies prefigured in certain later prophecies, esp. in Dn, and, far from being an imitation of that of its former, is rather as some at present maintain, represents in reality the true development of the inner principles of OT prophetic revelation. To it the structure of NT eschatology closely conforms itself. In doing this, it discards the impure motives and elements by which even this relatively higher type of apocalyptic writings a compromise is attempted between these two schemes after this manner, that the carrying out of the one is merely to follow that of the other, the national hope first receiving its fulfillment in a provisional Messianic kingdom of limited duration (400 or 1,000 years), to be superseded at the end by the eternal state. The NT does not follow the Jewish theology along this path. Even though it regards the present work of Christ as prefigured to the consummate order of things, it does not separate the two in essence or quality, it does not exclude the Messiah from a supreme place in the coming world, and does not expect a temporal Messianic kingdom in the future as distinguished from Christ's present spiritual reign, and as preceding the state of eternity. In fact the figure of the Messiah becomes central in the entire eschatological process, far more than is the case in Judaism. All the stages in this process, the resurrection, the judgment, the eschatological state, have according to the NT, receive the impress of the absolute significance which Christian faith ascribes to Jesus as the Christ. Through this Christocentric character NT eschatology acquires also far greater unity and simplicity than its Jewish counterpart. The two eschatological schemes. Everything is practically reduced to the great ideas of the resurrection and the judgment as consequent upon the Parousia of Christ. Much apocalyptic embroidery to which no spiritual significance attaches has diminished. While the overheated phantasy tends to multiply and elaborate, the religious interest tends toward concentration and simplification.

III. Course of Development.—In NT eschatology teaching a general development in a well-defined direction is traceable. The starting-point is the historic-dramatic conception of the two successive ages. These two ages are distinguished as hEidos ho aiôn, ho nín aiôn, ho en eiswla aiôn, "this age," "the present age" (Mt 13 22; 13 22; Lk 16 8; Rom 15 2; 1 Cor 1 20; 2 6: 3: 18; 2 Cor 4 4; Gal 1 4; Eph 1 21; 2 2; 6: 12; 1 Tim 6 17; 2 Tim 4 10; Tit 2 12), and ho aiôn ekheías, ho aiôn meión, ho aiôn enorhómenos, "that age," "the future age," "that age of God," "the age to come," "that age coming," "the future age" (Mt 13 22, 25; Lk 16 8; Eph 2 7; He 8 5). In Jewish lit. before the NT, no instances of the developed antithesis between these two ages seem to be found, but from the way in which it occurs in the teaching of Jesus and Paul it appears to have been current at that time. (The oldest undisputed occurrence is a saying of Johanan ben Zakkay, about 80 AD.) The contrast between these two ages is (esp. with Paul) that between the evil and transitory, and the perfect and abiding. Thus to each age belongs a character of things, a general order of things, and so the distinction passes over into that of two "worlds," in the sense of two systems (in Heb and Aram. the same word 'ôlâm, 'âlam, does service for both; in Gr aiôn usually renders the meaning "age," occasionally "world" [He 1 2; 11 3], kósmos meaning "world"; the latter, however, is never used of the future world). Cf Dlaman, Die Worte Jesu, 1, 132-46. Broadly speaking, the development of NT eschatology consists in this, that the two ages are increasingly recognized as answering to two spheres of being which coexist from of old, so that the coming of the new age assumes the character of a revelation and extension of the eternal order of things, rather than replacement of that of its former. Inasmuch as the coming world stood for the perfect and eternal, and in the realm of heaven such a perfect, eternal order of things already existed, the reflection inevitably arose that these two were in some sense identical. But the new significance which the antithesis assumes does not supersede the older historical character. The present crisis is interposed in the course of the lower as to bring the conflict to a crisis. The passing over of the one contrast into the other, therefore, does not mark, as has frequently been asserted, a recession of the eschatological warning. There is left, however, much that has been brought from the future to the present life. Esp. in the Fourth Gospel this "de-eschatologizing" process has been found, but without real warrant. The apparent basis for such a conclusion is that the realities of the future life are so vividly and intensely felt to be existent in heaven and from there operative in the believer's life, that the distinction between what is now and what will be hereafter enjoyed becomes less sharp. Instead of the supersEDURE of the eschatological, this means the very opposite, viz. its most real anticipati

But the same foreshortening of the perspective is also carried over from the OT into the NT delineation of general eschatology. The NT method of depicting the future is not chronological. Things lying widely remote in the historical scheme of things are brought together in the NT in a way that the life of Parousia is depicted. The interlude of history and the temporary as by it drawn closely together. This law is adhered to doubtless not from mere limitation of subjective human knowledge, but by reason of adjustment to the general method of prophetic revelation, a method which was a part of the very "parousia".

V. The Parousia.—The word denotes "coming," "arrival." It is never applied to the incarnation of Christ, and could be applied to His second coming only, partly because it had already become a fixed Messianic term, partly because there was a point of view from which the future appearance of Jesus appeared the sole adequate expression of His Messianic dignity and glory. The explicit distinction between "first advent" and "second advent" is not found in the NT. It occurs in Test. XII 2; Test. Abr. 92 16. In the NT it is approached in He 9 28 and in the use of ἐπίφανεία for both the past appearance of Christ and His future manifestation (2 Thess 2 8; 1 Tim 6 14; 2 Tim 1 10; 4 1; Tit 2 13 11,13). The second advent is more or less colored by the consciousness of the present bodily absence of Jesus from His own, and consequently suggests the thought of His future abiding presence, without, however, formally coming to mean the same as the Saviour's presence with believers (1 Thess 4 17). Parousia occurs in Mt 24 33 39; 1 Cor 16 23; 1 Thess 2 19; 3 13; 15; 5 23; 2 Thess 2 1 1 18; Jas 5 7 8; Pet 1 16; 3 14 2; 1 Jn 2 28. A synonymous term is apokalypsis. The Parousia was so closely linked with Christian origin, presupposing the preexistence of the Messiah in hidden form previous to His manifestation, either in heaven or on earth (cf. Apoc Bar 29 3; 30 1; 4 Ezr [2 Esd] 7 28; Test. XII 1, Test. Levi 18; Jn 7 27; 1 Pet 4 20). It could be adopted by Christians because Christ had been withdrawn into heaven and would be publicly demonstrated the Christ on His return, hence used with special reference to enemies and unbelievers (Lk 17 30; Acts 3 21; 1 Cor 1 8; 15 41). Another synonymous term is "the day of the [Our] Lord," "the day," "that day," "the day of Jesus Christ." This is the rendering of the well-known OT phrase. Though there is no reason in the NT to suppose that the day of Parousia should not be Christ, the possibility exists that in some cases it may refer to God (cf. "day of God" in 2 Pet 3 12). On the other hand, what the OT with the use of this phrase predicates of God is sometimes in the NT purposely transferred to Christ. "Day," while employed with the parousia generally, is, as in the OT, mostly associated with the judgment, so as to become a synonym for judgment (cf Acts 2 27; 1 Cor 4 9). The phrase is found in Mt 7 22; 24 36; Mk 13 32; Lk 12 17; 24 21; 21 34; Acts 2 20; Rom 13 12; 1 Cor 1 5; 5 13; 5 5; 2 Cor 1 14; Phil 1 6; 2 16; 1 Thess 5 2 4 (cf vs. 5 5); 2 Thess 2 2; 2 Tim 1 12; 18; 4; He 10 25; 2 Pet 3 10.

The parousia is preceded by certain signs heralding its approach. Judaism, on the basis of the OT, had worked out the doctrine of the "woes of the Messiah," ἡ χρήμα ἡ ἁμαρτία, the calamities and afflictions, the judgment and the beginning of the coming age being interpreted as birth pains of the latter. This is transferred in the NT to the parousia of Christ. The phrase occurs only in Mt 24 8; Mk 13 8, the idea, in Rom 8 22, and allusions to it occur in 1 Cor 7 26; 1 Thess 3 3; 5 3.
Besides these general “woes,” and also in accord with Jewish doctrine, the appearance of the Anti-christ is made to precede the final crisis. Without Jewish form the parousia is preparatory to it, the pouring out of the Spirit, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, the conversion of Israel and the preaching of the gospel to all the nations. The problem of the sequence and interrelation of these several precursors of the end is a most difficult and complicated one and, as would seem, at the present not ripe for solution. The “woes” which in Our Lord’s eschatological discourse (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21) are mentioned in more or less close connection with Jewish prophecies of: (1) widespread earthquakes and famines, “the beginning of travail”; (2) the great tribulation; (3) commotions among the heavenly bodies; of Rev 6 2-17. For Jewish parallels to these, cf Charles, Eschatology, 526, 327.

Because of this element which the discourse has in common with Jewish apocalypses, it has been assumed by Colani, Weissenbach, Weisszeker, Wendt, et al., that here two sources have been welded together, an actual prophecy of Jesus, and a Jewish or Jewish-Christian apocalypse from the time of the Jewish War 68-70 (HE, III, 5, 3). In the text of Mk this so-called “small apocalypse” is believed to consist of vs 7.8.14-20.24-27.30.31. But this hypothesis mainly springs from the disconnection to suppose that Jews are presupposing expectations, and the entirely unwarranted assumption that He must have spoken of the end in purely ethical and religious terms only. That the typically Jewish “woes” bear no direct relation to the disciples and the faithful is not an insufficient reason for declaring the prediction of them unworthy of Jesus. A contradiction is pointed out between the two representations, that the parousia will come suddenly, unexpectedly, and that it will come heralded by these signs. Esp. in Mk 13 30-32 the contradiction is said to be pointed. To this it may be replied that even after the removal of the assumed apocalypse the same twofold representation remains present in what is recognized as genuine discourse of Jesus, viz. in Mk 13 28-29 as compared with vs 32.33-37 and other similar admonitions to watchfulness. A real contradiction between vs 30 and vs 2 does not exist. Our Lord could consistently affirm both: “This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be accomplished, and of that day or that hour knoweth no one.” To be sure, the solution should not be sought by understanding “this generation” of the Jewish race or of the human race. It must mean, according to ordinary usage, the then living life or the time of the Jewish people. Nor does it help matters to distinguish between the prediction of the parousia within certain wide limits and the denial of knowledge as to the precise day and hour. In point of fact the two statements do not refer to the same matter at all. “That day or that hour” in vs 32 does not have “these things” of vs 30 for its antecedent. Both by the demonstrative pronoun “that” and by “but” it is marked as an absolute self-explanatory conception. It simply signifies as elsewhere the day of the Lord, the day of judgment. Of “these things,” the exact meaning of which phrase must be determined from the foregoing. Jesus declares that they will come to pass within that generation; but concerning the parousia, “that [great] day.” He declares that no one but God knows the time of its occurrence. The correctness of this view is confirmed by the preceding parable, Mk vs 28.29, where in precisely the same way “these things” and the parousia are distinguished. The question remains how to constitute the parousia among the “all these things” (Mt vs 33.34, Mk vs 30, “all things” (Lk vs 32) is intended to cover of what is described in the preceding discourse. The answer will depend on what is there represented as belonging to the precursors of the end, and what as strictly constituting part of the end itself; and on the other question whether one or several of the signs are only premonitory signs, or refers to two crises each of which will be heralded by its own series of signs. Here two views deserve consideration. According to the one (advocated by Zahn in his Comm. on Mt, 532-66) the signs cover only Mt 24 4-14. What is related afterwards, viz. “the abomination of desolation,” great tribulation, false prophets and Christs, commotions in the heavens, the sign of the Son of Man, all this belongs to “the end” itself, in the absolute sense of the last parousia and excepted from the prediction that it will happen in that generation, while included in the declaration that only God knows the time of its coming. The destruction of the temple and the holy city, though not explicitly mentioned in vs 4-14, would be included in what is there said of wars and tribulation. The prediction thus interpreted would have been literally fulfilled. The objections to this view are: (1) It is unnatural thus to abridge what is related in vs 15-26 under “the end.” From a formal point of view it does not differ from the phenomena of vs 4-14 which are “signs.” (2) It creates the difficulty, that the existence of the temple and the temple-worship in Jerusalem may be described as being long before the parousia. The “abomination of desolation” taken from Dan 11 13; 9 27; 11 31; 12 11; of Sir 49 2—according to some, the destruction of the city and temple, better a desecration of the temple-site by the setting up of the abomination, is spoken before the parousia. The “apocalyptic” character of this desecration, as a result of which it becomes desolute—and the flight from Judaea, are put among events which, together with the parousia, constitute the end of the world. This would seem to involve chiliasm of a very pronounced sort. The difficulty recurs in the strictly eschatological interpretation of 2 Thess 3 4, where “the man of sin” (see Sin, Man of) is represented as sitting in “the temple of God,” and in Rev 11 1.2, where “the temple of God” and “the altar” and “the court which is without the temple” and “the holy city” figure in an episode inserted between the sounding of the trumpet of the sixth angel and that of the seventh. On the other hand it ought to be remembered that eschatological prophecy may be encapsulated, and stereotyped formulas, which, precisely because they are fixed and applied to all situations, cannot always bear a literal sense, but must be subject to a certain degree of symbolical and spiritualizing interpretation. The premonitory meaning of the temple by Antichus Epiphanes may have furnished the imagery in which, by Jesus, Paul and John, anti-Christian developments are described of a nature which has nothing to do with Israel, Jesus or the temple, lit. understood. (3) It is not easy to conceive of the preaching of the gospel to all the nations as falling within the lifetime of that generation. It is true Rom 1 13; 10 18; 15 19-24; Col 1 6; 1 Tim 3 16; 2 Tim 4 17 might be quoted in support of such a view. In the statement of Jesus, however, it is definitely predicted that the preaching of the gospel to all the nations not only must happen before the end, but that it straightway precedes the end: “Then shall the end come” (Mt 24 14). To distinguish between the preaching of the gospel to all the nations and the completion of the gentle mission, as Zahn proposes, is artificial. As over against these objections, however, it must be admitted that the grouping of all these later phenomena before the end (Mt vs 21), all the easier avoids the difficulty arising from “immediately” in Mt 24 29 and from in “those days” in Mk 13 24.

The other view has been most lucidly set forth by Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels, 132-65. It makes Jesus' discourse relate to two things: (1) the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple; (2) the end of the world. The disciples are informed with respect to two points: (1) the time; (2) the signs. In the answer to the time, however, the two things are not sharply distinguished, but united into one prophetic perspective, the parousia standing out more conspicuously.

The definition of the time of this complex development is: (a) negative (Mk 13 5-8); (b) positive (vs 9-13). On the other hand in describing the signs Jesus discriminates between (a) the signs of the destruction of the temple (Mk 13 1-8) and (b) the signs of the parousia (vs 24-27). This view has in its favor that the destruction of the temple and the city, which in the question of the disciples figured as an eschatological event, is recognized as such in the answer of Jesus, and not alluded to after a mere incidental fashion, as among the signs. Esp. the version of Lk 21 20-24 proves that it figures as an event. This view also renders easier the restriction of Mk 13 30 to the first event and its signs. It places "the abomination of desolation" in the period preceding the national catastrophe. The view that the two events are successively discussed is further favored by the movement of thought in vs 32 ff. Here, after the Apocalyptic has been brought to a close, the narrative returns to the earthly aspects, and, in the same order as was observed in the prophecy, first, the true attitude toward the national crisis is defined in the parable of the Fig Tree and the solemn assurance appended that it will happen in this generation (vs 32); the true perspective toward the parousia is defined (vs 32-37). The only serious objection that may be urged against this view arises from the close concatenation of the section relating to the national crisis with the section relating to the parousia (Mt 24 29; "immediately after those days"; Mk 13 24: "in those days"). The question is whether this mode of speaking can be explained on the principle of the well-known fore-shortening of the perspective of prophecy. It cannot be a priori denied that this peculiarity of prophetic vision may have here characterized also the outlook of Jesus into the future which, as ver 32 shows, was the prophetic outlook of His human nature, as distinct from the Divine omniscience. The possibility of a sequence in perspective with chronological succession is in the present case guarded against by the statement that the gospel must first be preached to all the nations (of Acts 3 19.25.26; Rom 11 25; Rev. 6 2) before this and can come that no one knows the time of the parousia except God, that there must be a period of desolation after the city shall have been destroyed, and that the final coming of Jesus to the people of Israel will be a coming not of judgment, but in one in which they shall hail Him as blessed (Mt 23 38.39; Lk 13 34.35), which presupposes an interval to account for this changed attitude (cf Lk 21 24: "until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled"). It is not necessary to carry the distinction between the two crises joined together here into the question as put by the disciples in Mt 24 3, as if "when shall these things be?" related to the destruction of the temple exclusively, as the other half of the question speaks of the coming of Jesus and the end of the world. Evident in both is the universal (or cosmical) point of view (compactly considered) and the signs are distinguished. "These things" has its antecedent not exclusively in ver 2, but even more in 23 38.39. The disciples desired to know not so much when the calamitous national catastrophe would happen but what the subsequent coming of the Lord would take place, which would put a limit to the distressing results of this catastrophe, and bring with it the re-acceptance of Israel into favor. This explains also why Jesus does not begin His discourse with the national crisis. The parousia, the coming of the Son of Man, is to occur after the parousia, to define negatively and positively the time of the latter, and that for the purpose of warning the disciples who in their eagerness for the ultimate issue were inclined to forestall the preceding calamitous development. That Jesus could actually join together the national and the cosmical crises appears from other passages, such as Mt 10 23, where His interpretation for the deliverance of the fugitive disciples is called a "coming" of the Son of Man (Mt 14 28). The coming of the Son of Man in His kingdom (Mt), or a coming of the kingdom of God with power (Mk), or a seeing of the kingdom of God (Lk) is promised to some of that generation. It is true these passages are frequently referred to the parousia, because in the immediately preceding context the latter is spoken of. The connection of thought, however, is not that the parousia and this promised coming are identical. The proximate coming is referred to as an encouragement toward faithfulness and self-sacrifice, just as the reward at the parousia is mentioned for the same purpose. The conception of an earlier coming also receives light from the confession of Jesus at His trial (Mt 26 64); where the possibility to see the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven and to the sitting at the right hand of God; cf Mk 14 62; Lk 22 69). The point of the declaration is, that He who now is condemned will in the near future appear in theophany for judgment upon His judge. The closing discourses of Jn also have the conception of the coming of Jesus to His disciples in the near future for an abiding presence, although here this is associated with the advent of the Spirit (Jn 14 18.19.21.26; 16 19.22.23). Finally the same idea recurs in Rev, where it is equally clear that a preliminary visitation of Christ and not the parousia for final judgment can be meant (3 5.16; 3 320; cf also the pl. "one of the days of the Son of man" in Lk 17 22).

To the events preceding the parousia belongs, according to the uniform teaching of Jesus, Peter and Paul, the conversion of Israel (Mt 3 1-10; Lk 3 1-6; Acts 1 19). This event is closely related to the "refreshing" and "the times of restoration of all things" is made dependent on the [eschatological] sending of the Christ to Israel), and this again is said to depend on the repentance and conversion and the blotting out of the sins of Israel; Rom 11, where the problem of the unbelief of Israel is solved by the twofold proposition: (1) that there is even now among Israel an election according to grace; (2) that in the future there will be a comprehensive conversion of Israel (vs 5.25-32).

Among the precursors of the parousia appears further the Antichrist. The word is found in the NT in 1 Jn 2 18.22; 4 3; 2 Jn ver 7 only, but the conception occurs also in the Synoptics, in Paul and in Rev. There is no instance of its earlier occurrence in Jewish lit. Antis may mean "in place of" and "against"; the former includes the latter. In Jn it is not clear that the heretical tendencies or hostile powers connected with the anti-Christian movement are the subject of a false claim to the Messianic dignity. In the Synoptics the coming of false Christs and false prophets is predicted, and not merely as among the nearer signs (Mt 16 6), but also in the remote eschatological period (vs 22). With Paul, who describes it otherwise than in the Synoptics, the conception is clearly the developed one of the counter-Christ. Paul ascribes to him an apobasispeia as he does to Christ (2 Thes 2 6.8); his manner of working and its pernicious effect are set over against the manner in which God acts in the destruction of the beast forks (v 9–12). Paul does not treat the idea as a new one; it must have come down from the OT and Jewish eschatology and have been more fully developed by NT prophecy; cf in Dnl 7 20; 8 10.11 the supernaturally magnified figure of the great enemy. According to Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 1895) and Bousset (Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des NT und der alten Kirche, 1875) the origin of the conception of a final struggle between God and his enemy must be sought in the ancient myth of Chaos conquered by Marduk; what had happened at the beginning of the world was transferred to the end. Then this was anthropomorphized, first in the form of a false Messiah, later in that of a political tyrant or oppressor. But there is no need to assume any other source for the idea of a last enemy than OT eschatological prophecy (Ezk and Dnl and Zec). And no evidence has so far been adduced that the Pauline idea of a counter-Messiah is of pre-Christian origin. This can only be maintained by carrying back into the older period the Antichrist tradition as found later among Jews and Christians. It is reasonable to assume in the present state of the evidence that the idea of the great eschatological enemy and that of the counter-Messiah, is a product of Christian prophecy. In fact even the conception of a single last enemy does not occur in pre-Christian Jewish lit.; it is found for the first time in Apoc 4 12, which changes the general conception of 4 Ear (one) to this effect. Even in the eschatological discourse of Jesus the idea is not yet unified, for false Christes and false prophets in the plural are spoken of, and the instigation (hence the name) is by Satan, the head of the great enemy. If any such presupposed, remains in the background. In the Epistle of Jn the same plural representation occurs (1 Jn 2 18.22; 2 Jn ver 7), although the idea of a personal Antichrist in whom the movement culminates is not only familiar to the author and the reader (1 Jn 2 18, "as ye heard that antichrist cometh"), but is also accepted by the writer (4 3, "This is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world already"); cf 2 Thes 2 7, "The mystery of lawlessness doth already work").

Various views have been proposed to explain the concrete features of the Pauline representation in 2 Thes 2 and that of Rev 13 and 17. According to the places where the development of the Rom empire will be placed until after Rev 18; 18 3. But Paul, as in his other writings, assumes an earlier date, 3rd cent. 3rd cent. 1869, Paul has in mind the person whom the Jews will acclaim as their Messiah. The idea would then be the precipitate of Paul's experience of hostility and persecution from the part of the Jews. He expected that this Jewish Messianic pretender would, helped by Satanic influence, overthrow the Rom power. The continuance of the Rom power is "that which restrains," or as embodied in the emperor, "one that restraineth now" (2Thes 2 6–7). (For an interesting view in which the rôle played by these two powers are reversed, cf Warfield in Expos, 3d ser., IV, 30–44.) The objection to this is that "the lawless one," not merely from Paul's or the Christian point of view, but in his own awed in- tent, opposes and exalts himself against all that is called God or worshipped. This no Jewish pre- tender to the Messiahship could possibly do: his very Messianic position would preclude it. And the conception of a counter-Christ does not necessarily refer to the idea of Messiahship in Paul's mind has been raised far above its original national plane and assumed a universalistic character (cf Zahn, Einleitung in das NP, I, 171). Nor does the feature that according to ver 4, "the lawless one" will take his seat in the temple favor the view in question, for the description and later similar experiences may well have contributed to the figure of the great enemy the attribute of desecrator of the temple. It is not necessary to assume that by Paul this was understood literally; it must mean no more than that the Antichrist will usurp for himself Divine honor and worship. Pa- triotic and later writers gave to this feature a chilias- tic interpretation, referring it to the temple which was to be rebuilt in the future. Also the allegorical usage of the temple of the Christian church has found advocates. But the terms in which "the lawless one" is described exclude his voluntary identification with the Christian church. According to a second view the figure is not a Jewish but a pagan one. Kern, Baur, Hilgenfeld and many others, assuming that 2 Thes is post-Pauline, connect the prophecy with the at-one-time current expectation that Nero, the great persecutor, would return from the East or from the dead, and, with the help of Satan, set up an anti-Christian kingdom. The same expectation is assumed to underlie Rev 13 3.12.14 (one of the heads of the beast smitten unto death and his death stroke healed); 17 8.10.11 (the beast that was, and is not, and is about to come from the abyss). As to Paul's description, there is nothing in it to make us think of a Nero reappearance or revived. The parousia (one) of the lawless one does not imply it, for parousia as an occurrence is not "return" but "advent." The Antichrist is not depicted as a persecutor, and Nero was the persecutor par excellence. Nor does what is said about the "mending" or the "hinderer" suit the case of Nero, for the latter should be a "false" or "not real," if any, which hold back Nero's reappearance. As to Rev, it must be admitted that the rôle here ascribed to the beast would be more in keeping with the character of Nero. But, as Zahn has well pointed out (Einleitung in das NP, II, 617–20), this interpretation is incompatible with the date of Rev. This book must have been written at a date when the earlier form of the expectation that Nero would reappear still prevailed, viz. that he would return from the East to which he had fled. Only when too long an interval had elapsed to permit of further belief in Nero's still being alive, was this changed into the superstition that he would return from the dead. But this change in the form of the belief did not take place until after Rev 18; 18 3. Consequently, if the returning Nero did figure in Rev, it would have to be in the form of one reappearing from the East. As a matter of fact, however, the beast or the king in which Nero is found is said by Rev 18 1; 4 8 to have been smitten unto death and headed of the death stroke, to come up out of the sea or the abyss, which would only suit the later form of the expectation. It is therefore necessary to dissociate the description of the beast and its heads and horns entirely from the details of the succession of the Rom empire; the prophecy is more grandly staged; the description of the beast as par- taking of several animal forms in 13 2 refers back to Dnl, and here as there must be understood of the one world-power in its successive national mani- festations, which already excludes the possibility that a mere succession of kings in one and the same empire can be thought of. The one of the heads smitten unto death and the death stroke healed must refer to the last of the seven preceding kings. Therefore in one of its phases, but afterward to revive in a new phase. Hence here already the healing of the death stroke is predicted, not merely of one of the heads, but also of the beast itself (cf 13 3 with 13}
12) And the same interpretation seems to be required by the mysterious statements of ch 17, where the woman sitting upon the beast is the metropolis of the world-power, changing its seat together with the latter, yet so as to retain, like the latter in all its transformations, the same character whence she bears the same name of Babylon (ver 5). Here as in ch 13 the beast has seven heads, i.e. passes through seven phases, which idea is also expressed by the representation that these seven heads are seven kings (ver 10); for, as in Dnl 7, the kings stand not for individual rulers, but for kingdoms, phases of the world-power. This explains why in ver 11 the beast is identified with one of the kings. When here the further explanation, going beyond ch 13, is added, that the beast was and is not and is about to come up out of the abyss (ver 8), and in vs 10.11 that of the seven kings five are fallen, one is, the other is not yet come, and when he comes must continue a little while, to be followed by the eighth, who is identical with the beast that was and is not, and with one of the seven, the only way to reconcile these statements lies in assuming that "the beast," while in one sense a comprehensive figure for the world-power in all its phases, can also in another sense designate the supreme embodiment and most typical expression of the power in the past; in respect to this acute phase the beast was and is not and is to appear again, and this acute phase was one of seven successive forms of manifestation, and in its reappearance will add to this number the eighth. Although the most visible scene in the employment of the figures thus results, this is no greater than when on the other view Nero is depicted both as "the beast" and as one of the heads of "the beast." Which concrete monarchies are meant by these is of prime importance. For a suggestion of Zahn, op. cit., II, 624: (1) Egypt; (2) Assyria; (3) Babylon; (4) the Medo-Pers power; (5) the Graco-Alexandrian power; (6) the Rom power; (7) a short-lived empire to succeed Rome; (8) the eighth and last phase, which will reproduce in its acute character the fifth, and will bring on the scene the Antichrist, the counterpart and, as it were, reincarnation of Antiochus Epiphanes. The see evidently has his present in the same phase of the beast, and this renders it possible for him to give in 17 9 another turn to the figure of the seven heads, interpreting it of the seven mountains on which the woman sits, but this apocalyptic looseness of hand is objectionable to the view just outlined, since on any view the two incongruous explanations of the seven heads as seven mountains and seven kings stand side by side in vs 9 and 10. Nor should the mysterious number of 666 in 13 18 be appealed to in favor of the reference of the beast to Nero, for on the one hand quite a number of other equally plausible or implausible solutions of this riddle have been proposed, and on the other hand the interpretation of Nero is open to the serious objection, that in order to make out the required number from the letters of Nero's name this name has to be written in Heb characters and that with scriptio defectiva of Kesar (Nerón Késar) instead of Késar, the former of which two peculiarties is out of keeping with the usage of the book elsewhere (cf Zahn, op. cit., II, 622, 624, 625, where the chief proposed explanations of the number 666 are recorded). Under the circumstances the interpretation of the figure of the beast and its heads must be allowed to pursue its course independently of the number 666, and regard to which no certain conclusion appears attainable.
